THE QUIVER:

An Illustrated Magazine

FOR

SUNDAY AND GENERAL READING.

VOL. X.—TONED PAPER SERIES.

CASSELL PETTER & GALPIN:
LONDON, PARIS & NEW YORK.
1875.

XUM

ILLUSTRATIONS.

PAGE

HAPPY FACES AND A LOYAL WIFE . . Frontispiece
THE ORCHARD 1
"I REALLY CANNOT TAKE UPON MYSELF THE BURDEN OF YOUR SUPPORT!" 9
LADY ALICE 17
"NOW REALLY AND UTTERLY ALONE" 25
FLITTING FRIENDS 33
"AND THIS IS MISS GRANTON!" 41
THE VOICE OF THE STREAM 49
"I'M SURE, SIR, IT'S TRULY THANKFUL I AM!" 57
"SITTING IN THE SHADE TO SEW" To face page 60
THE OLD OAK 65
"INCITING HER PET TO RUN OUT AND FETCH IT" 73
A SEA-SIDE FABLE 81
"YOU ARE STILL VERY PALE AND THIN!" . . 89
CRAZY KATE 97
"I DO NOT CHOOSE TO TELL YOU ALL MY SECRETS, SIR!" 104
THE MOUNTAIN STREAM 113
"LOOKING OVER THE SKETCHES THE ARTIST HAD ADDED TO HIS PORTFOLIO" 121
THE FORTUNE OF WAR 129
"YOUR BROTHER IS TOO PROUD!" 137
VAIN REGRETS 145
"IT HAD BEEN HER MOTHER'S" 153
THE WRITING ON THE SHORE 161
"SHE IS OUR CHILD; LET US HAVE PATIENCE WITH HER" 169
TRANQUILLITY 177
"WAVING HER AN AFFECTIONATE ADIEU" . . 185
WHEN THE EARTH IS IN TEARS AND THE TREES ARE ALL BARE . . . . . To face page 188
THE ROBIN 193
"SHE WAS KNITTING, OR RATHER TRYING TO KNIT" 201
THE OUTCAST 209
LINES ON A CAGED LARK 217
"FOR ME TO LIVE IS CHRIST, TO DIE IS GAIN" 225
"THEN SHE SEATED HERSELF BESIDE EDA" . . 233

PAGE

THE SINGER 241
"THROWING HIMSELF INTO A CHAIR, COVERED HIS FACE WITH HIS HANDS" 249
AT THE WINDOW 257
"LEAVING HER AT MR. DE COURCY'S DOOR" . 265
FIRST FLOWERS 273
"MARK'S DESPISED AND NEGLECTED WIFE" . . 281
MORNING 289
"CLINGING TO EDA, HID HER FACE ON THE YOUNG GIRL'S SHOULDER" 297
SPRING-TIME 305
"HOW CAME THIS PHIAL IN THE ROOM?" . . 313
REPOSE 321
"THERE HAD BEEN ENOUGH SAID" 329
THE SEA-WALL 337
"SHE STAYED TILL HER ALARM, AND A LITTLE NATURAL RESENTMENT OF HIS INJUSTICE, PASSED AWAY" 345
THE SONG OF THE BELLS 353
"FAIR AND SWEET, LIKE THE WHITE ROSE SHE HAD FASTENED IN HIS BREAST" 361
APRIL THOUGHTS 369
"HE FLUNG HIS ARMS ROUND HER NECK, AND KISSED HER HEARTILY" 377
"STILL HAPPY IN OUR MUTUAL LOVE" To face page 384
A TOILER BY THE SEA 385
"HE SLIPPED SOFTLY FROM THE ROOM" . . . 393
CONTRASTS 401
"BERTRAND GENTLY TOOK HER HAND" . . . 409
WAITING 417
"THE HOME OF YOUTH STANDS RUINED THERE" To face page 423
"LEANING UPON AN OLD TOMBSTONE" 425
THE "STILL SMALL VOICE" 433
"'MY DAUGHTER!' HE CONTINUED, WAVING HIS HAND TOWARDS THE PRETTY FIGURE AT THE PONY'S HEAD" 441
AT REST 449
"'YOU ARE HARDLY HER GUEST,' SAID CHARLIE" 457

PAGE

LITTLE SAMMY 465

"I HAVE COME TO HAVE A CHAT WITH YOU, MRS. WYNDHAM" 473

SUMMER MORNING 481

"WHAT HAVE YOU FOUND, MARY?—WHAT IS IT?" 489

SABBATH CALM 497

"HER HANDS FULL OF DEWY FLOWERS" . . . 505

SHOULD I STAY ON MY WAY? 513

"SHE LAID HER HEAD AGAINST ONE OF THE FRIENDLY TREES" 520

"GOOD-BYE" 529

"MARY STARTED AS IF SHE HAD RECEIVED A STAB" 537

THE EVIL DREAM 545

"SHE PUT HER LITTLE HANDS AGAINST HIS BREAST, AND PUSHED HIM BACK" 553

MUSIC AND POETRY 561

"MARY'S SOFT VOICE WHISPERING SOOTHING WORDS INTO HER EAR" 568

FOURSCORE AND FIVE 577

"TWISTING A LONG SPRAY OF IVY AMONGST HER BRIGHT CURLS" 585

THREE ANSWERS TO THE SWALLOW 593

"MARY SAT AT THE SIDE OF THE VESSEL NEAR THE HELM" 601

EVIL THOUGHTS 609

"IN THE FADING LIGHT HE HAD TO GO QUITE CLOSE TO DISTINGUISH WHAT WAS WRITTEN" 617

HEATHER BELLS 625

"LYING ON THE GROUND AT THE FOOT OF A TREE" 633

LET THEM SLEEP 641

PAGE

"'THEY CALL ME PIERRON,' SAID THE LITTLE WAIF, AS HE RAN ALONG BY HER SIDE . . 649

MOTHER'S GARDEN 657

"HE WAS ASLEEP, IN THE ATTITUDE OF A TIRED CHILD, WITH ONE ARM ROUND HIS HEAD" 665

THE FIRST STONE 673

"VALERIE BURST IN, BAREHEADED" 681

WEAVING 689

"ALL NEEDFUL THINGS ARE BY GOD'S WORD SECURE. THE BREAD IS PROMISED, AND THE WATER SURE" 679

MOUNTAIN AIR 705

"SHE OFTEN SENT TO ASK MARY TO COME FOR AN HOUR OR TWO TO HELP AND CHEER THEM" 712

CHRIST AND HIS TEACHING 721

"YOU WILL DREAM THROUGH YOUR LIFE, AND DIE, AND BE FORGOTTEN" . To face page 723

"THE GREY SKY AND THE GREY-GREEN OCEAN" 729

LAURENCE HERNE'S FIRST PICTURE 737

"LAURA CLUNG TO HER WITH A FRANTIC GRASP" 745

THE THREE FLOWERS 753

"OH, CHIDE ME NOT, FOR I AM BENT ON FOLLOWING THY FEET" 761

DETHRONED 769

"MARY HAD TURNED TO THE WINDOW" . . . 777

COMING BACK 785

"GRANDFATHER SITS BY HIS COTTAGE DOOR" . 793

NORTHWARD HO! 801

"GREEN GRASSY ISLES, WHERE FOUNTAINS PLAY, AND FAN-PALMS VEIL THE BURNING DAY' . . 809

DESOLATION 817

"SHE EMBRACED MARY WARMLY" 825

THE QUIVER

(Drawn by WILLIAM SMALL.)

THE ORCHARD.

WITHIN the orchard's many shadows,
Flitting softly round our feet,
While, burning hot, the sunlight shot
Between them in the summer heat;
We went at times, by dock-leaves falling
Limp beside the mossy walling.

The way from garden into orchard
  Through an arched gateway led,
Where rose a dovecote up above
  The grey old arch above the head,
By flow'r-beds of the oldest fashion,
Sweet with rose and red carnation.

There spreading trees of mossy oldness,
  This and that way, leaning lay,
And others, young and upright, sprung
  For year-stunned old ones cast away,
Within a thorny hedge that girded
Ground, and tree-bough many-birded.

There shone the boughs in May's gay sunshine
  Out in blooth as white 's a sheet,
Or else their flowers fell in showers
  Softly down about our feet;
Or else they nodded, many-appled,
Green, and lastly ruddy-dappled.

And then the time of apple-taking
  Came, and apples pattered down,
Below the trees, in twos and threes,
  Full thick, and yellow, red and brown,
To folks that filled, from baskets by them,
Bags as full as they could tie them.

CHRIST AND MELCHISEDEC.

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN; AUTHOR OF "AIDS TO PRAYER," ETC.

"For this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him; to whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace; without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God; abideth a priest continually."—HEB. vii. 1—3.

THE Epistle to the Hebrews occupies a most important place in our revealed theology. It connects itself with both dispensations, and throws a mutually reflected light upon both. By means of it we seem to be carried up to an exceeding high mountain of thought, whence we can behold on the one side the types and shadows of the law, and on the other their verified fulfilment and consummation in the visible transactions of the Gospel—can see, on the one hand, a sharply-defined and significant outline, plainly prefigurative of something which was then to come; on the other, this outline filled up, coloured in, made plain to the eye of faith as a map or plan of the Divine benevolence—the scheme unfolded by which God would save the world.

In the portion of the Epistle from which our text is taken the apostle is endeavouring to set forth the authority, dignity, and efficacy of the Saviour's priesthood, and that especially in relation to the priests that were under the law. And the basis of his argument is, that the Levitical priesthood was essentially temporary; that it bore the impress of something that was designed to pass away; being, in fact, an intermediate institution between two other priesthoods—one that had gone before, and another which was to come after. Accordingly, he shows that antecedently to the giving of the law and the setting up of an order of priesthood whose successions should be continued in the line of Aaron, there had risen up a priest who, in his resemblance to Christ, was far before any priests of the Levitical succession—one who, in his name, in his genealogy, in the conjunction of his offices, in the several functions he discharged, as well as in the peculiar homage which he received, stood out as an eminent type of Christ from the earliest periods of the world; that to this illustrious personage the great founder of their nation had borne witness; that Abraham their father had deemed it meet to be blessed of him; and that to David, rejoicing in the anticipation of Messiah's day, no aspect of Christ's priesthood was so grateful as that which connected it, not with any of Aaron's line, but with one of far higher antiquity, saying, as he does, "The Lord sware, and will not repent. Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchisedec." This argument, as addressed to Jews, you would perceive, must be conclusive. So far was their claim of perfection as belonging to the Levitical priesthood from being established, that priesthood had not the merit of priority among preparatory institutions of the like sort, was not even the first intimation which God had given of the qualifications that should meet in a personal mediator. The law had its use, no doubt, and a noble use. It was a system of visible and material types, explanatory of the true principles of mediation, and foreshowing how a redemption was to be wrought out. But the most distinguished personal type of Christ had gone before, and is to be found in this Melchisedec, who, being "without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life, but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually."

Let us proceed to peruse the apostle's parallel between Christ and Melchisedec, by considering the latter—I. In his title as king. II. In his office as priest. III. In his origin as mysterious. IV. In his ministrations as intransmissible, and shared with none besides.

I. And first, with regard to the title of king, as here given to Melchisedec—"For this Melchisedec, King of Salem."

It would not tend to edification to discuss the various surmises raised as to who Melchisedec was, as to whether he was Enoch, or Shem, or one of the posterity of Japhet. It is sufficient to notice that the nature of the apostle's argument requires that he should be a man—as distinguished from any angelic appearance—and a real person, actually living in the time of Abraham. His appearance on the stage of Old Testament history is singularly mysterious and flitting. He is no sooner come than he is gone again. He crosses our path in the Mosaic record; nine hundred years after, he is made mention of, prophetically, by the psalmist David; and then, a thousand years later, we have him made the subject of an important Scriptural argument in the hands of the apostle Paul. Our only historical notices of him are gained from the fourteenth chapter of Genesis. There we learn that Abraham, on returning from the slaughter of the confederate kings, rested for a time with his forces in the valley of Shaveh, which is the King's Dale, a place not far from Jerusalem. Now, it was an early Oriental custom, that forces on an expedition, when passing through the territory of any neutral or friendly power, should receive from such power whatever they might need of temporary refreshment. King's Dale belonged to Melchisedec; and as Abraham was both a neighbour and a friendly ally, we are not surprised to find that the prince came out and brought bread and wine for the refreshment of Abraham and his followers. Hence, if this had been all, the incident might have passed without special notice. But it is added by Moses, that this Melchisedec, whom we might have supposed to be no more than an ordinary Canaanitish prince, was also a priest of the Most High God; was recognised by Abraham as such; the father of the faithful deigning to receive the priestly benediction at his hands, and, in token of veneration for his character and office, awarding to him a tenth of the spoils. Here, then, we see how closely Melchisedec is a type of Christ, and how, both in his acts and titles, he sustains the eminence of his typical character. Even the little incident noticed in Genesis we can hardly suppose was without its significance. He is there represented as coming out to Abraham, bringing him a present of bread and wine, that his followers might be refreshed after the toils of conflict. What is this but a picture of the way in which Christ, the true Melchisedec, rewards and refreshes those now, who, in faith and in hope, are followers of faithful Abraham? Thus, are they wearied with the toils and burdens of their spiritual warfare, He says unto them, "Come unto Me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will refresh you." Are they tired out with the world's disappointing pursuits, having spent their money for that which is not bread, and their labour for that which satisfieth not, He says, "Lo, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters: come ye buy and eat: yea, come, buy wine and milk, without money and without price." Nay, are they longing after greater nearness of spiritual communion, desiring to realise the presence of their God and Saviour, to see the King in His beauty, and receive from Him tokens of peace and love, He comes forth to them like Melchisedec, bringing bread and wine, offering to believing hearts the blessed sacrament of His passion, that so, with the sacred memorials of His body broken, and his blood shed fresh upon them, His people may go on their way rejoicing.

II. Still more typical of the Redeemer's royalty are the titles given to Melchisedec in the second verse:—"First, being by interpretation King of righteousness, and after that, also, King of Salem, which is king of peace." These titles, as applied to the first Melchisedec, may mean no more than that in the methods of his rule he had earned for himself the reputation of being a scrupulously upright and peace-loving prince; that he stood high among neighbouring powers for the righteousness which characterised his regal administration, for the integrity and uprightness of his judicial decisions, for the amicable relations which he maintained with the different border-states, and for the tranquillity which marked his government at home. The custom of giving special titles to monarchs, based on their reputed personal qualities, has obtained in all ages. We read of Alexander the Great, and Charles the Bold, and Antoninus the Pious. And in like manner, the subjects of Melchisedec, ignorant of any prophetic mystery wrapped up in the designation, may have agreed to describe him as king of righteousness, and, after that, king of peace.

But who sees not the applicability of these titles to Christ in the exercise of His spiritual royalty? "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In His days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely; and this is His name whereby He shall be called, the Lord our righteousness." This language implies that our own righteousness is gone—gone past recovery and past hope; that one must be made a righteousness unto us; that a new and everlasting righteousness must be brought in; that one who knew no sin must be made sin for us, that we who knew no righteousness might be made the righteousness of God in Him. Such a High Priest became us. We must have this attribute of righteousness in our Melchisedec. If He cannot satisfy every demand of a violated law, if He cannot meet all the conditions of unsullied holiness, if He cannot cancel every claim which heaven may have against us by the perfection of His obedience, nay, if He cannot present my soul before God as perfect, as unblamable, as free from blemish or spot as His own, the ground of my confidence is gone. To be called King of Mercy, King of Compassion, King of Love, is not sufficient for Him who is to undertake for me. In order to His mediation being effectual, He must be King of Righteousness.

And after that, also, King of Salem, which is king of peace. This also is beautifully typical of Messiah's kingship. In the Book of Psalms you will remember it is written of Him, "in His days righteousness shall flourish, and abundance of 'peace' so long as the moon endureth." And, again, in Isaiah, "The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever." You see in these passages the order in which our spiritual blessings are to come to us. The first thing necessary is to provide us with a righteousness, a clothing which shall hide our moral nakedness from the sight of God a suitable wedding garment wherewith we may sit down at the marriage supper of the Lamb in heaven; this done, however, the guilt removed, the curse done away, the sword of heaven sheathed, the face of the Eternal Father turned kindly towards us, all the enmities of our carnal nature broken down and destroyed, we attain to a sense of inward tranquillity. "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God." "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you." "Let not your heart be troubled," on account of my Father's ancient displeasure. I who am made to you Melchisedec, King of Righteousness, am made to you also King of Peace.

(To be concluded.)

MAKING FRIENDS OF MAMMON.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, NOTTINGHAM, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC., ETC.

Luke xvi. 9.

EVEN if we are honest and devout, and "our open eyes desire the truth," it is still very difficult for us to ascertain exactly what value we ought to put on money, what influence we should allow it to exert on our aims, our habits, our desires. It does not, indeed, take much wisdom to see that the love of money for its own sake is simply base, that it is fatally injurious and degrading to the heart that harbours it; nor does it take an heroic goodness to determine that, come what may, we will not let the pursuit of wealth be our supreme quest, that we will not take Mammon for our god. But, then, very few of us do love money for its own sake; and, probably, most of us would refuse to deliberately sacrifice character and principle, or even culture and enjoyment, to the mere acquisition of wealth. Yet, none the less, if, taking the New Testament for our guide, we honestly try to determine with any precision what place money, and the pursuit of money, should take in our thoughts, our endeavours, our aims, we may haply find ourselves involved in no little perplexity.

Nor shall we find our perplexity relieved, we may rather find it deepened, as we study the teaching of Christ and His apostles on this theme, for they lay down principles against which we may find much to object. Look, for instance, at what are probably their fullest utterances on it—1 Tim. vi. and Luke xvi.

In his Epistle to Timothy, St. Paul affirms that godliness with contentment is the true gain; that then only are we rich when we want nothing and long for nothing we do not possess, when our souls are settled in a sacred content undisturbed by lusts and cravings for aught beyond our reach. The love of money, he affirms, is a root from which all forms of evil spring. Impelled by this base lust, many have wandered from the Faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows. The desire to be rich is a snare in which many feet have been caught; those who cherish it plunge into many foolish and hurtful lusts, and are drowned in perdition. The man of God will flee this love, this craving, this desire. Having food and raiment, he will therewith be content. Discarding the pursuit of riches, he will follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness. He knows that as he brought nothing into the world, so neither can he carry anything out; why then should he neglect that in himself which is spiritual and eternal, in order to amass a burden that is only too likely to make his very life anxious and painful to him, and of which death will very certainly unlade him? The gains that can be carried into the next world, these, and these alone, should engage the heart of immortal man. In short, he speaks of wealth and of those who pursue it with a large tone of contempt and moral reproof which is really very surprising and perplexing to our English ears. For most of us frankly acknowledge that we should like to be rich, or at least somewhat richer than we are; some of us because we crave the ease, the enjoyment, the security, the social position and influence which wealth confers, and others of us because we crave, or persuade ourselves that we crave, the leisure for culture, the refined habits and pursuits, the means and opportunities of doing good, which are at present beyond our reach. "Content with bare food and covering, as St. Paul contemptuously calls it? Not we! We want well-appointed houses, well-served tables, and garments cut in the fashion of the time. We want books, music, pictures, and leisure to enjoy them. We want to mix with the best people on equal terms, to give our children the best education and training, to feel safe for the future, to provide against rainy days and sick days, days of infirmity and age."

That wealth should never stand first with us; that it should never be indispensable to us; that we should value it only for the good uses to which we can put it—these are the three great principles we have found in the New Testament; and these are not only Christian principles, they are also principles that commend themselves to every man's reason and conscience in the sight of God. And therefore we shall be condemned by reason and conscience, as well as by Christ, if gain is more to us than godliness, if we dread poverty more than we dread sin, or sorrow more over a bad debt than over a bad action, over a loss of money than over a loss of temper, or if we do not seek to make a wise and generous use of our money, rather than to secure a selfish enjoyment of it.

But here the question naturally arises, What is the wise, what is the Christian use of money?—i.e., what should be our ruling principle and motive both in acquiring and spending it, however much or however little we may possess? And to this question we can have no other answer than that of our Lord, if only we understand it rightly: "Make to yourselves friends out of Mammon, that when it shall fail you, they may receive you into the everlasting tabernacles." But it does not help us much to a right understanding of this answer to be told that Mammon is a Syriac word for "wealth," and that it is out of this wealth that we are to elicit friends more enduring and more hospitable than itself. To get into the true line of meaning we must remember that in these words our Lord gives the moral of a parable, that of the Unjust Steward, which He had just uttered. This Steward, while the rents of the estate were under his control, so used them as to gain the favour of the tenants, in order that, when he lost his place, they might receive him into their houses. Our Lord points the moral of the story by bidding us be equally prudent and forecasting. He would have us so use our goods and possessions as that, when these fail us, by our wise kind use of them, we may have made friends who shall welcome us into everlasting habitations, and be our crown and joy for ever.

Well, now, suppose a man has lived long enough to feel his feet, and to consider the courses that are open to him, and to be sincerely anxious to take the right course and to make the best use he can of his life. All around him he sees neighbours who are pushing on with the utmost eagerness in the pursuit of fortune, who are sacrificing ease, culture, pleasure, health, and at times conscience itself, in their love for that which St. Paul pronounces to be a root of all evil, a temptation and a snare, and which Christ says makes it very hard for a man to enter the kingdom of God. He has to determine whether or not he will join in this headlong pursuit—whether he too will risk health of body, culture of mind, and sensitive purity of conscience, in the endeavour to grow rich, or richer than he is. He sees that the dignity and comfort and peace of human life depend largely on his being able to supply a large circle of wants without constant anxiety and care; but he also feels that he has many wants, and those the deepest, which mere wealth will not supply. Accordingly, he resolves to work diligently and as wisely as he can, in order to secure an adequate provision for his physical necessities, and to guard his independence; but he resolves also that he will not sacrifice himself, or all that is best and purest and most refined in himself, to the pursuit of money and what it will fetch. Hence, so far as he can, he limits his wants; he keeps his tastes simple and pure, and by labours that do not absorb his whole time and energies he provides for the due gratification of these tastes and wants. Hence also he gives a good deal of his time and energy to reading good books, let us say, or to mastering some natural science, or to developing a taste for music and acquiring skill in it. He expects his neighbour, who had no better start nor opportunities than he, to grow richer than he himself has done, if his neighbour thinks only of getting and investing money; and therefore he does not grudge him his greater wealth, nor look on it with envious eye; he rather rejoices that he himself has given up some wealth in order to acquire a higher culture, and to develop his literary or artistic tastes.

Here, then, we have two men, two neighbours, before us. The one has grown very rich, has far more money than he can enjoy, more even perhaps than he quite knows how to spend or invest, but he has hardly anything except what his money will procure for him. The other has only a modest provision for his wants, but he has a mind stored with the best thoughts of ancient and modern wisdom, an eye which finds a thousand miracles of beauty in every scene of Nature, and an ear that trembles under the ecstasy of sweet harmonious sounds. By some sudden turn of fortune, Mammon fails them both; they are both reduced to poverty: both, so soon as they recover from the shock, have to make a fresh start in life. Which of the two is better off now? Which of them has made real friends to himself out of the Mammon while he had it? Not the wealthier of the two, assuredly; for, now that he has lost his wealth, he has lost all that he had: he has lived only to get rich; when his riches went, all went. But the other man, the man who read and thought and cultivated his mental faculties, he has not lost all. His money has gone, but it has not taken from him the wise thoughts he had gathered from books, or his insight into the secrets and beauties of Nature, or the power to charm from the concord of sweet sounds. He is simply thrown more absolutely on these inward and inseparable possessions for occupation and enjoyment. While he had it, he made friends to himself out of the Mammon of unrighteousness; and, now that it has failed him, those friends receive him into tabernacles which are always open, and in which he has long learned to find pleasure and to take rest.

Poor and imperfect as this illustration is—for there are losses in which even science and art, even Nature and culture, can give us but cold comfort—it may nevertheless suffice to make our Lord's words clear. For, obviously, if a man give a good part of the time he might devote to the acquisition of wealth to religious culture, instead of to merely mental culture; if he takes thought and spends time in acquiring habits of prayer and worship and obedience and trust, in acquainting himself with the will of God and doing it; if he expend money, and time which is worth money to him, in helping on the work of the Church and in ministering to the wants of the sorrowful and guilty, he too has made to himself friends out of the Mammon of unrighteousness, and friends that will not fail him when Mammon fails him, but will receive him into tabernacles of rest. However poor he may be, he can still pray, and read his Bible, and put his trust in God, and urge the guilty to penitence, and speak comfort to the sorrowful; and, by his cheerful content and unswerving confidence in the Divine goodness, he can now bear witness, with an eloquence far beyond that of mere words, to the reality and grandeur of a truly religious life. Faith, hope, charity, righteousness and godliness, patience and meekness, will not close their doors against him, because Mammon has slammed his door in his face. These are eternal friends, who pitch their tabernacles beside us wherever our path may lead, and who welcome us to the rest and shelter they afford all the more heartily because we have not where to lay our head.

In fine, it is not simply a future reward which Christ promises to as many as make a wise use of money and money's worth, but a present, a constant, an eternal reward. Virtually He says to us, "Use your money for wise ends, whether you have little of it or much; make it your servant rather than your master; compel it to minister to your spiritual as well as to your temporal wants; expend thought and time and labour in the effort to become wise and good and kind: and then, whenever Mammon fails you, your wisdom and goodness and kindness will abide with you; and these will fit you, far more than any wealth, for a noble and happy life, whether in this world or in that which is to come."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 1. Christ's Ascension.

Chapter to be read—Acts i. 1—14.

To the Teacher. It is intended in this volume to give a course of lessons on the stories in the Acts of the Apostles. It is believed that children often take a dislike to the Acts, from having to read the book regularly through, long speeches and all, but that if the different narratives were brought before them in a pleasant manner, they would take a great delight in this most interesting part of the Bible.

I. Preparation. (Read 1—5.) Have now gone through a number of scenes in Christ's life. (Vol. IX.) What was the last? How long did He remain with disciples after the Resurrection? Two distinct objects. (a) To fully convince them that he was risen; why was this so important? See 1 Cor. xv. 19—22, to show how our hopes depend upon it. How did He convince them? (ver. 3). Let children name some of these proofs about which there could be no mistake (infallible). Remind how they saw Him, heard Him, how Thomas was invited to touch Him (John xx. 27), how He ate with them (Luke xxiv. 43), worked a miracle for them, which was it? (John xxi.) So there could be no mistake. He was risen, they were all convinced, and would now bear witness to it (Acts ii. 32). The other object was (b) to instruct them for their future work. Had He not done so before? Remind of long conversation before His death (John xiv.—xvi.) But they only half believed; now, fully believing, would drink in words. What were his parting commands? (1) To preach the Gospel. (Read Mark xvi. 15—18), explain word "preach" as meaning "announce," "tell glad tidings," "do work of herald" proclaiming visit of king, rebels lay down arms and receive full forgiveness.

(2) To baptise. Ask what Christ said about confessing Him before men; would do so when come forward publicly for baptism. Remind of John Baptist requiring repentance and faith of the converts; read Mark xvi. 16 to show in whose name baptism was to be administered, and Acts ii. 38 for the benefits. (3) To wait. Apostles might perhaps be in hurry to begin work, must wait, for what? (ver. 4) could do nothing without Spirit, had been promised before (John xvi. 13), and partially given (John xx. 22) but must wait for its full gifts; then may begin public work.

II. The Ascension. (Read 6—11). Question the children upon the story, bringing out (a) the time, forty days, evidently a marked time in Biblical events (e.g., Moses on Mount Sinai, Elijah in wilderness, Christ in desert). (b) The place, the same Mount of Olives where Christ had so often been; remind of His riding from thence into Jerusalem as king. (c) The persons who would be with Him besides the apostles? (ver. 14), besides the holy women would be some of His many friends from Galilee, in all 120 out of 500 spoken of 1 Cor. xv. 6. (d) The last words. What did they ask Christ? (ver. 6) Still had lingering notion of Him as earthly prince. How did He answer? They were to receive power to form a people for Him, a spiritual kingdom in whole world; such would be effect of Holy Ghost accompanying the preaching of the Gospel. Where must they begin? Why in Jerusalem? (e) The parting. Picture the scene—the hill-side covered with verdure, birds flying overhead (Matt. vi. 26, 28), Jerusalem in full view, and Calvary, where crucified; the large group around Christ; His laying His hands on them one after another (Luke xxiv. 50); the last words and parting blessing; the moment of departure come; the white cloud mantling on Saviour's head; He slowly ascending; the disciples awed into perfect silence, still looking up, straining eyes to see Him, cannot take gaze off cloud; recalled to themselves by strange voice; what do they see? Probably same angels kept watch at tomb (Luke xxiv. 4). How did the angels comfort them? So had Jesus before (John xiv. 3). How could they best be ready? By doing as He wished. So return at once the two miles (ver. 12), and wait quietly in the upper room.

III. The Lessons. (1) The cause of the Ascension. Perhaps may ask why did not Christ stay on earth—go about preaching, working miracles, &c.? Surely all would believe! Ask, did people believe even when saw miracles? Many only filled with envy, malice, hatred, &c.; besides, remind how Christ's bodily presence could only be in one place at once, whereas if departed would send Spirit to fill the world (John xvi. 7); also, this world no place for Christ to stay in; was here short time to teach, heal, set example, &c., must now return to His native heavens. (2) The object of the Ascension. (a) To prepare heaven for man. Remind how Resurrection was a pledge of our rising; so the Ascension was a type of our ascension. To rise and live again in this world of sin and care no comfort, therefore are assured shall not only rise but also go to heaven; therefore Christ gone first that may be ready to welcome us. (b) To prepare man for heaven. Why is man not fit? What is the state of heaven? (Rev. iv. 8; xxii. 27.) Who alone can make fit? How then is Christ preparing us? Must seek Christ if would live with Him (Col. iii. 1—3).

Questions to be answered.

1. What were our Lord's two main objects in His talks with the disciples after the Resurrection?
2. Name some of the infallible proofs of the Resurrection.
3. Give a short description of the Ascension.
4. Why could not Christ remain on earth?
5. What were the two objects of the Ascension?
6. What is our duty in connection with it?

THE VALLEY.

WOULD you learn what is joy to the heart,
Would you know what is ease to the mind,
Would you walk from contention apart,
And leave all your sorrows behind,
To this sweetest of valleys repair,
Tread but on this magical ground,
Contentment shall laugh at Despair,
And Hate flee away at the sound.

No troubles are here to annoy,
Nó cares to this valley belong,
The birds are a chorus of joy,
And the streamlet an anthem of song;
The woodbine and briar entwine,
The oak and the ivy embrace,
While the bee and the butterfly join
With Beauty in haunting the place.

How poor are the sports of the town
Compared with such pleasures as these;
The mammon to which we bow down
With the rivers, the flowers, and the trees!
With a cottage encircled with vine,
And a seat in the shade by the door,
With my books and the love that is mine,
I were richer than Cræsus of yore.

Matthias Barr.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER I.

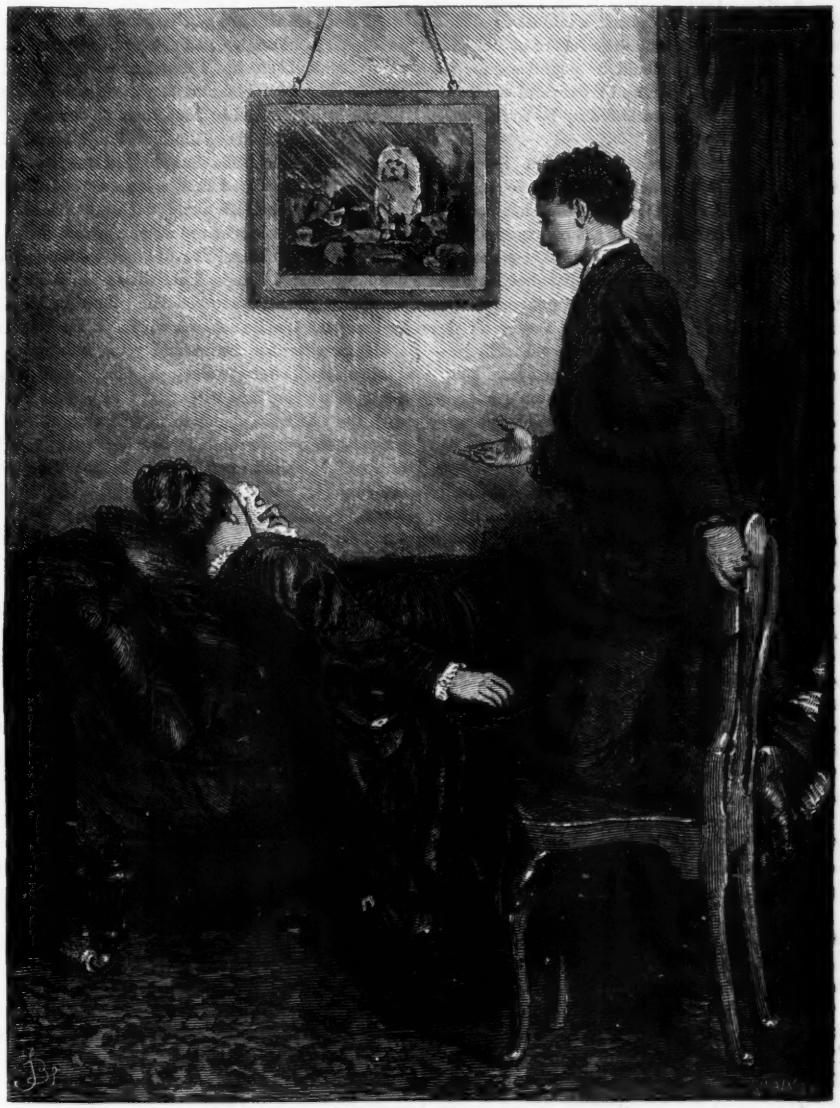
IN these days of constant improvements and alterations, when not only houses but whole streets are swept away, to give place to huge hotels and railway-stations, it might be useless to look for the dwelling in which our story opens. It stood in a court in Pimlico—a narrow thoroughfare leading from the terrace facing the Queen's riding-school to a quiet street behind—a court that vastly differed from the generality of the poverty-stricken teeming alleys in the metropolis, for a row of neat little houses standing back in strips of garden, and tenanted by respectable people, formed the one side of it, while the other was skirted by a high wall.

At the further extremity of this wall there were a couple of shops—a grocer's and a baker's—very prim, very much circumscribed both in space and business, depending for the latter on the tenants of the court—or row as we believe it was called—while, wedged between the wall and the one-storied shops, there was an ugly narrow slip of a house rising to twice their altitude, as if the builder had resolved to make up in height for whatever was wanting in the breadth of the dwelling.

In this house lived Mary Ingle, a gaunt grim-looking Buckinghamshire woman, who having furnished it with the proceeds of a small legacy, let the upper part, in order to eke out her earnings as a charwoman. She had a husband—an idle ne'er-do-well, who worked when he was in the humour, and spent his earnings at some favourite resort as soon as he received them—and she had a flock of children, whom she brought up in a fashion common enough among women of her class—petting and spoiling them during their infancy, railing and raving at them as soon as they were old enough to shift for themselves, and considering her duty done when she had paid for their schooling, and made a fair division of the broken victuals on which the young Ingles were accustomed to be reared. How they fared and what they did with themselves during the intervals betwixt and after school-hours she could not know, for her daily labours carried her away soon after their eyes began to open in the morning, and they were generally in bed when she returned, weary with the scrubbing and scouring that fell to her share. She stipulated with her employers for a day at home in each week, to be devoted to washing and mending for her progeny, but all else was left to "Ria," a great ungainly girl of fourteen, who "did" for the lodgers—when her mother had any—and slapped and scolded, in true maternal style, the little ones left in her charge.

It was one of Mrs. Ingle's home days, and more than once her arms had been taken out of the suds, and her feet slipped out of her heavy boots, that she might go softly up-stairs, and peep in at one of the doors on the first floor, or listen outside to such muffled sounds—a cautious tread, a low sweet voice, or a sigh of pain—as met her ear. The third time she went up in this way the door of the sitting-room had been opened for air, and a young girl, who sat in the arm-chair by the window, her arms raised and folded behind the head that lay back upon them with the languor of extreme fatigue, saw Mrs. Ingle, and made her a sign to come in.

Carefully setting down the boots she had carried in her hand, the woman advanced on tip-toe, glancing towards the inner room, and whispered, "Asleep, is she, Miss Eda? Then do 'ee go and lie down and rest a while. I'll stay here, and let 'ee know the minute she wakes. Do 'ee now! Ria can finish my work, and I'll be glad to sit still a bit."



Editha Granton smiled gratefully. "Thanks, Mrs. Ingle; I'm very tired, but I could not leave mamma now."

"She isn't worse, surely! Why didn't 'ee call me, Miss Eda? I thought she seemed quite cheerful like this morning."

The young girl's lips quivered. "No, she does not seem worse, but I know the time is drawing very near. She said so herself not an hour ago, and I cannot, cannot leave her again till——"

She stopped suddenly, and struggled to keep back the tears that must not be shed while the sight of her swollen eyes would distress the dear mother who was slowly but certainly losing her hold on this life. It was Editha's first trouble, for she could not remember the death of her father; and Mrs. Granton had been a healthy cheerful woman until a year ago, when she was suddenly smitten with a painful and incurable disease. There had been the usual hoping against hope, and unwillingness to believe that nothing more can be done, that we testify in such cases; and Eda and her brother Mark had persuaded their mother—the most resigned of the trio—to give up her home in the pretty Welsh village where they had lived for some years past, and go to London, where she could have the advice of some eminent physician.

It was a wrench to tear herself away from the spot that had grown very dear to her, but she made the effort all the more readily because she hoped to meet in town a brother of her deceased husband, who was on his way home from India, where he had amassed a considerable sum of money. It seemed but yesterday that Mrs. Granton had been busy with the outfit of the stripling, and parting with one or two of her own treasured ornaments that he might not land on a foreign shore without a few pounds in his pocket. Now he was coming back, a middle-aged man, to whom she hoped to confide the future of her children, who at her death would be penniless, for her small income died with her, and the careful economies of many years had been swallowed up by the expenses of her illness.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"I really cannot take upon myself the burden of your support."—p. 12.

Mrs. Granton had been in London for some months, deriving no benefit from the change of doctors. The good ship Aquila, in which her brother-in-law had signified that he might be expected, had long been overdue, and the mother's heart sometimes failed her as she asked herself what her children would do if the relative on whose generosity and affection she relied never arrived. Day after day passed on in the same suspense, till even Mrs. Ingle—who had attached herself warmly to her invalid lodger—caught the infection of Mrs. Granton's anxiety, and now made the inquiry, "Han't ye had no news of the ship? Oh dear, that's bad! but may be it'll come to-morrow."

"I fear not," was Eda's sad response, cautiously whispered lest it should reach the ears of her mother. "There was a report in yesterday's Echo that a homeward-bound vessel has picked up a boat and several fragments of a wreck, and that they are supposed to have belonged to the Aquila."

"It mayn't be true," said Mrs. Ingle, consolingly. "My Jan says it never does to 'pend too much on them papers; and he's a wonderful scollard is Jan! He often gets 'ticed into the public-house to read the news to them as can't read it for themselves. It mayn't be true, Miss Eda."

"Perhaps not; but we shall soon know, for my brother has gone to the offices of the ship-owners to learn how far the report is correct."

"You'll not tell your ma this, will 'ee?" asked the woman; and Eda shook her head.

"I have not done so yet. It would only distress her. Poor mamma! how will she bear it, if——" she checked herself, and bent forward in a listening attitude. It was Mark's step that she heard on the stairs, and her pulses quickened with eagerness to know what tidings he brought. The next minute he had bounded into the room so noisily that Mrs. Ingle put up her finger with a warning. "Sh—oh, Mr. Mark, your ma's asleep, poor dear!"

Mark Granton—a tall good-looking young fellow, Eda's senior by a twelvemonth or thereabouts, and strikingly like her, except that his eyes were black and her's of a soft deep grey—bent his brows in displeasure at the reproof, and turned brusquely to his sister.

"Have you anything for this good woman to do? Are you sure? Then why do you detain her? We'll not trouble you to stay any longer, Mrs. Ingle, but ring if we want you;" and with the elaborate courtesy that always discomfited the awkward but well-intentioned charwoman, he held the door open for her to take her departure.

"I can't think how you endure that creature here so often!" he said, when she had disappeared. "I rarely come home but I find her with you. If we pay her a reasonable rent for these rooms, I think we might be allowed to keep them to ourselves."

"Mrs. Ingle has been kindness itself, Mark. Don't forget how much she has helped me in nursing mamma!" murmured Eda, a little reproachfully.

"I'd rather be left alone if I were ill than have such a vulgar blundering woman about me!" the young man retorted. He did not know how often the large coarse hands, from whose touch he shrank fastidiously, had smoothed the pillow of his dying mother; nor had he noticed, with Eda, how the heavy tread grew light and the loud voice soft when Mrs. Ingle moved about the sick chamber. Mark Granton detested poverty and vulgarity, and had no patience with the weakness, as he termed it, that would have made Eda gentle and forbearing with the most unworthy. Knowing this, she hastened to change the subject.

"Have you brought any news, Mark?"

"Yes; the worst I could bring. The report is but too true. The Aquila has gone down, and not a soul is saved to tell how it happened."

"Speak lower, dear Mark! Are you certain of this?"

"Quite! I have seen the owners of the lost ship, and also the pieces of the wreck that were picked up, and the name of the Aquila is painted on one of them. I had but the one hope left, that uncle George might have taken his passage in another vessel, but even that is knocked on the head; for a telegram from Madras gives a list of the passengers who sailed in the Aquila, and his name is amongst them."

"Poor uncle George!" sighed Eda. "Oh, Mark, think of him dying in this sad, this dreadful manner! far out at sea, unable to send a farewell message to those who loved him, and perhaps drowned before he had time to put up a prayer for himself!"

"His money must have gone down with him," said her brother, echoing her sigh, "for he said in his last letter that he should convert all he had into specie. It is hard, Eda, it is very hard, to know that the good gold that would have done us so much service lies at the bottom of the ocean!"

"Do not think of that now, but of mamma. How shall we tell her such terrible tidings?"

But a faint call for Eda made her hurry into the adjoining room. There was no need to discuss ways and means of breaking the evil news gently to Mrs. Granton. She had been awake, and heard all; but she was either too ill to dwell upon this fresh trouble, or she had learned to commit her dear ones to Him who clingeth closer than a brother; and could be content to leave them in his care.

Doubtless the shock acted on her weakened frame, for from this time she sunk rapidly. It scandalised Mrs. Ingle that in her last moments the dying sufferer's thoughts were less of the devoted daughter who never left her than of Mark—restless and often thoughtless Mark. Was it because he was her first-born that her eyes followed him so continually, and her prayers, her ejaculations, were always breathed for him?

"Wun't ye bless Miss Eda too? oh, Mrs. Granton, wun't ye bless her?" burst from the woman's lips, when Mark, with bowed head and brimming eyes, had taken his last embrace and quitted the chamber.

Involuntarily Mrs. Granton turned and looked at her daughter. Ah! there was no need of a spoken blessing; they understood each other; deep in her heart Eda knew that those prayers were wrung from the troubled soul of the mother, whose fears for her boy were stronger than her hopes. It was in Eda's arms she died, a look of unutterable love requiting her daughter's tenderness; but the last words she breathed were of Mark, poor Mark, who had yet to learn the true source of the peace that settled down on the face of the dead and robbed Eda's grief of all its bitterness.

CHAPTER II.

"Do you feel strong enough to-day, dear, for a little serious talk?" Mark asked, about a fortnight after his mother's funeral.

Eda, who had been too weak and ill—although she bore up bravely—to do more than lie on the sofa, and submit to the uncouth cosseting of Mrs. Ingle, made room for him beside her.

"I am much better and stronger to-day; but if I were not I could listen to you, Mark. Of course you feel anxious to be up and doing."

"Aye, but what? there's the rub, Eda! If I had but been brought up to any profession!" and he gave a doleful sigh.

"But mamma had not the means, and you objected to a trade," his sister reminded him.

"I should rather think I did! Can you fancy me standing behind a counter measuring yards of tape, or weighing packets of tea? No, no, Eda, my motto always has been Aut Cæsar aut nullus, which, as I choose to interpret it, means that if I cannot be at the top of the tree, there is still no necessity for me to sink to the bottom."

"Certainly not; with your abilities, dear Mark, I shall hope to see you a great man some day."

"Able to buy you pearl necklaces by the dozen, and settle a few thousands upon you when you marry, eh?"

"I said a great, not a rich man," she answered. "I can be content without the pearls."

"There's not much greatness to be achieved in this world without a long purse to back it," said Mark, discontentedly. "I am an unlucky dog to be so friendless, just as I want a helping hand as badly as ever a fellow did."

"But, Mark dear, you ought not to call yourself friendless. Recollect how kind every one has been to us, and how mamma's old acquaintance wrote, directly he heard of our loss, to offer you a situation in his office."

"Eighteen shillings a week for drudging over his accounts from nine till five daily, with a prospect of rising to a hundred a year by the time my hair begins to get grey. Very generous of him, truly!"

"It was kindly meant; and if——"

"Oh spare me your ifs pray, Eda! I have written to Mr. Bennett thanking him for his offer, and civilly declining it."

There was a short pause, for Eda did not care to acknowledge how much her brother's decision had disappointed her. She had been dwelling—more perhaps than she was aware of—on the prospect of returning to the neighbourhood of the Welsh village. Its homely associations might sharpen her grief for a while, but the fresh air and friendly faces would also strengthen her to bear it; and then she had made pleasant mental pictures of finding pupils at some of the farm-houses around the market-town at which Mr. Bennett's bank was situated, and adding considerably to Mark's earnings by her own; of long summer evenings spent in revisiting the scenes endeared to them by the recollections of their mother; and of tranquil Sundays such as she had loved to spend: but Mark began to speak, and she forced down her own regrets that she might seem interested in his plans.

"You see, I have had plenty of time to look about me since we have been here, and to pick up 'notions,' as the 'cute Yankees would say. I have spent a good many hours in the City, and made a few acquaintances there through Richie Atwood, my old chum, whom I contrived to rout out one day when I had nothing else to do."

The faintest tinge of colour rose into Eda's cheek. She had known Richie Atwood ever since they played together, the children of friendly neighbours, and still treasured the little brooch that had been his parting gift when he left home to take up his abode with an uncle who resided in London.

"I thought Richie had forgotten his old acquaintances," she remarked.

"Not he! You would not think so if you had heard how affectionately he inquired after his dear little friend Eda. I would have asked him to come and see you, but I knew you would only be upset and ill again."

Eda secretly thought that the sight of such a pleasant face as gay handsome Richie Atwood's would not have been half so dispiriting as Mark seemed to fancy; but she only asked, "Is he much changed?"

"Not a bit, except that mixing with a better class of people has improved his manners and developed his mind; but I was about to tell you, that Richie and I have been talking over things, and we propose to row in the same boat. Both he and I have the same end in view—making our fortunes—and you know the old adage, "two heads are better than one." He will give me the benefit of his experience, and I believe my brains may be made as useful to him as to myself. An excellent arrangement, isn't it?"

But Eda did not immediately answer. She was struggling between her own liking for Richie Atwood, and a consciousness that she ought not to conceal from her brother that Mrs. Granton had not taken as favourable a view as her children of this young man's character.

"If I were you, Mark," she said at last, hesitatingly, "I would not be too intimate with Richie till I had assured myself that he is thoroughly well principled."

Mark smiled scornfully. "Wouldn't you really? Women never can resist giving advice, can they? May I ask why I am favoured with this precious piece of wise counsel? What has Richie, with whom we have been intimate from childhood, and never known any harm of him—what has he done, I ask, that you warn me against him?"

"Don't be angry, Mark," she pleaded. "I always liked Richie very much, he was so sweet-tempered so ready to give up his own wishes to oblige others; but I cannot forget that mamma once said those very qualities for which we admired him might do him infinite harm, and that she did not think him, though I scarcely know why, a good companion for you."

"Richard Atwood is my friend," said Mark, with a dignified air. "Whoever abuses him offends me. I am no mere boy, Eda"—he was barely twenty—"and should hope that I have too much sense to be led into committing a folly by any one."

"I do not distrust you," his sister answered, affectionately; "but now that we are left to our own guidance, ought we not to remember all our dear mother's wishes, and act up to them? She would not have liked you to associate with any person who is openly careless or irreligious."

"If there were many like she was," said Mark, more gently, "it would not be difficult to carry out her injunctions. But I tell you again, I know no harm of Richie; and our connection will be merely a business one. When a fellow offers to do one a good turn, one doesn't put the questions, 'Are you a consistent Christian?' 'Do you attend divine worship regularly?' It would be rather too absurd."

"Perhaps so; but still, Mark, we may try to choose our friends from those who do act consistently," Eda persisted.

"Oh yes, and we can be strait-laced and prejudiced, and think no one right who does not do precisely as we do," was the impatient answer. "But we will not argue this question any longer; you always were obstinate, Eda; and I can see that you have made up your mind to dislike poor Richie." His sister stifled an exclamation. How thoroughly he was misjudging her! It was because her own heart inclined her to think the best of her old playmate, that she had felt bound to remind Mark of his mother's objections to the acquaintance. "As you are resolved to dislike him," he went on, "we will speak of something else."

"Very well," she answered, quietly; "I would rather hear whether you have been able to decide on any plan for our future."

"For my own? Oh yes. I shall manage well enough, never fear; and a little knocking about in the world never hurts a fellow while he is young, and strong, and energetic. But what to do with you is the real difficulty. You are a dear girl, Eda, but I scarcely know what you are fit for."

Eda accepted this critique on her abilities meekly. "I know I am not sufficiently accomplished to offer myself as a resident governess. It was one of mamma's great troubles that she had not been able to finish my educatien; but I will make the best of what I have learned. I can keep books or teach little children, or if all else fails, I am clever at my needle. So that we can be together in the evening, dear Mark, I do not care how my days are employed."

"But Eda, this is just precisely what cannot be!" and to cover his uneasy sense that his sister would be both hurt and surprised at the announcement, Mark spoke with unnecessary sharpness of tone and manner. "We could not afford to keep these rooms, even if we wished to do so; besides, Richie has offered me a share of his lodging."

"And you have accepted?"

"Certainly. Circumstanced as I am, would it not have been madness to refuse? In fact, I have promised to join him as soon as I can contrive to settle you comfortably in something or other."

"So soon! are we to be separated so soon!" cried Eda, unable to restrain her tears at the prospect. "Oh, Mark, must this be? Mamma was very anxious that we should not be parted. She felt that we should better bear our loss if we clung together; and she died believing that we should be all in all to each other."

"I know, dear, I know; but at the present moment it would be impossible. When I have made myself a position, you shall be my housekeeper; but just now I cannot. You like me to speak frankly, Eda. I really cannot take upon myself the burden of your support."

Hurt, grieved, and even resentful, Eda lay back on the sofa and averted her face. In two short weeks had Mark discovered that his only sister would be a clog upon him?

"I never intended to be idle," she said at last; "I hoped to be a help to you, not an encumbrance."

"Of course you did. Don't I know that you are the most affectionate little sister that ever lived!" exclaimed Mark, patting her thin hand. "It will grieve me more than I can express to lose you, but it is for your good, Eda. I must think of your interests as well as my own. I cannot let you pen yourself up in the smoky city while I am learning the art and mystery of money spinning."

"Why learn it at all?" she boldly asked. "We should be happier, healthier, and more free from care if you retracted your refusal of Mr. Bennett's offer, and we went back to Wales together."

"So you say and think, but I cannot agree with you. I never will consent to vegetate behind a desk for a few shillings a week, while I know that I have energy and ability to make a fortune, aye, and tact enough to grasp the opportunity as soon as it turns up."

"But such opportunities do not turn up very often," Eda reminded him.

"Oftener than you think for. Why, there are scores of men now living in London who came here as poor or even poorer than I am, and yet roll by us in their carriages and enjoy every luxury of life! Don't pretend that you despise the pleasures and advantages money gives, for if you do I shall not believe you."

"I do not despise money. I have often wished, especially while mamma was ill, that I had more of it; but, Mark, I could'nt make the getting of it my principal end and aim."

"Of course not; no one does; at least not exactly; but if one must work, one may as well be striving for a million as the munificent salary old Bennett so graciously offers me."

"But, situated as we are," retorted Eda, gravely, "would it not be more prudent to accept a certainty, however small, than to wait for the chance of some day possessing the million?"

"You think so?" queried Mark.

"I do indeed," was the earnest reply.

"Then act upon it. I cannot. I have a little ambition, and am not ashamed to own it; but if you are content to dawdle through life in some quiet country place——" He paused, and looked at her inquiringly.

"There is nothing I should like better," was the eager reply; "always provided that you could make yourself contented there too!"

"You forget that my plans are settled, and that I cannot afford to be biassed by mere sentiment. It is of your wishes we are talking."

"I am ready to lay them aside for your sake, dear Mark," she assured him.

"But I shall not let you make any more sacrifices for me. You are a dear little thing; but I wish you would see that our separation for a time is inevitable."

"I do begin to see it," said Eda, choking back a sob. "I am in your way; that is what you mean, is it not?"

Mark rose with an offended air.

"Perhaps I had better leave you till you are more reasonable. When I was flattering myself that I am doing my best to carry out your ideas of happiness, I did not expect that you would be angry with me for what I have done."

"I am not angry, and I will try not to be unreasonable," she answered, as calmly as she could. "But please go on," she added, feeling that she had something unpleasant to hear. "You have made some arrangement in my name which I shall be expected to fulfil. If I can do so with a clear conscience, I will. Does that promise satisfy you? Then tell me precisely what you have been doing."

(To be continued.)

MAY FLOWER, OR, "SERVANT OF ALL."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LITTLE BUTTERCUP," "NOTHING BUT A SONG," "HOW TO ENTER INTO REST," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all."—MARK ix. 36.

"Whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all. For even the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many."—MARK x. 44, 45.

SHE sat up in bed, bright, sweet May Flower Colwyn, her golden hair rough and tumbled, and waving in the morning air that blew in over clover and hay fields, her face all beaming with pleasure, as she held a small dark book with gold clasps, in her hand, turning it over and over.

"What a pet!" she exclaimed. "How good of her; and the inside just the same as her own, though the outside isn't! What a beauty!"

Then she opened it again, and read the title page—"Light on the Path—the Morning Hour."

Then she turned back the leaves to see if her name was in it. Yes there it was, "May Flower Colwyn," and underneath it was written, "Servant of all, Mark ix. 35."

"Why, what a strange text! I don't believe I even knew it was in the Bible. 'A servant of all!' What does it mean? I shall have to ask her about it.

XUM

Oh dear! what shall I do when she goes away! There's only to-day left now," and May's bright face grew long and grave.

But it was getting late, and she sprang out of bed.

She had to hurry, and only got down too late for morning prayers, and not before her brothers and sisters had sat down to breakfast.

"There you are, May, late as usual. How is it that you never manage to get down in time? It is every bit as easy to be two minutes early, instead of five late. You know you'll have to sleep with some one else if you don't get up in time in the mornings."

The rebuke came from her eldest sister. May grew red and angry.

"Well, not with you, Phillis, I hope," she cried, "I wouldn't sleep with you!"

"Now, May, you'd better just eat your breakfast," said Tom, the one next older than herself.

"You need not talk, Tom; you are often late; indeed, you all are!" she retorted, defiantly.

"Come, come, May, be quiet, and don't talk any more; sit down, and eat your breakfast."

And obediently she sat down, and ate it very quickly; but the little fracas had taken away her appetite, and for the time her day was spoilt.

She felt angry with them all; and as soon as she could she slipped away.

She seized her garden hat, and ran off at once down through the little wood that skirted the house, till she came to a rustic gate, on the other side of which stood the cousin she was seeking—Rosamond Fernaval.

"There you are!" called May.

"Here you are, darling!" answered Rosamond; and then May poured out her ready thanks for the book.

"Well, I thought, May, that would help you, now that we shall not be able to choose daily texts to think about together."

"But, Rosamond, what a queer text you've put inside!"

"Have I, May Flower?"

"Yes; what does it mean? 'Servant of all?'"

"Why, you know what a servant is."

"Of course I do, Rosa; and very glad I am not to be one. I shouldn't like to do house-work one bit; nor to be a cook, or nurse, or anything."

"But, you know, we decided last Sunday that we are both servants—servants of Jesus Christ," she added, reverently.

"Yes, Rosa, I know; but that's quite different to this."

"I don't think it is, May Flower. The verse was spoken by Christ Himself. Perhaps it seemed a strange thing when He first said such words, and they have lost none of their strangeness now. 'If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all, and servant of all;' and a very short time after, He said it again, 'Whosoever of you will be chiefest, shall be servant of all.' And surely, May, that is what He was Himself—a servant to us; for He not only came to purchase our redemption, but besides that, He lived our lives, that we may have an example to teach us what our's should be and must be."

"But, all the same, Rosamond, I don't quite understand. 'A servant of all.' Does it mean of every one?"

"Yes, of every one."

"But you don't mean to say I'm to let Tom order me about just as he pleases!" May called out, excitedly; "and that I shall have to obey him, and always do just what he likes?"

Rosamond laughed.

"I shall never do it," May continued, rather angrily, "never. I see now what you mean by such a text; but I shall not take it for mine, for I could never do as it says. Be a servant to every one! Why, I should have time for nothing. They are wanting me to do something for them every minute of the day; besides, Rosa, boys ought to wait on girls. Hugh is always doing things for you, and Tom never does for me."

"But, May Flower, if you come to owing and paying, you will always lag behind. If a person is selfish, how must we help them out of it? It will make them worse if we are selfish as well. Must we not do as our Lord would have done, put self aside, and go down to them, and by our love and kindness teach them what a good thing unselfishness is? It is no use to talk at a person, and tell them what to do; the best plan is to lead the way. Ought you not to go back to your lessons now?"

"But, Rosa, I know I can't do it."

"May Flower, I know you can; and what's more, I know you will. I will walk through the wood with you, and tell you the thing that is my greatest help—shall I?"

"What is it?"

"Just this; that when we are serving others for Christ's sake, I believe He looks upon us, and may, perhaps, say that verse of us, 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me.' Now, isn't any trouble worth while that we take for such a Master as our Lord Jesus Christ is? Or, are we to love Him much, when all is easy, and forget Him, or turn our face another way, when something harder comes? That isn't love, I think; it is just selfishness and untruth. But, childie, you must run in; I shall see you again this evening. Mind, and let it be a nice bright happy day, to match this lovely sunshine." And she waved her hand, and ran back to the rectory house—that bright rectory house, where she and her brother Hugh spent so many happy days every year, but which visit was to terminate on the morrow.

CHAPTER II.

"Oh, let thy true refining love
Its utmost pleasure see;
And lift not up thy faithful hand,
Whate'er my cry may be,
Till I am strong for thy renown,
And pure for use to Thee."

"It must be good to share Thy cross, Thou bearer of my sin." L. A. W.

MAY went slowly in, thinking much of all that lay before her.

Yes, she was quite resolved; she would try for to-day, and learn something of what it meant to be "a servant of all;" but for how much longer than that one day, she could not say.

She stood in the hall, hanging her hat on and off a peg, twisting on one leg, and thinking over the pros and cons of her undertaking. No doubt it was a very great and a very alarming business to be a servant to all in that house—Phillis, Jem, Stephen when he should come home, Geraldine, and Tom; but, still, was it worth it?

"Come, May, do be quick!" cried Phillis; "I can't have you dawdling there all day; you ought to have been ready before this. Get your books and run into the study, and do learn to do things without always having to be told first!"

May coloured, and pressed her lips together, as she said to herself, "Servants never answer."

She ran off, and got her books, and sat down. Phillis soon joined her, work in hand, and sat opposite to her; but the indolence and carelessness of yesterday told on to-day. The lessons were ill-prepared—indeed, more probably than not, not prepared at all—just read over once or twice, and thrown aside. She stumbled—waited—began again—stumbled—and finally stopped altogether.

Phillis sat motionless but for the rapid motion of her needle, her eyes bent down, and her mouth stern. May's lessons were never perfect; and Phillis had at last made up her mind that things must and should be different.

The book was put on one side, and another solemnly opened, which soon shared the same fate. Then May was severely rebuked.

"I will have no more imperfect lessons; and you must learn these again at twelve, instead of going out," was the stern rebuke.

"Oh, Phillis! not to-day," pleaded May, "it is Rosamond's last day, and I do care so dreadfully about missing her!"

"Well, then, it will teach you all the better. You are growing more indolent every day, and I will not allow it. Now, May, don't cry and be silly!"

The gathering tears swam, but she kept them from falling down. It was very unfortunate that, just as she meant to do better, Phillis had made up her mind to be severe. It was a strong temptation to let her tongue work, and she knew of such lots of things to say to Phillis which would annoy and vex her. If Phillis was cross and cold, why should not she be? but she thought hard of the duties of servants, and kept quiet.

The rest of the morning would have passed well, but that she could not pronounce her French; and having always taken so little pains with it, Phillis would not believe she was trying.

"I declare, May, you are the most tiresome and the naughtiest child in existence!" she said, as the clock struck twelve.

"I'm not!" shouted May, at the top of her voice, so loudly and so passionately, that her second brother, Jem, who was passing, came in.

"May," he said, angrily, "shouting at your lessons again like this! Upon my word you shall go to school if you are so tiresome at home. Has she been naughty all through?" he asked.

"No, no, no!" cried May. "Oh, Phillis, I didn't mean to scream like that!" and between the longing to be naughty, the want to be good, knowing that she had been trying hard but that it was only natural that they had not recognised it, the tears, already suppressed, burst out.

"I think she has been better this morning, altogether," said Phillis, "till now; but she didn't know her lessons, and has to learn them over again. Learn them quickly, May, and then you may go out," and she gathered her things together and went away.

"Why is it, May?" asked her brother, lingering, and unwilling to leave the sobbing little being.

"Oh, Jem, I did mean better—indeed I did; ask Rosamond—won't you ask Rosamond?"

"No, May Flower, I don't need to ask her, for I believe you; but as you meant better, how did it happen to come so badly this morning? Can't you tell?"

And somehow, May told of the odd conglomeration that had possessed her, ending with, "I don't believe I shall ever—ever be able to be a servant—however much I wish it—for it's so hard."

"Oh yes you will, May; don't make such a fret and trouble. Just be good and obedient to Phillis, and try and take more pains in learning your lessons; you know you can learn them very nicely if you try. You must not dawdle over them, and talk all the time, and play with Tom. Set to work, and think of nothing else, and when they are finished, go and play and enjoy yourself. Come now, lift up your head and learn them, and run away to the rectory. Rosa will wonder where you are—her last day and all. I shouldn't wonder if she came up to see what you are about. Now, set to work; let's see what they are—geography and poetry. Well, up with your head! I'll help you to learn them."

"Will you, really? Oh, you don't mean that!"

"Of course I will. Why, May Flower, what a wretch I must be, for it to be such a surprise! Come on, now."

The lessons were learnt, thoughtfully and accurately, and May flew to repeat them to Phillis. She was deep in the mysteries of her sewing-machine.

"Well, May, I hope you will learn, and say your lessons at the proper time to-morrow. You must wait now."

And then Tom called out, "You should come to school with me, May, and you'd soon learn better; as you've learnt badly to-day, I shall get you a punishment. Run up-stairs, and get me my Charterhouse dictionary, and look sharp." And for once it seemed easy and even pleasant to run quickly up-stairs for Tom, instead of wanting to be begged and commanded.

"It does May good to cry," Tom was saying as Jem came in; "she's ever so much more agreeable for the next few hours."

"It wouldn't do her good, Tom," said his brother, "if her heart was not set upon being good."

"May's heart set on that! You won't make me believe that! She's as selfish, and cross, and indolent as you please."

"Well, Tom, and how much better are you?" asked Phillis; but Jem gave a funny laugh, as he said, "Well, Tom, I shan't afflict myself at such a remark; I well know it is only necessary for any one else to say the same, and you will paint the May Flower white."

Tom subsided; and May coming down, Phillis heard her lessons, and dismissed her. The rest of the day was a delightful time for May; her afternoon lessons were soon over; those for the next day prepared, and she ran off down to the rectory.

At the door she met old Dr. Hurst. "Welcome, my blossom," he said, as he kissed the smiling face. "Come to pack for Rosa? That's right. How long are you going to make your face grow when she and Hugh leave us to-morrow?"

May laughed gladly. "I shan't make it at all long, Dr. Hurst, for I could never make it long enough to reach to Uncle Fernaval's. May I choose you a rose?" and her quick little fingers gathered a beauty, and fastened it in the old man's coat.

"There, that'll do," she said, in a satisfied voice.

"That it will, little girl; but I'm going down into the village, so perhaps I shall leave it behind me there."

"Where are you going? Are you going to see Margery? I wish you would give it to her."

"Very well, then, I'll give it to her, with Miss May's love. Good-bye, my child."

May turned, and ran into the house, thinking all the while of poor suffering Margery Lellis, who had been crippled by a fall when she was fourteen, and had never walked since; and not only that, but had never been free from pain since then, now twenty years ago. What a strange thing it was, and yet Margery did not look unhappy and miserable; her face was always calm, and nearly always bright! How was it that such things were? Well, she could not tell. She quickened her pace, and ran up-stairs to Rosamond, and found her busy, but not too busy to find time for her. Phillis and Gerrie joined them later on; and at seven they all gathered round Mrs. Hurst's hospitable tea-table.

"Rosa, you make tea for me, my dear," said the old lady; and Rosamond sat down at the tea-tray, with Mrs. Hurst beside her on one side, and May, eager, on the other.

"I'm grieved to lose you two children to-morrow," continued the old lady; "we can ill spare you from our quiet little village, can we, May?"

"But I'm going to stay with them in the autumn."

"And you think it does not matter as long as you see them again," said Dr. Hurst.

"That's cool!" cried Tom; "I shall just go instead of you, May."

"You'll be at school, Tom."

"But I shall go in my holidays, and then you won't be able to go later on."

May laughed confidently; and then they began sending messages to Mr. and Mrs. Fernaval, till tea was over, and their last long country ramble began.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

1. We read that, according to the Mosaic law, a Jew, when he came into his neighbour's vineyard, might eat "his fill of grapes." What restriction was imposed on one so doing?

2. How many times did the Lord Jesus cleanse the Temple?

3. In which of our Lord's miracles is reference made to the custom of employing professional mourners?

4. In what part of the Old Testament is mention made of that prophet who was "slain between the Temple and the altar," and where does St. Matthew record our Lord's upbraiding His enemies with the murder?

5. Though St. John does not formally record the transfiguration of the Lord, yet he has an allusion to it. Give chapter and verse.

6. We read that the words of Jesus at Saul's conversion were unintelligible to all around him Give a similar instance from St. John's Gospel.

7. Prove that the church at Corinth had not adopted the practice of that of Jerusalem with regard to a community of goods and one common purse (Acts ii. 42—47).

8. The phrase "maid child" occurs but once in our version of the Bible. Give chapter and verse.

The Secretary of the Hospital for Sick Children, Great Ormond Street, London, requests us to acknowledge the receipt of Five Shillings for the "QUIVER COT" Fund.

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

LADY ALICE.

THE Lady Alice walks alone,
By forest glade and river brim,
A scarf around her shoulders thrown,
At morning dawn and ev'ning dim.

The early woodman often spies
A gentle form and face most fair,
With lids that droop above the eyes
To hide the sorrow seated there.

And, ling'ring by the silent lake,
She may be seen at twilight grey,
Feeding the swans that love to take Their food from fingers white as they.

The hare she meeteth in the glade,
At her approach disdains to stir;
And in the farthest chestnut shade
The fawn is not afraid of her.

They seem to know, those guileless things,
That she is gentle and in pain;
And startled birds that spread their wings
Look at her, and alight again.

So her hurt spirit dwells among
Sweet friends that never make it smart:
And sympathy without a tongue
Is shed in silence on her heart.

ALEXANDER HUME.

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—X.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF S. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me."—2 SAM. xii. 23.

IT is exceedingly painful to witness the death of an infant or of a little child. With the sufferings of a grown-up person we associate the idea of spiritual discipline; for the affliction, we think, sad and trying as it is, is working out its result in the perfecting of the Christian character. Or perhaps in such a case we find refuge in the thought that no adult lives can have been so blameless before God as to deserve exemption from sorrow. We do not judge. God forbid! We cannot trace, nor do we wish to trace—any connection between what is happening and any particular transgression. We only know generally that there is no man upon earth who doeth good and sinneth not. But this little one—in what hath it offended? And how can it—undeveloped, unreasoning, as it is, unable to interpret the Divine dealings—how can it be expected to profit by thus passing through the furnace of affliction? There is a mystery here. Christianity explains it—faith grapples with it; we are sure that the loving Father of all may be trusted to do what is best for His child; but still there is a vague feeling of perplexity haunting us. And the sufferings of a child—its wordless appeals for help, or its patient endurance of pain—affect us far more deeply than the spectacle of similar anguish borne by an older person.

But if it is distressing to see any child suffer, how much more so is it to witness the agony of your own offspring? and how unspeakably terrible must it be to have to admit to yourself that your folly, or your carelessness, or your sin, has been the procuring cause of the misery that has come—of the death that will follow?

Yet even such terrible anguish as this wrung on a certain occasion the heart of King David. Under any circumstances his affectionate nature would have felt keenly the loss of a little one: he would have grieved greatly if the ordinary ailments of childhood had taken an infant from his arms; but in this case it is he himself who is the author of the calamity. The blow which crushes him is not such as falls upon others: it is the direct consequence, the Divinely-sent punishment of, his transgression. The son is suffering for the sin of the father.

And now every cry and moan of the little sufferer cuts to the monarch's heart, as he lies there on the earth, fasting and weeping, covered with sackcloth, refusing to be comforted, and beseeching God, if it be His will, to spare the innocent and take the guilty.

Presently the struggle is over. The little tortured frame is convulsed no longer, but lies placid and fair in death, and the spirit has returned to Him who gave it. As soon as David knows this he ceases his mourning. Regaining some of his former cheerfulness, he goes back at once to his ordinary mode of life: and to the servants, who express surprise at the sudden change, he explains and justifies himself (for none could accuse him of want of feeling) in the words of our text. While there was life there was hope. God might, perhaps, be induced to revoke His decree. The calamity might, perhaps, not be so absolutely determined as that the repentance of the offender could not avail to avert it. At all events, God would hearken to prayer. But when the child was dead, all hope of course had vanished. What then was to be done, but to bear what the Divine will had imposed, and to bear it as cheerfully as might be, and to take the consolation which remained?—"Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him—but he shall not return to me."

It will be worth our while, we think, to examine these words with some attention. There are many households in which there is at least one little empty chair. There are many parents whose hearts turn wistfully at times to the recollection of some dearly-loved child "not lost, but gone before." The circumstances of David's bereavement were exceptional, as we have seen, but the fact was not. And the thoughts which gave him comfort in his sorrow may be found to have some efficacy in comforting the mourner now.

Let us consider, then—though this is not one of the topics of consolation—that David's suspense was over. He knew the worst, for the worst had come. And this was something. Many a sufferer would tell us that the anticipation of evil is far worse than the evil itself. Many a one who has dreaded dying, with a dread beyond expression, has found death comparatively easy when it came. And many who have watched by the sick-bed of one they loved, who have witnessed the painful conflict of life with the forces of disease, who have alternated between the extremes of hope and despair, have felt a relief—perhaps hardly admitted to themselves—when the suffering was over and the end had come. Yes, suspense is sometimes almost unendurable; it is always a very bitter ingredient in the cup of sorrow. And David now was free from suspense.

But what are the other thoughts that his language suggests to us?

First, this:—That what God has done is not meant to be undone; and that it is as unwise and unchristian as it is useless to resent the act of His will. Far better is it to accept the inevitable; far better to acquiesce in the Divine decision: and this not merely because we have no power to resist, but because we would not resist if we could. The fact that the little one has been taken indicates of itself that is the best event that could have befallen. We cannot alter it; but also we ought not to wish to alter it. We ought to feel—"if the turning of a straw could bring my loved child back again, I would not turn it, now that the Lord has decided otherwise."

Then there is the second thought: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me." Does David simply mean: "By-and-by I shall pass into the world of spirits, the unseen world, as he has done; I shall be gathered to my fathers in my turn, as he has been"? Surely not; for what consolation for an aching heart would there be in such a thought? But he means that although his child is taken from him, and will not return to this earth, there will be a meeting for father and son hereafter, in that brighter and better world beyond the grave. It is here that mourning parents find some of the consolation they need. A cold and cruel theology would persuade us to question the salvation of young children, dying in their childhood—would tell us that we cannot be certain about the happiness of our departed little ones. But we turn to Christ, the loving and gracious Saviour, who bids the children come to Him, and the heartless theory disappears at once, like a dark mist before the rising sun. We feel sure that the little ones are drawn into the embrace of the Saviour's infinite love. Whatever may be the case with us at last, they are safe—they behold the face of their Father in heaven; and whilst we are toiling and endangered here below, they are hushed in the bosom of eternal rest. And we shall "go to them" not as strangers, but to be recognised and welcomed. Can this be doubted? Think again of David's words. He draws his comfort from the hope of meeting his child, not from the idea of mixing with a crowd in which, somewhere or other, he believes his child to be. And bereaved parents may surely believe, with David, that they shall one day see their little ones again—changed, indeed, because radiant with the glories of Paradise, and yet the same—stretching out loving hands of welcome to them as they enter the golden gates of the City of God—the portals of their Father's house.

"We know that all things work together for good to them that love God."—Rom. viii. 28.

You have probably seen a large and complicated piece of machinery in full play. The parts, as you noticed, were very various—various in size and shape, various in the material of which they were made. There were wood and leather and iron and brass; there were cranks and levers and pistons and pulleys, and wheels great and small, with other instruments of which both the construction and the use were strange to you. And besides the difference of material, you observed a difference of movement among the parts. There was contrariety and opposition. The wheels whirled round in opposite directions; the chains seemed placed on purpose to resist each other. Checking and counterchecking, strain and counterstrain, were to be seen everywhere. And you felt confused as you stood contemplating the ceaseless and unintelligible whirl that was going on around you.

But although you were puzzled, there was one thing which you could understand. It was obvious that all these parts of the machinery, however diverse in themselves or in their mode of operation, were working together to produce a certain result—somehow or other, their combined action led up to a certain definite point, and amidst all the apparent confusion, this point was invariably reached. Did you feel disposed to criticise the mechanism? Not at all. A suggestion might have only displayed your ignorance. If you had advised the removal of some insignificant-looking portion of the whole, and your advice had been acted upon, probably everything would have come to a standstill, and disorder and ruin have ensued. Like a prudent man, then, you admired the process, without attempting to interfere with it. A wisdom and a skill superior to your own had formed these combinations, and adjusted these differences, and balanced these powers; and you were contented to receive with gratitude the benefit of the accomplished result.

If such an experience as this has ever occurred to us, we shall perhaps be the better prepared for entering into the significance of the Apostolic statement in the verse just quoted. There is marked diversity of importance in the events which befal the Christian disciple. Life, for the most part, is made up of trifling matters; but every now and then a great blessing or a crushing calamity comes. Then, again, there is contrariety of action as well as diversity of nature. Pain and pleasure, joy and sorrow, sickness and health, prosperity and adversity, possession and bereavement, life and death—what opposites are these! And yet they are sure to enter, in some proportion, into every Christian career. But all are adjusted, as in an elaborate piece of exquisitely-constructed mechanism, to produce a result in the advancing sanctification of the people of God. Considering, then, in whose hands the machinery is—would we like to criticise? would we wish to suggest an alteration, to hint that this trial or that loss might well have been spared us, or that such and such a blessing might have been advantageously bestowed instead of being withheld? Surely not. The system is too complicated for us to form a trustworthy judgment upon it, and we are satisfied to feel that "all" things, whatever they may be—great or small, pleasant or painful—are "working together" for our good. This is the end aimed at, and this—if we will have it so—will be surely attained.

"For good?" Yes, for the highest good of the Christian disciple. Not necessarily for his comfort, not necessarily for his release from trouble and removal into rest and ease; still less necessarily for his worldly advancement and prosperity; although these things may sometimes be given in, as it were, by the way; but for a nobler purpose still—even for his advancing conformity to the image of Christ, and increasing fitness for his post in the kingdom of God. We do not deny that many things which the world calls good are good also for the Christian, if he possess them and enjoy them in subordination to God. It is neither sincere nor right to speak slightingly of the comforts of existence, as if they should weigh nothing in the estimation of a follower of Christ. They should, it is true, weigh as nothing, when compared with spiritual blessings; yet in themselves they are things to be desired. A Christian disciple may legitimately ask for temporal mercies, provided always he is willing to leave it to God to decide for him whether it is well that he should receive them or not. In sickness, he may pray for health; in pain, for relief; in poverty, for a competence; in the prospect of failure, for success. Certainly these are "good things." But they are not his good things; they do not constitute his highest good. His highest good consists in the assimilation of his nature to that of Christ—an assimilation continually carried on by the inworking power of the Holy Ghost. And for this highest good, God, as we have seen, is engaged in providing, by the arrangement and adjustment of the various events of the Christian life.

"To them that love God!" There is a limitation, then, to the extent of the assertion? Yes; obviously there must be. The Divine gifts are blessings or are curses, according to our way of taking them. We make them what they are to us. Observe this, in the case of the greatest of God's gifts to man—that of His own Son. Christ is either a sure foundation on which to build, or a rock of offence on which men stumble to their destruction; and Christ's doctrine and Christ's ministers are a savour of life unto life to some, and of death unto death to others. And so with the Divine dealings with us. If a man does not love God, but is out of harmony with Him, it is impossible that the events of his life should produce a beneficial effect upon him. They are meant for his good; but they will work harm. Affliction will exasperate him; prosperity will puff him up; joy will make him thoughtless; failure will render him despondent; success will lift him to presumption. Mischief will every way be done. It cannot but be so. But let his attitudes toward God be reversed—let him come to love God—and that which has hitherto been against him will now be for him, and all things will work together for his good.

Lastly, "we know!" How do we know? From the character of our God and Father as He is revealed in Christ; from the recorded experience of the servants of God; lastly, from what we have observed about ourselves. Have we not lived long enough to detect the marvellous adjustment and combination of events by which our spiritual education is being carried on? Yes; we do not conjecture, we do not merely hope, and believe—we know!

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

XIV. BLESSING THE LITTLE CHILDREN.

I CANNOT yet leave that sea-coast where so great a multitude go to find rest and healing. The Divine Narrative may well appeal to us in relation to such a locality, for it was by the sea-shore that the Gospel came to those who went out to seek Jesus of Nazareth; it was there that the poor people heard Him gladly; there that the sick who were brought to Him were made whole; there that He fed the great company who lacked bread.

All the needs of humanity were recognised by Him who called Himself the "Son of Man." The blessing of little children is one of those needs of true human life which the Lord recognised gladly. He recognises it still; and His solemn mingling of warning and of promise with regard to its observance, has an intensity that may well appeal to us all, now that, after eighteen centuries of comparative neglect and indifference, we are discerning that the only hope of social redemption is to be found in that care for children which shall forbid their being left either morally or physically destitute.

There is a house the walls of which are now nearly built—a house standing high above the sea, in that great breezy suburb of Margate known as Cliftonville—to which I want you to pay a visit when it is quite completed; and when the bright, cheerful, airy wards—whose walls will be decorated with pictures,—the light, spacious dining-room, and comfortable home-like enlivening influences of the place, will entitle it to be regarded as the fitting consummation of two other admirable institutions for the nurture and maintenance of orphan and fatherless children.

The modest little building referred to is named "The Convalescent and Sea-side Home for Orphans," Harold Road, Margate. The foundation-stone was laid on the 29th of August in this present year, by the youthful son of a gentleman who has liberally promoted the beneficent work; and the foundation was celebrated by a simple consecration service, conducted by the Reverend the Archdeacon of Canterbury, and made vocal by the singing of a few simple hymns by some of the little ones from the parent institutions in London. These institutions are "The Orphan Working School," at Haverstock Hill, and that most attractive series of pretty cottages on the brow of the hill at Hornsey Rise, which have been more than once spoken of as "Lilliput Village," but the style and title of which are "The Alexandra Orphanage for Infants"—a name the distinguishing feature of which is that it is immediately associated with its first patroness, the Princess of Wales.

Of the intended Home at Margate I need not now speak particularly, except to note that it is approaching completion, so far as its external structure is concerned; that much yet remains to be done in the way of fitting and finishing it for the reception of the little convalescents, who—suffering, as many of them do, from constitutional and hereditary weakness, which is yet not actual sickness, and recovering, as many of them are, from the feeble condition which has been to some extent remedied by the careful nurture, good food, and healthy regimen, of the large institutions near London—are not fit patients either for their own or any other infirmary wards, and yet require to be restored to greater strength before they can join the main body of their young companions in the school or the playground.

I cannot show you in words what kind of building this is to be. The foundations of it are already laid; and it will be plainly picturesque and substantially pretty, as becomes a place which is to become the home of thirty children, taken from among nearly six hundred, the parents of nearly half of whom have died of consumption, and so left to their offspring that tendency to a feeble constitution which can be best remedied by the grand medicine of sea-air, wholesome nutritious food, and a judicious alternation of healthful exercise and rest.

It is to Mr. Joseph Soul—the indefatigable secretary of the Working School, with which he has been connected for nearly forty years, and the honorary secretary of the Alexandra Orphanage, of which he may be regarded as the virtual founder—that the proposal to establish this Convalescent Home is due. He has determined to open up for it a fresh and distinct interest, so that, though contributions for this especial object are received at the office of the two charities, at 63, Cheapside, the subscription-list is entirely distinct from those of the two institutions, one of which has a remarkable history, to be presently referred to.

Mr. Soul has already triumphed over considerable discouragement, and has worked so assiduously to found his Convalescent Home, as a crown to his labours, that gifts in kind as well as in money have been sent [illegible] building and the furnishing of the house. All the window-glass, a handsome patent bath, the tesselated pavement for hall and passages, plants and trees for stocking the garden, Art Union pictures for the walls, a harmonium, three furnished cots and a mahogany chair as a good beginning for the dormitory, besides a number of small but useful articles, have already testified to the sympathies ready to greet the completion of this Home for thirty weak and wistful little ones, who cannot obtain the requisite care and attention under the present system of placing them with private persons to board and lodge.

But it is necessary to tell as briefly as possible the story of the oldest of the two institutions of which this building is to be an accessory—not only the oldest of these two, but probably the oldest voluntarily supported orphan asylum in London, since it dates from 116 years ago, when George II. was king, when Louis XV. was scandalising Europe and preparing the Revolution, when Wesleyan Methodism was commencing a vast religious revival, when Doctor Johnson had but just finished writing his Dictionary, and when William Hogarth was painting those wonderful pictures which are still the most instructive records of society and fashion as seen in the year 1758.

It was in that year, on the 10th of May, that fourteen periwigged and powdered gentlemen met at the George Inn, in Ironmonger Lane, in order to discuss how they might best found an asylum for forty orphan children—that is to say, for twenty boys and twenty girls.

They soon came to a solemn decision that there was "a sufficient subscription for carrying the scheme into execution," and a record to that effect was soberly entered in the very first clean page of the first minute-book of the Charity, with the additional memoranda that a committee was chosen and a treasurer appointed to collect and take care of the money necessary to support the undertaking.

The early minute-books of this charity, by the way, are models of serious penmanship. Grave achievements of caligraphy, with engrossed headings, elaborate flourishes, and stiff formal hedgerows of legal verbiage, suggestive of the fact that the secretaries were either attorneys or scriveners, and regarded the entries in a minute-book or the opening of a new account as very weighty and important events not to be lightly passed over. In this they were probably right; and, at all events, just so much of the old methodical exactitude has come down to the present day in the history of the institution, that the published accounts of the Orphan Working School have been referred to by the Times as models of condensation cumbered with a clearness of detail, which may be regarded as the best indication of a well-ordered and economical administration.

It might not be too much to say that the old principle of carrying a scheme into execution only when there are sufficient subscriptions still characterises the operations of the institution. At all events, Mr. Soul had secured enough money for the completion of the new building at Margate before the actual work commenced, and his experience tells him that funds will be forthcoming to maintain it.

The founders of the original Orphan Working School, however, laid their wigs together to obtain a house ready built, and at last found one adapted to the purpose, in what was then the suburban district known as Hogsden—since gentilised into Hoxton. Like all really good work, the enterprise began to grow—there were so many orphans, and this was still the only general asylum maintained by subscriptions—so that, as funds came in, two other adjoining houses were rented, and in seventeen years the number of inmates had increased from 40 to 165.

Reading the formal and yet most interesting records of this parent institution for the care of the orphan and the fatherless, I fall into a kind of wonder at the enormous change in the method of "nurture and admonition," of teaching and training, which has taken place in the past eighty years. Even in this house at Hoxton, whereof the founders appear to have been kindly old gentlemen, the discipline was enormously suggestive of that stern restriction and unsympathetic treatment which was thought necessary for the due correction of the "Old Adam" in the young heart. We know how great an outcry has quite lately been made at the discovery of the remains of that mode of chastisement which seems to have been abandoned almost everywhere, except by a special revival in gaols, and at two or three of the public schools to which the sons of gentlemen are consigned for their education.

The discipline at the Orphanage at Hogsden was cold and repellant enough, perhaps—had very little about it to encourage the affections, or to appeal to the loving confidence of a child—but it was less barbarous than the code which at that time found its maxim in the saying, "Spare the rod, spoil the child." Only very flagrant disobedience, persistent lying and swearing, were punished with public whipping. But even in the case of ordinary falsehood, a child was placed with his face to the wall at meal-time, with a paper pinned to his back with the word "Lyar" written on it, till he was sufficiently penitent to say, in the presence of all the rest of the children, "I have sinned in telling a lie. I will take more care. I hope God will forgive me."

The name, "Working School," was then interpreted so strictly, that there was comparatively little margin for education. Arithmetic appears to have been regarded with peculiar jealousy by the founders of this institution, who, being perhaps bankers, accountants, and capitalists, looked upon such instruction as calculated to give the poor little boys and girls notions beyond their station.

For ten years the teaching of figures was altogether ignored; and it was only when some of the children, having heard that there was a science called "summing" known to the outer world, begged to be taught, that a solemn meeting of the Governors was called to consider the question, when it was conceded, after great deliberation, and no little opposition from the anti-educational part of the Committee, that arithmetic should be permitted to be taught, as far as addition.

Thus, to their few and rigidly ordered recreations, their hours of manual labour in making nets, list-carpets, slippers, and other cheap commodities, to their instruction in plain reading, and to their times for partaking of plain and even coarse food, served in not too tempting a way, was added the art of writing, and of the first two rules of arithmetic.

This was the condition of the orphans in 1775; but still the charity grew—grew out of house-room; and as the funds grew also, it was determined that it should have a building of its own, on a plot of ground in the City Road, where, improvements having set in, the grand old charity moved with the march of modern improvement. Life became less hard, and instruction more extended. The influences of modern thought and education had superseded the old severity, and new Governors succeeded the bewigged and powdered founders, who had, after all, so well ordered their work, that it grew with the growth of intelligence.

During the seventy-two years from 1775 to 1847, the institution had received 1,124 orphans; and again the dimensions of the house were unequal to the demands of the inmates; while the house itself, and the ground on which it stood, had become so valuable, that it was determined to buy a plot of land at Haverstock Hill, and there to found a truly representative Home for 240 orphan boys and girls—a number which has now increased (as the building itself has increased also) till 400 orphans are taught, fed, and clothed in one of the most truly representative charities in all great London.

AUTUMN LEAVES.

HEAP them up quickly!
Yesternight's breeze
Shook them so thickly
Under the trees.

Look! the dull yellow
Of each in decay
Rivals its fellow—
They have lived out their day.

How they were fluttering
Like birds taking wing,
And bashfully uttering
Low music last spring!

How they danced wildly
To welcome in June,
The gales singing mildly
A silver-sweet tune!

How they basked lazily
In Midsummer's glare,
And rocked themselves crazily
In Autumn's fresh air!

How russet and sober
The garments they wore,
To greet brown October,
Ere strewing his floor!

Dead spoils of November!
Soiled "gold of the woods!"
We sigh to remember
Such perishing goods.

Ye types of the treasure
We lay up on earth,
Betokening the measure
Old Time grants to Mirth!

Ye show to us yearly
The value of bloom,
But not too severely
Foreshadow its tomb.

Fair Nature works kindly;
Grave truths she reveals,
Lest men wander blindly,
Unmarking her wheels.

If hearts echo drearily
Some words on her page,
The whole softens cheerily
Our life's pilgrimage.

The leaves we are heaping,
Ripen the mould.
Locked up in their keeping,
Now torpid and cold,

Lie germs of spring roses,
Young daisies, green leaves,
For earth has long dozes,
And in them she weaves

A web of creations;
Thus feeding reflection
With symbols for nations
Of man's Resurrection.

JANE DIXON.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER III.

HALF stunned by the suddenness with which her future was being decided for her, Eda Granton sat and listened to her brother's rapid explanations. He had made inquiries at a couple of institutes for governesses, and advertised in her name in two or three of the daily papers, but had not heard of anything that promised as well as a situation mentioned to him by the clergyman who had visited Mrs. Granton.

"Did Mr. Gale approve of our parting so quickly and completely?" she roused herself to inquire.

"What are our private affairs to Mr. Gale, that I should thrust them upon him? I told him how we both felt that you must be up and doing as well as I, and this is the result of the inquiries he has made in your behalf. I wish you would not keep looking at me so reproachfully, Eda! You agree with me that it will be prudent to adopt this course"—she made a dissenting gesture, but Mark would not see it—"and yet when I take all the unpleasantness on my own shoulders, you find fault, instead of being grateful!"

Eda slid her hand into his, and tried to think that he was right; that her weak health and repugnance to his plans had made her irritable and unjust. "I did not mean to seem unkind," she faltered. I do not doubt that you are acting for the best, but you should not be surprised that I find it difficult to reconcile myself to the separation that mamma always deprecated."

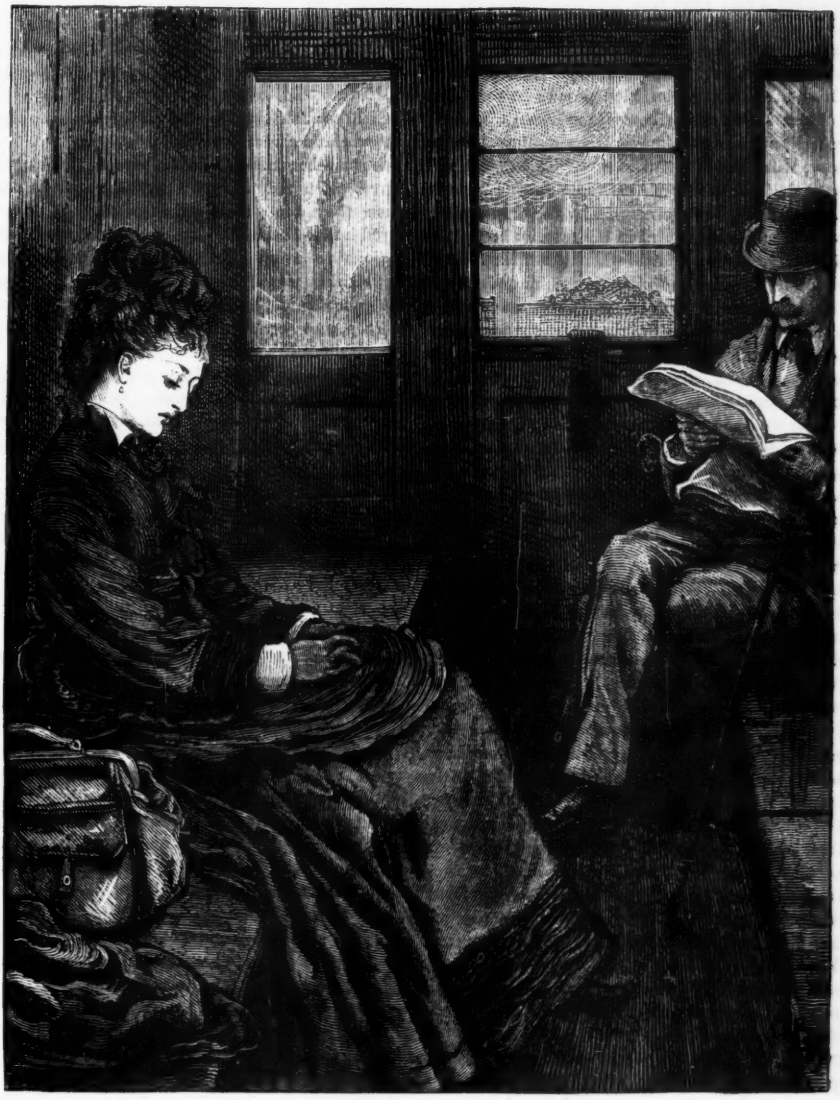
"Let me read you Mr. Gale's note;" and Mark produced it. "He has a friend residing on his own estate in Surrey, about forty miles from London—just a pleasant distance, Eda, I should be able to see you often—this friend has built a school-house for the children of his own tenants and labourers, and is in want of a sensible well-educated young person to act as schoolmistress."

"You forget that for a village school a certain system is required, which I have never learned," Eda objected.

"So Mr. Gale was saying; but in this case your ignorance will be considered an advantage, for his friend has a system of his own on which he proposes to have the children instructed, and as he is anxious to carry out his plans for their benefit as quickly as possible, the sooner you can commence your duties the better it will please him."

"You talk as if the affair were already settled, although I never knew till this minute that it had been proposed!"

"It only waits your assent," her brother admitted. "As your natural protector, I thought myself justified in writing to Mr. Texley, to detail your acquirements, and ask what salary he proposes giving, and so on; and it appears that my letter, or Mr. Gale's warm recommendation, or both, have given so much satisfaction, that Mr. Texley is ready to induct you in your new office as soon as you feel well enough to make the journey to Weston Hayes. The pure country breezes will do wonders for you, Eda! I wish your trunks were packed, and you were just going to start; your pale cheeks trouble me every time I look at them!"



He stooped to kiss her, and Eda's tears burst forth; the prospect of such a speedy separation had quite unnerved her. She knew how her mother had relied upon her to keep Mark steady, by her gentle sisterly influence; to cheer him if he lost heart; to encourage him when he made renewed efforts; in fact, to step into the breach that the loss of an only parent would make. How could she do this if he sent her from him?"

"If we could but be together!" she sobbed; but his hasty "It is impossible!" was spoken in a tone from which she knew that there was no appeal.

"Mr. Gale will look in to-morrow, Eda, and ask you to fix a day for leaving here. Let it be an early one, for we shall only make each other miserable till it is over. When we are both fairly launched on the world, we shall leave off looking back, and fretting over what cannot be altered."

"Promise me this! only promise me this!" cried Eda, throwing her arms round him; "that if you miss me, or if you feel that you have made a mistake in joining Richie Atwood, you will send for me at once. You do not know how economical and industrious I can be, nor how I would work to make your home bright and cheerful! Promise this, for the sake of the dear mother who bade us love and cling to each other, come what might."

"I do promise, Eda," he answered, kissing her again and again. "It pains me more than you imagine to let you leave me; but it is the curse of poverty that we must trample all our best affections under our feet! Now lie down, dear, and keep yourself quiet, while I go and learn by what train you had better travel. You are to have rooms at the gardener's cottage—did I tell you? and Mr. Gale, who spent a week at Weston Hayes last summer, tells me that the scenery around the estate is lovely. How you will enjoy rambling in the woods and fields once more!"

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"Now really and utterly alone."—p. 27.

"Alone?" Eda queried; but he closed the door so hastily, that she could not tell whether he heard the sorrowful question.

Mr. Gale called on the following morning, and was pleased when Eda gave him grateful thanks for the trouble he had taken on her behalf; but he was in too great a hurry to pay a round of visits to his sick poor to notice her increased dejection. Nor would she have cared to tell him, kind though he was, that the separation from Mark would cost her a sharper pang than any she had known when closing the eyes of their dead mother. The one had left her for heaven; but the other was plunging into the battle of life, unarmed for the conflict by the only armour that could be his safeguard in the fray.

Mrs. Ingle stood aghast when she first learned that her lodgers were going away; and Jan was fetched home from the tavern, and shook and scolded into comparative sobriety, that his spouse might have the benefit of his advice. After a long consultation with him, she went up-stairs to assure Eda that Jan wouldn't hear of her leaving them. She was quite welcome to the rooms as long as she chose to occupy them, and the rent could stand over till "any when" that suited her.

As Eda gratefully declined this offer, Mrs. Ingle took fresh counsel with her better half, and returned to say that if Miss liked to take out the rent in giving Ria a lesson now and then, Jan would be quite satisfied. Work was plentiful, and he had promised, quite faithful, to stick to it. Besides, the letting of the rooms wasn't so great an object that he'd hear of Miss giving them up as long as she could make herself comfortable in them.

"Say you'll stay, Miss Eda, do 'ee now!" pleaded the woman; "seems as if now you're to be left to yourself I can't let ye go. My poor motherless lamb, I can't abide for ye to go among strangers! Master Mark can fend for himself, never doubt him; but you——" and Mrs. Ingle's eloquence ended in such a burst of grief, that Eda crept into her arms and wept with her.

It was a long time before she could be comforted with assurances that Eda thought the change would do her good, and that if it did not, she would return to her kind friends at Pimlico. With this promise Mrs. Ingle had to be satisfied, and beat a quick retreat, for Mark was coming up the stairs, and she preferred to avoid him.

"That woman here again, Eda!" he exclaimed, angrily. "You allow her too many freedoms; you must assert your position more carefully when you are a schoolmistress! And look here! how dare she leave these disgusting things littering our sitting-room."

The "things" were Mrs. Ingle's boots, of which, true to her old custom, she always disencumbered herself when she came up to Eda. Viciously kicking these down-stairs carried off some of Mark's ill humour, but it revived when, in a voice broken by emotion, his sister related the disinterested kindness with which the Ingles had acted.

It was an insult, he declared. What did they mean by pressing their offers of assistance upon her, just as if she were a pauper? It was only that they might be able to bruit all through the neighbourhood the pleasant tidings that Miss Granton was living on their bounty. They meant it kindly! nonsense; or if they did, who would care to be beholden to such low-minded wretches as a tippling bricklayer's labourer and a charwoman.

Sick at heart, Eda said no more; and very little conversation had passed between her and her brother when they took their places in the cab that conveyed her to the railway station. Perhaps Mark was anxious to avoid altogether the painful subjects to which she would most probably recur, for they had not gone many yards when he signalled the driver to stop, and beckoned a person sauntering along the other side of the street.

"It is Richie," he explained. "You would like to see him before you quit London, would you not? if only to convince yourself that you do not leave me in the hands of such an ogre as you painted him the other day."

See Richie? Eda could have answered yes and no in the same breath, and with equal sincerity; yes, because he had been the hero of all her youthful dreams, and no, because some inexplicable feeling warned her that there might be danger in the meeting. But no option was given her. Mark's signal had been seen and obeyed, and Richie himself had opened the door of the cab, and was warmly shaking the trembling fingers she extended.

Mark was right; he was unchanged, except that the once boyish face had grown somewhat paler and more manly. There was the same gay light dancing in his blue eyes; the same haughty careless carriage of the head and impatient jerking aside of the wavy fair hair that would fall over his forehead, and, in all outward tokens, the promise of his youth was fulfilled. Richie Atwood had developed into a well-proportioned and very attractive-looking young man, dressed with a touch of foppery, yet foppery that sat well upon him, accompanied as it was with an utter absence of conceit or too much of that self-confidence so distasteful in the young.

His words, too, had all the pleasant but respectful familiarity which divests such a meeting of embarrassment.

"It is very delightful to see you again, Miss Granton, or may I say Eda, as I used to do? Thanks. I was on my way to Pimlico; for though Mr. Mark here demurred a little, and seemed to think I might be in the way, I could not resist my longing to say a how-d'ye-do and a good-bye to my old playfellow before she put so many miles between us."

"We have been in London nearly a year. Why have you never been to see us?"

"How could I intrude upon an invalid, even if I had known your correct address? But you must not think that I have been unmindful of you because circumstances have kept us apart. Mark will tell you how rejoiced I was to see him!"

It never entered the mind of Eda that if Richie had really been anxious to renew the intimacy, he would not have waited until a chance rencontre in the streets brought them in contact. Very few people ever did attempt to analyse Richie's motives while they were under the spell of his sweet low voice and sympathetic looks. To Eda, still smarting with a secret feeling that Mark had treated her like a wilful child who must be coerced and managed into taking the course proposed for her, these demonstrations of a more kindly feeling were so very soothing, that she started and sighed when the cab stopped, and Richie prepared to leave them.

"How sorry I am that you are leaving London!" he exclaimed, as he bent towards her with the caressing manner that was at once brotherly and tender. "But I shall hear of you through Mark, shan't I? Whenever there is no kind message for me in your letters to him, I shall revenge myself by being sulky till you write again. But in sober earnest, dear Eda, the knowledge that you are thinking of and praying for us ought to keep both of us straight, and I hope it will."

She could not trust herself to reply; and shaking her hand warmly, Richie alighted.

"May I go to the train with you?" he asked; "but no, I'll not press that wish. Of course, you and Mark have a few last words to say to each other, so adieu. Dinna forget old times, nor old friends!" and the next moment he was gone, and Eda stood bewildered in the bustle of the railway terminus. However, Mark safely piloted her through the throng, and his better self was heard in his farewells.

"I can scarcely let you go, my own dear sister, and I would not if I did not feel that it is for the best. Keep up your spirits, and recollect that I shall strain every nerve to win such a position that I can have you with me. You'll write often? I shall have nothing to cheer me but your letters."

"And you will not forget our mother, but try to live the Christian life she set before us?"

"It is you who must do that, Eda; and, as Richie told you, pray for both. See, here we are; and now to find you a comfortable seat. You'll not mind riding third class, will you? Now cash begins to run so short, one don't want to put more in the pockets of the railway company than one can help."

Eda raised no objection to any arrangement he chose to make. She wanted to say a few earnest words, to entreat him not to let this eager grasping after wealth get too strong a hold upon him; but when she began to speak he stopped her with an assurance that he knew all she wished to say, and would do his best to be good, &c., &c.

"Better take your seat at once," he added, hurrying her towards the train. "Get in here; I'll see to your luggage. God bless you, my precious little sister, and good-bye!"

Eda strained her eyes after him, as he went to the guard's van, and superintended the ticketing of her trunks. She hoped and expected that he would return to her for one last word, but Mark only waved his hand, and turned quickly away, as if he had not courage for a more protracted farewell.

There was no one in the same compartment with Eda but a young man, who sat in the further corner, absorbed in a newspaper; but even he was not disturbed by any noisy grief. The pale face of the young girl grew a shade paler, and her lips drooped more sorrowfully, but her eyes were tearless. It was with a sort of dull aching too deep for tears, that she was beginning to realise how she was now really and utterly alone; that from henceforth Mark's way through the world and hers would take different directions. Would these diverse paths ultimately bring them to the same destination? We shall see.

CHAPTER IV.

The bell rang loudly, every one had settled themselves in their places ready for the start, when a dozen or more of rough fellows came tearing across the platform, and scrambling into the compartment where Eda was seated, jostling, laughing, swearing, and, as the train moved slowly out of the station, cheering on two of their number, who were wrestling for the only seat left vacant. At last, amidst indescribable noise and confusion, one of the combatants was hurled violently on to the floor of the carriage, and the victor squeezed himself between a companion and Eda, who, terrified and disgusted by the blasphemous language these men were uttering, had drawn down her veil, and shrunk as far from them as she could. It appeared that they were all going down the line on the same errand—to be spectators of a fight that was to come off between a couple of noted pugilists, on a retired spot where the policemen were not likely to interfere with their amusement.

"Hope I'm not discommoding you, miss," said Eda's neighbour. "I'm very comfortable myself, I am, for I likes to be close to the ladies, I do."

Encouraged by a roar of laughter from his companions, he proceeded to be still more facetious.

"My elbows is squeedged into my ribs, or else I'd ask you to have a sup out of my bottle, miss. It's a *gen*teel drink I carries—cream of the valley, that's what it is."

Eda kept her face turned towards the window, or she would have seen that the young man who sat in the further corner was leaning forward, with his face flushed and brows knitted. He had a sister at home, and longed to defend this modest-looking and half-frightened girl from further annoyance; but he was one against many, and knew not how to compass it.

"Hope you don't mind a bit of smoke, miss," Eda's tormentor began again; "for I'm a-dying for my pipe. If you'd like to fill it with them pretty fingers of your'n, I'm sure you shall. I likes to be waited upon by the ladies."

In a moment the young man had pushed his way to the place where Eda was sitting, and was good-humouredly remonstrating with the fellow, whose short black pipe was now in his mouth.

"My good friend, you cannot wish to annoy the lady. If you must smoke, go and sit somewhere else."

He was heard with an insolent stare. "To oblige you? no thank-ye. I likes my present quarters too well. I shan't stir to please nobody. Lend us a bit of that there rug o' your'n, miss, will ye? I begins to feel a draught to my feet."

As he put his dirty hand on the shawl across Eda's knees, she could not repress a little cry of terror; and her champion, prudence forgotten, seized him by the collar, and sent him sprawling into the arms of those who sat opposite.

"Make your mate behave himself, will you, my lads!" he exclaimed, in clear loud tones that arrested their attention. "There 's only one lady in the carriage with us, and she's in great trouble, as you may see. I'm sure there's none of you would like to let her be insulted at such a time."

This allusion to Eda's deep mourning had the desired effect. The fellow, who was fuming and raving, and making ineffectual attempts to grapple with her protector, was unceremoniously pushed down on the seat, and held there till his wrath subsided. The young man followed up his victory by announcing that he was an artist, and would sketch any of them who would like their portraits taken.

This proposal was received with loud acclamations, and although the motion of the carriage was not very favourable for drawing, he contrived with a few bold strokes to produce likenesses of two or three of the party, which were handed round, and pronounced excellent.

It was amusing to see how these men, brutalised by their associations, smoothed their sullen brows, and were flattered to see their disfigured noses, thick lips, and coarse animal jaws, so faithfully reproduced by the artist. More than one hand was held out to him as the train stopped at the station for which they were bound, and then they struggled out of the carriage, impeding one another in their haste, and again horrifying the shuddering Eda with oaths and exclamations too horrid to repeat.

"I am very much obliged to you, sir," she said, gratefully, when once more left alone with the young man.

"Do not mention it. I think we both made a mistake in getting into an empty carriage," he added, with a smile; "another time I should advise you to secure yourself against such fellow-travellers as these have been by taking a seat where there are two or three babies. They may be troublesome companions in their way, but they would not pollute your ears with such language as those blackguards have used."

"There is no danger of their returning, is there?" she asked, apprehensively.

"Not the slightest. We shall be off again directly; but if you are going much further, and would like to change carriages, I will call the guard."

"I am going to Weston Hayes," said Eda.

"And I to a station beyond, so I think I can promise that you shall not be molested during the remainder of your journey. You are bound for one of the prettiest spots in Surrey!"

"Am I?" she asked, listlessly.

The question betrayed that this was her first visit to the village thus eulogised, but her companion was too polite to notice this, and went on chatting pleasantly.

"It was there Blank the Academician painted the picture that was so much admired at the Royal Academy last year. When you ramble as far as the old water-mill, which he reproduced very faithfully, you will agree with me that he could not have chosen a more charming subject for his pencil. Perhaps you will be tempted to sketch the mill yourself."

"I have not touched a pencil for many many months," said Eda. "Mamma drew beautifully—but she did everything well."

There were tears in her eyes now, and to banish them the artist opened his sketch-book, and began to show her its contents, trying to interest her in them, and explaining that some of the curious little unfinished-looking bits of woodland—a stunted tree, a bed of tall king-ferns, a bosky dell—were studies for the background of a scene from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," which he was commissioned to paint for one of his patrons. There was also an unfinished female head—an arch, spirited face—which he told her he had sketched from behind a screen, the original refusing to submit to the tedium of sittings for her portrait, although her parents were very anxious to have one painted.

But just as, with much humour, he had described his various attempts to obtain a profile of the young lady, and how frequently he had been frustrated by her restless flittings to and fro, and suspicions of his design, the train stopped, and Eda knew that she was at her destination.

"I hope you have friends here to meet you," said the artist, scanning the empty platform.

"I am a stranger, but an expected one," she answered, with a forlorn glance in the same direction.

"The village is a mile from here; are you going to it? To the Texley's? the Hall? that is still further. Let me make inquiries for you!" and leaping out, in spite of the guard's warning that they were going on directly, he interrogated the station-master.

No, there had been no conveyance sent down from the Hall, and there was no fly to be had without sending into Weston for it. The young lady's luggage could be taken on a truck, if she liked.

So Eda had no choice but to walk, and, once more bidding the artist adieu, she stepped briskly towards the lane pointed out to her as the nearest route to the Hall.

For some distance the railway ran parallel with this lane, and Eda's new acquaintance, watching from the carriage window, caught more than one glimpse of the slight figure in black wending her way along it to a new home. He had felt interested in Eda from the moment he saw the forlorn glance she sent after the brother who, instead of lingering beside her till the last moment, had seized the first opportunity to leave her. Left to her own resources, exposed to insult on the journey, and now, if not absolutely forgotten, so unkindly neglected, that his chivalrous spirit would have induced him to remain with her if he had not feared to distress her by too much urgency. To see a young girl—one too who was evidently unused to roughing it—in such a position, was enough to arouse all Fritz Allonby's kindest feelings towards her; and he continued to gaze from the window, hoping to see the carriage that should have been sent to the station to meet her, till the train entered a cutting, and he sat down to recall the pure pale face that had pleased his artistic eye, and rather idly wonder if he should ever see it again; while Eda, her step lagging when she was fairly under the elms that shadowed the lane, thought sadly of Mark, and Richie Atwood, till the sight of a church steeple told her that she was nearing the village of Weston Hayes, and would soon have to summon up her courage for an interview with her new employer.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 2. Matthias.

Chapter to be read—Acts i. 12—26.

INTRODUCTION. The teacher may commence by a picture of state of the world at that time, and of the work lying before the apostles. What was their command? (Mark xvi. 15) Show by a map the extent of the Roman Empire. What was its religious condition? See Romans i. 29, 1 Cor. i. 21, Eph. ii. 12. Was there not one nation better, to whom God was known? But what was the state of the Jews? Whom had they just crucified? Remind of Parable of Wicked Husbandmen. So wanted teaching as much as others. What a great work! Apostles would be eager to begin their work at once. Did they? Why not? Had ten days to wait, then Spirit came.

I. Apostles Waiting. (Read 12—14). (a) The room, probably the same room prepared for Christ and disciples to eat the Passover. Who were sent to get it ready? Must have been a large room (Mark xiv. 15). How many were assembled? (Acts i. 15) (b) The persons. How many apostles were there? Ask who wrote the Acts, and, referring to Luke vi. 13—16, show how in the Gospel they are given in the same order when Christ called them, except that Andrew there follows his brother Simon. Why are Peter, James, and John, now placed together? Remind how three times had been more favoured than the rest. Bartholomew, the same as Nathanael, who prayed under the fig-tree (John i. 50). Besides these were the holy women—who were they? And also about one hundred brethren who believed. (c) The occupation. How did they spend their time? (ver. 14.) Would be very quiet and thoughtful after the excitement of parting with Christ. See His love in giving them ten days' rest before beginning hard public life. For what would they pray? Show from Luke xi. 13, John xv. 16, how the Holy Ghost is specially given in answer to prayer. For whom would they pray besides themselves? Show how Christ had prayed for the converts of the apostles (John xvii. 20), so would they pray for success in their work. Had they ever been without Christ before? Would remember their want of success while Christ was on Mount of Transfiguration. Could not heal the lunatic boy for want of faith and prayer (Matt. xvii. 21). Would make humble, more earnest in prayer.

II. Matthias Chosen. (Read vs. 15—26.) Who was the absent apostle? Explain apostle as same as missionary, meaning one solemnly sent forth. How many had Christ so chosen specially? Remind of twelve patriarchs, founders of twelve tribes, and how when Levi was taken away for the priesthood, the number was made up by Joseph's double portion in his two sons. So now number must be completed. Who takes the lead in the matter, and what book has he been studying? Let children read Ps. xli. 9, lxix. 25, to see that David was speaking of his enemies as God's enemies, and so was prophesying of Judas. How was he Christ's enemy? (ver. 16) yet had been one of the chosen apostles! What was to be the qualification for the new apostle? (ver. 21) Why must he have been with them all through?

XUM

Remind how Christ had seventy disciples besides the twelve apostles, who had heard his words and had power of working miracles (Luke x. 19). One of these must be chosen. For what especially? Why were witnesses wanted of the Resurrection? Remind how Resurrection proved Christ's divinity; and show, from Acts ii. 32, iii. 15, iv. 33, how much they made of this. But what else would the apostles be especially anxious about? Would they like another Judas? but how could they tell whether they made a right choice; so what do they do? To whom was their prayer addressed? Who had chosen the apostles? (John xv. 16) Christ had selected them, Christ knew all hearts; so would ask Him to guide them. Remind how Christ showed such divine knowledge when He spoke to Thomas (John xx. 27), and how this same Peter had used same words before (John xxi. 17); so they for the first time pray to Jesus. Then what did they do? Ask for other instances of lots being cast, viz., the Israelites when Achan was discovered (Josh. vii. 16), Saul chosen for king (1 Sam. x. 21), sailors when Jonah was cast into the sea (Jonah i. 7), the soldiers for Christ's garment (Matt. xxvii. 35). Picture the scene: the rising from their knees, arranging the lots, the two candidates waiting for the result, lot given, the eager expectation, the congratulations to the successful one. How may be sure they were guided right? See Prov. xvi. 33. From Acts xv. 33 show Barnabas still held in honour by apostles.

III. PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Patience in waiting. The apostles, eager to work, waited paitently for ten days. Sometimes strength is to sit still; wait, to learn God's will. For example, a boy, strong and well, meets with accident, has to lie still, suffer, wait, &c., is learning patience; a girl wants to go out into world, earn own living, do much good, be useful to others, detained at home, must wait and be patient. How long was Christ before beginning public life? (Luke iii. 23) (2) Prayer in difficulty. Apostles did their best, selected two, used judgment, but let Christ decide. So always; God has promised to help in time of need. How often do we ask His advice? Remember Israelites in difficulty at Red Sea, cried to God; bidden go forward. Can always see one step before us, take that, will be guided on.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the state of world at time of Ascension.
2. Who were present in the upper room?
3. How did they spend their time?
4. Quote the prophecies respecting Judas.
5. What were the qualifications for an apostle?
6. What practical lessons does the story teach us?

MAY FLOWER, OR "SERVANT OF ALL."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LITTLE BUTTERCUP," "NOTHING BUT A SONG," "HOW TO ENTER INTO REST," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

"Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me."—John xv. 4.

"Here would I find a settled rest,
Whilst others go and come;
No more a stranger or a guest,
But like a child at home."

IT was strange to find the happy six weeks that the cousins had spent together so soon at an end; they seemed to have flown away.

May pulled Rosamond back as they were entering the house again.

"Rosa, of course, you'll write to me sometimes?"

"Of course, darling May; and you must let me know how you get on, and if you find you are making a good servant."

"Rosa, I don't like to think of that; it is such hard work; I tried to-day, and everything went as wrong as possible; much worse than when I don't try."

"I don't think that, May; I expect it was that when you began to try, you also began to find out that you never tried before, and how careless and idle you are sometimes. And there is another thing, my child; as soon as we turn our backs on sin and on ourselves, and our faces straight towards God, then it is that Satan is so busy putting stumbling-blocks in our way, and not only trying to make us fall, but trying also to make us tired and careless of all that is good and right. So we must be on the watch for him, and send the idle uncaring feelings away, and not listen to them."

"But they will keep coming back, Rosa; very often I don't care a bit about anything that is right and good, and that makes me sure that I am just fit for nothing, and can't be in earnest at all."

"Do you know what grafting is, May?"

"Grafting?"

"Yes; don't think I am not going to answer what you were saying; I am only coming round to it by another way. You know how it is done?"

"Why, I know what it is, but not how it 's done."

"Well, it is often done when a tree gets old, or if its fruit is not very good. The gardener does not take it away, and say it is useless, but he cuts a slip from off a good tree of the same kind, then he brings it to the poor bad stock, and he cuts one of its limbs, just exactly to fit against the good branch. Then he takes clay, and matting, and string, and binds it round and round, till it is quite firm and safe, so that if a wind came it would not be blown away. Suppose that the next day he went to the tree, and looked at it, and began wondering if it were growing, and holding on rightly, and that by-and-by he were to cut the string, and take off all the bandages he had put on so carefully, so as to see if it were growing, what do you think would happen?"

"Why, of course, the little branch would fall off; it wouldn't have had time to grow."

"No, of course not; and yet, if you were to look very closely at the two ends that had been cut to fit each other, you would see that there had been growth; the sap from the stock would have run into the new slip, and the tiniest fibres possible would have stretched across to join it, and life between the two would have begun."

"But no gardener would be so stupid as to go and undo what he had done the very day before."

"No, he would not; he would leave it alone, and go about his other work. By-and-by the time would come when the bindings might be taken away quite safely; and, at last, you would find it quite impossible to sever the branch from the stock; you would have to tear the tree itself, for they would be so firm—so entirely one."

"But what do you mean by all this, Rosamond?"

"In the Bible—it comes in the Epistle to the Romans—we read about grafting; that we are grafted into Christ; but you see there is a difference—our gardeners put good branches on bad stocks, but God, the great Husbandman, puts bad branches on the good Stock. Well, little May, you have given your heart to the Lord Jesus; that is like being grafted into Him; and now you are always looking to see if you are growing, and you spend so much time in the looking, that you have none left for the growing. You think the great good Stock cannot take care of a tiny branch like you. It is a simple fact that you are joined on to Him. What binds you is not only your feeble fitful desire towards Him, but chiefly, and most of all, His mighty tender desire to you."

"But what must I do, Rosa?"

"Just let things be, my child. Don't be always untying the bindings to see if you are on the Stock. You are there. Just rest quietly on the Stock, and let the life that is in Jesus our Lord flow through into you. Don't be always on the look-out to see where you are; only be careful to turn away from any and all hindrances that will keep His life from you, and make you miss His desires for you."

"What sort of hindrances will those be?"

"One great thing is disobedience; not to delay to follow and do that which is right; and so often as we do, to go at once and tell it out to God, and get His forgiveness, and go on again very humbly, but very cheerfully, because we are confident not in self, but in God."

"Is that the chief thing?"

"Yes, in one way; but there is yet another, and it is very dangerous because it is so hidden."

"What is it?"

"Why, it is just ourselves."

"Ourselves?"

"Yes, ourselves. They are always in the way; either troubling about something they have done, or have not done."

"But, Rosa, we must always have ourselves as long as we live!"

"Yes; but then the question is, what are we to do with these selves? Are we to pity and coax them, or to learn with God's help to have nothing to do with them?"

"Well, as you say, 'by God's help,' I suppose we ought to learn to have nothing to do with them. But I don't see why."

"I think the reason is that they hide Christ away from us. We sometimes get to be so busy about ourselves, that we forget all about Him. When we are praying, I think we ought to tell Him all that we know that is wrong and foolish in us; but then, having done that, I think we ought to leave it, and not brood over it alone."

"But then how can we see if we are going right?"

"Certainly not by looking into our own hearts. Have I never told you that favourite little sentence of mine, that I picked up I don't know from where?"

"What is it?"

"'Faith takes in what God says, because it looks, not at the thing to be done, but at the One who can do it.'"

"I see; then perhaps it is better so."

"Of course it is. Don't fret about all you have to do, but leave yourself quietly in our loving Father's hands, and obediently follow Him. Now, that must be all for to-night, my childie. I don't need to say how much I shall think about you. God bless you, darling!"

CHAPTER IV.

"O God, who art the Truth, make me one with Thee in everlasting love!"—Thomas à Kempis.

"Would that I were more closely bound
To my Beloved, who ever lives;
Would that my soul were always found,
Abiding in the peace He gives."—L. A. W.

"His presence in the soul is a perpetual feast—the one thing that cheers, strengthens, elevates."—Sermons, Rev. J. Bolton.

ROSAMOND was gone, and May was very lonely without her. The days and weeks passed but slowly, and though now and then there came a letter to cheer her up, she was rather beginning to feel that all her efforts after good were in vain; and sometimes she regretted that she had ever begun to walk in the narrow path.

This was only sometimes. In her inmost heart she knew that she would sooner part with anything than with this new life of serving God.

When she got to feel thus, she would go into the village, and call at Margery's little cottage.

Often she said nothing of how cross and naughty she was feeling, but just stayed and looked at Margery, and somehow it always did her good. She returned home feeling ashamed, feeling tender and gentle, and wishing she had not grieved God.

"Margery," she said one day, "I wonder why it is that you always do me good. I feel so much gooder after I've been to see you."

"I can tell why it is, Miss May."

"Why is it?"

"You never come empty-handed to me; you always bring me some flowers, or fruit, and kind words and that makes you forget all about yourself."

"I don't think it is that, Margery."

"I can't help thinking it is, Miss May. It is just the same as I used to do; I used to think so much about myself, that it was almost as if I had to save myself, and rule and govern myself, instead of the other way."

"What is the other way? and how did you find it out?"

"The other way, Miss May dear, is that the Lord Jesus has saved me, and is now ruling and governing me, and that my part is to obey. And the way I came to find out about it all was just through our dear Dr. Hurst. One day when he came in to see me I was feeling that miserable and ill I did not know what to do. It was Dr. Edwards' day for seeing me, and he was just going away as Dr. Hurst came in, and said to him, 'Dr. Hurst, I think you will do more for my patient to-day than I shall;' and so he went, and Dr. Hurst came in, and stood by me for some time without saying a word, only just looking at me crying so foolishly; and at last he spoke. And what do you think he said?"

"I don't know, Margery."

"He just said—and I shall never forget the words, for they often help me now—he said, 'Margery, you are making a great mistake.' So I looked up at him, and then he added, 'You are not the doctor, you're the patient; you are not the doctor, you're the patient!' Just nothing but that, and he put his roses on the table, and went away."

"But how could that do you any good?"

"Why, Miss May, it just showed me what a foolish, ignorant, wicked creature I was. When Dr. Edwards came to see me, I just told him all that was wrong, and left it to him; but with the blessed Lord Jesus, who was with me always, I told Him what was wrong, it is true, but I did not leave it with Him. I kept worrying, and grieving, and sighing, as if I were some one very good who had suddenly become wicked, and instead I ought to have been glad and rejoicing, for I am very bad, and, myself, can never be good, and Christ knows that, and is ready to let His beautiful holy life shine through me, and in me, if I will let Him."

"But I don't see how it was that you were not letting Him."

"I was so busy making myself good; sorrowing over my quick temper and impatience, and want of love, that I lost sight of the Lord, and so then and there I just gave it all up. I told Him I knew there was no good in me, and so I came to Him to give myself up entirely to His power and love; and since then I think so much about Him, that I have no time to moan over myself; and yet, somehow, I hardly know how, since then, I am sure that Christ does indeed live in me, and I in Him."

"But, Margery, how I wish I loved Him more!"

"You will not learn to love Him, Miss May, by looking at your want of love, but by thinking of His great tender love to you."

"But I don't feel it."

"Then believe it—trust it."

"But it doesn't make me feel satisfied; I should like to be quite satisfied."

"And so God means you to be, Miss May. 'Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst, for they shall be filled,' 'He satisfieth the hungry soul,' are His own words; and surely, if you were to give up all your wonderings and questionings and wants into His gracious hands, and trust Him, you would be satisfied."

"Well, Margery, I must run home for to-day. I wish I were like you!"

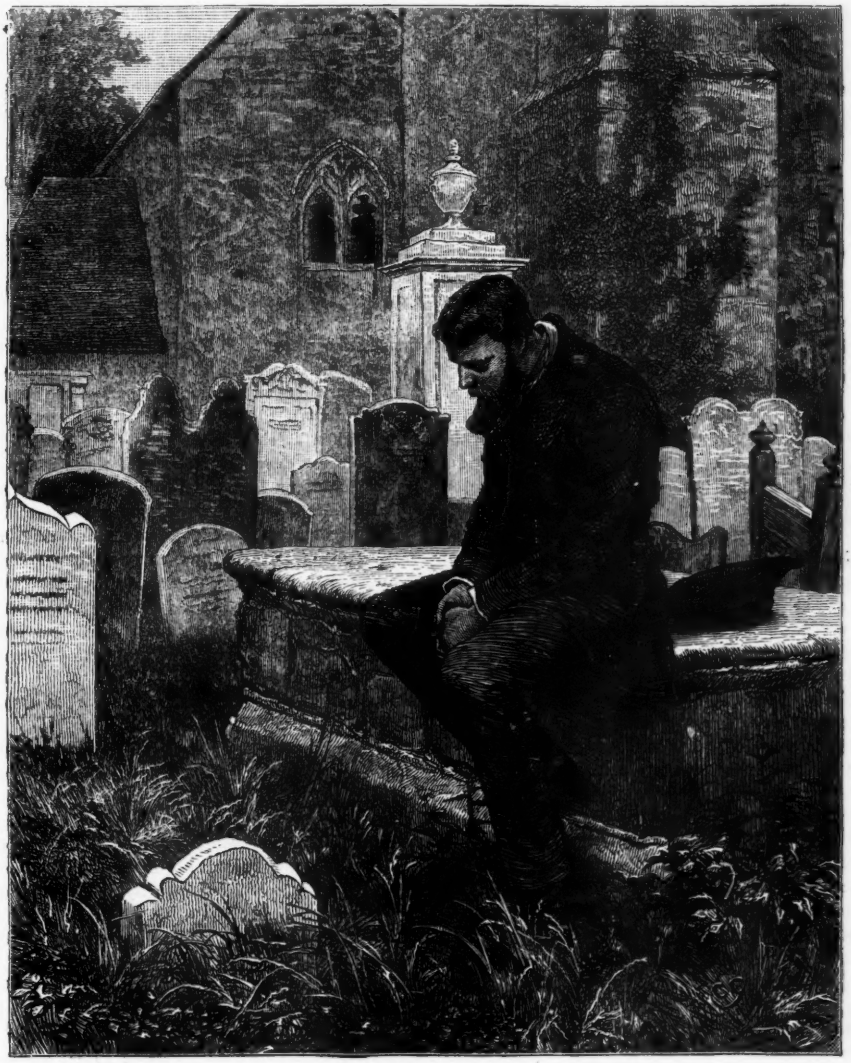
"You have some one better and surer to try to be like, Miss May. I don't know what we should do if we had to take each other as our examples, instead of Christ."

"No, I suppose that is the best," answered May; and with that she nodded her good-bye, and ran homewards.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

9. "Get thee behind me, Satan," said the Saviour when tempted. Give another instance of the use of these words by the Lord Jesus.



10. How many years after planting a vine were to elapse before the Jews were allowed to eat of the grapes?

11. Where do we find that baldness was produced artificially, as indicative of mourning?

12. The day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 29, Numb. xxix. 7) was the only fast enjoined by the Mosaic law. Show that the Jews of our Lord's time did not strictly follow this injunction.

13. Which were the three principal promises that God made to Abraham?

14. Which of Evangelists record the command of the Saviour, after the feeding of the five thousand, to "gather up the fragments?"

(Drawn by CHARLES GREEN.)

FLITTING FRIENDS.

THE swallows' nests beneath our eaves
Are tenantless again to-day,
The silver birch its golden leaves
Drops noiseless on the public way,

And childhood's footsteps, that of yore
Before our window blithely sped,
Now, perished foliage pressing o'er,
Move with a sad and muffled tread.

And if we walk our garden round
  At early dawn, we mark a rime
Upon the fence and border ground
  Prophetic of the coming time;
A lingering blossom here and there
  With faded countenance we trace,
Looking like love in mute despair
  Beside some dear one's resting-place.

But though the birds have taken wing,
  And though our floral beauties lie
Prone in the mire, and Winter bring
  His bitter wind and leaden sky,
We know, however harsh his hand,
  The birth of Spring will end his reign,
And love and joy throughout the land
  The birds and flowers recall again.

But other friends have gone away,
  Ne'er to resume their olden place,
Who've found, and joined the bright array
  Of singers at the throne of grace;
Yet though they cannot pass the Gate
  Which looks abroad from saints to men,
We know, if we but trust and wait,
  We shall behold them once again.

JOHN G. WATTS.

EDWARD TURNER, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.

BY AGNES MACDONELL, AUTHOR OF "MARTIN'S VINEYARD."

CHAPTER I.

OPENING PROSPECTS.

"What trade art thou?
Why, sir, a carpenter."—Julius Cæsar.

I WAS bred a carpenter, and born in the country. I do not think you will find a prettier village fifty miles round London than Birchfield, in Kent, and there it was that I was born. Our cottage stood in a hollow of the downs, with a little bit of garden in front, where my brother Robert grew his auriculas and carnations, for he was fond of gardening as a boy, and having weak health, he was often able to work about among his flower-beds when he could not go down to the workshop at Birchfield. I was a stout lad always, and a good workman, and was often able to make up by extra work for the odd days that the poor lad was kept at home. I took my father's place in Brereton's workshop when he died, which was when I was just twenty-one. We went on living in the old cottage on the heath, where my mother had lived ever since she was married. I always had a liking for my work, and never was happier than with a tool in my hand.

Our master in the workshop, Mr. Brereton, owned a timber-yard beside the shop, and employed seven men, not to speak of Charlie Brereton, his nephew, who had the prospect of following him in the business, for Brereton had been a widower for many years, and had no children.

Charlie Brereton took the first place in the workshop, although there were at least two better workmen there than he. Old Brereton was a clever man at his trade, and often did work for the gentlemen of the country-side without ever troubling an architect for a plan; and in some of the smaller jobs—when there was a greenhouse to be put up or a coach-house built—he would give his nephew the management of the work. Charlie used to scribble over a fine sight of paper with his plans, but he never knew his own mind about it, and it was not seldom that his measurements were wrong, or part of the common working drawings left out, and often he would say to me when a job was on hand, "Here, Ned, just look at these drawings and see if those stairs are turned right, or if those shutter-boxes will do?" And I used to take his designs home with me, and set up at night scratching out, and measuring, and putting them straight, and many a time I should have liked to tear the paper across and make a fair plan out of my own head, for I saw the building as it ought to have been, straight and clear before my mind all the time. And that was the way I first came to study Nicholson and other books on building, just through working over Charlie Brereton's plans.

I cannot say exactly how it came about, but gradually, though Charlie always held the same place in the shop, and took the orders from customers, Brereton came to give me more of the work to manage, and often called me into the little office behind the shop to consult about the plans for some of the bigger jobs, which he usually managed himself alone.

I never had a hard word with Charlie. I liked him, and he was always friendly towards me. He was a good-natured, easy young chap, fond of pleasure, and a bit vain of his good looks, which was not to be wondered at, for he was just as handsome as a picture, with brown hair curling round his forehead, and red lips, that had a proud and smiling look, even when he was busy at his bench. He would speak quick sometimes, and be nettled at my altering his work, but he would forget it all next day, and be ready to stroll down the street with me as I went home, for our cottage lay on the other side of the village, not so far from the new junction of the Weald of Kent line of railway. He often came in to look at my lathe-work—for I used the little lean-to at the back of the cottage where my mother kept her pans as a workshop—and often of a Sunday afternoon he came down to get a nosegay of my brother's flowers to take to some of his sweethearts—for he was always following some girl about—but more through fancy than love, I used to think, for Charlie Brereton never seemed a fellow who would settle down with a wife at his fireside, and be content to live like a hard-working man. And that was the reason that I never liked to see him loitering about the garden talking with my sister, for Ann was a quiet, serious girl, who thought a deal of going to church and Sunday-school, and being so steady in all her thoughts and actions, I knew she was not likely to take things in the light and careless way that Charlie did, and it troubled me to see them together.

It was one Sunday afternoon, as we were strolling through the lane, that Charlie told me of the scheme of going to London.

"It's an important thing," says he, "not so much in itself as in what it may lead to. Uncle has had a letter from a friend of his, a man with whom he worked as a boy, and who has a place in London, Duke Street, Blackfriars, London," says he, repeating the direction. "Mr. Smith has a big business, and he and uncle have always been friendly, and uncle has been proposing that I should go and take a place in one of his finishing-rooms, just to learn something of the London trade."

"Well," said I, "and what do you say to it, Charlie?"

"Oh, I think," says he, running his hand through his hair, "it's just the thing for me. I should have to work harder than I do at Birchfield, and I should learn a good deal of the London business, and be better suited for the shop here when it comes to me. I've always had such a fancy, you know, for going to London. Birchfield is a stupid place, after all."

"But what about the work," said I.

"Well, I'll tell you the whole plan, for it concerns you as well as me. Mr. Smith, in his letter, says he wants a man—a first-rate carpenter, with some theoretic knowledge—just such a fellow as you, you know, to take the head place in one of his rooms, and I said when I heard it, 'Ned Turner is the man for him!' Uncle did not want to part with you, but I said, 'Well, uncle, I won't take any man from Birchfield, but Ned, so you may please yourself!' You see, Ned, we've been so long together, and you know my ways, and—oh, hang it!—you've helped me a great deal, and I wanted you to go. Now, what do you say to it?"

Well, all that afternoon we talked about the London scheme.

Charlie lay among the heather in the sunshine, with his cap over his eyes, and his hands under his head, talking about the sights of London, the streets, and the shops, and the theatres, and I sat beside him with my elbows on my knees, turning the matter over and over in my mind. The idea of the London work suited my fancy very well.

The wages offered by Mr. Smith were not higher than I got at Birchfield, and I should have the extra expense of living in London. But the work was of a better kind, and in it I could use all the knowledge I had gained with my reading of winters' nights, which was useless store almost to me at Birchfield.

Before I reached our garden-gate I had made up my mind that if my mother did not take my going too hardly—and I did not think she need, with Robert and Ann still left at home—I would leave the country, and try my fortune in London.

As Charlie and I came in at the gate, we saw Ann standing among the rose-bushes. I do not know whether she had heard something of what he had been saying as we came up the path or not, it is very likely that she had, for the evening was still, and we talked of London all the way till we reached the gate, and saw her there. She looked flurried, and said, "I have just come in from church," and "Good evening, Mr. Brereton," and turned to go into the house, though Charlie began to laugh and joke her about saying "Mr. Brereton," instead of calling him by his christian name.

Charlie stayed the evening with us, and we opened the plan about the new work to my mother. She objected pretty strongly to it at first, though she owned it might be the best thing for me. My brother spoke up for the plan, though I saw the thought of the change troubled him as much as it did me. Charlie talked about London and all its glories, till you might have thought it the city of Bagdad in "The Arabian Nights" to hear him.

Ann said nothing, and only shook her head quietly when I asked her what she thought about the plan of the new work; but she meant no unkindness, for after Charlie had said "Good night," and she and I stood in the doorway, listening to hear if he latched the garden-gate after him, she turned, and clasped my arm, and laid her head against my shoulder with a sob.

"I am so sorry you're going, Ned," she said; "London is an evil place; I am so sorry you're going!"

That was all she would say; and in that moment a thought came in my mind that made me resolve that I and Charlie Brereton should go to London, whatever it cost, for it seemed plain to me at that moment that Ann was thinking more of his going than mine may-be; and that, partly through a sisterly sort of anxiety for him—gay and thoughtless as he was—going into all the temptations of London, and partly because his very thoughtlessness and gaiety had a charm for her gentle mind, she had grown to think too much about him, and had come to let the thought of him lie too constantly on her heart. It was a great deal better Charlie Brereton should go I thought.

XUM

CHAPTER II.

IN ST. PAUL'S.

'Twas on a Holy Thursday, their innocent faces clean,
The children walking two and two, in red, and blue, and green;
Grey-headed beadles walked before, with wands as white as snow,
Till into the high dome of Paul's they like Thames waters flow.

Oh, what a multitude they seemed, these flowers of London town!
Seated in companies they were, with radiance all their own;
The hum of multitudes was there, but multitudes of lambs;
Thousands of little boys and girls raising their innocent hands.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

I THINK I had been about a year at Smith and Horrock's when the work at St. Paul's began. I had learnt a good deal in that year, not being greedy in working over hours, but using my evenings in reading and learning what I could about my trade. My heart was in that, and I cared for little beside. Most of the planning in my department at that time fell to my share; and I often had whole jobs put under my charge. Charlie Brereton went on his way too. He was very fond of pleasure, but he kept closer and did better at his work than I had expected he would. We sometimes took a walk through the streets together, as we used to do in the country, but we did not see much of each other. I did not care for the things he liked, and the things I took pleasure in were nothing to him.

London is an awful place to either man or woman who had not always lived among its noise, and heat, and filth, and got used to it from the beginning; at any rate, to those of the working-class it is. I used to wonder sometimes, as I went across the park from my work, and saw the ladies rolling along in their carriages, looking with their delicate smiling faces over the heads of the crowd below them, I used to wonder whether they knew that the streets that they passed through so safely, sheltered by their rank, which seemed to protect them like an unseen angel—if they knew that these streets were unsafe as quagmires, were very often like roads to the bottomless pit to women of the poorer class. I saw enough and heard enough to teach me what a training an honest industrious girl must have that earned her bread in London, and had to pass to and fro in the crowded streets. It made my heart ache at first, but what was the good of it? They got used to the coarseness and the looseness of tongue, and grew hardened to it, if they did not sink into the midst of it themselves. I sickened over it at first, and then gave myself up to my work, and shut my eyes to everything else, but more through pity than hardness, I think.

Well, as I said, it was the beginning of May, just when I had been about a year at Blackfriars, that the work at St. Paul's began. The wooden cornices under the arches had to be renewed. I liked working in the old church better than anything I had ever done. The place was solemn and grand, and the very echoes of the hammer-strokes as we worked seemed to die away like music in the great dome. I often used to walk round of an evening, after the other men were gone, to look at the monuments, and read the inscriptions. I liked especially the one to Sir Christopher Wren, the architect, which tells you to look around you if you want to see his monument. There was something like a sermon to me in those words, showing how a man may build up his own record, and leave it, like this great church, for the good of others and the glory of God. And if it is true of Sir Christopher Wren, I thought it may be true of another man, however humble; for though he may not be able to plan or erect a great edifice like this by which to be remembered, he may still leave something behind him, through honest work or honest purpose, that will add a stone or a beam to the building.

Just when we had very nearly finished the work, there comes an order one morning for all hands to turn on, and put up scaffolding, and tressels, and seats, for the great festival service of the charity children. I was put at the head of this "temporary work," as it was called, and I was pretty hard pressed to get it all done by the Thursday morning. Mr. Smith was anxious about the hastily-constructed benches on one side, and gave me orders to stay in the building till the children were all in, and the service partly begun, to see that all was safe, and be ready to add some fresh supports if they were needed. "And, Turner," says he, "it will be but an hour to dinner-time; you can stay and see the show, if you choose."

I dare say nearly every one has seen the anniversary service, and knows all about it; but I had never even heard of it, and I think I should never have forgotten those thousands of children with their innocent faces, and white aprons, and bits of caps, till my death, even if the day had not been the beginning, as I might say, of a new life to me.

For an hour, standing under the scaffolding of the seats, I had heard the tramping of the children's feet overhead, as they were being led up in companies to their high seats in the amphitheatre under the dome. Charlie Brereton came to me quite excited, and said, "Come up for a minute, Ned, and see the fun, the children are all in. It's the finest thing you ever saw. There's the bishop and the Lord Mayor, and the sheriffs, and all the ladies; and the street outside the churchyard is filled with carriages." I had done all I had to do below, and went up with him, and we stood together at the base of one of the great pillars, where we could look down on the crowd. All the floor of the church was filled with spectators, and above them, rising into the dome, were the children, eight thousand of them. It was enough to make a man's heart swell to see that crowd of innocent faces, as I've seen a wide hollow among the hills in Kent white over with daisies. Only when you think that, instead of blooming in the sunshine on a quiet hill-side, that each of these little creatures had a heart under the blue jacket or the white apron—a heart to be hardened, perhaps broken, by the rough work of the world—it makes you sad. That was what I was thinking, as, at a given sign, all those thousands of young heads were bowed, and the white aprons fluttered up to cover the faces while the first prayer was said, and the great organ thundered out the music of the "Old Hundredth," and all those children rose up to sing.

The swell of the clear young voices sounded above the roll of the organ like a blast of trumpets, and the great dome seemed to shake with the words:—

"With one consent, let all the earth
To God their cheerful voices raise."

My heart stood still before the grandeur of their great innocence and meekness, while the music filled the place like a sea. It made the scaffolding tremble, and must have terrified many of the children standing up there at that dizzy height.

(To be continued.)

CHRIST AND MELCHISEDEC.

BY THE REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A., VICAR OF HOLY TRINITY, PADDINGTON; CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN; AUTHOR OF "AIDS TO PRAYER," ETC.

PART II.

BUT let us pursue the parallel between Christ and Melchisedec next in relation to the priesthood. "For this Melchisedec, King of Salem, priest of the Most High God."

That which is especially worthy of notice here is, that Melchisedec is the first instance we have of a person specially set apart for the office of the priesthood. Sacrifices, as we know, are part of an aboriginal institution, commencing with the expulsion from paradise, and surviving the desolation of the deluge. But the persons who offered up the victims in the earlier ages of the world were not priests, that is, were never consecrated to such an employment as a distinctive office, but only performed this, as they did other religious services, in their proper capacity as heads of families; and, of course, by the act of sacrifice expressing their faith in the great Atonement. Here, however, is the case of one who, though a king, ruling among his neighbours as a king, appears before us as solemnly designated to the office of the priesthood; is regarded by Abraham as entitled to all the prerogatives pertaining to the holy office; is allowed to claim a fixed proportion of the spoils taken from the enemy, not because he is King of Salem, but because he is the priest of the Most High God. All this adds to the eminence of Melchisedec's typical priesthood. He is not one of a line of priests succeeding to the office in a certain family order. He is not one invested with authority by the hands of others acting under the prescribed rules of any ecclesiastical authority. But he is one who, long before the Levitical priesthood had any beginning, stands alone in a strange country, challenging homage from the greatest saint of antiquity as an ordained priest of God. In all this we see at once certain resembling features to the priesthood of Christ. He is not descended from any family line of priests. He receives no imposition of hands from men designating Him to the sacred office. Yet there rest upon Him the tokens of a holy consecration. The opened heavens testify to the indwelling in Him of the power of the Lord's anointed. The Spirit of the Lord without measure is given unto Him, and when He had made His soul an offering for sin, and when He had borne the sin of many, and when He poured out His soul unto death, believing souls did homage at the foot of His cross, and exercising faith in the great oblation, said, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec."

And then observe one office of the typical high priest which is here mentioned by the Apostle—"who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the Kings, and blessed him." Surely this is a work which specially belongs to the true Melchisedec. Benediction seems never to have been off the lips of Christ. With promises of blessing He opened His Sermon on the Mount; with hands of blessing He called little children to His embrace; with the uplifted voice of blessing He was borne away on the Ascension cloud; and when He shall come again to welcome, and claim, and receive His own, His language to them will be, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Yes, blessing was the first act of the Redeemer, after He had gone back to heaven. Unto you first, God having raised up His son Jesus, sent Him to bless you, and never will He lay down that glorious prerogative till we are blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Him. Especially will Christ bless us thus after our return from the slaughter of the kings; after victories obtained through His grace over all the potentates and powers of evil. Then, like the Melchisedec of old, will He come forth to meet us as we are laden with spoils, saying to us, "Come in thou blessed of the Lord, wherefore standest thou without? Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

XUM

But observe another act of Melchisedec noticed by the Apostle, namely, his receiving a portion of the spoils. "To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all." No question will be raised here as to the offering spoken of being a dedicated religious offering to God. Melchisedec was too rich to need any gift for his own use, and it were an affront to Eastern hospitality to suppose that it was offered as a compensation for his kindness to Abraham and his company. The gift was plainly what the Apostle's argument seems to make it—a recognition by Abraham of God's hand in his recent successes—a recognition regulated in amount by some traditional standard of the proportion of our goods which God had a right to, and governed as to the mode of offering by the consideration that it should be directly set apart to the Divine service. Abraham evidently recognised the principle that every man was bound to give of his substance towards the maintenance of a national worship. He had a church in his own house. He commanded his children and his household after him that they should keep the way of the Lord. But leaving to individual or sectional effort to accomplish what it may, our history suggests that in every land there should be one national witness for God, and that every man should give something for its support. To a priest by whose personal ministrations Abraham could not statedly profit, he yet gave a tenth part of all. Nor is this reference less noteworthy in its bearing on the general subject of almsgiving, and the proportion of our substance which belongs to God, and which is not at our own disposal at all. Under the Gospel we have no binding rule upon the subject. Faith worships by love, and love does not want rules. But there is something in this dedication of a tenth of their property to religious objects by good men of old time which, to say the least of it, is very striking. You will hear people say sometimes, "This dedicated tenth was part of an abrogated Levitical code, was, in fact, a mere form of Jewish poor-law." Here we have proof that it was no such thing. Four hundred years before the law was given Abraham sets apart his tenth for Christ; whilst a hundred and fifty years later, but long enough before the giving of the law, we have Jacob vowing a vow to the Lord, "Of all that Thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto Thee." How carefully the same holy practice—especially after any great successes—was kept up by David and Solomon, and what a lasting blemish is made to rest on the fame of the good Hezekiah, for that he returned not unto the Lord according to the mercy which he had received, I need not stay to recite! The practical lesson is one which we can all draw for ourselves. "Honour the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thine increase. If we have been prospered in the work of our hands; if we are returning after a victory over many foes, and hindrances, and difficulties; and if, above all, Christ, our great High Priest, is meeting us with tokens of His benediction, and favour, and grace, let us give Him a part—and a liberal part too—of these our captured spoils. Let one strength, one grace, one outstretched arm, be acknowledged in our deliverances; testifying that on earth we would lay our successes, even as in heaven we shall lay our crowns at the feet of Him who is "ordained a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec."

III. But the parallel between Christ and Melchisedec is pursued further in relation to the mysterious circumstances of their descent. This Melchisedec is declared to "be without father, without mother, without descent; having neither beginning of life nor end of days." Now, as Melchisedec was a veritable human person, these words cannot of course be understood in their strictly literal sense. Nor does the usage of Jewish phraseology require that they should be so taken. The expression, "without father, without mother," implies no more than there has been no record of the person's individual genealogy preserved. The point is insisted on in relation to Melchisedec's claims to exercise the functions of the priesthood. According to the Levitical rules, such a failure in the family history would have been fatal to him. It was fatal to some who had got into the priest's office in the time of Ezra, concerning whom we read, "These sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but they were not found: therefore were they, as polluted, put from the priesthood." Having no descent preserved, they were reckoned as "without father, without mother." In a similar way we are to explain the language that Melchisedec had "neither beginning of life nor end of days," that is, that no account has been handed down to us of the time when his office began, or when it ended. Of Moses, of Joshua, of David, and other eminent types, we have such accounts, but none of Melchisedec. He starts up on the page of the sacred record as one exercising the mysterious functions of a royal priesthood, shrouding beneath a veil of impenetrable obscurity all the antecedents of his history, as well as all that relates to the ending of his days. The bearing of all this on the Apostle's argument with the Jews we may see at once. He wished to show that Christ's was an absolute, independent, self-originated, and eternal priesthood. He owed it to no law of human successions at all. So far otherwise, His human genealogy would have been an insuperable bar to His priestly claims, sprung, as He was, from the tribe of Judah, a tribe which by law was excluded from the office. His claim, therefore, like that of this mysterious priest in Abraham's time, must have been of some higher and unknown origin. The consecrating unction must have come upon Him direct from heaven. In Him the successions of Aaron's line were set aside. He was made of God, a High Priest according to the order of Melchisedec.

And yet let us not fail to notice, in passing, the subtle beauty of adaptation which lies enfolded in these inspired words. See how the very language which we can apply to the typical Melchisedec, only with the limitations of a Jewish gloss, may be applied to the true Melchisedec without any limitation or any gloss at all. For, in relation to the great mystery of His incarnation, is He not "without father?" In regard to His proper and essential Godhead, is He not "without mother?" Did not Isaiah teach that He was without descent, when he said, "Who shall declare His generation?" And when Micah says, "Whose goings forth have been of old, from everlasting," does he not testify that He has "neither beginning of days nor end of life?" Thus, in relation to Christ's priesthood, we may take the sublime description of our text in all its length and breadth, and depth and height. That priesthood has no beginning of days, and till all the elect of God shall be gathered in, it shall have no end of life. He is the Alpha and Omega. He is the ancient of days. He is the mighty Father of eternity. "From everlasting to everlasting Thou art God." "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec."

IV. And this brings us to the last point of the comparison here instituted, namely, that the priesthood of Melchisedec was an intransmissable priesthood; that he had no successor in his office; that a sort of typical perpetuity is attributed to his ministrations because there is no mention in Scripture of the time when they ceased. "Made like unto the Son of God, he abideth a priest continually." And in all this, argues the Apostle, He is a fit representative of the true Melchisedec, who does abide for ever, who has an unchangeable priesthood, who, in all the might and prevalency and sovereignty of an unshared mediation, ever liveth to make intercession for us. He is a priest for ever, and a king for ever, and an intercessor for ever; with none second to Him and none like, with none to co-operate and none to come after, with no interruption and no pause. One is our High Priest, and His name one. There is the same blood to cleanse there always was; the same voice to plead there always was; the same emblem of sacrifice is ever in the midst of the throne, and the same censer is still in the hands of the Holy One to receive the prayers of saints. "He abideth a priest continually."

Such are a few points of parallelism between Christ and Melchisedec, on which the Apostle claims our confidence, and rests the title of Christ to our eternal gratitude. Gathering up the argument in few words, we may observe:—In that Christ hath provided the means whereby God may be just and yet the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus, He is the King of Righteousness; in that He is our peace, and hath made our peace, and dissipated all trace of displeasure from the Eternal Father's countenance, He is King of Peace; in that He hath prepared us an altar, provided a lamb for our sacrifice, ordained a priest to slay—altar, sacrifice, and priest, all being found in Himself—He is "Priest of the Most High God;" in that He can challenge all the finite intelligences, whether of earth or heaven, to declare the fathomless mystery of His generation, He is said to be "without father, without mother, without descent;" in that He is now gone back into heaven, in that He now lives a priest on the throne, in that all the prerogatives and powers of an endless life are being now employed on behalf of all who will put their cause into His hands, He is said "to abide a priest continually."

And now, what more shall we say? What can we say more to add to the security and comfort of those who worship at the true tabernacle? Our Melchisedec is before the throne. He is exalted there to be a Prince and a Saviour; to give repentance, to scatter pardons, to send down gifts, to encourage faith, to strengthen the tempted in their conflicts, and to uphold the despairing in their fears. The proper scope and tendency of all our recent commemorations has been to show that the whole mediatorial life of our Lord, whether on earth or in heaven, was meant to assure our hearts before God. The cross and the sceptre, the grave and the throne, the fainting and the Almightiness, all that of humanity was kind and pitiful, all that of Godhead was infinite and supreme, must equally and alike conspire to stay our souls on Christ and His work. That work is perfect. None can succeed to, and nothing can supplement, the ministrations of our great Melchisedec. For, as our salvation has been purchased for us by Him, who is both King of Righteousness and King of Peace, so the application of that salvation to us is entrusted to that priest of the Most High God, who ever liveth to make intercession for us, and who to defend, to sanctify, to save, to bless, "abideth a priest continually." Amen.

XUM

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER V.

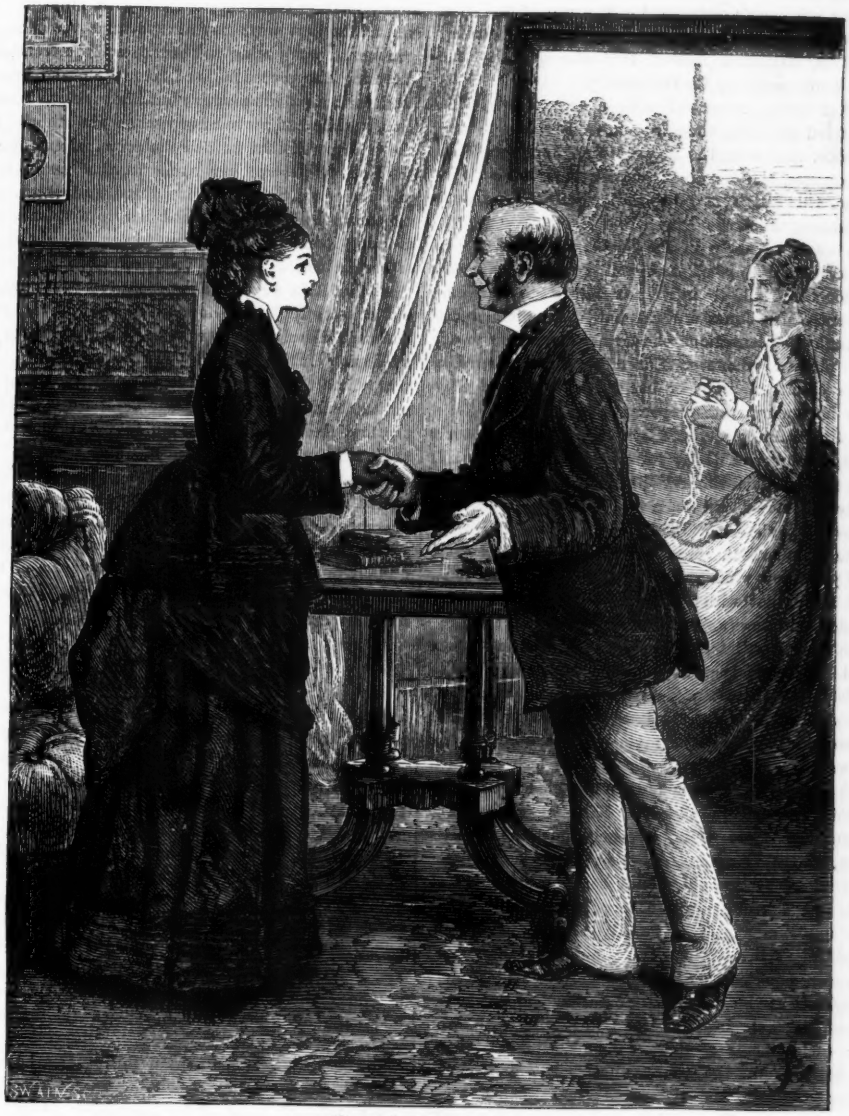
JUST as Eda was summoning all her courage for the very unpleasant ordeal of entering a strange place, and introducing herself to the people who seemed to have wholly forgotten her, she saw that a young woman, burdened with a baby, and panting with heat and haste, was coming rapidly towards her. On closer inspection she proved to be a trim little body, who, dropping a rustic curtsey, announced herself as "Dannle's wife—Dannle Jones, the gardener,"—and added, in gasps, that "master had been so terrible busy, overseeing the setting-up of a new chaff-cutting 'chine, that he had disremembered all about the new school governess coming that day, and so he had but just sent word that some one was to go and meet her; and Dannle hadn't come home from his work, and she hoped miss would excuse her if she wasn't very tidy, for she'd only time to put on her bonnet and come."

Dannle Jones's spouse was a rosy, girlish-looking woman, so weighed down by her fat placid infant, that Eda insisted on being allowed to relieve her of him till she was cooler; and as baby condescended to make himself quite at home with his new nurse, baby's mother soon overcame her dread of the young lady she had been required to receive as her lodger.

Before they reached the neat little lodge or cottage in the grounds where the gardener resided his wife had grown confidential enough to tell Eda that she had been half off her head ever since Mr. Texley, or "the master," as she called him, had sent her word that the new schoolmistress was to lodge with her.

"Were you afraid that I should give you so much trouble?" she was asked, with a smile. To which she was now sufficiently at her ease to respond, "Lor' no, miss; I don't mind trouble; I'm sure I'm not one that grudges a little extra work." And to prove this, Mrs. Jones danced her baby up and down till she was breathless with her exertions. "It didn't take no time to scrub out the rooms, and put clean curtains to the windows; and Dannle brought home some pots of fluchers and 'rangiums (fuchsias and geraniums), to stand in them, that looks beautiful!"

"Then I am very much obliged to him, for I dearly love flowers!" said Eda, speaking with more animation than she had before evinced. "But what is it that has so perplexed you?"



"It's the furniture sent down from the big house," Mrs. Jones ruefully told her. "I'd have liked to have everything nice and comfortable for you, miss, against you came; but I can't make out what half of it's meant for, nor where it ought to go; and Dannle's just as stupid as I be. Perhaps, though, miss, as you've come from London, you can tell us how to 'range the things. It 'd be a real help, if you would."

Eda's "Oh yes!" was spoken very readily; but she felt more doubtful when ushered into the small but pretty sitting-room—which, with an equally tiny chamber above, were to be her own—for a more heterogeneous collection of furniture never met the eye than she now beheld. The chairs may best be described as various, for they included an invalid-chair, fitted with so many appliances as to be quite bewildering, an American rocking-chair, a "prie-dieu," and two or three fauteuils, each of a different shape and make. Then there were more tables than she could use—tables, too, each of which had been patented for some strange contrivance that enabled them to be converted into chiffoniers, or shut up into travelling-chests, &c. There was also a couch that could be used as a chair or a bedstead; several ottomans, intended to serve a double purpose as coal-scuttles or cellarets; and no fewer than three clocks, each remarkable for something or other, though neither of them could be induced to keep correct time. Besides these articles, Eda found herself provided with a couple of sewing-machines, which no one could work, and the same number of self-acting pianos, both of which refused to play.

Passing from this room to the sleeping-chamber above, she found that it was similarly appointed. There was one bedstead that, by a very ingenious mechanism could be folded into the smallest possible compass; and there was another, that by setting a spring, could be made to turn the sleeper out on the floor at a given hour, and which, by an exhibition of its powers, had so startled Mrs. Jones that she had avoided the room after twilight ever since.

She also gave a pathetic account of her adventures with a shower-bath, which the inventor doubtless regarded as a marvel of skill, but Mrs. Jones stigmatised as "A downright onnateral thing to have in a house!"

The remainder of the furniture comprised a dressing-table that could be made to serve as a washstand, a washstand that could be converted into a dressing-table, and so on; till Eda grew confused at the multiplicity of her possessions, and the difficulty of conjecturing for what half of them really were intended.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"And this is Miss Granton!"—p. 42.

She learned afterwards that Mr. Texley had a passion for invention, and was so continually bringing home some clever patent, that his spinster sister and housekeeper, on learning that furniture must be sent to the gardener's cottage for the use of the new schoolmistress, had gladly rid the house of sundry eyesores, flattering herself that the quantity she sent would make up for the quality.

After being refreshed with a cup of tea, Eda contrived to select enough to make her rooms comfortable, and with the help of Mrs. Jones and her civil spouse, the remainder were banished to an outhouse, till Mr. Texley's pleasure could be learnt concerning them.

It was still early in the day, and so, when her labours were finished and toilette made, she set off for the Hall, to introduce herself to her employers. Mrs. Jones and the baby accompanied her through the plantations, the former looking as proud and pleased whenever Eda paused to admire a noble clump of trees or beautiful vista as if they were her own private property.

"It is a fine place, isn't it, miss? and the master's always doing something to make it handsomer still. Not but what I think I liked it best in the old squire's time—I wer' born on the estate, miss, and so wer' Dannle—for though, maybe, the work wasn't quite as plentiful, there weren't so many changes, and you knew what you had to do, and how to do it. But now, what with 'chines for this and 'chines for t'other, and new ways of setting about everything—from planting 'taters to making the butter—it's a deal harder to keep in with the master and give satisfaction than it used to be. It vexes him when he can't make his men think, as he do, that whatever's newest must be best. Dannle often says he's afeard he won't be able to stay, for he gets quite caddled with so many directions and new-fangled notions."

Eda listened in silence. She longed to know something more definite concerning the gentleman, whose ideas on education must be peculiar, and whose system she would be expected to carry out, but she did not like to question a person in his employment. That he advocated progress, and encouraged inventions, Mrs. Jones's harangue and her own experiences with the furniture had already taught her; but she was young and enthusiastic, therefore not inclined to find fault with him for such liberal tendencies; and after diverging a little from the route, that her guide might point out the newly-erected school-house, Eda bade her a smiling adieu, and pursued her walk alone.

A swing gate, fixed on such an ingenious principle that, unless acquainted with the secret, it was the work of time to unhasp it, eventually admitted her to the gardens of the Hall. The air was heavy with the perfume of the lilac and hawthorn, that were now in their glory, and for some minutes she stood on the verge of the lawn, delighted at the beauty of the scene before her.

The house was a handsome mansion in rather a composite style, the substantial Tudor windows and doors having been surmounted with pinnacles and verandahs that were not always improvements. A gentleman was pacing the terrace walk in front of it, directing the proceedings of some men who were at work with a patent mower; but his back was towards Eda, and he had moved away when she stepped into the wide porch that formed the principal entrance to the Hall. She gave her name to the man-servant who happened to be lounging there, and who, after a moment's hesitation, ushered her into a handsome drawing-room, while he went to apprise his master of her arrival.

At first Eda supposed the room to be untenanted, but a second glance showed her that a tall hard-featured elderly lady was sitting at one of the windows, embroidering by the fading light. For some time this lady worked on without taking any notice of Eda; but when a difficult stitch had been accomplished, she glanced up to point to a chair, and sharply ask why she did not seat herself. But having made this concession to politeness, she resumed her employment, and seemed to forget the presence of the young girl, who found it so depressing to sit there, with nothing to do but watch those quickly-moving fingers, that it was quite a relief when a voice and footsteps in the ante-chamber announced the approach of Mr. Texley.

CHAPTER VI.

The next minute the door swung open and admitted a very brisk smiling little gentleman, whose face would have been an extremely pleasant one but for the restless expression of his eyes, which were continually roving beyond the person he was addressing, as if in search of something beyond their ken. However, his manner was so kind, that Eda felt too grateful to find fault with any of his peculiarities.

"And this is Miss Granton," he said, as he shook hands with her; "the young lady who promises to assist my efforts to ameliorate the lot of those about me. Maria, my dear sister, this is Miss Granton."

"So I concluded, when she sat waiting for you goodness only knows how long!" was the ungracious reply of Miss Texley.

"Ah! and you have been telling her how very glad we are to see her!"

"I haven't been doing anything of the sort, Pierce," she retorted, stiffly; "for I am not glad to see Miss Granton here."

Mr. Texley looked embarrassed, and Eda's colour rose. What was she to understand from such strange speeches?

Perhaps Miss Texley saw that her eyes were filling with tears, for she added, in softer tones, "I have no doubt that Miss Granton will do her best to give satisfaction, but I always have set my face against this new school, and I always shall. It is an insult to the good old rector of our parish and the managers of the excellent schools that are already established."

"My dear Maria," expostulated her brother, "if I am anxious that the people in my employ should receive higher and better teaching than they can get in the village, why should you find fault with me for such a laudable desire?"

"Do as you please," she answered, coldly, while gathering up her work. "I told you I would never set foot in your new folly, nor further it in any way, and I never will. Good evening, Miss Granton; I shall send you a bottle of cod-liver oil and some arrowroot; don't neglect to take both; you look very white."

Mr. Texley smiled, shook his head, as the lady disappeared, and, sitting down near Eda, became confidential.

"Ah, Miss Granton, an excellent woman, this sister of mine, though whimsical, as you perceive. But I try her temper sadly, for I am heedless and forgetful, as I have given you convincing proofs to day, haven't I? I intended to have met you at the station myself, but I was so absorbed in testing the merits of an American invention—a wonderful people, the Americans, wonderful!—that I contrived to let your arrival, my luncheon, and everything else, slip my memory. Are you interested in machinery? I should like to show you this new two-horse-power chaff-cutter of mine."

Eda glanced dubiously at the window from which the last glint of sunlight was fading. His eyes followed hers, and he nodded.

"Ah, true, there would not be light enough. Some other day, however, I shall have the pleasure of taking you through my model farm, and showing you how I have availed myself of the greatest discoveries of skill and science. Our school, Miss Granton, must be like this farm—a little, or I hope I shall soon be able to say very much, in advance of our neighbours."

"I believe Mr. Gale warned you that I am inexperienced in tuition," she thought it only honest to remind him.

"True; but at the same time he assured me that you are energetic, sensible, and teachable, and therefore I am satisfied. I did not want an obstinate, self-conceited young woman, so imbued with the dogmas of a past generation that she would refuse to enter into my plans, but one who will cheerfully do her best to carry them out."

Eda hinted that she should like to have some idea what these were, but a gong was sounding, and Mr. Texley said, with a smile, that much as he wished to have a longer conversation with her, he could not afford to lose his dinner as well as his luncheon.

"I have a great deal to say to you, Miss Granton," he added; "but I think it may just as well be deferred till I can meet you on the field of our new labours. At the school-house I shall be better able to explain my wishes. When do you think you will be able to commence your duties?"

Eda, who dreaded any lengthened period of inactivity, expressed her readiness to open school whenever he pleased.

"Thank you; then I will give notice to my people that you and I will be at the school-house on Monday morning, at nine o'clock precisely, to receive scholars. Your task will be a high and honourable one, Miss Granton. To instil into the virgin minds of the young the first principles of knowledge is a noble occupation! But you look tired; I will not keep you here any longer."

He followed Eda across the hall, hoping, aloud, that their new undertaking would prove profitable to themselves as well as those they proposed benefiting; and was dismissing her with a paternal blessing, when Miss Texley shrilly called to him from the staircase, "Are you sending that poor child away without the smallest refreshment, to lose herself in the plantations? If you must have a schoolmistress of your own, Pierce, you might remember that she is flesh and blood, and a stranger."

"You whimsical thing!" cried Mr. Texley, shaking his finger at her, and laughing, to cover a little annoyance. "Pray come back, Miss Granton; my sister is quite right, and I am the most inconsiderate of men."

But Eda did not feel at all inclined to encounter Miss Texley again, or to trouble any one to accompany her back to the cottage; and, assuring him that she was neither hungry or thirsty, and had taken particular notice of the route by which Mrs. Jones had brought her, she contrived to make her escape.

"He's a very well-meaning gentleman is the master," said Mrs. Jones, as she lighted Eda to bed that night, and assisted her to unpack one of her trunks. "There couldn't be a better-meaning gentleman nowheres, only he do have so many irons in the fire at once! More nor half the people is terrible set against this new school, for the children get on well enough at the old one, and who can want more? Howsoever, it's the master's whim, and they musn't go against it, unless they want to be turned off the ground. He must have his way, and it's no use to go against him."

Certainly Eda's prospects were not very encouraging; scholars who would be sent unwillingly, and the only lady from whom she might have looked for occasional help and advice plumply declaring that she would give neither! She sat for a little while after Mrs. Jones left her, giving way to an inexpressible longing for the sympathy of her lost mother. But when she knelt down, the very attitude seemed to bring with it calm and healing, and though her tears fell fast, they were not hopeless ones. But for the parting with Mark, and her fears that he had not chosen wisely, she could have smiled at the trifling circumstances that now depressed her.

However, she was able on the morrow to write cheerfully to her brother, and send, blushing the while, the promised kind remembrances to Richie. This done, she could enjoy the change from the close London streets to the fine sweet country air. The weather was delightful, and while Mrs. Jones was busy at her work, Eda carried the baby into an arbour in the garden. This became one of her favourite retreats, for it commanded a view of the green fields beyond, and the sparkling little river that ran through them, winding and turning capriciously, or brawling round two or three tiny eyots, and then rushing on towards the water-mill of which the artist had spoken.

While Eda sat crowing softly to the sleepy infant, and inhaling the fragrance of the cowslips that the south wind bore towards her, she heard the sound of wheels, and peeping through a gap in the hedge saw Miss Texley driving herself in a pony chaise along the lane that led to the cottage. She checked her small steeds at the gate, and called loudly for Mary Jones, till the gardener's wife, wiping her hands on her apron, ran out to learn her errand.

In the hard authoritative voice that made Eda wince in her hiding-place, the lady said, as she handed out a basket, "Now, Mary Jones, remember your lodger is to swallow two doses of this oil daily; you hear? daily. And these preserved fruits are to be taken afterwards if she makes wry faces. And—don't run away—this is arrowrcot; if you don't know how to make it, come up to the Hall and my cook shall teach you; it's disgraceful for young married women to be so ignorant! If she does not soon get some colour into her cheeks I shall hold you responsible for it."

"You shall do what, ma'am?" asked Mrs. Jones, fearfully.

"Never mind, never mind!" said Miss Texley, with a flourish of her whip. "All you have to do is to listen to what I say, and take care of your lodger. I don't like to seesuch white-faced shadowy people about the place."

On the appointed morning Eda found herself at the school-house door, awaiting Mr. Texley's arrival, and making efforts to enter into conversation with the half-dozen or so of cottage mothers, who came straggling up with their children, in obedience to "master's" orders, and either stood stolidly staring at the new governess, or held aloof, whispering together about her.

As last a sudden hush fell upon the talkers, and Mr. Texley, brisk and smiling as usual, came in sight, swinging on his finger the ponderous door-key. He nodded to the women, and shook hands with Eda, whose heart gave a leap as she followed him into the room, where her as yet untried powers were to be put forth, and her patience, energy, and perseverance tested by work.

(To be continued.)

COMFORTABLE WORDS.—XI.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF S. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."—PHILIPPIANS iv. 6, 7.

IN these two verses there are three chief points or topics, which we will consider in order. There is, first, a prohibition, then a precept, and, lastly, a promise.

The prohibition is against "carefulness"—that is, over-anxiety about the future. If "carefulness" referred to painstaking and diligent performance of duty, it would certainly be commended, not blamed, in Holy Scripture. But here it is to be understood according to the ancient acceptation of the word; and so understood, it describes a condition of mind which is most adverse to spirituality. We are accustomed perhaps to think that the deadliest enemy of the Christian life is pleasure. The man whose end of existence is self-gratification, seems at the furthest possible remove from the Gospel of Christ. And yet the Saviour Himself, when speaking of the destructive influences which choke the Word and render it unfruitful, classes together "care" and "the deceitfulness of riches;" and in His solemn charge to His Disciples, given just before the close of His career, warns them against the cares of this life, as well as against the excesses into which they might possibly fall. But why should care, thus interpreted, be so mischievous? Indeed, why should it be so sinful? Anxiety as to our future is natural, probably, to us all. In the case of some it seems almost inseparable from their mental constitution. They cannot help, as it appears, distressing themselves about what is going to happen. Why, then, should our Lord and His followers express themselves so severely about it? Clearly, because the root of the feeling is distrust of God. Consider. In words most plain and positive, God has promised to protect His people—to supply their wants, to make all things work together for their good. He has bidden us cast our care upon Him, because He careth for us. Can it, then, be a trifling matter, a venial offence, to question the sincerity of the Divine promise, and to refuse obedience to the Divine command? Surely not. In the heart of "carefulness" lies unbelief; and so far as we indulge the feeling we separate ourselves from God. We see then the reason for the Apostle's prohibition. Probably another reason might be found in the utter uselessness of this solicitude. What good did over-anxiety ever do to any one? None. But harm it can do. It distresses the mind; it disturbs the calculations; it frets the temper; in fact, it renders a man inefficient for the duties of the day, by drawing his thoughts in among the possibilities and contingencies of the morrow. Common sense, as well as religion, will teach us to avoid this disturber of our peace and destroyer of our usefulness. What we have to do is to form our plans and arrange our measures and take due precautions (for we are and must be forecasting beings; we must provide); and having thus done our best, to leave the rest, calmly and confidently, in the hands of God, accepting the result whenever it comes, and whatever it may be, as the decision and disposition of One who orders all things for the people who trust Him.

The precept is of equal extent with the prohibition. There we read, "Be careful for nothing;" here, "In everything make your requests known unto God." "In everything!" The universality of the injunction is a little startling at first. It seems to us as if some troubles and some necessities were too trifling to make the subject of a request to God. We can come before God, we think, if a great trial is impending, or a serious calamity is weighing us down; but to approach the throne of grace when we are vexed and harassed by the insignificant cares of life seems hardly compatible with the reverence due to the majesty of Jehovah. But there are the Apostle's words. He makes no exceptions. Whatever your need be—whether it concerns a matter of trifling moment or one of the greatest importance—"bring it," he says, "before God." Besides, look at the reasonableness of the precept. After all, small matters—"trifles" as we are accustomed to call them—constitute the staple of our existence—make up almost the sum-total of our daily histories. Insignificant in themselves, they are powerful in their accumulation. They are like flakes of snow in a snow-storm. The flake is a beautiful object, as it comes floating down from the sky, but it is perfectly harmless, it has no strength, no power. The child stretches out his warm palm to catch the tiny particle in its descent, and it melts and disappears ere he has time to examine it. But let these pretty, white, powerless things float down by the thousand and the ten thousand and the million during the space of a night, and the next morning the vast heart of a metropolis will have ceased to beat. Muffled in the robe of snow, the streets will be silent and deserted; their traffic suspended; locomotion brought to a standstill for the time by this puny agency. And so it is by the little duties, little pleasures, little annoyances, little trials, of our every-day life, and by the use we make of them, that our characters are being formed by a process of slow and gradual accretion, and our destiny is being decided. Nothing, then, can be trivial in the estimation of a Christian; nothing can be too insignificant to lay before God.

And then God is a Father; and whatever interests His children interests Him. We should be kind and considerate of course to a child under any circumstances; but childish griefs and troubles assume a very different appearance when the little one is our own. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." For these reasons, then—and probably for others,—the Apostle bids us keep the road of communication with heaven open. Let prayers go up; let praises ascend; let thanksgiving be often sent on its gracious mission.

Lastly, we have the promise—"The grace of God shall keep your heart." Observe the prohibition, obey the precept, and this shall be the result. God's peace—no fictitious or transient thing, but a real, solid gift, and one that abides—shall take possession of your inmost soul, and fence it against the intrusion of all that is prejudicial to you. It is the body that is "below par" which most readily receives infection when disease is abroad. Let vigour run in the veins and infection is repelled. So he that is filled with the fulness of the spiritual life throws off temptation more effectually than he whose graces are are at a lower ebb. Walk closely with God, and evil shall not easily reach you.

The leading idea, then, of the passage may be said to be this: that the freeness and the power of the Christian life depend upon the readiness of our communication with God. In proportion as we make God a stranger, hesitating, for whatever reason, to enter His presence, just in such proportion are we weak. We are strong when the intercourse is free and open—like that of a loving child with a loving father. We must not, indeed, expect entirely to exclude anxiety in time of trouble. With all temperaments it would be difficult, with some it would be utterly impossible—to do so. But we may, God helping us, so far obey the Apostle as not to fall into the sin of distrust; as not to destroy our comfort, or unfit ourselves for the duties of a Christian life.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 3. The Gift of the Spirit.

Chapter to be read—Acts ii.

INTRODUCTION. Ask when we first hear of the Holy Ghost in the New Testament; who baptised with water, and what did he say about Christ? (Matt. iii. 11). Did Christ baptise at all with water? (John iv. 2). No! but on day of Resurrection He breathed on apostles the Holy Ghost (John xx. 22). Show how that was a gift for themselves, their own souls, &c., convincing them of Him as divine; teaching them the Scriptures. What use did Peter make of it while waiting? What else did they want, then? Great power and great knowledge for preaching in the whole world! Not kept waiting long.

I. The Spirit Given. (Read i. 4.) (1) The time. On what day was it? Explain Pentecost: fifty days after what great Jewish feast? Read Lev. xxiii. 15—21 for account of Pentecost offerings called "feast of harvest," because the grain harvest complete, and "feast of weeks" because a "week of weeks" since the last feast. What was offered? the first fruit of wheat, two loaves in the Temple. Show how this time might be considered typical. Remind of parable of wheat and tares, describing people as grain; harvest of souls ripening; 3,000 about to be gathered in to the Lord (ver. 41). (2) The manner. In what outward sign did the Spirit descend upon Christ? (Matt. iii. 16). Of what was the dove the sign? But now the Spirit was to come as John the Baptist had prophesied. What did they hear? Who compared the Spirit to wind? (John iii. 8). Remind of lesson on Nicodemus to show that the Spirit resembles wind in being invisible, cleansing, &c. Is the power of the wind always the same? Sometimes can scarcely feel it—hardly a breath—sometimes strong enough to up-root trees, drive clouds, &c., so the Holy Ghost. How did it descend on Christ? now on the apostles, strong and mighty; about to do a great work; convince unbelieving Jews and heathen Gentiles. What did apostles see? Why this shape of tongues? Of what use is the tongue? Apostles at once filled with Spirit; did not keep powers to themselves; began at once to use them.

II. The Effect. (Read 5—13). Describe the apostles leaving the house at once; now the time come to begin work; were to preach to every creature; begin at once; lose no time; talk to different groups; explain the presence of these Jews from different nations; scattered by reason of commerce, &c.; all come now to keep the feast. How did they feel? Remind how the Galilean dialect was peculiar (compare Matt. xxvi. 73, and Mark xiv. 70), and the fishermen of Galilee unlearned; yet now these ignorant men are heard to speak, not with lisping uncertain accents like persons beginning to learn a new language, but accurately and distinctly, in not only one but many different languages. When had persons before suddenly learned strange languages? (Gen. xi. 9). Was that for a punishment or a blessing? Which was this? But the people cannot at all understand it. What do they think? Some simply amazed, others at once begin to mock.

III. Peter's Speech. (1) Fulfilment of prophecy. (Read 14—21). All being Jews or proselytes, i.e., the Gentiles who had adopted the Jewish religion; would be acquainted with the Scriptures. So Peter at once appeals to their knowledge; apostles not drunk at third hour, i.e., 9.0 A.M.; simply fulfilling old prophecy; the Spirit is poured out; wonders are now seen; men and women are prophesying, i.e., teaching under Divine inspiration, telling all to call on the Lord and will be saved (ver. 21). But what Lord? Whom only did they believe in? Must show Jesus to be God, as salvation only through Him. (2) Preaching Christ. (Read ver. 22—36). Ask what Peter wanted to convince people of; all knew what Jesus was, viz., a Nazarene; despised race; poor man; going about preaching; wanted to show that He was the expected Messiah, Lord and Christ. How will He show this? (a) His miracles (ver. 22). (1 Cor. xv. 23). (c) Fulfilment of prophecy. (Read Ps. xvi. 8—11).

IV. The Result. (Read 37—41). Ask the effect of the sermon; describe the scene. Have, perhaps, seen a large crowd swayed by one man's voice, and excited by one feeling; so here, 3,000 at once all moved; conscience stirred; see their sins. Who was foretold as able to convince of sin? (John xvi. 9).

V. Practical Lessons. (1) Holy Spirit convinces of sin. Have we really felt our sins? they caused Christ's death as much as these Jews. Do we listen to His voice by conscience or resist it? Ask for grace to keep consciences tender; to hear His voice to-day. (2) Holy Spirit reveals Saviour. These knew about Christ, but did not believe the Spirit given. We heard all our lives. Do we really look to Him for pardon, and act as if always in His sight, our King and future Judge?

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the manner in which the Holy Ghost was given.
2. Say all you can about the feast of Pentecost.
3. Show how the Spirit resembles wind.
4. Quote any prophecies fulfilled by the events of this day.
5. Give an outline of Peter's speech.
6. What two lessons may be learned?

MAY FLOWER, OR "SERVANT OF ALL."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LITTLE BUTTERCUP," "NOTHING BUT A SONG," "HOW TO ENTER INTO REST," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

"Love—do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again."—Luke vi. 35.

"If we are not blessing others, we are growing selfish."

ANOTHER week, and Tom's holidays would have begun, Stephen would be home from his curacy in a large distant town, and May herself free from lessons. It was delightful to look forward to. May was in her highest spirits; everything seemed easy; everything seemed pleasant. She danced through the wood, and spent her last Wednesday half-holiday, before her regular holiday began, with Mrs. Hurst.

"Oh, Mrs. Hurst, I'm so happy, I don't know what to do!" she cried.

"Then it's well, lassie, that you've come to my wife to be taken care of," said Dr. Hurst, "or you'd certainly be in hot water before to-night."

"Doctor," said Mrs. Hurst, with a smile, "I think she's too happy to be naughty or mischievous now. You just go away, or I shall have you putting her up to something bad; and leave me to set her to work."

"There, May, you see we are to be separated like two naughty children. Well, my dear, come to my study to say good-bye before you go home;" and with that the old man nodded his kind good-bye, and left them.

It was a quiet afternoon, but a very bright one. First they trotted all round the yard, looking at the ducks and chickens, feeding and taming them; then through the kitchen garden, gay with bright old-fashioned flower borders, nestling up close against cabbages and potatoes, and sheltering under huge old pear and apple trees.

"Gather me some flowers, May," said Mrs. Hurst, "and a posy for yourself, if you like; 'tis a pity now roses are so nearly past."

"But they will come out again soon, Mrs. Hurst," answered May; "look how the buds are beginning on this one!"

Then they strolled into the field, and called Pegtop, and her calf; and on their way homeward, the gardener was summoned to give May a swing, and there Mrs. Hurst left her, to follow her in when she should feel inclined.

"It's not so long since I was swinging you a baby in my arms, Miss May," said Aliston, as she sprang into the swing.

"Indeed, it's a long time since, Aliston: fourteen long years!"

"That ain't so long to me, Miss May, when I've lived past four times fourteen years."

"Well, I like this kind of swing better than the other."

"You wouldn't have liked it then, Miss May," he said, with a chuckle, as he sent her flying through the air. How the wind tossed her hair, and blew it about all over her face, as if playing hide and seek with her sweet eyes and laughing mouth! Perhaps Aliston had some such thoughts as he invited her to come and see the cows milked, and very happily she went with him.

Later on, when she returned to Mrs. Hurst, she found her busy mending.

"I dare say you can help me a bit, May," she said.

"Oh, Mrs. Hurst, I wish I could, but I never did a stitch of mending in all my life. Sometimes if I tear my frock, I just cobble it up. Oh, it is such a cobble, too!"

"Then who does the mending at home?"

"Oh, nurse does some of it; and Phillis and Gerrie do the rest."

"I think you are a very lazy little girl."

"Oh no, Mrs. Hurst!"

"Oh yes, I say. It is quite time you learned to be useful, May. Here, you shall begin this afternoon. Hand me that needle-book;" and, choosing needle and cotton, the old lady went on, "You must not leave everything to the elder ones, and be a spoilt baby. Here is a sock of the Doctor's that wants mending, and you shall begin on it, and by-and-by I hope you will take all the sock-mending, and relieve Phillis."

"Oh, Mrs. Hurst, indeed I shall not!"

"Why not?"

"Why, it would take me the whole of my Saturday afternoons."

"Well, child, we will think about that another day; meanwhile, just bear my words in mind. And now, tell me, Stephen comes on Friday?"

"Yes, on Friday. Oh, we are so looking forward to having him home! Do you know, Mrs. Hurst, sometimes I think he's my favourite brother, and yet, I don't know really—sometimes I think it's Tom, and sometimes Jem."

"I expect they are each 'favourite' in their own way, my dear. You are very happy to have such brothers and sisters belonging to you."

"But, Mrs. Hurst—you know—they are rather tiresome too."

"Do you mean they are tiresome or you are tiresome?"

"Well, Mrs. Hurst," she answered, with a laugh, "I suppose it's a little of both. I'm always quarrelling with some of them."

"Quarrelling?"

"Yes; they do provoke me so—it's 'May here,' and 'May there,' 'May do,' and 'May don't,' all day long; and oh, I do get so tired of it. However, I don't listen to them—I don't care about them now."

"My dear child, I am glad you have said this to me, for I fear you are very wrong indeed to speak in this way. 'It takes two to make a quarrel,' as the old saying has it, and it is nonsense for a child like you to talk of quarrelling with grown people. Your part is very simple; it is nothing but obedience and gentleness."

"Oh but, Mrs. Hurst, you don't know how provoking Phillis is! her temper is up in a moment, and she flies out like anything."

"My dear," said the old lady, sternly, "you have nothing to do with your sister's faults, excepting to hide them. And if Phillis was twenty times more impatient than she is, your path would still be the same. The worse people are the more it is our duty to be loving and good. Shall I tell you of one who put that before her all her life?"

"Yes, please."

"She was a lovely young thing, bright and sunny, the very joy of her home, and the only child, except one brother. Her father and mother died, and left her to his care, and through one trouble and another, he turned out, not as bad—for I still believe it was in a great measure owing to mistakes and misfortunes—but as unhappy a young man as could be. And she, who from her earliest days had been petted and spoiled, and ever allowed to have her own way, resisted all the attempts of her relations to part them. It may have been wrong in the world's eyes, but in the eyes of our Father in heaven, I believe it was noble and pure. She gave up her place in society, her time, pleasure, everything for this brother, and waited on him in simple love-lent duty, meeting rebuffs and misunderstandings even from him, till she won him; yes, that's it, won him back from all that was evil to all that was noble, and good, and godly. By-and-by, one who well deserved her asked her to be his wife, but she put aside the blessing—and what a blessing it must have seemed, after the torn life the poor lamb had led, God only knows! Howbeit, she put it aside, and devoted herself more than ever to this brother, to whom she was now so unutterably precious; and I think she never guessed she had made a noble sacrifice, but only felt her exceeding loneliness, when six months later, long after her lover had gone into a strange land, her brother was brought home dying from injuries in a train accident, and she had only time to receive him, and bless and comfort him, and hear his last words, 'Safe in Christ, through you,' before he went to the better land."

"Oh, how noble! how beautiful! How I should like to do that sort of thing, Mrs. Hurst!"

"Ah, my child, I doubt if any one likes doing it; no one can like suffering in itself, and she, dear soul, only took it so sweetly and patiently because Christ Jesus was so near her, and she so near Him, that she forgot it was pain."

"What became of her?" May asked, after a pause.

"She thought all was over for her, but the man who loved her, loved her enough to read her true, in spite of all that had seemed contradictory, and he came back and gave her a home, and rest, and all she needed. Do you know why I have told you this, May?"

"Not quite, Mrs. Hurst."

"Because it was your own namesake who did it—May Flower—your dear mother, my child. To you it seems some great wonderful thing to have done; to her it seemed to be the simplest, most natural duty. Though you cannot remember your mother, May, surely you have heard enough of her to long to be like her, and you will be, if you begin rightly—putting yourself aside in little things, upon every possible occasion. If you don't go seeking for pleasures for yourself, but seeking for opportunities of giving them; if you do not seek for anything, but simply, as the blessed Word of God says, 'love, hoping for nothing again.'"

"But that seems so hard, Mrs. Hurst."

"It is not hard, my child, if you open your heart to receive Christ's love. He can and will give you all you need for yourself, and not only that, He will give you also all you need for giving away."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

15. No mention is made in the Sacred Narrative by any of the Evangelists of one entire week of our Lord's earthly ministry. State what memorable event immediately preceded the period alluded to.

16. The terrible consequences of rejecting the Messiah are distinctly stated by Moses. Give the passage.

17. After His transfiguration the Lord Jesus charged his disciples to "tell the vision to no man." Which two of the Evangelists record this injunction of our Lord? For what event were they to wait before divulging it?

18. Give in the words of St. Peter the reason of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 16.

1. "Thou shalt not put any in thy vessel" (Deut. xxiii. 24).

2. Once at the beginning of His ministry (John ii. 14—16), and again towards its close (Matt. xxi. 12, 13).

3. The raising of Jairus's daughter (Matt. ix. 23; Mark v. 38).

4. 2 Chron. xxiv. 20—21; Matt. xxiii. 35.

5. John i. 14.

6. See John xii. 28, 29.

7. 1 Cor. xvi. 2.

8. Lev. xii. 5.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

THE VOICE OF THE STREAM.

SWEET is your babbling voice to me,
O little woodland stream,
When 'neath this wave-reflected tree
An idle hour I dream.

Full many a tender tale it tells
Of those long-faded hours,
When as a child I roamed these dells
In quest of summer flowers;

And of those later happier times,
When in this sacred grove
Your song made music to the rhymes
In which I breathed my love.

Dear distant days! yet not more dear
Than those which now I share;
There is in every fleeting year
Far more of joy than care.

And of our joy, to me it seems
We may increase the store
By sometimes calling back in dreams
The sun-lit scenes of yore.

So babble, brooklet, as you glide,
Sing on the dear old lays;
I see reflected in your tide
The light of other days.

J. C. TILDESLEY.

THE PRECIOUSNESS OF DEATH.

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC.

"Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints."—PSALM cxvi. 15.

IT is trite to say that as soon as we begin to live we begin to die, but it is a solemn truth. This world is not our resting place. "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh." We are surrounded by death; its dark memorials are ever with us. We tread on the dust of past centuries, and are ourselves hastening to the narrow house appointed for all living. One event happeneth sooner or later to all; but how different in its character and issues to different individuals! To some it is the greatest evil; to others it is the passage to the greatest good. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." Jehovah is the Creator and the Lord of life. He can take no pleasure in death as a mere destruction or dissolution. His delight is to give life, not to take it away. The death of man was not the work of God. It is Satan that is said to have in this sense "the power of death." Is it not, then, remarkable that, in any case and under any circumstances, death should be precious in the sight of God?

But whose death? Saints alone are named; and in their case, therefore, there must be special reasons for it. "The Lord hath set apart him that is godly for Himself." The very highest dignity for man is to be a saint—separated from sin and consecrated to God. We know that the lives of saints are precious in His sight, for He gives His angels "charge over them to keep them in all their ways" and to be "ministering spirits for them who shall be heirs of salvation." Their tears are precious, for He puts them into His bottle, and writes them in His book; their prayers are precious, for in one of the visions of the Apocalypse the golden vials seen in the hands of the elders were full of odours representing the prayers of saints; all their acts of kindness, self-denial, and love, are precious, "for with sweet sacrifices God is well pleased." But here we are assured that their death is precious—not merely that they themselves are precious in dying—for in living or dying they are the Lord's—but their death itself is precious in His sight. To them, therefore, the entire aspect and character of death must be changed. How so? They live in Christ, and have a life which death cannot touch. The one decease accomplished by the Son of God on Calvary—when he died, the Just, for the unjust—has emancipated them from the power of death. In dying He made of Himself "an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour." His decease was infinitely precious in the sight of the Eternal Father, and it has changed the character of death in the case of all the followers of the Lamb. "Whosoever liveth and believeth in me," said Christ, "shall never die." It is, then, through the triumph of the Cross and the resurrection of the Lord Jesus that the death of saints is precious in the sight of God. But on what grounds is it so? For manifold reasons, some of which we can see, and doubtless others to us here unknown.

1. Death is the end of all the sorrows and trials of the saints, and in this respect it is precious in the Lord's sight. Life is a probation and a discipline. "Whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." Is this chastening a pleasant thing for God? does He like this process of scourging? No; He does not delight in pain, nor in subjecting His children to suffering. Though needful for their judgment is "His strange work," it is no gratification to Him to see their tears, to witness their sorrows, to hear their sighs, to behold their disappointments, for in all their afflictions He is afflicted. It is through much tribulation—in every case through more or less—that they enter the heavenly kingdom. Our Divine Father rejoices when His discipline has accomplished its end—when "the peaceable fruits of righteousness" have been brought forth—when the life of the soul is ready to be transplanted, that it may grow and flourish in another clime. Hence the death of His children is precious in His sight. It brings the end of their probation. There is henceforth no more discipline, but rest; conflict no more, but victory; suffering no more, but glory. Then all tears are wiped away; sorrow and sighing are ended; tribulation and toil for ever cease. Such is the interest that God has in the happiness of His people that the event pleases Him which closes the record of their trials and raises them beyond the reach of pain and sorrow for evermore.

2. The death of saints, moreover, is the final step towards their moral perfection, and on this account God regards it as precious. It is the gate through which they pass to join "the spirits of the just made perfect." The sanctification of His people is the Divine will; and with what wisdom, power, and grace has He provided for it! God seeks that they shall be changed into His own image—from glory unto glory. With wonderful care and mercy does He watch the process of transformation—sitting as a refiner sits by the fire in which metal is melted and tried. To see the lessening force of sin and the growing beauty of holiness in them is to Him a joy. It shows forth His praise and magnifies His name. Just as the sculptor looks with interest and satisfaction on his work as the rude block of marble assumes under his hand definite shape and graceful form, and rejoices in marking its progress towards a likeness which seems to want nothing but the living breath, so God regards with Divine satisfaction the growing holiness of His people. And if the process and progress are so pleasing to Him, what must the consummation be? Death is the end of all their weakness and imperfection. They die and leave behind them "the body of their humiliation," and with it they leave frailty, temptation, and sin. No more lukewarmness or unbelief or spiritual insensibility or moral infirmity for ever. In dying, they pass beyond the reach of Satan's power; they overcome the last hindrance and surmount the last barrier between them and complete moral likeness to their Lord. And as God wishes their perfection—as He provided for it, watched for it, worked for it, waited for it—we can well see how their death, which finally secures it, is precious in His sight.

3. Further, the death of God's saints is the true birth of their heavenly being; and on this ground too it is precious in His sight. It closes the earthly and begins the heavenly life. Through death, they go to be with Christ, which is far better. How much is there in the words—"Absent from the body, present with the Lord." Not more marvellous is the change in the history of a living babe when it is ushered into the world than must be the change to the Christian when he passes through death into the immediate presence of his Lord. Then his soul reaches a higher sphere of being—a higher and purer atmosphere of light and life—the end for which all the past had been a preparation and probation. What an emancipation from the bondage of the present! What an expansion from the limitations of time and sense! Here the soul is clogged, hampered, held down, largely dependent for knowledge and feeling on the senses, which may be often injured or imperfect. But hereafter that which is in part will be done away. Now we see through a glass darkly; but then we shall see face to face. It will be entrance on a new life of resplendence, perfection, and glory. Death sets the soul free—

> "Free to wing the vasty realms of being,
> Inbreathe the freest air of life divine—
> Bask in the sunshine of eternal love."

Shall we wonder, then, that the death of His saints should be precious in the sight of God? Oh no! it but fulfils His own purpose, marks the triumph of His own good, is the achievement of His own power and love. His people are called, justified, and sanctified that they may be glorified—glorified together with Christ, who died for them, and in dying became the Conqueror of death for all His followers.

4. The death of God's saints is their arrival at home: hence also its preciousness in His sight. They are His children by regeneration and adoption. He has renewed them by His spirit, and made them partakers of His own nature. "And if children, then heirs: heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ." What loving father does not rejoice at the safe arrival of his children at home from the discipline and training of school or the pains and perils of travelling? Death brings the Christian home to the Father's house above, in which there are many mansions. Here, because of the entanglement of the flesh and the imperfections of this life, God cannot fully communicate with His children as He would, cannot reveal to them all the mysteries of His love or unveil to them His glory. They could not bear the revelation now, nor indeed could they appreciate it. He longs, if we may so say, to show them their inheritance—to see them in the house prepared for them, to display to them more of the riches of the universe, of which they are joint heirs with Him who is "Heir of all things." Their death is, therefore, precious in His sight, as it brings them home. What a home it will be! What relationships will be formed, renewed, and perfected there! What fellowships enjoyed! what glories seen and shared in! Home, with its rest, its solace, its society, its love and its felicity, for ever. Home, with its untiring occupation, its celestial songs, its purest pleasures, its unbounded peace, its perennial joy. The saint in dying is not the victim, but the victor of death—yea, more than conqueror, through the mighty love of Him who is "the Resurrection and the Life." May we not, then, sing as we advance in the pilgrimage of life—

> "While through the barren wilderness wearily we roam,
> How sweet to cast a look above and think we're going home

To know that there the trials of our pilgrimage shall cease
And all the waves of earthly woe be hushed to heavenly peace!
Home, sweet home!
Oh, for that land of rest above, our own eternal home!"

And if the death of saints be thus precious in the sight of God, then we may be sure that the time of it and the manner of it are in His hand and of His ordering. He knows the end from the beginning, and orders all for the best. In health and sickness, in life and death, trust in Him should be the sheet-anchor of the soul. Thus, as we advance in the pilgrimage of life, leaning on the Son of God, we may have the happy assurance at the close of every day that we are "one day's march nearer Home!"

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC. ETC.

IV.—"BETTER TO LIVE IN HOPE THAN DIE IN DESPAIR."

IT would be a very curious sight if we could see embodied and in actual operation the various passions or feelings or principles which sway mankind. No doubt a precise metaphysician would ask us which these are—"feelings," "principles," or "passions"; and perhaps would have his dignity much scandalised if we told him we did not care in the least what he calls them. Our readers would know well enough what we mean when we tell them that jealousy and envy, and avarice and lust, and ambition, and the like, are in one department of the list; and love and patience, and humility and hope, and self-denial, and so forth, in the other. What terrible sights would the first present to us, what beautiful ones the other! then we should see the real actors on this world's stage; not only, as now, what is done, but who do it.

Amongst the most beneficent of the holy band would be "Hope"—that Hope of which the poet sings—

Auspicious Hope! in thy sweet garden grow
Wreaths for each toil, a charm for every woe,
* * * * * *
When every form of death and every woe,
Shot from malignant stars and earth below;
When Murder bared her arm, and rampant War
Yoked the red dragons in their iron car;
When Peace and Mercy, tavished from the plain,
Sprung on the viewless winds to heaven again:
All, all, forsook the friendless, guilty mind
But Hope, the charmer, lingered still behind.

Well is it for us that she did so, for a life without hope would be only a living death.

Now, all these graces which we have mentioned above are working graces. They are very beautiful and refined; and if we could see them moving about amongst us, no doubt they would be arrayed in garments of infinite purity and lustre; still, not one of them would be found above work, doing great things for one, and hand's turn for another; going here, and there, and everywhere, and doing this, and that, and anything, or everything, if only they could scatter blessings around.

One of the most working of all these graces is "Hope," and one of the most ubiquitous too, having a lodging almost everywhere where there is a human heart.

And here we find it in one of our most common proverbs, "Better live in hope, than die in despair."

In this paper let us consider "Hope," and what comes of it, Life; and Despair, and what comes of it, Death.

This proverb is not to be considered here as applying to any particular thing; every one must apply it for himself; and in doing so we shall find it to be true as regards the two branches into which all our affairs must divide themselves—our temporal and our spiritual.

Now, first of all, let us look at what it is to live in "Hope." It is to believe ourselves to be within the possibilities of success. No man will embark on a hopeless enterprise. Duty may indeed compel him to go to certain death or ruin; but instances of this kind are comparatively rare, and do not come into the ordinary affairs of daily life. To undertake anything with spirit, we must believe that at least it is possible to accomplish it. And thus it is that the most difficult enterprises are undertaken. Hope may be seen in every steamer that ploughs its way over the sea; in every bridge that spans a river; in every garden that is laid out, every house that is built: if they could talk, Hope would animate their voices, saying either, "I am here," or "I was here once." The shipwrights, the architects, the masons, the gardeners, were all hopeful; they looked forward to their work turning out profitably and well, and that made them plan it and carry it through.

Hope does not prevent obstacles opposing themselves, but it prevents men being depressed unduly by them; and so they go at their work again and again, with life and energy, and that energy carries them through. Sometimes the possibilities of success are so clouded, that if Hope did not come in, almost as a charm, men would not undertake what they do. Perhaps a man cannot give a reason always for the hope that is in him in that way, but practically it carries him on, and eventually also overcomes difficulties. And thus it comes to pass that some of the greatest successes in life have been won—they are triumphs of Hope. A man feels "what may be, must be, and shall be," and though he be down to day and to-morrow and next day, he is buoyant, and he often rides safely over all his difficulties at last.

Hope should always be the companion of effort; the lazy and idle will only find it mock them. It is intended by the Almighty not only to work in us, but also with us. He wills us, going through this life, as well as looking forward to the next, to live in hope, and to act as living men.

Hope is intended to be a bracing power—to make men gird up their loins for action. If you have any duty to perform, let it be such, good reader, to you. Do not say "Hope privileges me to dream," but "Hope privileges me to work."

And Hope is a great supporter. When matters are going wrong, it is Hope that holds us up, and makes us look forward to their mending. It is all that many a mother has had to sustain her during the long weary years of a son's waywardness; all that many a hard worker has had to enable him to keep at his unremunerative toil—the way is long and hard, but if only he could hold up and hold on, success might crown his efforts and repay him for all at last.

Always holding out new prospects, it energizes to fresh action, it comes out as bright as the sun does from under a cloud; it rises up with ever-new morning times, even as we ourselves do after long dark nights. Hope might be almost said to be a miracle of ever-new resurrections; not only full of life itself, but life communicating to others also.

If we could see what Hope is really doing in daily life, we should behold it bearing heavy burdens; administering cheering cordials; letting in light to dark places; striking up a song and filling with melody silent and solitary abodes; setting men on enterprises of which they would otherwise have never thought; and giving the world most of the sunshine and health and music that it has.

There are many estates of life which would be very unhappy and perhaps even intolerable in themselves, were it not that Hope enters into them, and brings with it its own train of interests, its own alleviations, its own pleasures. Life is and always must be, more or less pleasant where it is. Life, though full of struggle, yet, with Hope, is infinitely better than the dull peace of despair, which is a living death.

We are often very wrong in the estimate which we make of conditions and circumstances of life as esssential to happiness. The truth is, a man for the most part carries his happiness within himself; and a hopeful man with a crust is more happy than a low-spirited man with a feast. A man with hard struggles and plenty of hope, is better off really, and happier, than one with plenty of everything else but no hope, nothing to look forward to, his present and future alike one melancholy blank. We can never tell what life really is to a man, because we cannot penetrate his mind and see what he has of a hopeful spirit.

And so in our dealings with our fellow-men, we should be careful to trench as little as possible upon hope. Something should be left, even to the worst criminals, in this way. To leave them without hope would be only to harden them more and more. We must leave every one some future, and something to be earned in that future. When the penalty of death is exacted, of course all earthly hope is ended; but short of that, it is bad policy as well as wrong in other ways, to destroy all hope. Hope is one of God's great lifters of mankind, an element almost of physical life itself; and unless we take away life, we have no right to destroy all hope.

And now, as regards the far higher matter of our spiritual hope. To live in hope, is what God designs for all his people—for all who would take hold of this great truth. How often we meet with people ready to lie down in despair as regards spiritual things. It is often Satan's plan to try and cast a man into despair. He knows well that it is death for the soul. Once down in that horrible pit, there would be no energy to stir, nothing but darkness, and sitting still till the end comes.

False hopes—which indeed should not be called hopes at all, but heart-deceivings—have ruined many; and when they come to ruin, Satan would never help a man to something on a good foundation, but would persuade him that all is lost—there remains now nothing but despair. Always remember that despair is death. The words of good old John Douname should be remembered: "As desperation is a sin in its own nature most grievous, so also is it to ourselves most pernicious; for whereas other sins make us worthy of the torments of hell and eternal condemnation, this, as it is above all the rest, entitleth us unto all the right of this hellish inheritance, so also it entereth us into the most certain and present possession thereof, even whilst we live upon the earth."

This good old divine took a strong view of the matter, but he is right—despair means death here, and death hereafter too.

Let our whole spiritual life be one of hope. Hope is one of the graces to be added to others (Rom. v. 4); it does not make ashamed (v. 5); we are said even to be saved by it; we are to abound in it; it passes beyond this life (1 Cor. xv. 19); it is laid up for us in heaven; it is bound up with the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ. You have only to run your eye down the column of a Concordance, to see the preciousness and importance of it in Scripture.

In whatever aspect we view our spiritual life, it should be one of Hope. What is there whichever way we turn but Hope food. It lies all around us, as the manna did round the tents of the Israelites. The whole breath of the New Testament savours of reconciliation and love, and a beautiful future, for any one who will simply take Christ. The present position is one of acceptance, the future prospect is all bright. "Ye are washed," says St. Paul (1 Cor. vi. 2), "ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit of our God." "There is now no condemnation," says he (Rom. viii. 1), "to them that are in Christ Jesus, for the law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death."

And all the future that belongs to such a present is and must be bright. "Made heirs according to the hope of eternal life," as it is said in Titus iii. 7. "Begotten again to a lively hope" as St. Peter says, we have heaven, and that for ever before us—something which we describe by such words as "brightness" and "glory" and "wealth" and "joy," but which in all probability infinitely transcends anything we understand thereby.

For my own part, I see no reason why Hope, which is one of God's choicest gifts, and which has done so much for us through life, should lie down and die on the threshold of that heaven to which it was so instrumental in bringing us. Why should Hope not live in heaven as well as on earth, and be a perennial source of exhilaration to the saints, ever leading them to look to their Father for yet more and more—ever for some fresh joy to come! This Hope may, for aught we can tell, be one of the special bonds between God and us for the future; we may be ever thinking, "Our Father will show us more and more. He will give us more and more;" we could not come to the end of His good things, and we never would. It is a grand vision—an eternity exhilarated by Hope. Well might Pope say—

> "Hope humbly then, with trembling pinions soar;
> Wait the great teacher Death, and God adore.
> What future bliss He gives not thee to know,
> But gives that Hope to be thy blessing now."

Progression, so far as we can learn from science, has been the law under which our world has lived for countless ages; and, ever advancing to something higher, it has become the beautiful planet that it is. But Hope looks forward to a still greater future for it, when, cleansed by fire, it shall have surrounding it a new heaven and itself be a new earth. And as our world and ourselves have lived under this law, why may we not live under it for ever? Why should not progression be the very necessity of our spiritual being? When gratitude and praise and enjoyment sparkle in the eyes of the saints, why should not Hope also? God has inexhaustible treasures on which to draw, and He may enlarge our capacity ever more and more to receive them.

Shakespeare says—

> "True Hope is swift, and flies with swallow's wings; > Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings."

This thought contains the germ of what we have been saying just now. Hope has power to do yet more for us in whatever state we are. As it blesses us here, so it may hereafter too.

And if Hope be thus precious—if indeed it belong even to a blissful eternity itself, then how serious a matter is it that we should make sure that our present Hope is well grounded. The Hope here is connected inseparably with this Hope on which we have ventured, we trust not unreasonably, to speculate as existing hereafter. There is but one ground on which it can rest, and that is Jesus, as Himself the one all-sufficient atonement. "Christ in us," as the Apostle tells us in the Epistle to the Colossians, is "the hope of glory."

Had we no Christ, what could lie before us but despair? The blackness of darkness must brood evermore upon our souls; the heart must have remained what it is by nature—a den of everything that is unclean. But Christ has come to light up ten thousand lamps within our souls. Yes; far more than that. As one sun outshines thousands of lamps, so the Sun of Righteousness arising with healing in his wings sheds abroad beams over our souls, which leave all earth-lit hopes and lights outshone into having scarce any place at all.

Reader, has Christ come as this great light into your heart to rule the day there? Has the day-spring from on high visited you? Has a mighty Hope, the daughter of Faith, sprinkled any music from her harp-strings, murmured soft melodies, or struck louder tones of minstrelsy in your heart? There are some who are described in the Scripture as "having no hope," and being "without God in the world." You are not, I trust, amongst them; but you very possibly are living below your privileges, below the standpoint on which Hope would place you.

A full Christ leads you to a full Father; joy and peace in believing are your privileges—full peace, full hope, for Jesus leads you to the large hand and large heart of His Father.

Do not be content with little. He who aspires to much shall get much; and what will make us aspire so much as Hope? As to despair, however much it may belong to the lost and to their "dungeon horrible, on all sides round," where "hope never comes, that comes to all," with such a Christ "while there's life there's hope;" and even though it be small, still there may be in it even eternal life itself.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 4. The Early Christians.

Chapters to be read—Acts ii., iii. (parts of).

INTRODUCTION. Question the children upon the events, so far, of the day of Pentecost—the one hundred and twenty disciples in the upper room; the Holy Ghost coming—referring to former lesson. Now shall see some of the characteristics of the early Church.

I. The Ordinary Life (read chap. ii. 41—47). (1) Baptism. First picture the apostles baptising these three thousand persons. What a busy scene! When were crowds baptised before, and by whom? Perhaps these in the brook Cedron—not told where. What was required of the converts by John? What besides repentance now? (Compare Matt. iii. 6 with Acts viii. 37.) What form of words had Christ given them for the purpose? (Matt. xxviii. 19). Must now fully believe not only in Jesus as God, but in the Person of the Holy Ghost. Show the benefit of baptism. All admitted into same family (Gal. iii. 27), bound to same master—blessings and privileges of Christians assured to them and children (ii. 38, 39), by reason of covenant with God. (2) Fellowship. Remind how boys would feel who belong to same school, would learn from same books, have to obey same laws, have same privileges, &c. So these Christians (ver. 42). Who would be their teachers? and whence did the apostles derive their knowledge? Remind of qualifications for apostle (i. 21). So they all continued together, learning and praying. What book would they study, and what feast would they share? Remind of the new feast instituted, as a sign of the love Christians should have to each other. How else did they show their love? (3) Common property. Ask how can show love to one another. Remind of parable of sheep and goats, Dives and Lazarus, and others; also of apostles having given up all for Christ; would teach duty of giving up goods to the poor. Also remind of Christ washing disciples' feet. This love made them give up their property, and have one common purse. Let children see two things about this: it was done voluntarily—there was no compulsion (see Acts v. 4); and it was done cheerfully—just as the rule was laid down by St. Paul afterwards (2 Cor. ix. 7). Ask for instances of true love giving the best to Christ—the poor widow, her last farthing; Mary, the spices; and Joseph, his own tomb. So these went about cheerfully, and full of praise (ver. 46).

Practical. From all this may learn two lessons—(1) Religion makes us liberal. First comes contentment—have enough, can spare to him that needs. How much are we to love our neighbour? Then not merely give him crumbs (Luke xvi. 21), but share money with him. Who failed under this test? How did the young man go away? (Matt. xix. 22) Still, all must come from true love or charity, or else worthless (1 Cor. xiii. 3). (2) Religion makes us cheerful. Great mistake to suppose Christians must be gloomy: its ways those of pleasantness (Prov. iii. 17). What are causes for joy? Promise of this life. No carefulness—all things necessary promised (Matt. vi. 33). Promise of next life—pardon, peace, joy in Holy Ghost (Gal. v. 22), none of which can be taken away or lost, like earthly treasures (John xvi. 22; Matt. vi. 20).

II. Miraculous Powers. (Read chap. iii. 1—16.) Question the children on the story, and bring out the following points—(a) The place. Why did the man place himself at the gate of the Temple? What were the people going to the Temple for? What o'clock of our time? What was offered at three P.M. daily? Refer to 1 Kings xviii. 29; hence show that the apostles did not neglect the daily worship in the Temple (chap. ii. 46), any more than the new converts. (b) The lame man. Picture him lying at the entrance-gate, on his mattress, eyeing the people. Must often have seen Christ entering the Temple: perhaps had seen Him work some miracle. Why did he accost Peter and John? Probably saw kind faces, caught something of the look of Jesus (chap. iv. 13). How were his hopes raised (vs. 4, 5)? (c) The miracle. What had the apostles not got? Why not? Yet had something far better? What was that? Whence obtained? Still, though had this power, what was necessary on the man's part? (See Mark xvi. 17.) Let children observe how apostles always spoke of Jesus of Nazareth, that despised place. What did the man do at once? Could be no mistake; was no partial cure; could leap, as well as walk. What else did he do? Remind of lepers, who showed no gratitude. (d) The effect. What could the multitude think? Marvellous to hear ignorant men speak with other tongues. This more strange—a man lame from his birth running about. What did the apostles do? extol themselves? boast of their power? No! Simply another opportunity of upholding Jesus (ver. 13; chap. iv. 9, 10). What does this show? Whence came this humility? Had now learned of Him. His Spirit at work in their hearts (Matt. xi. 29).

Questions to be answered.

1. What was the first act of the new converts?
2. What practical proof did they give of their love?
3. Give two rules for alms-giving.
4. What two practical lessons may be learned?
5. Describe the healing of the lame man.
6. What quality did the apostles exhibit?

XUM

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER VII.

MR. TEXLEY'S first act was to lead the new schoolmistress to her desk, and open before her a book in which she was to enter the names of the scholars as they presented themselves. At his invitation the mothers entered, and listened in respectful silence while he made them a little speech, expatiating, rather more than Eda liked to hear, on the gratitude they ought to feel for the expense and trouble he had been at in building such a well-appointed and excellently arranged schoolhouse for their children, whom he enjoined them to send regularly, unless they wished to incur his serious displeasure.

Very few signs of the grateful feelings he invoked were visible on the faces of his auditors. Only one simpering woman, in ragged and tawdry finery, made any acknowledgments, and hers were couched in the following terms:—

"I'm sure, sir, it's truly thankful I am, whatever other people may be, that I'm able to take my dear childern——"

"It's Mrs. Blackman, isn't it?" asked Mr. Texley. "It was your boys whom I caught the other day breaking down one of my hedges."

"Was it now, sir!" and Mrs. Blackman tried to look astonished, but failed. "Well, now, if they aint allays in mischief; but childern will be childern; and what's a few sticks to a great gentleman like you, sir? and as I was a saying," she went on, too rapidly to permit of another interruption; "I shall be thankful to take 'em away from a school where they has to company with all sorts, and the ladies takes upon themselves to find fault with my girls for having a flower or two in their hats, poor things! and the missus took Mary Jane's beads off her neck, and wouldn't let her wear 'em in school-time. A reg'ler piece of imperence I call it! Who's she, indeed, to take so much upon herself!"

Involuntarily Eda moved a little farther away from the shrill-tongued speaker, and Mr. Texley coughed rather dubiously.

"That will do, my good woman! I really cannot stop to hear these very frivolous complaints. Miss Granton will draw up a code of rules, which you and your children will have to observe. I am pleased to find that you appreciate the advantages I am offering you. Education is an incalculable boon, and,——I think that is all, and I need not detain you any longer."

But a stout tidy matron had now edged her way into the front rank, and curtsied till she contrived to attract his attention.

"Who's this—Mrs. Brown?"

"Yes, sir, Mary Brown, as got the prize at the last cottagers' show for the cleanest house place in the village. I ha' brought my two girls, sir, as you bid me; but I'd like to know what I be to have for taking 'em away from t'other school, just as they was a doing as well there as children could do?"

"I don't understand you," said Mr Texley. "They will have superior instruction—very superior!"

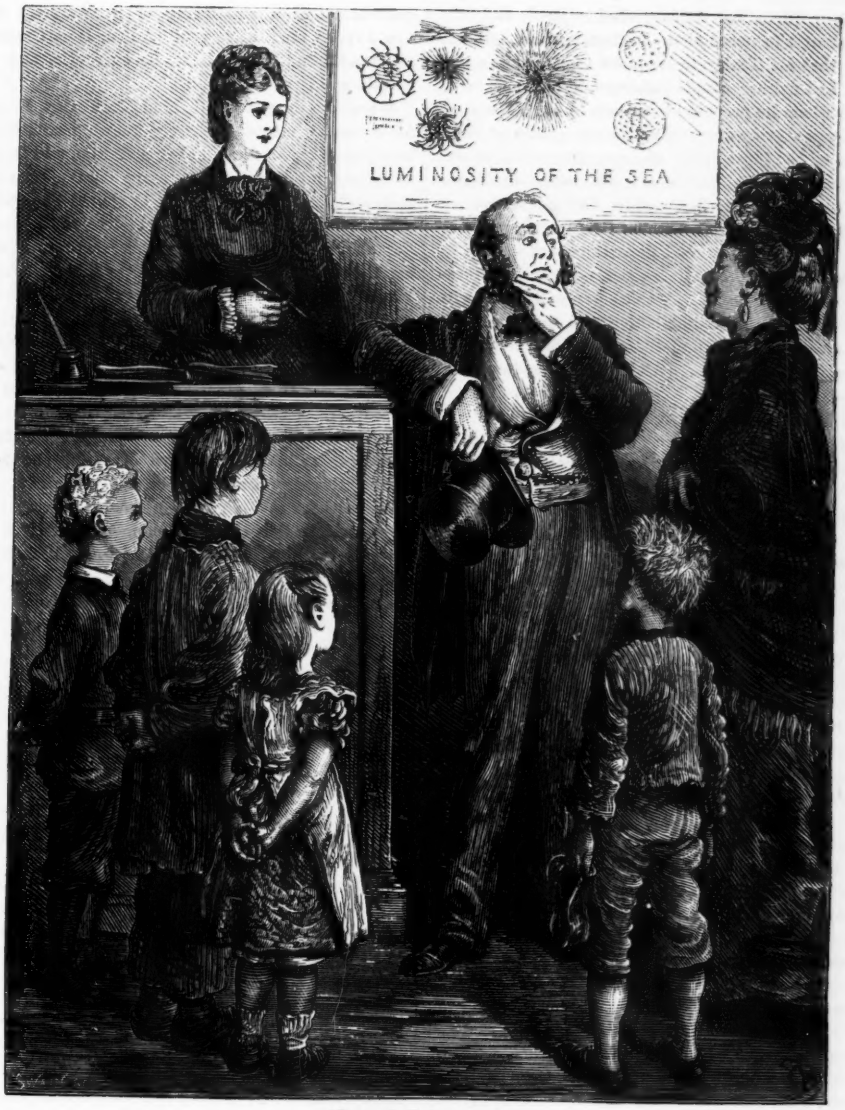
Still the mother was dissatisfied, and did not hesitate to say so.

"Well, but, sir, they was a getting on as well as I could wish, and in the first class both of 'em; and they had as good a chance as e'er a one in the school of winning Miss Texley's prize for needlework."

"I, too, shall give rewards to stimulate our pupils to greater industry," she was assured, "and carry their education to a height at which their former teachers have never aimed!"

"May-be, sir," she answered, shortly; "and I'm sure I'd not be against their learning anything that's right and according to Scripter; but who's a going to make up to 'em for the gifts they always have at Christmas, and the chance of being helped to good places as soon as they be ready to leave school?"

"I am afraid you are inclined to be mercenary, Mrs. Brown," said the gentleman, reprovingly. "You evidently value a few pecuniary considerations more than the enlightenment of your offspring."



"I values the flannel petticoats they was to have, and I won't deny it," she boldly replied; "but if you means to make it up to 'em, sir, of course I haven't no more to say."

But others had; for, encouraged by her example, some of her companions began to tell, half eagerly, half sorrowfully, how hard they should find it to lose the aid of the clothing club, into which their children were allowed to pay their pence as long as they attended the village school.

Mr. Texley began to look hot and harassed.

"Dear, dear me, my good women, this is too, too much! Look at the beautiful school I have built for your children, and spared nothing to make it complete!"

"Aye, sir, it be a fine place, surely!" said Mrs. Brown, "and must have cost a power of money; but how be the poor children to come across the park to it all through the winter, when the grass is little better than a mash, if they've no shoes to their poor feet? and how be they to get shoes without the club to help 'em?"

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"I'm sure, sir, it's truly thankful I am."—p. 56.

"Must I institute clubs too!" the gentleman ruefully exclaimed. "Well, well, I cannot enter on such undertakings just at present. I'll think it over, I'll think it over."

The mothers, but half-satisfied, retired, and Eda sighed as she noted their downcast faces. It was plain that Mr. Texley, in his haste to carry out a new plan, had neither counted the cost to himself, nor to those whom he proposed to benefit by it. He, however, was already overcoming his annoyance at what he called the ingratitude of those for whom he was labouring, and exultantly led Eda round the room, to point out the excellence of its arrangements.

"I assure you, my dear Miss Granton, I spent two days in the Educational department of the Kensington Museum, examining the respective merits of the forms and desks. I think you will agree with me that nothing could be better than these. And in this closet you will find the nucleus of a library for the use of the parents. All rudimentary works, as you perceive."

"But they are philosophical and scientific," she objected.

"Certainly they are; that is part of my plan. Why should it not be as easy to teach a man the component parts of a drop of water as to explain to him the process of making bread? I shall give a course of lectures in this room during the ensuing winter, for which these books, if they study them, will pave the way."

Eda echoed the if mentally, and then asked for alphabet cards, that she might set one of the elder girls to form a class of the younger children, who were beginning to be fidgety.

"My dear Miss Granton, pray don't commence with that old-fashioned system! Think of the time that is wasted in trying to make the poor little creatures distinguish b from d, and n from u. I am sure you will be able to devise a better method of teaching them to read than that."

"I will do my best," said Eda, dubiously.

"Thank you. Then I may leave you with your young charges? It is very gratifying to be able to feel that they are in good hands. You will convey a great deal of the information you impart in song, will you not? And if you can devote an hour daily to natural philosophy pray do so. Now what do you think you had better begin with? Shall I send you down an illustrated natural history for you to lecture upon? or would you like to take them into the woods, and inaugurate our new system by giving them lessons in botany?"

"I would rather make their acquaintance first," said Eda, timidly, "and ascertain how much they already know."

"As you please," was the polite reply. "You will find an English History and an Arithmetic in your desk. You will not require any other books. Lessons only disgust the young, and such drudgery impedes progress. Begin with practice, and they will learn the simpler rules with it. Tell them the history of their own country, and they will, at the same time, imbibe patriotism and spelling, good grammar, and a smattering of geography. And now I really must leave you. Adieu, Miss Granton; adieu children! be obedient, be energetic, and you will do wonders!"

When the door closed behind Mr. Texley, Eda sat for some few minutes scarcely knowing whether to laugh or to cry. Should she recall him, and frankly state her incompetency to carry on the school in such an extraordinary manner, or should she quietly and methodically instruct the children to the best of her ability, teaching them what she found them capable of learning, and if he complained, acknowledging her inability to do more? Perhaps this would be the wisest plan to adopt at present; and gathering them around her, Eda offered a simple prayer in language that the youngest could comprehend, and then, guided by a dim recollection of a visit to a national school, marshalled them into order. In checking the rebellious, encouraging the timid, and keeping a watchful eye over all, she found plenty to occupy her till the hour for dismissal, when she went back to the gardener's cottage, very tired, but conscious that she had done her best to fulfil her duty, in the highest sense of the word, both to the children and her employer.

CHAPTER VIII.

GROWING rosier and stronger every day, and finding real pleasure in her labours, as soon her little scholars began to love and obey their patient instructress, Eda persevered in the course she had adopted. No one came near the school for several weeks, either to advise or assist her; and, conscious of her own inexperience, she felt a little anxious when Mr. Texley popped his head in at the door one morning in the midst of the lessons.

But he had only come to superintend the fixing of a gallery, in which his audience were to be seated when he lectured; and his interest in the children was second to his desire to prevail upon Eda to give a course of lectures too. It was no use assuring him that she should not have courage to speak in public; he only pooh-poohed this objection, reminding her that ladies frequently did so now-a-days, and left her a list of subjects from which to select one for her opening essay.

Soon after this she heard that he had gone abroad to some Exposition, from which he returned with his head full of fresh ideas, and his pockets of bills for fresh purchases. By this time his interest in the school was fast disappearing. He came and questioned the children; frowned at their timid and often incorrect replies; and told Eda that either the hour had not arrived for bringing his system to perfection, or else she had not been working as hard as he had hoped and expected to find her. He added, with a sigh, that it was dreadfully disappointing when a man was so willing to spend and be spent for the good of his fellow-creatures, to find every one more inclined to hinder than to help him.

Eda attempted to defend herself, but she could not get a hearing. Mr. Texley was quite prepared to admit that she might have had some few difficulties to contend with, but a little energy, he told her—energy of mind and a fixed purpose—would always overcome every obstacle. However, the children appeared more docile, and the parents did not complain; so he would let things go on as they were for the present.

With this doubtful assurance he left her, and in the first flush of her resentment Eda longed to be able to throw up her situation, but she dared not, for where could she go? Mark, who wrote but seldom, was still sharing Richard Atwood's lodging, and complaining bitterly of the fickleness of fortune; and though the note Richie enclosed in his friend's letter was written in a more hopeful spirit, it hinted at trials and discouragement, and ended thus:—

"How glad we ought to be that you are comfortably situated, and able to take your ease in some shady spot, while Mark and I are toiling along the hot dusty streets in search of something to do. Do you not wonder sometimes how two fellows so opposite in disposition get on together? I must confess that we do quarrel sometimes; or at least that Mark scolds and accuses me of snapping up every chance that fortune throws in our way, and I meekly remind him that he does the same in his turn."

"Of course this is only a jest!" Eda said to herself, as she read, and smiled at Richie's readiness to disparage himself.

"But such a continuous run of ill luck" [the writer went on] "would make any one out of sorts, and I console myself with the thought that if Mark grumbles occasionally, Mark's sister will try and think kindly of me—did she not promise to do so when we parted?—and I magnanimously give my testy friend full permission to seize the first chance of climbing over my shoulders, and vaulting into a better position. Till that moment arrives, he must be content to share the fortunes, or want of fortune, of my dear Eda's devoted and affectionate friend,

"RICHIE."

So Eda resolved to be patient, though she could not resist hinting to Mark her wish that he would relinquish his efforts to attain riches, and let her join him in some more reasonable plan of living. But she pleaded in vain; nor when she expressed her fears that she should not be able to retain her situation did she receive any sympathy from her brother.

"As for your joining me" [he wrote], "it is as totally out of the question as it was three months ago. Why not be more obliging to your employer? What matters if he is whimsical? If he wished the village brats to learn high Dutch and shorthand writing, what can it signify to you, as long as he pays you well for your trouble?"

Although Mark's notions of right were not Eda's, she tried to glean a lesson from them, and assured herself that she was too easily discouraged. When Mr. Texley came again, and the children, more accustomed to his short sharp queries, were better able to give him proofs that their minds were not allowed to lie fallow in his absence, he would doubtless do more justice to their young teacher.

But these hopes were not destined to be realised. When he did pay another visit to the school he could not conceal that he was growing tired of it; and Eda began to understand how it was that many new inventions which, on her first coming to Weston Hayes she had heard lauded as perfection, were already thrown aside and forgotten. Mr. Texley was unstable as water. He would spare no toil, no trouble, till the plan he had made was wrought out, or the article he craved was obtained; but, like a child with a toy, he was soon sated by possession.

During the few minutes he stayed he entertained Eda with details of the vast expenses the erection of the school had entailed upon him, and the unpleasantnesses he had been forced to endure with in consequence of his sister's determined opposition to his scheme.

"It is so horribly disheartening!" he complained. "Here am I, eager to benefit the working classes, and assist them to raise themselves, and yet I am crushed, absolutely crushed, by the want of a little human sympathy. No one appreciates my efforts. Even you, Miss Granton, are only giving me divided attention, for you are watching those two quarrelsome urchins instead of listening to me."

"I beg your pardon, sir; one of them is a new boy, and I was afraid he was fighting. With regard to the school—is not the time too short to decide how much good can be done by it?"

"You have been here some months, Miss Granton."

"Between three and four, sir, no more."

"And I do not see any results. I do not, indeed. I do not wish to hurt your feelings, but really your pupils are not in advance of those at the village school; they really are not!"

Eda thought in her heart that, unadvised, unassisted, as she had been, and confessedly entering upon the work without any experience, it was something to have kept pace with more practised teachers.

"You seem to overlook the fact, Miss Granton," he went on, "that I do not want a mere machine here, to do precisely what is set down for her, and nothing more; but an energetic woman, who will suggest, and devise, and second me zealously; but you do not appear to comprehend me at all, so I'll not detain you from your scholars. I suppose we must go on as we are now doing, until some better arrangement can be made; but it is really terrible to have thrown away such large sums, without obtaining any satisfactory results—any results whatever."

Eda walked home from the school that afternoon so hot and indignant, that when she encountered Miss Texley at the gate of the gardener's cottage, she would have passed on with a slight bow, if the lady seated in the pony carriage had not put out her whip and barred the way.

"What is the matter, Miss Granton? are your pupils too much for you?"

"No, madam," she answered, briefly.

"Are you tired of keeping school?"

"No," said Eda; "but I wish I had never been persuaded to come to a place where my endeavours to do my duty are not recognised, and I am thrust into a position which I cannot fill with any credit to myself."

"In plain words, you are dissatisfied because you cannot work wonders with very raw material."

Eda shook her head. "I never expected to be able to do that. Mr. Texley complains of me because I have not attempted what I saw to be impossible."

"Then you are a more sensible girl than I imagined, and I am sorry I cannot help you. Why don't you go back to your friends? The sooner this silly scheme collapses the better for every one connected with it."

Eda's lips quivered. "You forget, ma'am, that I came here hoping to earn my living. I have no friends who are able to receive me if I throw up my situation."

Miss Texley looked grave. "What is your present trouble? Tell me; I might be able to suggest a remedy."

Eda hesitated; she did not like to expose her employer's inconsistency, and contented herself with repeating Mr. Texley's last speech, without any addition or explanation of her own.

Miss Texley looked graver still, and sat for a few minutes flicking the flies from her ponies' ears.

"What do you teach the children?"

At rather greater length Eda told her.

"Go on, then, as you are now doing, and recollect that while duty guides us, it does not signify much whether our motives are or are not recognised by those about us. Try to make the children good Christians, and instead of vexing yourself over fancied failures, go steadily on. One who was wiser than you and I has said that sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. If my brother should close the school something or other will turn up for you."

It was rather an indefinite promise, but Eda strove to be satisfied with it. Often and often, too, she repeated to herself Miss Texley's words about duty; and when her difficulties increased, as they did but too rapidly, all through that summer, she comforted herself with the thoughts that lady's hints had awakened.

She never saw Mr. Texley, except at church; and some of the parents of the little ones, perceiving that the master no longer cared for his new hobby, either removed their children altogether, or permitted them to attend as irregularly as they pleased; whilst others, dissatisfied to find that none of his promises were fulfilled, vented their displeasure on the young schoolmistress, and encouraged their offspring to be troublesome, and even insolent.

Still, the clouds lifted sometimes. Though Mr. Texley never came near her, his sister had always an encouraging word to say when she called at the cottage. Some few of the cottagers were really thankful for Eda's teaching; the rector never met her without pausing to speak kindly; and her humble friends the Joneses were affectionately attached to her. Mark, too, was beginning to write in a more cheerful strain, and held out hopes of a speedy reunion, though what ground he had for these hopes, or the nature of the employment he had undertaken, he did not explain; and as her strength increased, both mentally and bodily, many a vexation that had pressed upon her during the day was shaken off, as soon as evening came, in a long healthful walk, or a romp with Mary Jones's fat merry baby.

Eda was doing her best to be really content with her lot, when one of those circumstances occurred that sometimes change the whole tenor of a young life. (To be continued.)

OLDER.

(Husband and Wife.)

(H.) AS golden chains behung their tree
And swung, in breezes, to and fro,
There you, below the humming bee,
Were sitting in the shade to sew.

(W.) Ah! sew in white, with no black dyes
Of mourning, under weeping eyes.

(H.) With eyes that showed a glist'ning blue
As clear as succory blossoms bear,
Or as your girdle, shining new,
Or knot new-made for breast or hair.

(W.) Ay, hair, all glossy black, that all
Now withers grey in life's late fall.

(H.) Yet fall, with charms we all can feel,
Awaits the ripening time and sun,
For gifts, enhancing all our weal,
In growth of fruits by spring begun.

(W.) Begun, as once with us begun
Our life that now is far outrun.

(H.) Outrun to reach a happy stage
To which our riper mind has brought
A treasure for our wiser age,
The wisdom culled from time by thought.

(Drawn by J. D. WATSON.)

"Sitting in the shade to sew."

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

BLESSING THE LITTLE CHILDREN—(concluded).

THE obvious distress and suffering of those who are destitute, and whose claims are constantly before us, may lead us to forget the frequent needs of a large number of people who represent uncomplaining poverty. There is a tendency to identify general appeals to benevolence with efforts for the relief of that extreme necessity which demands immediate and almost undiscriminating aid, and requires the prompt distribution of alms or the provision of a meal, warmth, and shelter. Doubtless, the actually homeless and destitute claim our first attention—especially in the case of deserted and neglected children—and I have tried to show what is being done for those little ones, whose presence in the streets of this great wilderness of brick and stone should of itself be an appeal strong enough to move the heart of humanity in their behalf.

There is, however, another class of poverty, which makes no sign, and bears distress dumbly. There is a need, which, without being that of actual destitution, requires a constant struggle to prevent its representing the want of nearly all the luxuries, and some of those things which most of us regard as the necessaries of life.

We find this among that large section of the middle class represented by persons holding inferior clerkships, small official appointments, and situations where the salaries are only sufficient to yield a bare subsistence, and there is little or no probability of their improvement, because of the number of candidates who are eager to fill such positions, there exists a degree of distress not easily estimated, even by the appearance of those who are the sufferers. Of course relief cannot reach such people through the poor-law, or by any direct legislation. They are far above the reach of almsgiving, or even of societies for distributing bread and coals. They have a just pride in maintaining a position of independence; and though they may sometimes look with a feeling too near to envy at the more prosperous mechanic or the skilled artisan, who can earn "good wages," dress in fustian or corduroy, send his children to the Board School, and regulate working hours and weekly pay by the rules of a Trade Union, they mostly keep bravely on, hoping that as the children grow up, they may get the boys "into something," and find some friend to help them to place the girls in situations where they may partly earn their own living.

With rent and taxes often absorbing a fourth part of his entire income, with market cliques combining against him to keep up the prices of food, with dear bread, dear potatoes, with boots and shoes always wearing out, and respectability demanding cloth clothes, even though they be made of "shoddy," how is the clerk, the employé, the small tradesman, the struggling professional man, to follow the prudent counsel which wealthier people are always ready to bestow upon him—and "lay by for a rainy day?" Rainy day! why his social climate may be said to represent a continual downpour, so far as the necessity for pecuniary provision. He lives (so to speak) with an umbrella always up, and it is only a poor shift of a gingham after all. The half-crown which is in his pocket to-night is already bespoken for to-morrow's dinner. As he listens to the account of the week's marketing, and knows that his wife and children have been living for three days out of seven upon little better than bread and dripping, he feels like an ogre as he thinks of the sevenpenny plate of meat that he consumed at one o'clock, because it was only "a makeshift" at home.

How is he to pay even the smallest premium to insure his life, when he is obliged to meet even ordinary emergencies by a visit to the pawnbroker after dark?

Insure his life! Ah, the time may come when the hand of the bread-winner is still, when the little money left in the house is scarcely sufficient to pay for the "respectable funeral" which is the last effort of genteel poverty, when the red-eyed widow gathers her fatherless children about her, and wonders amidst her stupor of grief what is to become of the younger ones who yet so need her care that she will not be able to go forth to seek the means of living. To what evil influences may they be exposed while she is absent striving to earn their daily food?—the temptations of the streets for the boys; the certainty that the elder girls must either starve at home to mind the little ones, or must become drudges before they have learnt more than the mere rudiments of what they should be taught. It is then she feels that dread of degradation, which is amongst the sharpest pangs of the poverty which would fain hide itself from the world.

It may be that the children are left a parentless little flock, huddling together in the first dread and sorrow of the presence of death, and the sense of utter bereavement, and awaiting the intervention of those who are sent by the Father of the fatherless. Then, indeed, prompt and certain help is needed—help certain and permanent—and such aid can seldom be secured except by an organised institution such as those of which I have already spoken in a previous chapter.

XUM

But let us see to what that Orphan Working School, established in 1758, has developed in 1874. We have but to take a short journey to the foot of Haverstock Hill, and there, in that pleasant locality named Maitland Park, part of which is the property of the Institution, we shall see the successor of the old house in Hogsden Fields, while its plain but large and lofty committee room is the modern representative of the parlour of the George Inn, Ironmonger Lane, where plans were first laid for the maintenance of forty orphan children.

This wide and lofty building, with its handsome front entrance and its less imposing side gate in the wing, is the home for nearly three hundred boys and nearly two hundred girls, when its funds are sufficient to keep each of the long rows of neat beds in the great airy wards appropriated to a little sleeper. I mention the dormitories first, because both on the girls' and on the boys' side of the building these are illustrative of the complete orderliness and excellent management of the Institution—illustrative of what should always be the first consideration, namely, to bring comfort to the child's nature, to join to necessary discipline a sense of real freedom and happy youthful confidence without dread of repression and the constant looking for of punishment.

As to the appliances that belong to the building, they are such as might almost raise a doubt in some prejudiced minds whether we are not doing too much for children in the present day, and thinking too constantly of their comfort. But, alas! it needs many compensations to make up for the loss of parents; and in any such an Institution, where 400 children form the great family, the arrangements must be on a large scale, so that it is only a matter of experienced forethought to combine a generous liberality with the truest economy. Thus, there are baths, and long well-ordered lavatories, to each wing, even to a large plunge bath for each side; and there is a great laundry, where the girls are taught to wash, clear-starch, and iron, not in the regular patent steam-heated troughs only, but in genuine homely tubs. There is a great handsome dining-hall, with a painted ceiling, wherein the vast troop of quiet, orderly, and happy-faced children, sit down to well-cooked wholesome meals of meat and pudding. There is a great school-room, divided into class-rooms for the girls, and a noble room wherein the boys assemble to be taught, not in the narrow spirit of the first directors of the old building in the City Road, but with a full appreciation of the duty of giving these young minds and hearts full opportunity to expand. Next to the admirable evidences of family comfort, and bright domestic influences, which pervade this place, we may regard the efficient education of the children as the truest sign of its liberal and enlightened management. Not only the three R's to the extent of practised elocution, caligraphy worthy of the old minute books of the first scrivening secretaries, and the lower mathematics,—but history, geography, the elements of physical science, French, drawing, and vocal music, are among the subjects thoroughly studied. It only needs a perusal of the reports of the educational inspectors and examiners to see that the work of this great hive goes on healthily. The boys have already achieved a great position in taking Government prizes for drawing at South Kensington; and the girls are celebrated for their beautiful needlework. There is but little time to walk through all the departments of this great home—the kitchens with their spacious larders, and store-rooms, and mighty cooking apparatus; the great airy playgrounds; the large and handsome room used as a chapel (for those who do not go out to evening service), and containing its convenient reading-desk, and sweet-toned organ. Let us not forget, however, that many of the things which add so vastly to the beauty and completeness of the building and its various departments, are themselves gifts from loving and appreciative supporters of the Institution.

But we are due at that Lilliput village on the brow of Hornsey Rise—that series of cottage homes, where, on each lower and upper storey, with their exquisitely clean nursery cots and cradles, and their tiny furniture, a neat nurse is to be seen like a fairy godmother, with a family of chubby babies, or a more advanced charge of infants able to run like squirrels round the covered playground or to spend the regulation hours in that great glorious school-room, where learning is turned into recreation, and lessons are made vocal, gymnastic, zoological, picturesque, or even fictional, as the time and circumstances may dictate. "The Alexandra Orphanage for Infants" has become so well-known amidst the numerous institutions which have been established for the care of the orphans and the fatherless, that one might think it would be full of eager admirers who on visiting days go to see the two or three hundred. Why are not all the cottages full, and each little toy bedstead complete with its rosy, tiny sleeper, who, from earliest infancy to the maturer age of eight years form the assembly for which Mr. Soul has set himself to provide by public appeal?

These, then, are the two institutions to which that modest little convalescent home in Harold Street, Margate, is a worthy appanage, and one which may well find support among those whose maxim it is to do with all their might what their hands find wants doing.

MAY FLOWER, OR "SERVANT OF ALL."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LITTLE BUTTERCUP," "NOTHING BUT A SONG," "HOW TO ENTER INTO REST," ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

"What then? for all my sins His pardoning grace,
For all my woes and wants His loving-kindness,
In darkest shades, the shining of God's face,
And Christ's own hand to lead me in my blindness."

"The end of it all is, that I know the great God loves me, and all day long I can only look straight up to His heaven, and thank Him for it."

IT was a very bright week when first all the brothers and sisters were together; there were long country rambles to be taken, long talks to be had, much both to see and to hear; but the newness once over, they dropped for the most part back into their quiet ordinary ways.

Not altogether, though, for, before ten days were gone, there were loud exclamations against holidays in general, and against Tom's and May's in particular; "Something must be done with those children!" was Phillis's constant remark.

"Give May lessons in the morning," suggested Stephen, "and she will enjoy her holiday the more in the afternoon."

"Not I!" said Phillis; "I assure you I have quite enough of her at her regular times; I can't be bothered with her now."

Stephen looked surprised for a moment, then answered, "Come, Phillis, we mustn't let those children get into bad ways for want of a little trouble; they have run wild for nearly a fortnight now. If you'll give May two hours every morning, I'll do the same for Tom."

Phillis laughed. "Perhaps I will by-and-by, but let me have a little more holiday first," and so the conversation ended.

It was an unfortunate day. May and Tom quarrelled all the morning—half in fun, half in earnest—and were so noisy at dinner-time, that, after being soundly rebuked by Jem, and utterly refusing to be obedient, they were turned out of the room neck and crop by Stephen.

May burst into tears, Tom into fits of laughter, first at the disaster, then at May. That Tom should turn against her was too much, especially when he had helped to cause all the trouble. She flew at him as she had not done for years, in her rage and mortification, seizing his hair in a frenzy, and screaming at the top of her voice.

"Holloa!" cried Tom, his love of fun and teasing departed, and his quick anger risen. He slipped his foot behind her's, and tripped her up, but her grasp on his hair was too tight, and they fell heavily together, to be picked up by Jem and Stephen, the two sisters standing behind in amazement.

Tom's punishment was quick and summary.

"For shame," cried Jem, "to fight with a girl!" as he dismissed him howling to his own room.

May was desired by Phillis to dispose of herself in the study.

"I shan't, you nasty, horrid, cross thing! I hate you, Phillis; you are as angry as you can be, and pretend you're not!"

"Be silent, May!" thundered Stephen. "Go to the study this moment!" and, for once frightened, she obeyed without any more words.

There, half an hour later, when he went in, Stephen found her in an agony of sobs and tears, curled in one corner of the sofa, with her face hidden.

The passion was all gone; only the remembrance of her great naughtiness was left—the remembrance of all her hopes after a better life; the fear and trouble that it was all in vain.

He left her alone for an hour or more; but there was something appealing in the sobs that still came, and the quiet that followed.

"May," said he.

"Yes," she answered.

And then he went to her.

"May, I can't think what possessed you to behave in such a way: you are worse than ever."

"Oh, Stephen, I don't mean to be, indeed I don't; only somehow I always am bad."

"I wish I could show you, May, how thoroughly in the wrong you put yourself behaving as you do. I will not speak about Tom; you know how far that was your own fault well enough, but I am more surprised than I can say at your behaviour to Phillis."

"Oh, I never shall, I never can get on with her."

"You utterly make a mistake, May. There is never a trifle brought up but you quarrel about it; and I can't see how there is to be any peace in the house. Whatever the occasion, you certainly put yourself in the wrong. You must remember that she is entitled to respect from you, at any rate in speech and conduct. The way you speak of and to her would make any one think she was a perfect shrew. I don't believe you mean it for a moment, but then, you have no business to act as you do. Talk about giving her respect, why, May, you have much more than that to give her. Even if she were as loveless as you seem to think, still, Christian love, is it allowed to exclude any?"

"Oh, Stephen, I didn't mean all that!"

"Why," he went on, in a sort of wonderment, "not care for old Phillis! I never heard of such a thing! You cared for her when she sat up with you night after night last year, and nursed you through the fever, and when she mends all your clothes, and excuses your wild ways to us boys, and looks after you, and saves up that you may go nicely dressed and cared for to see Rosamond, and——"

"Oh, I am so sorry—I am so sorry! Please, Stephen, don't go on. I care for her with all my heart; only I don't know what makes me so naughty to her!"

"It's the same with us all, May; it's the little midge-bites that we can't bear. If anything big comes for us to bear for or from those we love, we lift it manfully; but it's these trifles that upset us. If we could only treat them with the slight notice they deserve, and reserve our forces for what is worth striving for, how different we should all be!"

"I wish I did."

"We shall never do it, May, until we leave off depending on ourselves."

"How do you mean?"

"Just this, we need to give ourselves up to Christ."

"Have you done so, Stephen?"

"I hope so. Yes, I have."

"Will you tell me how you did it?" she asked, as she crept a bit nearer, and did not miss a welcome.

"Why, it is just like this, May: God has promised us salvation, and those who have once heard His voice will never rest till they hear it always. And His salvation is this—first, that we come to Him and receive it, that is, receive the forgiveness of our sins through faith in the blood of Jesus. It is the beginning of all. Just to trust His love that has loved us so much, and to believe that He has cast away our sins from before His face."

"I know that; but what next?"

"Then that we surrender ourselves entirely to Him, to be governed by Him; that we give all into His hands—our pleasures, studies, hopes, fears—all, and leave them with Him; and at the same time that we receive all from Him."

"I don't understand that part of it."

"Receiving from Him? I think it's like this—we are accustomed to depend on ourselves, but we must give that up. We have a little love, a little patience, a little desire, a little kindness, and we want to go and trade with these, and make them more. Now, I fancy, that, instead, we ought just to recognise that there is nothing good or worth anything in us, that we must turn away as much from the good in us as from the bad in us, and depend solely on Christ. 'He is made unto us wisdom, and sanctification, and redemption,' it says. Then let us never expect anything from ourselves; but all, and everything from Christ, in us, and the rest will come."

"But we must see if we are getting on?"

"Don't you remember how it says, in the parable of the seeds and tares, that the man went day and night to see his field, and the seed sprang up, he knew not how? You are always wanting to be at your seed, seeing how it is getting on; just leave it alone, and be busy only with Christ Jesus, and He will take care of the rest."

"Oh, Stephen, I wish I could do that!"

"So you can, child. Just take and use Christ Himself; don't fret and worry about what you have or have not; be busy with Him, all that He is, and the rest will come."

"I hope it will."

"I am sure it will. God is too mighty, and too tender ever to leave a soul that longs for Him unsatisfied. He has a place for you in his heart. I am sure you are there already, and now, live on Christ Jesus, and live for Him."

"It seems so little that I can do."

"Do it very cheerfully, and very well, then. Have you ever heard what Herbert said?—

> 'Lord, place me in Thy concert;
> Give one strain to my poor reed.'

And however broken or bruised you may think your reed, He will neither break nor bruise it, but will train it to harmony; and if, child, you may touch but one chord, but one note on God's great organ, don't ever descend for a moment to pipe a quarrelsome tune on a Jew's-harp. Now I must send you away."

"Oh, Stephen, do tell me have you known all this long!"

"No, not long; but I have found at last that Christ has known me all my life."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

19. Where do we read of the people for the first time debating whether Jesus was their expected Messiah?

20. State the reason why sentence of death was passed upon Adonijah by his brother King Solomon.

21. After the Lord Jesus had fed the five thousand we are told that He "constrained His disciples to get into a ship." What may have been the reason for this?

22. The second prophecy of the Messiah was made to Abraham, and repeated to Isaac and to Jacob. Give chapter and verse.

23. State when for the third time a voice from heaven spoke to the Lord Jesus Christ.

24. What is the first notice we have of Silas? Who accompanied St. Paul after he separated from Barnabas?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 32.

9. See Matt. xvi. 23.

10. Four (Lev. xix. 23—25).

11. Isa. xv. 2.

12. Luke xviii. 12.

13. 1, see Gen. xii. 3; 2, Gen. xvii. 8; 3, Gen. xvii. 16.

14. St. John (vi. 12).

(Drawn by W. R. Buckman.)

THE OLD OAK.

O GREY-KNOTTED oak, with ribbèd trunk,
That, hollowed by time, art now a shell,
Where we in our early days have sunk,
Up-crouching within thy wooden cell;

As there for a while we lingered dry
From storm-driven rain that scudded by.

How gay is the path along thy ledge
When daisies besprinkle all the ground,

And thorns are in bloom along the hedge,
Where lately the woodpecker has found
A bower within her doorway, high
In thee, as the rook is sweeping by.

At night, on the moon-shown path below
Thy head, only men-folk take their way,
Where women, by choice, would only show
Their comelier shapes while shines the day,
And not when thy broken moon-shades lie
Where swiftly the meal-white owl sweeps by.

When flakes of grey moss that thou hast shed
In storms, are all dried by summer heat,
And foot-weary men beneath thy head
Would willingly sit to rest their feet;
Then happy, the while the sun is high,
Is he who beholds my love come by.

EDWARD TURNER, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.

BY AGNES MACDONELL, AUTHOR OF "MARTIN'S VINEYARD."

CHAPTER III.

A HOME IN THE COURT.

"Along the city's street she led the way,
As fair as country maid 'mid mounds of hay."

AND thinking of this made me look at those standing near me. We were close to the benches over which hung a banner with "St. Mary's School, Lambeth," upon it. The children must have walked a good way, and many of them looked tired and pale. I knew they could not get bite or sup till three o'clock. It must have been more of a treat to those who came to see them, and went away in their carriages to dinner, than for those poor little things, I fancy. I was thinking over this while the bishop was preaching; we could see him raise his arm every now and then, but we were too far off to catch a word where we stood. Several of the children near me had gone to sleep, with their little heads laid on their companions' shoulders. All of a sudden there was a movement among the upper row of boys—a little chap had fallen forward, and was being held from the floor by two other boys. One of the policemen who was stationed below came up, and took hold of the child, and begun to haul him by the shoulders down the narrow passage between the lines of seats.

I saw the little chap had fainted. At the same instant, a girl on the opposite side started up, and, after talking a moment or so to a teacher, began to push her way very quietly and quickly down towards us, just at the moment when the boy was brought to the barrier where we stood. I took the boy in my arms, and said to the policeman, "I'll see him to a place behind the scaffolding, and get him a sup of water."

"He'd better be took home," says he, in a whisper. "He lives somewhere in Blackfriars, they say. They're only in the road when they get this way. The young woman belongs to him; she'll take charge of him."

The girl had to cross a space of the reserved seats to reach the place where we stood. I judged by her face she was sister to the boy. I felt a pity for her; for though she was not much more than a child, she was, I saw, old enough to shrink and flush under the stare of all those people.

"What a pretty girl!" said a lady; and a young man put up his eye-glass to look at her. They were not within hearing of the sermon, and so thought, I suppose, they could treat the whole thing as a show, and make what remarks they liked. The girl glanced round a little flurried, but still with a clear brave look in her eyes. They somehow settled on me. Perhaps she read in my face the honest pity I felt for her in my heart at the moment. She spoke to me, as if in answer to my thoughts, and looked up into my face.

"Please take him to the door; he is my brother. The fresh air will bring him round."

I carried him to one of the side doors, and, as there was no other seat, laid him at the foot of one of the great pillars, with his head against my knee. Then she knelt down on the stones, and took his head on her lap, and loosened the stiff collar of his coat; and I ran for a glass of water. When I came back, I found the boy with his eyes open, but looking still very sickly and pale. He drank some of the water, and his sister looked up, and said, "He is getting better. The noise in the church frightened him, and turned him faint. They have given me leave to take him home for the day; he is a boarder at St. Mary's, but I am only a day-scholar, and I live with my aunt in Berner's Street, Blackfriars. Can you walk, Tom?" she says; "it's not far, you know, dear," then she whispered, with a little laugh, to please him—"won't we have a nice holiday together, and you shall have a bun for tea; see if you don't!"

But though he smiled, he seemed weak and tired still, and not ready to walk; and I took him up in my arms, and told her to lead the way, and that I would carry him home. So we went across the flags of the churchyard, and through the crowd of carriages, and along some narrow streets; the girl leading the way. I see her still, as she tripped along, with her white cap and apron, her smiling face turned over her shoulder to give him a kind look from time to time, and looking, I thought, as strange, with her quaint dress, in those London streets, as any bright country flower that had sprung up on the dusty pavement.

She stopped before a dingy-looking house, and opened a door that was only latched, and went in.

"Here's the place, sir," she said; "it 's up-stairs, please—we live on the third storey."

I followed her up the narrow staircase, to a room at the top of the house.

The roof slanted towards one side, and the sunshine came in through the two small windows that looked out on to the chimneys and roofs of other houses.

The room was very neat and clean, though poor-looking. The girl took the child from me, and laid him on the bed; the moment she touched him his arms were about her neck, and I saw he felt more comfortable and at home with her than he had done with me.

"Aunt is out at work just now," she said to me. "Won't she be surprised to find a new bird in the nest!" she said to the boy. "See, I'll get you a cup of tea, Tom, and you'll soon feel better; I'll have it ready in a minute." But he began to cry, and held to her in a weak way, and would not let her leave him.

"If you will tell me where the things are," I said, "and you'll trust me, I'll make the tea while you stay by him. I've often had to make my own tea," I said, "and I know well enough how to do it."

So she sat, and told me where the tea-things were, and where I should find the bread, and the knife to cut it; and, somehow, we got quite friendly over the work; and she chatted away now merrily, partly to cheer the boy, and partly with a sort of knowledge that comes early to some girls, that teaches them what other people feel, and made her wish to set me at my ease, and let me feel at home.

I must have been there over half an hour, I think, before I thought of going; and when the time came for me to go, I could not but stand a moment to watch the two—she dipping the bread into the tea, and feeding him so kindly and carefully, with her arms about him, and his head upon her breast.

I held my hand to say, "Good-bye." "I'll look in to-morrow as I pass, and see how he goes on," I said. "My name is Edward Turner; I'm a carpenter by trade. I'll make you a box," I said to the little fellow, "and bring it you one of these days; see if I don't!"

"You have been so kind to us," the girl said, with a quick bright smile, "and Tom and I are only strangers to you. My name is Barbara—Barbara Milton—we are orphans, and we live with our aunt. Tom 's not strong—never has been since he was a baby—and I was frightened very much when he fainted. It was very kind of you to bring him home!"

CHAPTER IV.

THE ORPHANS.

"Oh, shifting heart, that varies with the wind,
Stand still a moment, knowing duty now,
While I may fetter this inconstant mind,
And have my purpose bonded with a vow."

It has often puzzled me since, to find the reason of the thought that came into my mind at that moment so sudden and strong. It has always been my disposition, since I was a boy, to think a great deal about a thing before I resolved how to act about it, though, when I have considered a thing over, I usually see it all clear, and resolve, without wavering, what I shall do, and when I have once made up my mind, my judgment is not shaken.

Perhaps it was that Barbara's words about their being orphans at that moment came when my heart was softened with the sight of all those children in the church, and only sealed the feeling of pity I had had in thinking of all their helplessness and innocence. But in the moment that I stood with Barbara Milton's hand in mine, I made up my mind, like a vow to God, that I would stand between those children and the world while I drew breath. I felt it, as I say, like a vow to God, and yet I knew no reason for it; and, as I went up the street again, back to the workshop, I wondered why I had taken such a fancy to the two children, and whether I should ever see them again.

I did see them again, though I did not go there often. The few times I went to the Miltons' made me feel very friendly, almost as if I had known them all my life. Barbara's aunt made me welcome, when she found I was a quiet steady-going fellow. Sometimes I dropped in of an evening as I went home from my work, to say "How do you do?" or to leave a toy for the boy, or some such errand. I somehow never forgot the vow I made when I first saw the two children—it lay strong and sound in my heart, and grew deeper till it came to be part of my life, I think.

At the end of two years Charlie Brereton went back to Birchfield to take partnership with his uncle in the shop, but I still stayed on at Smith and Horrock's, and took the place of foreman in the first room. I had never told Charlie about my acquaintance with the Miltons. The fact was, that since he had come to London he had made many friends, and went mostly with them; and when we were together—as sometimes happened—he talked of his own affairs, and I did not say much about mine. Indeed, I think I had a sort of shrinking from telling him about Barbara, perhaps from a fear of what might come if they met—of that which did come afterwards, and which gave me the bitterest thoughts of my life.

I had uneasy thoughts sometimes, too, about his going to Birchfield, wondering how he would behave himself towards Ann; and I felt relieved when I found the letters from Robert said little about it; and then I went down to Birchfield now and again for Sunday. I heard little of his being at the cottage. He was still very friendly with Robert, and was very kind and civil to my mother and Ann. Whatever faults he might have, Charlie Brereton was not proud nor so set up with being his uncle's partner as to make him ashamed of his old friends; it was only that his London experience had filled his mind, and his thoughts were always running on new fancies.

Barbara had left school now for more than a year, and supported herself by needlework; but the boy was still in the Lambeth school. She had grown tall and womanly, but her health suffered from the confinement and late hours she kept over her sewing. I used to think of this a good deal at that time, when I fancied her cheeks looked paler than they should. I used to meet her sometimes on her way to the shop in St. Paul's Churchyard for which she worked, and sometimes, but not very often, I walked a bit of the way with her.

She had put off her white cap and tippet now, and you could see her brown hair knotted up behind; but she still wore plain dark clothes, and always looked as neat and pretty as any lady. I think she always thought of me as if I had been her uncle, or a near relation much older than herself. Sometimes, when I went there of an evening, and sat a while with her and her aunt, she threw off all shyness, and laughed, and talked, and told us about the girls in the shop, or sprang up, and, spreading out her brown dress, minced about the room, imitating the fine lady that was set over the girls in the work-room, and who was hard-hearted, for all her fine airs and soft voice.

The colour used to come to Barbara's cheeks then, and she looked as fresh as a rose. I thought a great deal about her all that time: she seemed the very joy of my life, even then. Spite of the hard work, she was growing up as pure and fresh as a flower in all the dust and smoke of London. But it often troubled me to think of her being so much with the kind of people she was thrown with at the shop where she worked; and for many months I was turning over in my mind schemes for getting her some different kind of employment. She had been taught well at St. Mary's School, and her mind had a natural quickness of its own. She did everything she turned her hand to well and easily. I used to like to watch her at her sewing, to see how she cut and smoothed her work, and how, when she had done, she gathered up the ends, and tidied all about her, leaving every place the fresher and the neater for her having been there.

One evening, about this time, as I came home from work, I took up a newspaper, and read an advertisement about a class of young women who were to be trained as telegraphers. The girls had to spend a year in the office, until they had learned the art, and were then to be promoted to small stations, or to places as under-clerks at a terminus, and receive wages. "A lady," the advertisement said, "was at the head of this office, whose chief interest was to supply new lines of industry to the better educated class of young women seeking employment in London, and who were for the most part forced, through necessity, into the already over-crowded ranks of needlewomen."

I thought this all over for a day or so, but I was very much puzzled to know what to do. I knew that Barbara's present employment was bad; the hours were long, and the wages poor, and the company of some of the other work-girls far from good; but then I knew nothing about the telegraphing work, nor anybody who could tell me about it. Still, the words of the advertisement were always running in my head, when I was at my work even, and there was something about the wording of it that made me feel respect and liking for the person that wrote it.

(To be continued.)

THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

I.—THE WORD OF INTERCESSION.

"Then said Jesus, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."—LUKE xxiii. 34.

WE visit Calvary—the place around which the most sacred and sublime associations gather—the place of all places which we love in memory and imagination to frequent, sanctified, as it is for ever, by the event which transpired there more than eighteen centuries ago. We visit Calvary now, not merely that we may gaze upon the uplifted cross, and behold the Divine Sufferer, but that we may listen to the last words of Jesus, the dying utterances of our Divine Redeemer, which we may regard as among the most significant words of Him who spake as man never spake. And surely, if the last words which have been whispered into our ears by earthly friends in the moment of death are shrined in our heart's inmost sanctuary, and held as a possession ever dear; these last words of Christ, uttered from the cross, and in the midst of inexpressible agonies endured on our account—words full of tenderness and love—surely these will be treasured as inexpressibly and everlastingly precious by us all! The longer and more devoutly we ponder these final utterances of Christ, the more does His wonderful character unfold itself to our view; the more beauty do we discern to admire; the more majesty to reverence; and the more of that deep and exhaustless love wherewith our weary souls may refresh themselves.

We have on the pages of the world's history the record of many remarkable deaths: of men who were martyrs to some great truth, some high and noble principle, but we have no death like this. By such men in their dying moments have been uttered many memorable words, but no words like these last words of Jesus. We need not wonder that from a Roman soldier, who witnessed this scene, and listened to these words, there was extorted the confession, "Certainly this was a righteous man;" or that an infidel should have made the singular acknowledgment, "If Socrates lived and died like a philosopher, Christ lived and died like a God."

What words could more remarkably and beautifully express Christ's character than these words of merciful and High-priestly intercession, which He offered up for His murderers when first extended on the cross, or, more probably, while they were actually affixing Him to it? There He is, not only tied but nailed to the cross; lifted up a spectacle for men to mock at; the subject of bodily torture the most extreme; the object of indignity and reviling the most brutal; and His first words are not words spoken in defence of Himself or accusation of others, not words of defiance or imprecation, but He fulfils the ancient prophecy—He makes intercession for the transgressors. He carries out His own injunction—praying for them who were despitefully using and persecuting Him. He offers up this prayer for his murderers:—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

As we listen to these words, our attention is arrested by the petition presented, and not less by the plea by which it was sustained.

I.

The petition presented. "Then"—probably while they were actually fastening Him to the cross, or lifting Him up on it—"then," when His sense of the indignity offered to Him must have been most keen, and His physical agony most intense, He said, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

A remarkable, indeed a quite unexampled prayer this, in whatever light it is regarded.

Think who were the objects of this prayer, who were interested in it! They were men who were engaged in the commission of a crime of unparalleled atrocity, who were crucifying the Son of God, the Lord of Glory, and putting Him to an open shame. A crime which, in its hideousness and atrocity, seems marked off from all others, towering darkly above them all—the world's everlasting reproach. Everything seems to conspire to aggravate and intensify this, the crowning sin of humanity; and, as now, after the lapse of ages, we read the terrible record, we wonder not that the earth should have trembled in sympathy with the Divine Sufferer, or that the heavens should have been arrayed as with sackcloth.

Think WHO was the object of this virulent animosity! The victim who suffers from all this rancour, malignity, pitiless persecution, is One of unblemished reputation, of pure and spotless life, of boundless benevolence, One who has come forth upon an errand of love and mercy. Yes, the one instance of moral perfection ever presented to the world is the one around whom, on Calvary, eighteen centuries since, there surged and roared that terrible sea of passion and sin. And it was the very moral superiority of Christ, the very purity of His principles, which awakened the animosity which there so fatally expressed itself. Had He been of the world—of kindred spirit and aim—the world would have recognised and loved its own. But because He was not of the world, but altogether nobler, truer, purer, and because that character, so noble and pure, was a standing rebuke of the world's sin, therefore the world hated Him. It has been well said, "The crucifixion of Christ was the realisation of that dark anticipation of heathenism which Plato had already expressed, where he makes Glaucus say to Socrates, that a perfectly righteous man, if he were to appear upon the earth, would certainly be loaded with chains, scourged, tortured, and, after having borne all this, crucified."

And the murderers of Christ—those for whom this prayer was offered—put no limit upon the expression of their hatred; there was no mercy mingling with their malignity; they exhausted their ingenuity in devising means of increasing suffering and deepening degradation. And yet for these men does Christ pray—not that swift and fiery vengeance might visit and consume them; not that the earth might yawn and swallow them; not that they might bear upon their brow the brand of eternal infamy, or carry about in their souls the abiding remembrance of this deed, which should be within them as the burning of an inextinguishable fire, or the gnawing of an undying worm. No! But wonder, O heavens, and be ye astonished, O earth! His prayer is—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

As we listen to this prayer we should try and realise what is involved in this one word, forgiveness; the prayer is, not merely that these men, so depraved, so prejudiced, so cruel, so resolutely set on imbruing their hands in innocent blood, should not be visited with the punishment which by their sins they were invoking—that alone would have been a great boon. But Christ prays that they may be restored to a state of purity and blessedness; that they who were engaged in putting Him to death might enjoy that pardon which could only reach men through the cross; that they might, being justified by His blood, and sanctified by His spirit, sit down with Him in that kingdom the way to which He Himself was. How can we measure the love which thus leads Christ to pray that the very men who were putting Him to a cruel and ignominious death may share all the privileges of an endless life?

What light does this prayer shed upon Christ's invariable character and purpose as the Redeemer of men!—a character and purpose of love, the expression of which cannot be hindered by any stress of outward circumstances. Hostile rejection of offered service, and malignant aspersion of character, have turned many patriots and philanthropists from the path of benevolence, and led them to retire in cynical seclusion from the world. But nothing of this kind have we in Christ, as these words of merciful intercession, uttered in the most trying circumstances, attest. Christ's character, Christ's purposes cannot alter; and it is a blessed thing for us that it is so. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

And this prayer must not be viewed as a special, an isolated expression of Christ's love. It is in perfect harmony with the whole life of Christ. It was that men might be forgiven that Christ came into our world. This was the master-passion of His soul; on accomplishing the Divine purpose of saving man His heart was set, and He was straitened till this was accomplished. By no ingratitude, by no misrepresentation, by no persecution, can He be turned aside from His work; He can hear unmoved, save by pity, that shout, drowning every other shout, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" and extended there upon the cross, in agony which may not be described, He can utter these words of merciful intercession, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." The very malignity of men of which He is the object, the very cruelty from which He suffers, so far from turning Him aside from the work in which He had engaged, presented themselves to Him but as symptoms of that dire disease for which He was providing the remedy. Man was never more clearly seen to need a Divine Saviour than at the very time that Saviour was suffering for man's sin. There, side by side, we see the disease in all its raging and terrible malignity, and there the Divine remedy which is to work a lasting and complete cure. And shall we wonder that Christ, on the cross, prayed for the accomplishment of that which He died to render possible! The more fully we realise the significance of this prayer, the more clearly do we see how perfectly it consists with the great purpose of Christ's life, and the great desire of His heart.

When viewed in connection with the circumstances of the case, it must occur to us as singularly appropriate that such a prayer should be offered at such a time. In Christ we see not only the atoning Lamb, the all-sufficient Sacrifice, but we see One who was at once priest and victim; and so, while offering the blood of atonement, He intercedes as the great and prevalent High Priest—as though, in thus seeking the salvation and forgiveness of the greatest sinners, He would convince the world of the fact that His blood can "cleanse from all sin."

The primary reference of these words was to those who were more or less directly implicated in the death of Christ, and all those who by word or deed were adding to His sufferings; and it is pleasant to think that many of those for whom Christ prayed, did experience the blessing of forgiveness not long after. The prayer of the prevailing Intercessor was answered. Almost while He was yet speaking He was heard. One transgressor on a neighbouring cross, who had scarcely ceased from reviling Him, is led to cry for mercy, and is at once snatched as a brand from the burning. There was a Roman soldier so impressed by what he saw and heard, that he cried out, "Truly this was the Son of God!" In the minds of the people at large there seems to have been some strange revulsion of feeling, for we read that "all the people who came together smote upon their breasts and returned." And we know that within a few weeks from the period of the crucifixion more than eight thousand were converted to the faith of the Crucified One. But while this prayer had primary reference to those who were then congregated around the cross, we fail to apprehend its complete significance till we regard it as really covering the case of all who need forgiveness.

In offering this prayer, we see Christ teaching us the practical lesson of Christian forgiveness. Christ always teaches by example. He lived the religion which He preached. He never bade His followers do what He was unwilling or unprepared to do Himself. He goes before us in all things, leaving us an example that we should follow in His steps. The duty of forgiving our enemies, of doing good to and praying for those who despitefully use us and persecute us, is one of the distinguishing precepts of Christianity—a duty of which men never dreamed before Christ's advent, one which is perhaps the hardest of all practical duties to discharge—a duty the obligation of which men are still very unwilling to admit. Here, then, we have this distinctively Christian duty practically enforced—this principle thoroughly carried out. The precept of Christ is, "Pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you;" and here, while hanging on the cross, or even while, in the midst of a mocking multitude, He was being attached to it, we hear the Saviour lifting up His voice in prayer for His enemies, and saying, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

It was a new thing to hear love to enemies enjoined as a duty, and forgiveness of injury insisted on as an essential condition of Christian life. Yes, it is one of the triumphs of the cross, that mercy, however slowly, is really supplanting vindictive revenge. You may search through the entire treasury of Pagan literature, but you will find nothing which will compare with these words of our greatest poet, whose lamp, in this instance at least, was kindled at the sacred fire:—

"The quality of mercy is not strain'd;
It droppeth, as the gentle rain from heaven,
Upon the place beneath; it is twice bless'd,—
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes;
'Tis mightiest in the mightiest: it becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown;
His sceptre shows the force of temporal power,
The attribute to awe and majesty,
Wherein doth sit the dread and fear of kings;
But mercy is above this sceptred sway—
It is enthroned in the hearts of kings;
It is an attribute to God himself;
And earthly power doth then show likest God's,
When mercy seasons justice."

This is just one of many passages in our literature which could not have been written or conceived had Christ not lived and died. Let it ever be remembered by us that it is at the cross of Christ, which affords the surest ground of our hope, that we shall be forgiven; that we have urged upon us, in the most impressive and emphatic way, the duty of forgiveness—of even loving our enemies, and praying for them who despitefully use us and persecute us.

II.

But we must consider not only the petition which was presented, but also the prayer by which it was sustained—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." The prevailing efficacy of this prayer is to be attributed to the circumstance that it was offered by Christ who had condescended to the death of the cross. It is as though he said—"I have died for them; I am now in painfulness and agony dying for them. Father, forgive them for whom I die; lay not even this sin to their charge; I die that they may be saved—that thou mightest be just and yet the justifier of all who believe in Me."

But this appeal was associated with a plea of extenuation urged in behalf of those for whom the prayer was offered, "They know not what they do.'

Some have attempted to explain these words by limiting their reference to the Roman soldiers, who, not knowing what they did, rendered a merely blind and mechanical obedience to military authority. The words cannot fairly be made to refer exclusively to them; and to whomsoever they may refer, they cannot be regarded as more than slightly excusing the sin which they were committing. It is not easy to determine how far those who were associated in securing Christ's death could plead ignorance. The Roman soldiers were probably most ignorant, and therefore—save as they indulged in unnecessary cruelty—most innocent. But all classes of the Jews were occupying an essentially different and worse position. Their presence at the cross was voluntary, and they themselves had brought about the consummation which they came forth to witness. Though they may not have been, and actually were not, satisfied that Jesus was the Messiah, the Lord of Glory, for had they known that, we are told, they would not have crucified Him, yet they must have known and felt that He was unjustly condemned. And knowing that the charge against Him was false and malicious, and regarding Him only as an innocent man, it is impossible too strongly to reprobate the conduct of those who were present at the cross, and who, by their presence, assisted at the crucifixion. Still, however, it remains true that they knew not that in crucifying Jesus they were crucifying the Christ of God.

"They know not what they do." These words seem to shadow forth a dark possibility—though it is not affirmed, the idea cannot but occur to us—that had they known all that was involved in the crime which they were perpetrating—all about the real character of Him against whom their malignity was directed, forgiveness might have been impossible, a thing not be to be asked for. But as they knew not this—as this evil work was wrought in ignorance and unbelief—the Intercessor feels that theirs is a sin which may be prayed for, and His word is, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do: however guilty, at least they know not this, that they are crucifying Thy Son."

These words have a permanent significance; they are not to be ranked with the utterances of the illustrious dead, but regarded as the abiding words of the ever-living Saviour. Still, if we will but listen for His voice, we may hear the great Intercessor pleading, not only for His friends, but also for His enemies. He, when His bodily presence was withdrawn from this world, did not intermit His mediatorial work, He merely passed from the outer court, where the sacrifice is wont to be offered, and where He had offered sacrifice once for all, to the temple's inmost shrine, the holiest of holies, where, on the ground of that once-offered sacrifice, and arrayed in the robes of a once humiliated but now glorified human nature, He ever liveth to make intercession both for saints and sinners. Yes, from that glorious height, as once from Calvary's cross, does the Divine Saviour look down, with sad and pitiful eyes and yearning heart, upon those who, in innumerable ways, are still sinning against Him, crucifying Him afresh, putting Him to an open shame; and in their behalf does He pour forth the words of merciful intercession—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER IX.

WHEN the corn had been cut and housed, the school-children received a fortnight's holiday that they might help their mothers to lease or glean the farmers' fields. Eda had long resolved to avail herself of this opportunity for paying Mark an unexpected visit, but Mr. Texley went to the seaside without remembering that her salary was in arrears, and she was forced to postpone her trip, and put up with the disappointment as patiently as she could.

However, she enjoyed the season of rest, and on more than one deliciously soft lazy day, carried her book and her work to a favourite spot on the bank of the river, about a mile from the gardener's cottage. There was no fear of being intruded upon, for though the path on this side the stream was a public one, it was too far from the village to be much used; and very few feet besides Eda's had trodden it that summer. The noble domain of the Earl of Chessington sloped down to the river on the opposite side, and she never wearied of admiring the fine clumps of trees that dotted the green sward, and were now putting on their autumn tints of orange and crimson. The deer would sometimes come to drink of the cool waters, or gambol beside them, unconscious that any one was near, for Eda had found herself a seat on the roots of an old willow that overhung the stream, where she was hidden from every eye by the long pendent boughs, and, what was of more consequence, nicely sheltered from the sun.

A bend of the stream concealed the ruined mill of which the artist who travelled with her from London had spoken, but the rush of the waters over the mill-dam was a pleasant sound on the still September air; and her book was often laid down, that she might listen, and indulge in the train of thought her pleasant solitude evoked.

Sitting there one afternoon, she saw a female figure come lightly dancing down the green slope on the opposite side of the river—a sight so unusual that Eda put aside the leaves of her bower, and leaned forward to get a better view of the stranger. A young girl with an arch, laughing face, not positively pretty, but full of mirth and espiéglerie, was in pursuit of a favourite dog, that had escaped from the silken leash in which she had held it; and as she bounded along the sward, the unseen observer of her graceful movements recognised in her the Earl's only daughter and heiress, the Honourable Eudora Chesney.

Eda had frequently seen this young lady at church, and sometimes been favoured with a smiling glance from her bright eyes, as she passed down the aisle, trying to accommodate her quick steps to the more sober pace of her mother, a pleasant but stately matron, to whom she did not bear the smallest resemblance. She was more like the Earl, to whom she was passionately attached. And more than once Eda had seen the father and daughter cantering through the village, or dashing across the common beyond, at full gallop, Lady Eudora leaping the ditches and hedges that came in the way so fearlessly, that she was divided betwixt admiration of her beauty and courage, and some distaste of what she considered an unfeminine proceeding.

Singing as she went, the young lady chased her canine favourite till it grew tired of the sport, and came fawning and leaping about her feet. Then she threw herself down on the grass to play with the little creature; and as she tossed off the Dolly Varden hat that had shaded her forehead, and displayed the rich clusters of her fair hair, that she wore simply tied back with a ribbon, Eda recognised the original of the sketch the artist told her he had been at so much pains to procure.

Feeling that it was scarcely right to watch the young lady any longer, Eda picked up her work, and tried to busy herself with it; but she could not resist an occasional peep at the spot, somewhat higher up the stream, where Lady Eudora was now amusing herself by flinging a stick into the water, and inciting her pet to swim out and fetch it. The dog required a great deal of coaxing and urging before he would do this, but his mistress was positive, and sent him in again and again, laughing like a gleeful child when her muslin dress was plentifully besprinkled with the drops he shook from his curly coat.

Then Eda bent her head over her work, and stitched on busily, till disturbed by a cry of distress, when, looking up, she saw the dog in the middle of the stream, yelping piteously, and making feeble efforts to regain the bank.

In great distress at her favourite's plight, Lady Eudora flew to the nearest tree, and broke off a long branch, with which she walked right into the water, extending it to the poor little creature, and encouraging him to cling to it. But every moment the current bore him further from her, and in leaning forward to urge him to fresh efforts she contrived to overbalance herself, and to Eda's horror sank beneath the water.

She rose instantly, and had sufficient presence of mind to throw back her head and put in practice a few faint recollections of a swimming lesson or two received at one of the watering-places; but the weight of her clothes impeded her, and the face that Eda had seen a few minutes earlier blooming with health and hope, was now so white and despairing, that it was terrible to behold.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"Inciting her pet to run out and fetch it."—p. 72.

With the exception of that one cry of distress, wrung from her by the danger of the dog, she had not uttered a shriek. Perhaps she knew that it would be useless, for what help was within reach of her voice? Her father's splendid mansion was nearly a mile away from the river, the village was more than twice the distance, and not a labourer nor gardener was at work on this part of the estate.

Eda started to her feet as soon as she saw what had happened, and her first impulse was to fly towards Jones's cottage, where alone there was the smallest chance of obtaining assistance; but she had not gone half a dozen steps ere she remembered that long before she could get there and return Lady Eudora would have been borne to the mill-dam by the resistless current.

In an agony of doubt and apprehension she wrung her hands, and ran back to the tree. The hapless young lady was now within a few feet of one of the huge limbs that lay above the water; and, not daring to stay to think what had best be done, lest the opportunity for doing should be lost, Eda climbed into the willow, and crawling as near the end of the branch as she dared, stooped down to clutch the floating hair of the sinking girl as she went by.

Lady Eudora looked up, saw the face that bent towards her own, and involuntarily raised her arms, ejaculating an eager "Save me, save me!" Then there was a rush of water in her ears—a strange eddying sound—that robbed her of her senses, and for a little while she was only conscious that friendly hands had been extended towards her, and that she had failed to grasp them.

When she did overcome the faintness that oppressed her, she found that she was still under the boughs of the willow, held there by the young girl, a glimpse of whose features had aroused within her the hope of being rescued.

"Then you have saved me!" she ejaculated, hysterically. "How good of you! how shall I thank you for it?"

But Eda did not answer, for Lady Eudora's position—and her own also—was more perilous than the young lady imagined. She had succeeded in drawing the drowning girl out of the current that was hurrying her towards the mill-pool; but in doing so she had herself slipped from the branch to which she was now clinging with one hand, whilst with the other she supported her companion in danger. When Eudora was more composed, she explained this to her, and urged her to grasp the branch and try to climb on to it, hoping to be able to do the same herself; yet, simple though the feat would have been to a practised gymnast, neither of these girls could accomplish it. The branch bent lower and lower when they attempted it, but their strained arms refused to raise them, weighed down as they were with their drenched skirts, and Eudora was the first to recognise that they could not reach dry land without assistance.

"It is no use exhausting ourselves with these efforts," she said; "we must be content to wait till some one comes along the path, or till we are missed and sought for."

"That will scarcely be before nightfall," whispered Eda, uneasily recalling the fact that Mrs. Jones had gone with her husband to make some purchases at the market town, and would not return sooner.

"No one will know where to look for me," sighed Lady Eudora. "Mamma will think I have shut myself up in my room because she lectured me, and the servants never trouble themselves about my wanderings. Oh, for the sound of a footstep, that we might not feel ourselves so utterly alone and forgotten! How long shall we retain strength enough to cling here?"

"I am afraid to ask myself that question," Eda replied; "my hands feel numbed already. If we could get near the bank, perhaps the water would be shallower, and we could wade to shore. Shall we try?"

But Lady Eudora negatived this proposal. She had been here with her father fishing too often not to know that one of the deepest pools where the trout lay was under this willow, and that their only chance of safety was in the branch.

"We must wait," she cried; "surely some one will come to our aid before long! We cannot be doomed to die such a hideous death as this! I would not care so much if we could do anything towards helping ourselves," and she gazed around impatiently.

"We can pray," said Eda; "don't let us forget that we are in God's keeping."

There was a short silence, broken by the earl's daughter wishing half aloud that her last act ere she quitted the house had not been to displease her mother.

"And papa, poor papa—always so indulgent and loving—how will they tell him he has lost me! What will he do and say when he hears that I am dead—drowned in these cold treacherous waters? He will grieve dreadfully; oh, dreadfully!"

She began sobbing with such violence, that Eda put aside her own fears to cheer and soothe her.

"We must not give up hope yet. Some of the reapers or the gleaners may come this way when they leave the corn-fields.

"It is not at all likely, for there are no cottages near here. There cannot be a lonelier spot on the river than this," Eudora answered; but still she was comforted a little by the suggestion, and presently made another. "If we were to raise our voices, and call out as loudly as we could on one highly-pitched note, we might make some one hear us; the air is so still that the sound would travel far, and might attract attention."

Eda assented, and the attempt was made; but her voice was low and hoarse with fatigue and terror; and Eudora, after one or two efforts, broke into another fit of weeping. "It is of no use; no one hears us; no one will come; and we might as well let go and drop into the stream at first as at last. It must be the end; it must; I am certain of it!"

"Hush," said Eda, "you are talking foolishly. Is not your life precious to others? for their sakes be patient and hopeful. We are not alone, nor forgotten," and her own lips moved in silent but earnest supplication; for, friendless orphan though she was, existence was almost as sweet to her as it was to the impatient heiress, who rebelled against the agony of suspense they were both enduring.

"But I cannot pray—I cannot think of what I ought to do or say;" gasped Lady Eudora, "I can think only of papa and how dreadful it is that he should be so near, and yet not know how badly I want him. Why did you stop me when I was being hurried away by the current? If you had left me alone it would have been all over by this time. Oh, papa, papa, help me, help me!"

But the shrill passionate wail elicited no reply. The Earl and Countess of Chessington were leisurely driving home at that moment from a visit to a neighbour, chatting pleasantly about the weather and the crops, and little dreaming that their only child was in such peril.

Again Eda would have spoken comfort to her companion, but she felt physically incapable. The water, always cold in this pool, where the sun never came, was gradually depriving her of all sensation. An icy chill crept higher and higher, till her lips were blue, her face white and pinched, and she began to lose all sense both of fear and pain, though her stiffened fingers mechanically retained their hold on the willow.

"Hark!" cried Eudora, whose cries had ceased at last, "What's that?"

Even Eda roused herself a little to listen. It was some one whistling a popular air, and the sound came from the direction of the park, growing fainter and fainter, however, with every moment, as if the person who whistled was walking rapidly from instead of towards the river.

"It is Mr. Allonby, and he has been sketching at the mill!" the young lady exclaimed. "Oh, to be able to make him hear us!"

She shrieked again and again, in the hope of attracting attention; then, with a burst of her former impatience, declared that it was useless—useless. "He is too far away; or if my voice has reached his ears," she went on, "he would only fancy that it was some child screaming to its companions. There is no hope—no hope!"

But even as she moaned these words some one was heard demanding, "Who called?" and a young man emerged from the shadow, of the trees and walked rapidly towards the river.

CHAPTER X.

ALWAYS impetuous—whether in her joys or sorrows—Lady Eudora Chesney passed instantly from the blankest despair to the most rapturous delight. Calling the new-comer Mr. Allonby, she entreated him to hasten to her assistance, yet in the same breath forbade him to attempt to swim the river, lest he too should get into danger. There was a bridge, she reminded him, about half a mile higher up: yet as soon as she had told him this her more selfish fears predominated, and in the most pitiful accents she prayed him not to go away, lest she should be forced to relinquish her hold before he could return.

While she was vehemently pouring forth these contradictory directions, Mr. Allonby had thrown off his coat and vest; but while stooping to take off his boots, he perceived that her ladyship was not alone, and also that her companion appeared to be the most in need of immediate assistance.

"Keep quiet, and hold on firmly," he shouted to her; "there is a skiff in the boat-house just above, I will bring it to you as quickly as I can."

Away he sped, and with the sound of his retreating footsteps Eudora's spirits again sank.

"It will take him at least a quarter of an hour to fetch the skiff," she murmured; "must I wait all that time? Oh, I cannot, I cannot! I can feel the water lapping round my knees and sucking me away. And you, my poor girl, you look as if you were dying. Ten minutes! he might be back in ten minutes, but who can wait patiently so long as that? If he does not make haste I shall lose my senses. Ah me! ah me! why did I let him go? If the skiff should not be there, or the boat-house locked, or he should let anything else delay him, what will become of us?"

In this frantic manner she continued to bewail herself, and conjure up horrors, till the steady fall of oars converted her fears once more into rejoicings. A little while, and the rower impelled the boat under the willow, and would have made Lady Eudora his first care, but her native generosity now came into play, and she insisted that Eda should be placed in safety before herself, saying, "She risked her life for mine, and she is weaker than I am."

"For which very reason," replied Mr. Allonby, in tones as decided as her own, "you will let me help you into the skiff, and then you can assist me with your friend;" and Lady Eudora yielding the point, both girls were soon extricated from their awkward and dangerous position.

Eda sank down in the bottom of the boat more dead than alive, and Mr. Allonby checked the transports of her companion by pointing to her wan features and utter exhaustion. "Your friend, Lady Eudora, must be put in to a warm bed as quickly as possible. You can row, can you not?"

"Yes; but I do not feel fit for the exertion just now," she answered, with a shiver.

"I dare say not, but it will do you good. As soon as we have crossed to the other bank, I shall leave you to pull up the stream as far as the boat-house, while I run to the house for blankets and an arm-chair. Who is this young lady? Her face is familiar to me."

"I do not know anything about her, except that she is the bravest girl in the world, and saved me from being swept into the mill-pool. Ah yes, I do know who she is! I remember now. Her name is Granton, and she is schoolmistress to the children on Mr. Texley's estate. I have often seen her at church."

Before her explanation was finished, Mr. Allonby had given her the sculls, leaped out, and was running across the park at his utmost speed. His grave glance at the half insensible Eda had made Lady Eudora anxious too, and as soon as she had reached the spot indicated, and drawn the skiff ashore, she knelt down and chafed the sufferer's cold hands.

Eda tried to thank her, and make a coherent reply to her kindly inquiries, but her mind seemed benumbed as well as her body. She felt like one in a dream while she was being carried to Chessington House—catching a glimpse, as she was borne across the hall, of Eudora clasped in the arms of her parents—undressed by careful hands, and laid in a downy bed, where, after tossing about for several hours, feverish with pain, and every limb aching intolerably, she sank into a dreamless and refreshing sleep.

It was some days before Eda lost these pains, and was able to leave her bed for the couch that was brought into the room, and placed in the sunniest window, for her use. During this period she saw no one but the servant in attendance upon her, the doctor who had been sent for as soon as she was brought to the Park, and Lady Chessington, who came two or three times every day, to bring her fruit and flowers, and sit for a few minutes beside her, talking in a soft motherly fashion, that often made Eda's heart thrill with sad memories, and her eyes fill with tears. The countess's manner was ordinarily stiff and reserved, but she was very grateful to the young girl who had done her best to preserve the life of her child—the saucy wilful daughter who vexed and thwarted her continually, but was very dear to her heart for all that—and Eda was too refined and lady-like to presume upon the increasing kindness with which she was treated.

"Eudora is very anxious to be allowed to see you, my dear," Lady Chessington said one morning, when she found her patient sitting up and looking really stronger and better; "I would not let her come to you before, as I was afraid she would talk you into a return of your feverish symptoms; but if you think a visit from her would not be too much for you——"

"I should be delighted to see her!" cried Eda, who began to find the seclusion of a sick-room monotonous—"delighted to see her before I go back to Mrs. Jones's cottage, which I think I am almost well enough to do now."

"Almost is not quite," smiled the countess; "I have written to Mr. Texley to tell him that you are with us, and that we do not intend to part with you until your doctor pronounces you thoroughly recovered."

"You are very good to me, madam, but the school ought to be re-opened this week, and I feel anxious to be there."

"Are you then so very fond of teaching A B C?" she was asked, with a smile.

"I do not like it at all," Eda frankly confessed; "but it is my duty, and I try to do it as well as I can."

"And a very oppressive duty you find it if I may judge from the gravity of the look you are putting on; am I not right, my dear?"

"Not quite, madam"—for Eda had often thought she could have been very happy at the school if she had been cheered by the satisfaction of her employer—"but I had rather not talk of this, if your ladyship will excuse me."

Still the countess seemed disposed to persevere. "I know already that Mr. Texley is not satisfied with the working of his new system," she observed, with a penetrating look that made Eda's pale cheek glow; but she bravely resisted a longing to defend herself, and was rewarded the next minute by hearing Lady Chessington say, "Perhaps you would like to know who was my informant; and when I tell you that it was Miss Texley, to whom I wrote concerning you, I suppose you can guess that I have heard a very fair statement of facts."

Eda's face cleared again, and the countess laid her hand kindly on her head. "Try and content yourself here a little longer. I do not like to form plans too hastily, and there is always a risk to be run in removing a person from the position she fills well to a more difficult or at least a more onerous one.

The countess paused, although she must have seen that Eda was perplexed, and waiting with some anxiety to hear her explain herself.

"I will send Eudora to you," was all she said; "do not let her do as I have been doing, talk to you too much. I think Morris shall bring you your lunch before you hold another reception."

It was therefore an hour or even more before Eda's solitude was enlivened by the visit of the earl's beautiful daughter, the gay bright young creature whom, ever since she had been staying at Chessington Park, she had been learning to regard as one of the happiest and most fortunate of girls. She was now about to learn how far she was correct in her conclusions.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 5. Persecutions.

Chapter to be read—Acts iv. 1—31.

INTRODUCTION. Ask what warning Christ has given to His disciples about what they must expect from their enemies. (John xv. 19, 20; xvi. 1—4.) What miracle had two apostles worked? Did that give offence? But in whose name was the cure effected, and what had the apostles done afterwards? What other similar sermon had been preached? on what day and with what effect? Remind how it was foretold that the Gospel should be preached to the poor. (Is. lxii. 2.) They heard gladly; whence then did opposition come? We shall see.

I. The Apostles Examined. (Read ver. 1—12.) Question the children as to who disliked the preaching of the apostles, and why. (a) The priests, full of envy at any persons setting up to be teachers of the people, usurping their office, and especially unlearned fishermen. (b) The ruler of the Temple, afraid of a disturbance which might bring him into trouble. Where did the miracle and sermon take place? (c) The Sadducees: let the children name other occasions where their disbelief of the Resurrection comes under notice. (See Matt. xxii. 23, and Acts xxiii. 8.) These now all combined against apostles. What did they do to them? Fancy the shame of being led through the streets of the capital as prisoners! did it have the effect of stopping converts? What were the numbers now? What happened the next day? When had this Council of the Jews (or Sanhedrim) met before? Remind how Peter and John had both been present at that trial in the High Priest's house; how the remembrance of Christ's patience would inspire them with the like. Picture the meeting of the Council—the High Priest in robes of office presiding, the seventy elders sitting round in a circle, the two apostles in the midst. What were they asked? Could not dispute the fact of the miracle, only inquire into its origin. How had Peter behaved at the last trial? Who had questioned him there, and how had he answered? What caused the difference? What had been given to him which gave him boldness? (Matt. x. 19, 20.) Now notice Peter's answer. It contained (a) A confession of faith. What a contrast to his former denial of Christ! What did Christ promise to those who confessed Him before men? (Luke xii. 8.) Notice the unflinching testimony to Jesus Christ the Nazarene. (b) A bold rebuke. How would a prisoner generally feel before his judges? Why was not Peter afraid? Show how he also quotes from their own Scriptures to condemn them (ver. 11), and boldly preaches salvation through Christ alone in the very Council.

II. The Apostles Threatened. (Read 13—22). Notice the effect of bold speaking. Who had so often rebuked the rulers, scribes, &c.? So they recognise these as Jesus' disciples—animated by same spirit of boldness and patience combined. What a testimony to the apostles! Could the Council doubt the reality of the miracle? Why not? How old was the man? How long had he been lame? All this made the cure more wonderful; so they charge them not to speak or teach in this name above every other name (Phil. ii. 9, 10). How did the apostles answer? Did they consult together? take thought how to answer? Why not necessary? Could give but one answer: "Have a message to give, which must be given at all risks!"

III. The Apostles Rejoicing. (Read 13—31). Picture the apostles leaving the Council, a crowd of new converts following, holy joy and thankfulness beaming in their faces; the young John supporting the elderly Peter, their arrival at the house, the joyful meeting and congratulations, the questions and answers. What is their first impulse to do? Picture Peter leading the prayer, the rest joining, probably standing (See Luke xviii. 11, 13). Notice the prayer. It contains—(a) An acknowledgement of God, His power, His eternal will (v. 28), the truth of His Scriptures, the fulfilment of prophecy (v. 27). (b) A prayer for boldness in preaching: What might they have asked for? Knew, however, that they were not to expect freedom from persecution, must share sufferings of Christ. In whose name do they ask? (c) The answer. Remind of prophecy of immediate answer while yet speaking (Is. lxv. 24).

IV. Lessons. (1) Boldness. Children not likely to be in just such circumstances; still sometimes called upon to be derided for Christ, e. g., when laughed at at school for reading Bible or saying prayers—see benefit of firm answer; must do right; obey God. (2). Communion with Christ. Whence did apostles get their boldness? Jesus the same ever. How can we be with Jesus? May "seek Him early," in prayer, in His word, in His communion feast. None who so seek sent away empty.

Questions to be answered.

1. Name places speaking of persecution for Christ's sake.
2. Who composed the Council? Say anything you can about them.
3. Describe Peter's answer to the Council.
4. What charge was given the Apostles? Did they observe it?
5. Give an account of their prayer when released.
6. What lessons may we learn?

XUM

MAY FLOWER, OR "SERVANT OF ALL."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LITTLE BUTTERCUP," "NOTHING BUT A SONG," "HOW TO ENTER INTO REST," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

"Nor, thankful when it pleaseth me,
As if thy blessings had spare days,
But such a heart, whose pulse shall be thy praise."

"It is ever my thought that the most God-fearing man should be the most blythe man."—MRS. R. MAITLAND.

MAY was glad to find Phillis alone, at work, and very busy. She only waited a few moments to beg her pardon, and then joined Geraldine, whom she saw in the garden.

"Gerrie, may I help with your gardening?"

"Yes, come along. Do you mind running down to the tool-shed for me? There is some matting there that I want for tying up these carnations, and my little trowel."

May ran off; the tool-house was some way from the flower-garden. She had to run through the fields down to the large kitchen-garden. She found what was needed, and returned, and the two sisters spent a busy, happy time together.

Then Gerrie's quick fingers gathered bunches of flowers, and made the whole house sweet and pretty with them.

After some time, May asked, "Where is Tom?"

"Gone out with Jem," answered Geraldine. "They have gone for some fishing, and then are going up to the Lincolns. There is some talk of Frank Lincoln and Jem going for a walking tour."

"Going for a walking tour! Where?"

"Either to Wales or Scotland. Frank is going, and Mr. Lincoln has asked Jem to join him."

"Will Jem like to go?"

"Why, yes, of course he will, it will do him so much good. It is just the kind of change he needs; I wish Stephen could go as well."

"It would be so dull without them!"

"Yes, dreadfully," answered Geraldine, cheerfully; "I don't know what we should do without them, but I wish they were both going all the same."

"You don't seem to mind much," said May, in the same disconsolate voice as before.

"Mind! Why I should be delighted if they went!"

"Oh, I meant, mind about their going away."

"Oh!——" and Gerrie laughed.

"Gerrie, I do wonder why you're never put out at anything?"

"Why, what's the good of it? It would not mend matters."

"But you're always all right. It never seems as if anything were the matter with you?"

"No more there is. Why, I've such lots to interest me—there's the garden, and my painting, and the village, and hearing from Rosamond, and plenty to do for the boys when they are at home."

"Still, things are disagreeable sometimes, Gerrie!"

"Of course they are," she answered, sunnily, "and will be to the end of the chapter. But it just depends on what we do with them whether they make us better or worse, richer or poorer."

"How do you mean?"

"Shall I tell you a story?"

"Yes, do: I should like it so much. I've not heard a story for ever so long. Come and sit down under the plane-tree, and I'll lean against you and be cosy. What will you tell about?"

They strolled across the lawn, and sat down on the bank beneath the plane-tree.

"There, that'll do," said May, when she had arranged herself in the most comfortable way she knew how. "We shall have a nice long time now before tea-time, or any of the others come back."

"Now begin; what will you tell me about?"

"About murmurs."

"Murmurs?"

"Yes; don't you know how the brook murmurs through the village! Shall I tell you how it came to murmur so happily, instead of murmuring crossly and angrily?"

"Well!"

"Far, far away in the hills—in the very heart of the hills—two little streams rise; one already large, for it springs up through the earth into a good large basin; the other, very tiny, not large enough to be called a stream, but just squeezed down through the rock, drop by drop. These drops remain on the rock below, till eight or ten of them are there, and then slowly, slowly, they trickle down one side; under a great round stone, and you can see nothing more of them for a long time.

"The stream that bubbled up out of the earth was called, 'Well-a-day.' The stream that trickled down so slowly, was called, 'Gladness.' Well-a-day bubbled up from the darkness into the light, strong, and bright, and independent. She gambolled in the basin till it could hold her no longer, and then, with a shout of delight, she tipped over and flew downwards towards the plain. I am not going to tell you about Well-a-day, but would you like to know what became of her?"

"Yes, tell me."

"Every day she went on bounding with joy, straight down through the thickness of the forest. She never met with a single obstacle, and at last she flowed into a pond, where cattle came to drink.

"But it is about Gladness that I want to tell you. Often and often, as each drop squeezed so hardly through the earth, she looked towards Well-a-day, and her heart was full of jealousy and anger. Why was it that she had to go such a hard difficult way, while with Well-a-day all was smooth and straight?

"She was very angry about it, and did nothing but look at Well-a-day, and count up all her advantages. She would say, 'She is strong; she has a pleasant basin to sail in; she is much larger than I am. She does not have to squeeze herself to the light, but comes bubbling up as fast as possible, and then she just tips over into her course; I have to wait and collect my drops slowly, and then with difficulty we push ourselves onward.' When she came to the end of these reflections, with a hard cold thud she would splash her drops down on the rock.

"And so she went on—never bright, and never happy, and a continual murmur in her heart, which showed itself in her angry drops and splashes.

"It was a very dry summer, and it was harder than ever to squeeze through the rock; harder than ever to get any stream to trickle away.

"It was getting on towards autumn, and the night dews were beginning to fall, when one morning a little cloud, drawn up by the sun from the earth, lost its way, and found itself close beside Gladness.

"It hovered near a leafy bush, surprised and wondering.

"At last it spoke, and said, 'Little stream, why do you murmur so hardly? why are you complaining?'

"'Who are you?' said the stream, angrily.

"'They call me "Prevailing," and I am a cloudlet.'

"'That's a queer name for such a weak thing as a cloud! Why do you want to know what is the matter with me?'

"'I have just come up from the plain; all is bright and lovely there; all is beautiful through the wood; but I see, poor little stream, that something is amiss with you.'

"Then the stream, violent and angry, told of all her troubles, and ended by saying, 'Here we are, a few little drops with everything hard and difficult for us. I send some drops over the rock, but I always stay here myself, I am too unhappy to go further.'

"'And so you just stay here and complain. What do they call you?'

"'That is the worst of all,' answered the stream, in a rage, 'they call me "Gladness;" and how can I be glad!'

"'Why,' said Prevailing, 'I thought you were Gladness, and yet I could hardly believe it.'

"'How could you think I was Gladness? I am not glad, and I shall never be.'

"'You are not called Gladness just because you are glad yourself, but because you are to make so many others glad.'

"'I shall never do that.'

"'You, or rather your's, are doing it now. The drops that push with so much difficulty over the rock, run through the earth, and come out sparkling and bright on the other side; then they flow always onwards, eddying round big stones, stooping low beneath bushes, but always growing greater and brighter, till they flow past little cottages, and into the great ocean, where their rest is come.'

"'Is this true?' asked Gladness.

"'Quite true; but because the beginning has been hard, you have allowed other things to be hard. You have drawn away from your place, angry and foolish, and have missed the brightness in store.'

"'I was jealous of Well-a-day, for all is so easy with her.'

"'Yes, it seems so; but if she were to leave off working, as you have done, all would soon be hard for her, and you would hear an angry murmur instead of her happy pleasant one. Take what is sent you with a murmur of gladness, and you will soon find you have no time for the murmur of discontent.'

"'Oh, I am willing and anxious to go, but now I cannot! I am too far away from the other drops. I shall just have to stay here, and the sun will scorch me up.'

"'No, Gladness, you need not do that. See! I will brood over you, and come down in rain-drops, then you will reach the rock's edge, and follow your course.'

"'No, no!' cried Gladness; 'can you give up your pleasant trip to the bright skies, and expend yourself on a murmuring, discontented stream? Ah! now I know why you are called Prevailing—such a weak tiny cloud, but so strong—because you are ready to give all your store to another. No, Prevailing, you have prevailed. I shall not murmur more, but you must go free.'

"But even as she spoke, the cloudlet hung over her a moment, and then, as it had promised, gently and silently dissolved into the refreshing rain-drops; the tiny stream flowed to the edge of the rock, over it went, and was buried again in the earth. It trembled and shivered—all was dark and black.

"'But it is to make me pure and sparkling!' she remembered; and as a murmur of gladness thrilled her, she burst into the light, bright and golden. Away she hurried, and straight in her path stood up a huge boulder; the old habit of discontent seized her, but again she remembered the cloud's words, 'Take what is sent you with a murmur of gladness;' and with a happy murmur she sprang forward, eddied and rolled for a moment, and then, long before she knew it, the great dreaded boulder was far behind.

"There were some children playing on the bank, and one fell and cut his knee.

"'Come down to the dear little stream and bathe it, and it will soon be better,' said another; and the drops that had so long lain murmuring on the top of the rock, sprang up and bathed the poor hurt knee, and heard the child say, 'Dear water—it is so cool and bright; I don't mind my knee hurting now; it is so nice in the water!'

"On the stream bounded.

"'How could I have been so wicked and foolish as to murmur at the troubles that met me at first! If I had taken each difficulty gladly, it would soon have led me to brightness.' In its joy, it leapt and bounded down the steep incline, past the little cottages. At the door sat two mothers.

"'This is about the only stream near here that has not failed this summer,' said one; 'but it was very near it a few days since.'

"'Well, I never thought it would dry up,' said the other; 'it's so bright and merry—it never seems to tire.'

"'Ah,' thought the stream, as it hurried along; 'they do not know all.'

"By-and-by it came to a bridge thrown across it; on it stood a girl, and a boy stooped down and caught the water in a little cup as it passed along, and handed it to her.

"'There, you won't be thirsty much longer; this is the best water in the country;' and he bathed his hot hands and face.

"The stream flowed on, and thought much of the gladness she gave others, and then began to find out how glad and happy she was herself! Every minute brought her nearer to the great ocean.

"Her last act before she reached the ocean, except giving drink to a poor thirsty cow, was one for the ocean himself. She found one of his shells—one of his beautiful murmuring shells—lying almost buried in the sands.

"'Why, shell!' she cried, 'why are you here?'

"'Ah,' said the shell, very sadly; 'at one time I used to murmur to the sea songs of content, but I left the sea, and let the waves take me up and up, till now I cannot get back to it. My murmurs are no songs now, but frightful groans, and sometimes I am quite dumb. Oh, that I had never left the sea!'

"'My poor shell! But I can tell you how all will be well. Your murmurs are only frightful because you murmur to yourself; you are buried in the sand, and either you murmur discontent to yourself, or, as you say, you are dumb. I am going to the sea: let me take you with me, and as soon as you begin to murmur to others, your old songs will come back.'

"'Oh, will you take me?—will you take me?'

"The stream worked till it had pushed away every grain of sand, and freed the shell, and she was the first to hear the glad murmurs again.

"Together they journeyed on.

"'I am afraid to see the ocean,' said the shell, 'after leaving him as I did.'

"'Don't be afraid,' rippled the stream, 'take all with a murmur of gladness. Why, he is coming to meet us! The great waves are rolling forward to embrace us. Don't you hear their loud murmur of welcome?'

"But before the shell could reply, they were both safe in the arms of the ocean.

"There, May, that is all. Jump up, for I must run and make tea. Tell me—do you like it?"

"Yes, very, very much, Gerrie! do you mean that I could murmur like that?" she asked, as they walked towards the house.

"Indeed you can, May; and it is much pleasanter for oneself and every one else than the other way. It is such a pity when brooks, and trees, and wood-pigeons, all murmur so gladly, that people should be the only ones to do it so disagreeably."

They stooped through the open window, under the half drawn-up venetians, and found Stephen standing before the urn.

"Come, Gerrie and make the tea; it's nearly half an hour late. Where are the others?—not home from the Lincolns?"

"Here they are!" cried May, and in they came, hot and tired, but in grand spirits. Jem and Frank were to start the following Monday for Wales. The evening passed very pleasantly, discussing plans, and making ready for the departure. It was not pleasant to lose one of their happy party, but it would not be very long before they all broke up.

They sent him off in grand spirits; not to return, in all probability, for four or five weeks.

Even May's murmur was glad and bright especially when she called out, "and I shall be the next to go! Rosamond is sure to write about my going very soon now."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

25. Account for the surprise evinced by the Twelve when the death and resurrection of our Lord occurred, notwithstanding the minuteness with which He had foretold these events.

26. Which of the Evangelists has recorded the subject of conversation between our Lord, Moses, and Elijah, when Jesus was transfigured?

27. Show that St. Paul, if he did not share the gift of speaking divers languages, bestowed on the Day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 4), was nevertheless an accomplished linguist.

28. When did the Saviour leave the Temple for the last time? State what prophecy the Lord uttered on that occasion.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 48.

15. The transfiguration. See Matt. xvii. 1; Mark ix.; Luke ix. 28—36.

16. Deut. xviii. 15—19.

17. "Till the Son of man be risen from the dead" (Matt. xvii. 9; Mark ix. 9).

18. "Because it was not possible that He should be holden of death" (Acts ii. 24).

(Drawn by J. D. WATSON.)

A SEA-SIDE FABLE.

A LITTLE child had found a shell,
While skipping o'er the sea-washed sands
Which ocean, in its endless swell,
Had brought from distant lands.

He held it to his eager ear
And listened to its murmur low,
If in its music he might hear
Sounds that his soul would know.

There came strange secrets o'er the seas,
  Amid the waves' majestic roll,
And sweet unearthly melodies,
  That sank into his soul.
And visions passed before his eyes,
  Of floating islands, green and fair,
And lotus-lands 'neath sapphire skies—
  He sighed, and wished him there!

And music Earth shall never hear
  Awoke within that sounding shell,
And, floating round his willing ear,
  It bound him with its spell.
He thought of music-haunted streams,
  Where fairies bright their revels keep;
When, 'midst his fancy-woven dreams,
  He gently fell asleep.

And, as he slept, still far away
  He heard strange music sweet and clear,
As, smiling in his dreams, he lay,
  The shell beside his ear.
For Fancy, on her flashing wing,
  Took up the boy from off the sands;
And, as they sped, he heard her sing
  The songs of distant lands.

* * * * * * *

There came an aged man along,
  And, as he looked with wondering gaze,
His heart seemed stricken by some song
  Beloved in bygone days.
And 'midst his tear-dimmed gaze he fain
  Would of his years have been beguiled,
To catch again that wondrous strain
  That charmed the sleeping child.

What was there in that low sweet sound
  To waken such a smile of joy,
And consecrate the shell-strewn ground,
  Where lay the dreaming boy?
Amidst the murmur of the sea,
  He sat down sadly on the sand,
And took that soul of melody
  From out the little hand.

He placed its lips of green and gold
  Close to his ear, and listened long
To what his spirit might be told
  In its mysterious song.
It told him not in Fancy's dreams
  Of islands green in golden seas;
Nor lulled him by cool crystal streams
  With angels' melodies.

There passed, as writ upon a scroll,
  The joys his heart had known of yore,
And as they went they left his soul
  Thrice sadder than before;
And music came, like Autumn's sigh,
  Along the fading forest-aisles,
Which darkens in a cheerless sky
  Sweet Summer's thousand smiles!

No dreams of fairy realms afar
  Passed brightly o'er his saddened eyes;
His life was like the setting star
  Far down the western skies.
He left the shell beside that one
  Who caught its sweet mysterious strain;
And, gazing on the sinking sun,
  He sighed for youth again!

ALEXANDER LAMONT.

THE SHEPHERDS OF BETHLEHEM.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL COX, AUTHOR OF "A DAY WITH CHRIST," ETC., ETC.

LUKE ii. 8–20.

"THE Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost"—to seek and save those who were lost in the crowd, as well as those who were lost in sin; the meek, the poor, the humble—all who had the spirit of a little child, as well as those who were plunged in guilt and misery. It was right and meet, therefore, that His coming, His advent, should be first announced to the lowly shepherds of a little hamlet, to poor men whose very names are unknown to us, and were never known beyond the precincts of Bethlehem. "Wise men" were travelling from afar to worship Him; but before they arrive, the rude and humble shepherds are led to the rude and humble cradle in which He lies. "As unknown, yet well-known," might be the motto of these simple men; unknown after the flesh, yet well known in the spirit; unknown by name, yet oftener in our thoughts, and dearer to our thoughts, than most of the men whose names are most familiar in our mouths. How often, and from what early years, has our imagination depicted them as clustered together in some sheltered nook on the hill-side round the watch-fire which both tempered the cold breath of a Syrian night and scared away the "evil beasts" who might have otherwise harried the flock—keeping watch over their sheep, but perhaps watching also and longing for the morning, little dreaming that the new dawn of that new "day which the Lord hath made" was about to break upon them before the sun should top the Eastern hills. Our imagination has been so long busy with them that probably they have become idealised in our thoughts, shepherds rather than men—abstractions, ideal creatures of the brain, rather than men of like passions with ourselves. That they were men, however, and men of like passions with us, is quite obvious even from the little we are told of them. They were impressed as we should have been impressed by what they saw and heard; they acted as we should have acted, had we been in their place. They passed through the very phases of fear, doubt, inquiry, faith, through which we pass when once the supernatural breaks through the veils which commonly hide it from us, and presses itself home upon our thoughts and affections.

Never was happier news brought to men than the "good tidings of great joy" which the angels brought to the shepherds of Bethlehem. Yet, as they listened to the joyful tidings, "they feared with a great fear." And can we wonder that their first emotion was one of terror rather than of delight? We shall not wonder if we attempt to conceive the scene, and if we remember how the sudden inburst of that which is above nature on the easy round of habit and custom always agitates the human heart. These Hebrew shepherds were engaged in their common task. They had led their sheep to a sheltered spot, where they might lie safely for the night, and find pasture in the morning. They have gathered round their fire, some sleeping perhaps, and some watching; or perhaps it is yet early in the night, and they are all talking together before they divide the watches of the night between them, or laying out their plans for the morrow, or singing their evening psalm. They had much to talk of, for Bethlehem was very full just now, and even over-full; many old friends had come back to their native village to be enrolled in the new census which Cæsar Augustus had decreed. And as they talk or sing—and shepherds have always been given to song—we may be sure that they often lift their eyes to the sky, watching the changes of the night, and gazing on the lustrous stars which shine in a Syrian heaven with a splendour unknown to us in our dull climate and misty air. And as they gaze, lo! every star bursts into a bright-winged angel, moves from its place, descends, and all the glory of heaven comes down to earth! Could anything be more startling to these simple men, or more terrifying in its very splendour? They had often heard of a "day of the Lord," in which the heavens should quake, and the earth be purified as by fire. What wonder, then, that they feared with a great fear? It must have seemed to them that the end of all things had come, that the earth, like the stars, was about to be removed out of its place!

As they gazed on the celestial portent with astonishment and affright, one of the angels detached himself from "the glory" that shone above them, drew near to them, and cried, "Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord." As he ceased speaking, once more the glory of the Lord shone out upon the night; a new glory is added—the glory of song to the glory of splendour; the morning stars sing together, the sons of God shout for joy, as over a new-created world; "a multitude of the heavenly host," the choirs of heaven, praise God, and chant—

> "Glory to God in the highest,
> And on earth peace among men of good will."

Heaven and earth are not to be destroyed, as the shepherds feared, but reconciled and united. He has come whom the prophets foretold—Immanuel, God with us,—to make His tabernacle with men, to dwell with them, and be their God, and give them peace.

Their fear is supplanted by joy as they listen to these good tidings. And yet their joy is overcast with doubt, as the angel saw, or why should he give, why should they require, "a sign"? It seems too good to be true, that the Messiah, for whom they and their fathers had waited so long in vain, should be coming, should have come. It seems incredible that to them, of all men, to poor unknown shepherds keeping watch over their flock, rather than to rabbis teaching in the schools, or to priests ministering before the altar, this grace should be shown: that they, first of all men, that they alone among men, should behold the glory of the Lord, and hear the choirs of heaven; that they should be selected to see and hear what kings and prophets had desired to see, but had not seen, and to hear, but had not heard.

Happily for them, doubt spurred them on to inquiry. "It came to pass when the angels went away from them into heaven"—and pray observe that the tone of the Evangelist is as natural and easy when he speaks of the angels as when he speaks of the shepherds, and that heaven is as real a place to him as the village of Bethlehem—"the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this saying which has come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us." Two points rendered their inquiry a very hopeful one:—First, that they took some trouble, and ran some risk, in order to arrive at a reasonable conclusion; and, second, that they were predisposed to believe they should find what the angel had said to be true. In the flush of the great hope which his words have quickened within them, they leave their sheep untended on the hills, and hurry to the city of David.

There they find the sign—"a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, and lying in a manger." Not a very convincing sign to a sceptic, perhaps; for a new-born babe could have been no great rarity even in little Bethlehem; and even that the babe should be cradled in a manger was a fact easily accounted for, since, owing to the census, the solitary "inn" of the hamlet was crowded, and there was no room for the last-comers save in the stable. And yet even this sign sufficed the simple shepherds. In the new-born Babe they saw "Christ the Lord." Doubt gave place to faith. They worshipped Him as the Messiah, the Saviour of Israel. They "made known the saying which was told them concerning the Child." So strong was their faith, that they preached to others so soon as they themselves were convinced. They returned to their flock, of which peradventure the angels had taken charge while they were absent, "glorifying and praising God for all the things they had seen and heard," taking up and repeating, we may be sure, the chant of the heavenly host—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men of good will."

On the shepherds of Bethlehem, then, the advent of Christ produced fear; fear changed into doubt; doubt passed into inquiry; and inquiry led on to a faith that expressed itself in worship, in service, and in praise.

And in this sequence of emotions we have the proof that they were men of like passions with us; for these are the very emotions which the advent of Christ excites in us when that advent becomes to us, as it did to them, a sacred and verified reality—when to us, as to them, all the glory of God is reflected in the face of Christ.

The message of Christmas to us, and to all men, is: "Fear not, for unto you is born this day a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord." But even these good tidings of great joy, when first we realise their meaning and truth, awaken a great fear in us. Like the shepherds, we take our life easily for the most part. We are occupied with regularly recurring tasks, with familiar duties and pleasures. We move in a round of custom which is seldom broken or disturbed, and which keeps our thoughts, our affections, our aims, well within the bounds of time and sense. If any great break or interruption occurs, we are startled and amazed. When the spiritual, the supernatural, presses in upon us, when it invades the regular course of our daily habits, we are most of all agitated and disturbed. Was it not thus with us when first of all religion became a reality to us, and the one all-important reality, instead of a mere creed, or a mere round of decorous forms? When we first recognised Christ as a Saviour, and as our Saviour, we also first saw, in all their heinousness, the sins from which He came to save us. When we discovered that He had come to declare the Father to us—to teach us how good He is, and that He is bent on making us good; when He taught us that all the gains and pleasures of life are as nothing when compared with life itself, and made us feel that our one great task is to lay hold on life eternal: we also felt, as never before, how evil and impure we were, how foolish and reckless we had been, what opportunities we had lost, and how difficult it would be for us, with powers so limited, time so short, so much to learn and unlearn, so much to do and undo, to rise into a settled and steadfast goodness, to incorporate the character of Christ with our own, to become perfect even as our Father in heaven is perfect.

And in us, as in the shepherds, did not this natural fear breed doubt? Did it not seem to us that the good tidings of great joy were too good to be true? Was it not incredible to us, at the first, that God should love men, despite their alienation from Him? and, above all, that He should love us, despite our manifold offences against Him; and so love us as to send His Son to declare and prove the exceeding greatness of His love? No doubt we doubted. Possibly we still doubt—doubt whether Christ can be our Saviour, whether He can ever wholly redeem us from our thraldom to the senses and to evil habits, from our undue and excessive devotion to the toils, cares, and successes of this present life. Or, if we trust him for ourselves, we may nevertheless doubt whether the good tidings are for "all the people;" whether He is, and will be, the Saviour of all men, and not only of those that believe. Nay, I am very sure that we do doubt; for there is nothing of which we find it so hard to persuade ourselves, even now, that Christ has come both in the flesh and in the spirit, as of the perfect redeeming goodness of God, the goodness that is over all His creatures, over all His works. Even more than for others, we doubt for ourselves, for we know more of the evil that is in us than of that which is in our neighbours. That we, who often wish we were half so simple and unworldly as the poor shepherds of Bethlehem, should ever be "like unto the angels" who sang to the shepherds, that we should even be "satisfied with the likeness" of Him whose advent the angels sang, this seems incredible to us, since the better we are, and the better the mood we are in, the more sadly we feel how far we are from all perfection.

When we are troubled by such doubts as these, they should stimulate us to inquiry, to experiment. Like the shepherds, we should arise and go to the city of David, and see whether these things be so or not. And it will be wise of us to simplify our quest by detaching from our thoughts all questions that are not of supreme importance, to confine ourselves to such inquiries as these:—Is not God good, and even of a perfect goodness? Are not our own best and purest affections but faint reflections of His? If we would do anything for the sake of those whom we love, to reclaim them when they are lost to us and to goodness, would not He, who is so much better than we are, humble Himself, and take the form of man, and come and dwell among us, if He could thus redeem us unto Himself, and make us partakers of His divine nature? Do we not feel that God must become man, must wear our nature, speak our words, live our life, die our death—in short, pass through all our experiences, from the cradle to the grave, if He would reveal, in forms that we can apprehend, His kindness and good will towards us, if He would show us what we ought to be and help us to become what we ought to be? If He can only reach us thus, and will not hesitate at any humiliation, any suffering, by which He may reach and recover us; if we may assume that He would and did become in fashion as a man, that He might save us men; then where shall we look for Him? What man is there who towers high above men, the noblest and most gifted of the race, who is the fairest of the sons of men, perfect at all points, and altogether lovely? Who is it to whom even the sceptic and the disbeliever bear witness as the wisest and best of men, as the one divine Man whom the race has produced? Is it not that very Man of whom the season speaks, of whom the angels sang to the shepherds, "Unto you is born this day a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord?" Let us trust Him, then, and what He declares to us about Himself, about God, about ourselves. What though the miracle of the Incarnation and the miracles involved in it perplex our thoughts? If God were to become man, if He must needs come and dwell among us, must not many things have been natural to Him which are supernatural to us? What though we find on His lips words whose depths we cannot fathom, and in His words lines of thought which to us seem contradictory and irreconcilable? If the Inhabitant of Eternity came within the bounds of time, and the Infinite God became finite man, and the All-wise spake in our poor imperfect words—words that will not adequately express the half of our own thoughts and emotions—must not our words still more imperfectly express His thoughts? Must not many of His thoughts be too large for us to grasp and reconcile? If the Man Christ Jesus be the best man we know—the purest, the wisest, the likest God—no doubt should prevent us from making the experiment of trust in Him. At first, like the shepherds, we may come to him by night, in a mental obscurity which makes it hard for us to find and recognise Him. But if, like them, we are prepared to put ourselves to trouble, and to run some risk of loss; and if, above all, we love goodness and truth, and are prepossessed in their favour, we shall get peace at the last: for is not "peace" promised to "men of good will"?

They went to look for Christ, they found a little Child. We may look for the Son of God, and at first we may find only the Son of Man. But if we trust Him, and put Him to the proof, just as they came to see the Christ in the Child, so in the Son of Man we at last shall find the Son of God and the Saviour of the World.

But, finally, some of us—most of us, I trust—have passed through fear and doubt and inquiry to faith. For us the words of the angel to the shepherds have a sweet and familiar sound. But let us listen to them again: "Fear not: for, behold, I bring you great tidings of joy, which shall be to all the people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord." Oh, memorable and most pleasant words! we love to hear them. But have they even yet taken their full effect upon us? We believe them; we rejoice in Christ as our Saviour, and the Saviour of all men. This gracious and hallowed season is welcome to us, not simply because it brings a brief rest from toil—a holiday in which our kinsfolk and friends gather round us—but also, and chiefly, because it commemorates the time "when the kindness and philanthropy of God our Saviour appeared unto men." But have even we nothing to learn from the shepherds, rude and simple as they were? When they had seen the Child, they worshipped the Christ. When they had worshipped Him, they made known what they had seen and heard. When they had published the good tidings abroad, they returned to their flocks, "glorifying and praising God for all the things they had heard and seen." Have we done as much? If we have worshipped the Saviour, have we, remembering that the good tidings are for all people, published the good tidings to our kinsfolk and neighbours? Have we so wholly put away fear and doubt from us that we glorify and praise God as we go about our daily work in the world?

Now and then we have, no doubt. But another Christmas has come round. Once more we are called to worship Christ, to make Him known, to praise and glorify His name. And how can we worship Him more acceptably, or more persuasively make Him known, or praise Him more welcomely than by ministering to the men for whose sake He became a man? The message of the angels guided the shepherds to but a poor abode. Are there no poor abodes to which it should lead us?—none to which we might carry some warmth of kindness and a little good cheer, because some faint echo of that angelic song is, even yet, still ringing in our hearts?

"Go eat the fat" then, if God has given you a feast of fat things for your Christmas fare; eat the fat, "and drink the sweet; but send"—send! nay, carry, "portions to those for whom nothing is prepared:" and the joy of the Lord shall be the strength and inspiration of all the joy and merriment of the time.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

XV.—WITH THEM THAT FAINT BY THE WAY.

THERE are perhaps few conditions demanding greater sympathy and more ready aid than that of poor women who, from temporary sickness or the weariness that comes of hope deferred, are unable to follow the employments, often precarious and yielding a bare subsistence, by which they strive to be independent of charitable assistance. It is only those who know to what extremities of need they will submit for shame of making their poverty known, and what mental suffering they will endure as they find their scanty savings dwindling day by day, and their few household goods, or even their clothing, and the little family mementoes, which they can only part with as a last resource, going piece by piece, who can fully realise all that is meant by the genteel phrase, "very reduced circumstances," as applied to women of refined feelings, and frequently of gentle nurture, who find themselves without the means of obtaining necessary food and medical aid when health and strength give way, and they can no longer work at those few callings by which they can earn enough to enable them to avoid a dreaded "application to friends." Quite lately, the subject of some kind of provision for poor governesses who are sick, or have to subsist during long holidays on the small balance of their quarterly wages, has occupied public attention, and it would be well indeed if means could be found for giving the healthy temporary employment, and the weakly a quiet home where their strength might be restored without the sacrifice of independence. There are others, however, for which such help is equally needed—the dressmaker, or the shopwoman, on whom long hours of tedious and often of exhausting toil in an unhealthy atmosphere, has begun to tell too severely; the servant of good character and respectable habits, who is not so ill as to be admitted to a hospital, and yet is breaking down in strength, and regards with dread the necessity for going into some obscure lodging, where her surplusage of wages will barely pay for rent and food during two or three weeks enforced idleness; the girl who has learnt some ill-paid business, which affords her no more than a mere contribution to the family funds, and leaves no margin for extra food or medicine, or the fresh air that is as important as either.

Any careful observer standing at the door of a general hospital, and watching the throng of out-patients waiting wearily to see the doctor, will be able to distinguish a score of cases for which a temporary rest with wholesome food and the sympathy and loving-kindness that refresh the soul would bring true healing.

No large establishment in the nature of a hospital or a refuge affords the kind of help for such distress as theirs. They cannot be dealt with as occupants of wards; for they have either recovered from the actual crisis of some serious disorder, or are pining in a depressed condition to which no definite name can be given to classify it for admission to any public establishment for the cure of disease. To many of them the idea of entering a large charitable refuge—and I know of none in London adapted to such needs as theirs—would be repulsive, as suggesting that horror with which persons of a lower grade regard the union workhouse; what they need is a temporary home, and if ever the time should come when a well-supported scheme for such a provision should be adopted, it will have to take the form of what is now known as the "cottage system." Indeed, in hospitals, as well as in other large charitable institutions, the defects of the old plan of maintaining a great number of adult persons in one vast building have been recognised. The immense ward with its long rows of beds, the divided and necessarily confusing duties of attendants, the ill-served meals at a great dinner-table where there is no possibility of escaping from a too rigid routine, the depressing, not to say degrading, influence, resulting from the loss of individuality, would make any vast institution for convalescents or invalids far less effectual in its operation. I make this reference only with regard to the probable inauguration of homes for invalid women in or near London, and because I have just visited one, which, although it is not on the cottage system, but is established in a rare old mansion of the period of Queen Anne, has yet the happy characteristic of being a family whose scanty means is largely increased by loving gifts, instead of an institution every corner of which bears a reminder that it is "supported by charity." In the pleasant airy High Street of Stoke Newington, and within a stone's throw of the famous Cedar Walk of Abney Park—that locality made famous by the prolonged visit of Dr. Watts, who went to spend a week with Sir Thomas Abney, and remained for the rest of his long blameless life the honoured guest of the family—is the house I speak of, "The Invalid Asylum for Respectable Females in London and its Vicinity," superintended by a ladies' committee, and with weekly visitors, and a matron to carry on the practical work of the executive.

There is nothing remarkably picturesque, nothing very striking, about this home for thirty respectable invalid women employed in dependent situations, to whom it affords a temporary asylum, widely differing from the crowded receptacles for the sick in the metropolis. One of its peculiarities is, that the purity of the family circle is maintained, by the fact that no patient is admitted without a certificate of conduct signed by two housekeepers or by an employer, while her case is also recommended by an annual subscriber or life governor; and there is a sense of repose and quiet confidence about the inmates which is particularly suggestive of the care taken to recognise their individual claims, and the interest which is manifested in them during the time of their sojourn.

This very quietude and sense of rest, and gradual renewal of health and strength in a serene retreat is, in fact, the feature which attracts my attention. It is not too much to say that I am ready to attribute much of such influences to the fact that the institution was originally established by ladies representing the unobtrusive beneficent work of the "Society of Friends," and that the order and peace which is its delightful characteristic, may in a great measure be traced to that foundation. At any rate, these qualifications so identify it that I feel justified in regarding it to some extent as a worthy example of the method to be adopted in any institution, which, without being altogether a free "charity," takes only such a small sum from the patient or her friends as suffices to keep away the degrading feeling of pauperism, or of utter dependence on the bounty of strangers. It is true that the principal life-governorships include the privilege of sending entirely gratuitous patients, but in ordinary cases the annual subscriber of a guinea recommends the case, and when the patient is admitted, the sum of twenty shillings is received for the month's medical attendance, lodging, and full board, "including tea and sugar," for a time not exceeding one month, after which, should the case require a longer stay, the ticket must be renewed by the same or another subscriber, on the further payment of twenty shillings. If the patient be in the employment of the subscriber, the payment of this sum will suffice without the renewal ticket, an arrangement which should commend the institution to every benevolent employer of female labour.

It need hardly be said that no cases of infectious disease are admitted, and that every applicant is examined by the medical attendant. No patient is admitted who is not above ten years of age; and neither "private cookery," nor the introduction of spirituous liquors by visitors, is permitted, any more than gratuities to servants of the Institution.

It may be remarked that though 129 cases were received during the last official year—91 tickets being renewed, and 80 weekly payments being received—the very fact of contributions being made by the patients themselves, who are thus relieved from the sense of utter dependence, appears to have prevented the Institution from participating in the benefits of the "Hospital Sunday" fund. I am not sure that this is a real disadvantage however, for the Institution is after all less a hospital than a temporary home, and it appeals on behalf of a peculiar form of distress, the claims of which are of a specific and none the less of a very urgent character. But in order to realise the kind of work that is most needed, and is here being accomplished, let us pay a visit to the house itself. We have been hitherto standing on the broad flight of steps inside the tall iron gates, and have hesitated to sully their hearthstone purity, for it is Saturday, and we may well have an inconvenient sense that the short hand of the clock is already close to the dinner-time of the institution.

With a long experience of paying unexpected visits, I am prepared to encounter remonstrance, even though it only take the form of a critical glance at my boots as a means of possible maculation of the newly-cleaned hall and passages. Conscious of having judiciously employed a member of the shoe-black brigade, I can endure this scrutiny, and, with a few words of explanation, am conducted, by the matron herself, over the grand old house, whose broad staircase and elaborately carved banisters of black oak at once attest not only its antiquity but also its aristocracy. I have already said that there is nothing here on which to found a "picturesque description," and yet the air of repose, the sense of almost spotless cleanliness, the freshness of the large lofty rooms containing from three to five or six comfortable beds with their snowy counterpanes, the general order and pleasant seclusion, are remarkably suggestive of the intention of the place. Two of the patients, to whom I make my respects, are not yet sufficiently recovered to join the daily dinner-party in the neat dining-room. One of them, an elderly lady, who has only just been brought here, is slowly recovering from very severe illness, and cannot even sit up in the bed, whence she regards me with an expression which seems to intimate that she has reached a haven of rest. Her companion, a young woman—also in bed in the same room—is sitting very upright, cheerfully engaged in some problem of needlework, and responds with a hopeful smile to the declaration of the matron, that they "mean to make a woman of her if she is good."

Close to this room is the neat lavatory with its bath, supplied with hot and cold water, and on the landing I note another bath, on wheels, for use in any part of the house where it may be required. All the accessories are home-like; and in the invalid sitting-room, on an upper storey, where two convalescents, not yet able to get down-stairs, greet me from a pair of easy chairs, there is the same pervading influence which distinguishes the house from those large institutions where everything is characterised by a depressing mechanical dead level. The library—a pleasant cheerful room—is in course of re-furnishing; and I am glad to learn that THE QUIVER is amongst the favourite periodicals that find a place there, while the stock of books, either gifts or loans, are likely soon to be replenished, a matter wherein extra aid would be appreciated.

Already the cloth is laid in the dining-room, and dinner itself consists of hot meat with the usual accessories every day, except on Sundays, when there is a cold dinner, while, of course, the invalids who are ordered medical diet have fish, custards, or other delicate fare, specially provided. Each patient has a pint of ale or beer daily, and wine as a remedial stimulant, according to the doctor's orders.

There is just time before dinner is served to walk through the room into the grand old garden which extends from a pleasant sheltered lawn and flower-garden, with a glorious fig-tree in full leaf and fruit against the sunny wall, to a great kitchen-garden and orchard one, with a wealth of fruit and vegetables (and notably a venerable and prolific mulberry tree), and extending in a pleasant vista of autumn leaves. On the other side of the high wall is the Cedar Walk already mentioned; and the whole place is so still and balmy on this autumnal day, that we may go away with a very distinct appreciation of the rest and peace, which, with regular nutritious food, rest, and medicine, may bring restoration to the physical health, just as the hopeful ministrations of good and pious women who visit the home daily may bring a sense of peace and comfort to many a weary spirit and burdened heart.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XI.

LADY EUDORA came into the room carrying such a pile of books that her willowy figure fairly bent under them. These volumes she tossed carelessly on to the table—one falling into a dish of jelly, another knocking over a vase of autumn flowers, and two or three coming to the floor with a crash. But her equanimity was not at all disturbed by the émeute she had occasioned; with a gay laugh at her own awkwardness she huddled the flowers back into the vase, and seating herself on an ottoman so that she could fold her hands on the invalid's knees, began expressing her pleasure at finding her nearly convalescent.

"I have been longing and longing to see you," she went on, "for I felt sure that you must think me the most ungrateful girl in the world for letting anything keep me away; but it was mamma's doing; you must blame her, not me."

"I do not blame any one," Eda gently interposed.

"But I have, over and over again; and I should have been as obstinate in my way as mamma was in her's, if she had not declared that I should make you worse with my heedless chattering."

"Lady Chessington has been most kind, most considerate!" cried Eda, gratefully. But Eudora stared and smiled, at this little burst of feeling.

"That sounds as if you quite agree with her in thinking my absence a greater boon than my society. Never mind, don't try to explain away what you said. I know I'm too noisy to be an acquisition in a sick chamber; but I did think mamma might let me sit up with you at night. However, she would not consent, although I made papa and my cousin Eustace plead for me."

"But, my dear Lady Eudora, I have not required any one to sit up."

"All the better for me if I had been your nurse, for I don't believe I could have kept my eyes open. So you see I don't pretend that I should have made myself very useful, only that it would have been a great satisfaction to have been able to say that I was doing something for you."

"Even though it were nid-nodding in a chair, to our mutual discomfort?" asked Eda, with a smile.

"You may laugh at me as much as you like, I give you full permission," said Eudora, good-humouredly. "But just imagine what I felt when I knew that you were really ill through what you had endured for me; and that I was doing nothing, absolutely nothing, in return."

"Pray do not speak of it! I have been nursed so kindly that there was not anything left for you to do."

"Ah yes, I knew mamma and Morison would take good care of you; but you are still very pale and thin."

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"You are still very pale and thin."—p. 88.

"And you, Lady Eudora—did you not feel any ill effects from being so long in the water?"

"No, indeed!" And the young lady laughingly tossed back her beautiful hair. "Nothing hurts me. I was rather hoarse for a day or two; and Eustace advised some gruel and black-currant lozenges, but my voice returned without either of his nauseous remedies. He would have demanded a physician from London, and papa would have gone off by express to fetch one, if I had told them what miserable nights I had."

"Wakeful ones, do you mean?"

"No, but disturbed with dreams in which I was continually being hurled down a hideous abyss, into which I fell with a scream that made me start up in a cold perspiration. Thank goodness, those wretched visions no longer torment me; but I shall not quickly forget how they might have been realised if it had not been for your promptitude and courage."

She raised herself to kiss Eda's cheek, and her bright eyes were moist as she went on talking: "I shall never care to go near the river again, for Fido was drowned—my faithful little doggie! And I could not go there now without being reminded that it was entirely my own fault, and that two human lives, as well as Fido's, might have been sacrificed through my thoughtlessness."

"Neither do I think that I shall like my seat under the willow as well as I used to do," Eda remarked, "for the roar of the mill-dam will make me shudder. And yet I could not hear it without being very thankful that both you and I were rescued from such a sudden and watery death."

"Don't speak of it! I have had similar thoughts, in the wakeful hours to which I was just now alluding; and though I tried to forget them in repeating nonsense-verses, or humming the prettiest songs I knew, I could not help picturing to myself all kinds of sickening details—such as dragging the river for our corpses, and breaking the news to our friends. By-the-bye, Miss Granton, yours live in London, do they not?"

"My brother does; I have no other near relations."

"And no very particular friend who is nearer and dearer still?" inquired Eudora, saucily.

Eda felt the blood rush into the cheeks that the moment before had been so white, and involuntarily began asking herself if Richard Atwood would have been amongst the few who would have grieved for her. The many solitary hours she had spent since leaving London had been employed but too often in recalling his handsome face and the tenderness of his adieus to enable her to answer Eudora's question in the negative with a clear conscience; therefore she did not answer it at all; and the young lady, feeling that she had overstepped the bounds of propriety, jumped up, saying, "Aren't you very tired of being shut up here? I should be, for I hate staying long in one room; it suffocates me! When mamma does pin me down to study for a whole morning, I am always obliged to make an excuse for going away to find something, that I may run up and down stairs, or rush round the garden, to work off my restlessness."

"Then I am sure you must be getting very tired of staying here."

"Indeed I am not! You are a nice little girl, Eda—I may call you Eda, mayn't I?—and I can see that I shall get on very well with you, for you are not so prim and fussy as mamma. Oh, you need not look so grave; I'm not going to say anything rude; but it's a known fact that mamma and I worry each other dreadfully; although she is the best mother in the world."

"The best mother in the world, and yet you have just confessed to worrying her dreadfully! You did not mean this, did you?" asked Eda, smiling a little, yet with a look in her eyes that made Eudora qualify her hasty speech.

"Not precisely; I think I told you that we worry each other. However, my cousin Eustace says the fault is all mine; and as he is one of those clever men who are always right, it's no use contradicting him. But this isn't what I came to say. Are you fond of reading? I thought you were, and so I told mamma I would bring you some books, if I only knew what you liked. Every one suggested two or three different ones, so I brought them all, and some art journals, in case you should prefer looking at pictures to poring over drier matter."

"Do you read much, Lady Eudora?" Eda inquired, as she turned over the engravings.

"Only when the fit takes me, which is but seldom. I like riding, walking, gardening, fishing—in fact, anything better than in-door occupations. I have been so surfeited with governesses and lessons, English exercises, French themes, Italian and German translations, and so on, that I seldom care to open a volume now, for fear I should come on one of my old impositions. You see," she explained, "papa accepted some colonial appointment when I was a child, and as mamma went with him I was left in the care of an aunt to be educated, and the dear old thing thought she should not be doing her duty if she did not make a very accomplished young lady of me. But the forcing process was a failure, for I hadn't brains enough to blossom into a blue-stocking. Mamma regrets it, but I don't; while papa often wishes I had been his son and heir, instead of his daughter and heiress; and so do I, most heartily."

Her face had flushed a little, and her lip quivered as she spoke, although her tone and manner were more reckless than was consistent with good feeling. Eda remembered now to have heard some one say that Lady Eudora Chessington was a charming girl, but inclined to be fast—preferring a ride to the meet, or a romp with her dogs, to more feminine pursuits; and it was easy to comprehend how much the countess, who was fastidiously precise, and detested any approach to loudness or vulgarity, must feel annoyed to find her only daughter so different to herself.

And yet there was something very winning and lovable about Eudora; and Eda listened to her lively speeches with pleasure. To her, so long deprived of any society, the quaint fresh remarks of the young lady were quite exhilarating; and if Eudora's auditor could not always agree with her in her opinions, it was pleasant to find that she bore contradiction good-temperedly, and was prompt to acknowledge herself in the wrong.

"I hope I have not tired you with my chattering," she said at last, as she rose from her lowly position; "mamma bade me only stay one hour, and, I declare, I have been here two!"

"I am very sorry," said Eda, with such earnestness, that she was laughingly asked why.

"Have you been wishing me gone while I was flattering myself that we were equally comfortable?"

"Wishing you gone! No; but sorry that I should have been the cause of your disobeying Lady Chessington."

"Is that all?" cried Eudora, carelessly; "I'm afraid mamma's accustomed to worse acts of rebellion than this one, which was quite unpremeditated. However, I'll go, for fear you should have a headache. But first tell me if there is anything I can do for you."

"Yes, dear Lady Eudora," Eda replied, with some fear of giving offence by her candour, "there is one thing you can do, which will relieve and oblige me very much."

"What is it? I shall be glad to do it, whatever it is."

"Only to go and explain to the countess that neither of us have intentionally disregarded her injunction."

Eudora bit her lip, and was silent a while. "She will not blame you, Miss Granton."

"I suppose not," Eda replied; "indeed, I was not thinking of myself."

"Then pray don't make yourself uneasy about me," retorted Eudora, pettishly; "I am used to being lectured, and I hate saying I am sorry—especially when it isn't true. It's hypocritical; and I am no hypocrite!"

Eda did not speak; she felt that she had been over-bold already; but she did not remove her sad serious gaze from the downcast face of the young lady, who stood plucking to pieces the China asters that lay on the table.

"Every one seems to forget that I am no longer a child, who mustn't do this nor that," she said, presently; "it's only papa who treats me like a rational creature. I hope you are not going to enrol yourself in the ranks of my tormentors, Miss Granton."

Eda opened her eyes at the idea. "I did not mean to offend you, Lady Eudora."

"I am not offended, but——" and then she paused.

"But you thought I presumed on your good-nature, when I hinted that nothing would please me better than to see you brave enough to acknowledge a fault."

"It cannot be called a fault if you are none the worse for my long stay," she quickly retorted; "it was simply an act of forgetfulness. If I had recollected mamma's injunction, I dare say I should have obeyed it. It's just because I have been pestered all my life by these petty restrictions, that I detest—yes, it's a strong word, but it's the right one—I detest almost everything I ought to love and respect."

Eda felt how wrong this was, but did not know how far she was justified in expressing her sentiments. Lady Eudora was very frank, but she was also very touchy, and perhaps the best course was to be mute.

"Well, good-bye, Miss Granton," her ladyship said, in more peaceable tones. "Now I am beginning to make myself disagreeable, I suppose I had better run away; but I shall come and see you to-morrow, if I may. You'll not shut the door against me, if I promise not to be so snappish any more, will you?"

Eda assured her, with truth, that she should be extremely glad of another visit; and Eudora tripped to the door, but only to stand there a little while, considering, and then came back and looked steadily into the eyes of the surprised Eda, while she put the following question:—"Has mamma been talking to you about my shortcomings? Did she ask you to try and teach me the fifth commandment? You shake your head; but are you sure—quite sure?"

"Dear Lady Eudora, is not this an absurd supposition? You forget that until these last few days I have been a stranger to the countess. Is it at all likely that she would talk to me about you? I have not heard her mention your name until this morning."

"Then what made you set my duties before me so gravely? an innate love of playing the teacher? or a consciousness that in no other manner could you make yourself so acceptable to mamma?"

Eda coloured, and looked distressed.

"What did I say to make you think that I wished to do either? Perhaps I spoke too hastily; but it is not very long since I lost my own dear mother, and knowing how bitterly I have grieved over every word or action of mine that may have vexed her, I could not resist pressing you to make amends for yours."

"But you have made so much of a trifle," Eudora complained, with a half laugh. "If you knew how often I give mamma much greater cause to find fault with me!"

"Then I had rather not know," said Eda, gently.

"But still you think I ought to humble myself, although I really have not been in the wrong this time."

"Dear Lady Eudora, if you are satisfied with yourself, what can my opinion signify?"

Eudora gave herself a shake, and patted the floor with her foot.

"Don't provoke me by taking that tone, but say just what you think. Do you hear? Speak, little preacher, or——" and she menaced Eda with a cushion she had snatched up—"speak, or be extinguished for ever!"

"Must I risk your displeasure again? Then I will frankly tell you that I think the best mother in the world merits at least the civility of an explanation and apology when her wishes have been set at nought."

Lady Eudora would hear no more.

"Quarter! quarter! I yield! I own myself convinced; but don't begin to triumph till I have had time to get out of hearing."

And with a merry, but half-defiant look, she ran away.

CHAPTER XII.

Eda never knew whether her impetuous ladyship put her good resolutions into practice, for she looked so fatigued when the countess saw her in the evening, that all visitors were prohibited till she was stronger; and when Eudora did come again, she made no allusion to what had passed at their former interview. It was her birthday, she said, and the earl had presented her with a beautiful Skye terrier, to take the place of her drowned pet.

"Papa meant it kindly; but I had such a choking in my voice I could scarcely thank him. I do not like replacing dead favourites; and I feel horribly guilty about my poor Fido."

"What name shall you give this little creature?" Eda demanded, as she caressed it.

"He answers already to that of Nip, and is a thoroughly well-educated animal. Shall I put him through his accomplishments before he goes into banishment? Mamma will not have any dogs in the house, so I must ask the coachman to take charge of mine."

But the countess came in before the accomplished dog could go through his performances, and his young mistress snatched him up, and sat alternately playing with and teasing him, while her mother talked to Eda. Lady Chessington tried to turn a deaf ear to the growling and barking with which Nip testified his displeasure whenever his ears were meddled with; but when he retaliated by seizing Eudora's sleeve, and shaking it till the lace was rent and hanging in tatters, she lost patience.

"Pray send that tiresome little animal away, child!" she exclaimed; "his noise distracts me!"

"Nip shall be quieter, mamma. It was my fault he made such a noise," Eudora answered, cuddling him up in her arms, and laughing at his struggles to escape.

"Oblige me by sending or taking the dog away!" Lady Chessington reiterated; and her daughter rose to obey, but it was with a sullen look and a rude speech.

"You always take an antipathy to any creature I like, mamma."

Lady Chessington's brows contracted, but she answered, with composure, "You bring a sweeping charge against me, my dear. I think Nip a very pretty little fellow; but I certainly do not like to see a young lady immoderately fond of dogs and horses."

Lady Eudora winced a little, and walked to a window, where she stood drumming on a window-pane, till she abruptly asked, "Are you going to stay with Miss Granton for an hour or so? Then you will not want me; and I suppose there can be no objection to my riding with papa to see Colonel Sorbett's new mare?"

"If your papa very much wishes it, Eudora, I suppose I must consent;" and the anxious mother sighed. "If he wishes it!"

But with all her faults Eudora was truthful, and promptly replied, "I do not know that papa wishes it, mamma, but I do;" and Lady Chessington divined that the too-indulgent father had been teased into compliance.

"Then I would rather—much rather—you did not go, my love. You have not opened your piano since Miss Granton has been here; and I never see you studying now!"

"I detest studying!" was the mutinous answer; "and the last time I attempted to play my cousin Eustace took upon himself to find fault with me. I will never touch the piano again while he is here!"

"Do not exaggerate, my dear child; Mr. St. Orme is an excellent musician himself, and thought he was doing you a kindness in pointing out the way the passage you had been slurring should be played. But if you cannot appreciate Eustace's endeavours to set you right, you can avoid him by fetching your books and spending your morning here with Miss Granton."

Eda looked her pleasure at the prospect, but the earl's petted daughter would not see it, and irritably declared that she would rather have a good gallop over the common with papa and the dogs than stay at home to be snubbed by any one.

"Perhaps so; but I do not approve of these wild rides across country;" her mother told her, "neither do I like you to visit at a house where there is no lady to receive you."

"The colonel is a very old friend, and I should be with papa," was the defiant answer, "if he is satisfied——"

"But he is not," the countess interposed; "he yields against his better judgment, because he does not like to deny you anything."

"And I love him for it dearly—yes, dearly!" cried Eudora, with such vehemence that Lady Chessington grew pale with emotion, and Eda, who had been on thorns during the whole of the colloquy, could not resist giving the refractory daughter a look of appeal and entreaty. Was it possible that she did not know the pain she was inflicting on her mother by these rude and cruel speeches?

Eudora reddened, and hung her head; but she was so accustomed to have her own way, that she felt more angry at Lady Chessington's objections than ashamed of her own behaviour. Still, she could not help recalling what Eda had said on the previous day respecting her own mother; and when the countess—still too much moved to do more than nod a farewell to her guest—quitted the room, she stepped forward, as if half inclined to follow, and entreat her forgiveness, but checked the good impulse, and stood there, silent and sullen.

A servant came to the door the next minute, to say that the earl wished to know if Lady Eudora was ready; and Eda involuntarily clasped her hands, and leaned forward, in her eagerness to know what she would do. Would her self-will win the day, or her better feelings prevail?

There was a pause, and then the young lady carelessly said, "Tell papa, with my love, that I shall not be able to ride with him this morning."

Eda heard this message given, and she bent over the work that had been lying on her lap; but ere long it was snatched out of her hand by Eudora herself.

"Why, you silly little thing, you are crying—actually crying! Is it in pity for mamma, or are these tears for me?"

"I know I am very weak and foolish," Eda faltered, "but—but I could not help crying for joy, when I saw you gain a victory over yourself." And she put her arms round Eudora, and kissed the cheek that still glowed with angry feelings.

Not another word was spoken; but Eudora slid down on the floor beside her new friend, and hid her face on her lap. Her tears were not as easily evoked as Eda's; but there was a softened light in her eyes when, after a lengthy interval, she looked up and said, "Kiss me again, Eda; I would be like you if I could!"

Neither of the girls knew that the door had been softly opened, and that Lady Chessington had looked in upon them, as one knelt humiliated and penitent, and the lips of the other moved in fervent prayer that this repentance might be lasting.

(To be continued.)

MY ROSES.

A ROSE is my darling—a baby rose—
A little pink bud that gaily grows,
'Mid glistening leaves on parent tree,
And I know my rose lives just for me.

My rose it blossomed one cold spring morn,
Or ever the hawthorn-tips were born,
Or ever amid the hedgerows green
The first pale primrose was to be seen.

The days were cold and the air was chill,
The white snow covered the distant hill,
And the garden lay deserted, bare,
No flower would venture to blossom there.

And I was alone with sad sad heart,
Fresh from the place where the angels part
The dead and living, and take away
The flowers that may live some future day.

And the rose-tree saw me pass in gloom
Down the rose path to the little tomb,
By the church beyond, where lay at rest
The Rose of all roses I loved best.

Or ever the birds began to sing
My Rose was nipped by the early spring;
Chilled by the breath of the new-born year,
It dare not bloom in my garden drear.

No power on earth could its young life save,
So I laid the rose-leaves in the grave;
But my Rose, I know, by God was given,
And it blossoms now for me in heaven.

And here on earth, though the air is keen,
This parent tree has my sorrow seen,
Has seen me walking alone, alone,
My own little Rose for ever gone.

And so it has faced the early spring,
(Sheltered perhaps by some angel's wing),
With a bud upon its tender breast,
Like the little Rose I loved the best.

And truly I love this baby rose,
This little pink bud that gaily grows
'Mid glistening leaves on parent tree,
For I know it has blossomed alone for me!

And God through my tears says words of love
"This rose for earth, and thine own above
For the Rose of Sharon cares to give,
Both roses that wither and those that live."

H. G.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 6. Ananias and Sapphira.

Chapters to be read—Acts iv., v. (parts of)

INTRODUCTION. Have so far heard of the apostles and early Christians as a kind of happy family, 5,000 in number, all filled with same spirit, holding same doctrine, continuing in same fellowship; some having undergone persecution; all full of joy in believing. Ask what effect the persecution had: united more than ever together, made bold to preach the Word. New troubles begin from within the Church.

I. A Common Purse. (Read iv. 32—37.) Ask what our Lord required of those who followed Him (Matt. xvi. 24), meaning the cross of trouble, persecution, &c. Which apostles had already had to bear this? What else did He require? Remind of the young man who wished to be a disciple; what kept him back? (Matt. xix. 22.) What, therefore, would the disciples require of the converts? but in what spirit were these gifts to be made? (2 Cor. ix. 7.) What had the apostles themselves given up? What did Matthew leave, and Peter, and Andrew, and the sons of Zebedee? (Matt. iv. 20, 22.) So now the converts follow these examples. Show the children how everything comes from God—health, good, supplies, &c. (James i. 17); and from the parable of the sheep and the goats, and talents (Matt. xxv.), that these gifts are loans to be used for God in feeding the hungry, &c. Now picture the Christians selling their lands, houses, property, &c.; hastening with joy to the apostles; pouring out the money; buying necessaries; feeding the poor; delighted to do something to imitate Christ.

Practical Lessons. What does all this teach us? (1) Religion claims all that we have. To whom do we belong? (1 Cor. vi. 19, 20.) Therefore all that we have is God's, to be used for Him; not now required to give up all for Him; still, the spirit of the requirements the same; to be ready to part with them; consider as God's and not ours; to ask with Saul, "what wilt thou have me to do?" (Acts ix. 6.) (2) The offerings must be voluntary. Contrast the requirements of the Jewish law—giving always one-tenth—with the Christian requirement (2 Cor. ix. 7). No one was compelled to sell his lands, but all caught the infection of giving. Ask the children what they give, and how they give.

II. A Vain Offering. (Read ver. 1—11.) The Christian religion now become popular; apostles thought a great deal of, probably commended highly, those who sold their possessions to give to the poor, perhaps praised them too much. Two persons thought they would get credit too with them; who were they? Still liked their money much; how could they manage? Surely need not sell all or give up all; but then would lose some credit, so agree to keep back part and give rest, as if all. Picture Ananias coming in with his money, expecting commendation; Peter's indignant words; Ananias' consternation at being found out; his sudden death, and burial. Then the wife coming in, being questioned, answering as agreed upon; her equally sudden death, the quick burial; the news spreading; the effect on all the Church. Notice the following points:—(a) The lie was planned, not a hasty one on spur of the moment, but deliberately designed to get credit for liberality, hence so much the worse. (b) The lie was against God. Let children notice the proof of the divinity of the Holy Ghost from verses 3, 4, called a lie against God and Holy Ghost. (c) The lie was punished. Remind how God is called the God of truth (John xiv. 6) and of the punishment assigned to liars (Rev. xxi. 8). (d) The effect on the Church. How was it discovered? Probably by direct revelation to Peter, who also was the means of their punishment. Hence would magnify apostles, and also strike awe into the Christians; would deter others from same sin; would test the genuineness of those who gave money.

Practical Lessons. Let children see—(1) The sinfulness of a lie. Ask what a lie is, and show how it extends to conduct as well as words, and that half the truth is as much a lie as a direct lie. Bring home to the children the sin of deceit in copying at school, spending money not entirely theirs, deceiving as to amount of work done, &c. Remind of the (2) Omniscience of God. Can often deceive master, teacher, companions, but never God. What does He look at? Ask, then, for honest and guileless heart, for Holy Spirit to teach perfect truth in inward parts (Ps. li. 6), so as to fit for heaven, into which no lie may enter.

Questions to be answered.

1. How were the poor maintained?
2. Show the nature of the requirements of religion as regards giving to God.
3. Who fell into sin as regards their gifts, and how?
4. How was the sin detected?
5. What was the punishment?
6. What lessons may we learn from the story?

MAY FLOWER, OR "SERVANT OF ALL."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LITTLE BUTTERCUP," "NOTHING BUT A SONG," "HOW TO ENTER INTO REST," ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

"But how to perform that which is good, I find not."—Rom. vii. 18.

"If Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness."—Rom. viii. 10.

IT had been an unfortunate morning, and things had gone wrong more than once with May. It was one of those days, when, as she said to herself, "Do what you would, things went all crooked."

The first part of the afternoon she spent working with her sisters, sorely disliking it; but the morning had made her gentle, and she tried, though only in a half-hearted sort of way, to put her own will aside, and to do "what she ought to do."

At last she was free; and away she rushed to her own room, and by-and-by sprang down-stairs with bounding jumps, making the whole house resound; whereupon, first Stephen, and then Phillis, appeared from different rooms with a rebuke.

She stopped the words that came jumping to her mouth, for she did not want to be kept in, and only fidgeted till she had permission to go on.

At the garden-door she met Geraldine.

"Oh, Gerrie! you are not going to spend the afternoon with Mrs. Hurst?"

"Yes; were you going? Well, come along with me."

But May knew that Geraldine would enjoy a quiet time with their old friend; "two was company, three none," in this case. Should she give up and wait, or should she please herself and go?

"Well, what is it?" asked Gerrie, smiling. "You may really come, May Flower, so don't look so grave about it."

"Well, Gerrie, I think I won't come now; I think I will come down by-and-by."

"Will you? No, don't; I know you want to come; and you have been working quite hard this afternoon. Come along, darling, and we will have a capital time."

But Gerrie's free giving up of what May knew must have been her plan—namely, a long quiet tête-à-tête with Mrs. Hurst—was infectious. May began to laugh, and finally, Geraldine went alone, with a promise from her, that she would follow at five o'clock.

She spent the time idling about, doing nothing, and just worrying herself and the household with demands about what the time was—whether it was not going very slowly, whether it always went as slowly, or only to-day—till Tom came in and claimed her for a scramble.

It would have been most natural to her to send him off sharply; but, in spite of her idleness, the giving up to Gerrie had nerved her somewhat.

"Tom, do go without me," she said; "for it's only a quarter to five, and I want to go down to the rectory at five; Mrs. Hurst and Gerrie expect me."

"I dare say! Why, you can see them any day; you just come."

"No," May said, perfectly decidedly.

"Well, come for a quarter of an hour, then; you can do that."

So they went off, down the long garden, and over the field, till they came to the kitchen-garden, where was the old tool-shed. Tom found the key, unlocked the door, and going in, began examining all the contents, appealing every second moment to May. He wanted to make a seat for the garden, would this do, did she think? would that? How broad must the seat be? Should the legs be very short? Which was most comfortable?

May fidgeted. Tom could do that just as well without her, she thought, and she wanted to go. The small stock of patience with which she had started from the house was entirely exhausted.

"Oh, Tom, that'll do!" she said, sharply.

But Tom went on all the same as if she had never spoken.

"There, that'll do!" she said again. "What's the good of turning over all those old things? I wish you'd be quick!"

There was something in the pettish pleading voice that roused the mischief in Tom. He looked up, comprehending for the first time that, as he would express it, "May was in a taking."

She looked so pretty standing there, with heightened colour, twisting first on one foot and then on the other, drumming with her fingers on the hard wall, and in spite of her impatience, still waiting for him, that he laughed at her.

"I'll wait no longer, Tom!" she cried, springing to the door; but he was before her, and reached it first, and locked it.

"Won't you wait?" he asked.

"Tom! you horrid, unkind, wretched boy, let me go! I will go, Tom!" and she stamped her foot again and again in a frenzy of passion and rage, as he danced round her at arm's length, and then swung himself up the rafters far beyond her reach in the high pointed roof, and after many exertions, squeezed out of the tiny window at the top.

"Tom! Tom!" she shrieked.

"All right," he said, popping his head in again for a last glance. "Don't wait any longer, now;" and in another moment she heard him scramble down the sloping roof, drop on the ground, and run off.

"Tom!" she screamed at the top of her voice, battering the door with feet and fists; but Tom was far away.

It was long before she in the least collected herself; but at last she stopped beating and calling, and listened.

"Surely he would come back;" but she listened in vain. Then other thoughts came, and the tears gathered in her large eyes, and began to fall fast.

Was this the day she had begun by wishing and trying so hard to be good?—it had been worse than any other almost; for it was long since she had given way to such a burst of passion as this, and yet she was sure she had tried, at any rate she was sure she had meant to try; but oh! why had she failed so dreadfully? If only she had been a little more patient, it would never have happened, that was quite plain; if only she had not fidgeted and got angry, or even at the very last had laughed, she was sure Tom would have come back. But none of this was so bad as the thought that, while in heart she had meant to be a good servant of, and for the Lord Jesus, she had so utterly failed outwardly. The tears fell thick as she leaned against the wooden door. How had it been? she tried to think; and then the words that Stephen had once spoken, and which were always presenting themselves to her, came again into her thoughts, about trading with the little goodness that she seemed to have of her own, instead of recognising that there was nothing good in herself, and that she must leave that alone, and just take and use Christ Himself; that He would give her His patience, His gentleness, His love, His goodness. She remembered he had told her not to think so much of how she had to work and plod to get on, but to think how He was with her to work it for her and in her. Yes, she had forgotten that, and, trying to stand, had fallen.

Many other thoughts came to her; but, though it had been outwardly such an unsuccessful day, she did not feel daunted. She began to long and hope for the next day, that outwardly she might show how earnestly she wanted to become like the Lord Jesus, and to put away all that was displeasing to Him.

The church clock had long since struck six in the distance. She could not understand being left there so long. Presently, seven tolled out. She knew they would be at tea now; were they leaving her there on purpose? When Tom had said what a passion she was in, had they said she should remain there as a punishment?

The time passed away very slowly; it had become quite dark in the tool-house before now, and she knew it must be getting quite dark out of doors.

She was getting very hungry and cold; never, in all her life, had she had such a punishment as this, and never had she taken any so humbly.

Eight struck—half-past eight.

Then a dreadful fear seized her. "Could they be going to leave her here all night?" She sprang from the floor in a frenzy of terror as the thought struck her.

"O God! O God!" she cried, "don't—don't let them do it!"

And even as she said the words, the thought of Stephen being at home quieted her. However naughty she had been, and however severely they might punish her, she was quite sure he would never leave her there alone all night, away from everybody.

The slow minutes passed away. Then nine struck; and she covered her face with her hands, crouching up and shivering, but always repeating, "Stephen never would; no, he never would."

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

29. "If we believe not, yet He (Jesus) abideth faithful" (2 Tim. ii. 13). Mention an instance from St. Matthew's Gospel of the fulfilment of this promise before the Saviour's ascension.

30. In how many of our Lord's parables is any name given to the persons mentioned?

31. "We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar," said our Lord's enemies (Luke xxiii. 2). Prove the falsity of this charge.

32. Quote a verse from the prophecy of Ezekiel to show that Damascus was an important commercial city.

33. St. James says (ii. 19.), "The devils also believe." Give instances proving their belief in the divinity of the Lord Jesus.

34. "Whatsoever hath a blemish," said Moses, "that shall ye not offer." Was there any exception to this rule?

35. Which is the most ancient war on record in Holy Scripture?

36. We read in John xix. 17; "And Jesus bearing His cross went forth," &c. Find the antitype.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 64.

19. Matt. xii. 23.

20. See 1 Kings ii. 13—25.

21. St. John (vi. 15.) tells us that Jesus "perceived that they would come and take Him by force, to make Him a king."

22. Gen. xxii. 18; xxi. 12; xxvi. 4; xxviii. 14.

23. See John xii. 28. The first was at His baptism (Matt. iii. 17); the next on the mount (Matt. xvii. 5).

24. Acts xv. 22, 40.

(Drawn by CHARLES GREEN.)

CRAZY KATE.

BY MRS. G. LINNÆUS BANKS.

EVER she wanders along the shore,
Alike in the glow and shine,
Alike when the awful waters roar,
And sprinkle her with their brine;
Watching each tiny speck of a sail,
As men look out for a star,
Wistful eyes and monotonous wail
Asking the distance afar,
"When will he come back o'er the sea?
When, oh when will our meeting be?"

Her hair was brown, and her young eye clear,
  Her raiment was neat and trim,
When the first faint shadowings of fear
  Brought her here to look for him,
When the crested waves ran swift and high,
  And their white foam lipped her feet,
And thunder-peals from an angry sky
  Were rocking her boulder-seat,
As she cried for him across the sea,
"When, oh when will our meeting be?"

Her locks are grey, and her eye is dim,
  Her dress is as worn as she,
Yet still she looks and watches for him
  To come back over the sea.
Heeding no winds that flutter her rags,
  No sun that scorches her brow,
Pacing the sands or climbing the crags,
  Peering for pennant and prow;
Ever that wail is sent o'er the sea,
"When, oh when will our meeting be?"

The very sea-birds skimming the wave,
  Hearing the piteous cry,
Have borne its echoes unto a grave
  That lies 'neath an arctic sky;
Yet answer none have they brought again,
  In all of the thirty years
She has watched with crazy heart and brain,
  And eyes that have burnt up tears.
But soon she will sail for the crystal sea,
And then, oh then will their meeting be!

EDWARD TURNER, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.

BY AGNES MACDONELL, AUTHOR OF "MARTIN'S VINEYARD."

CHAPTER V.

MISS VERNON.

"Then followed counsel, comfort, and the words Which make a man feel strong in speaking truth."

ONE evening, after my work was done, I went up to the address given in the advertisement, thinking I would look at the place and see what it was like. I found the office was in one of the older squares, between the City and the West End. It was a quiet-looking house, with a plate on the door stating the hours of business. I walked once or twice up and down before the house, noticing all this, and then went home again, resolved that I would make the application for work.

The next Saturday afternoon I went to the office in Macgregor Square. An elderly man was sitting at a desk, he asked my errand, and then told me I must wait a few minutes, for Miss Vernon was engaged at the moment. So I stood waiting, hearing nothing but the scratching of the clerk's pen as he went on writing. In a while the door of an inner room opened, and some one came out. The clerk looked up over his spectacles, and waved his pen to bid me go in; the door shut behind me. A lady in a black dress, with a gold chain about her neck, was sitting at the table. I told her as clearly and simply as I could the errand I came on. She asked me the age of the young woman, whether she could read and write, and said it was not usual to receive applications from any but the girls themselves; but that as all I had stated about the girl was satisfactory, she was willing to enter her name at once.

"But," she said, "I must tell you that I have to refuse many applicants, from no fault of their own, but because they are incapable of taking the instruction here through want of previous education. For the first six months each girl must be provided for; for there is no payment made by us till a certain facility and trustworthiness is secured in the operators. Some of the girls who are homeless," the lady went on, "I take under my own care, and provide them with board and lodging, and devote the evenings to teaching them myself; but for these, ten pounds must be paid, and a less sum is paid for those who do not lodge in the house, but simply take their meals here." I told her that the young woman I spoke of would most likely be of this class, and that I was ready to pay for her entrance.

As I stood before the lady when she was entering the name and age of Barbara in a book, and arranging the time for seeing her, she said, "Your sister is very young."

I said, "She is not my sister, ma'am; she is no relation to me; but I have known her and her brother a good while, and they are orphans."

The lady looked up, and waited a moment. I can see her now as she leaned on the table, and her beautiful quiet eyes on me, as if she would read my mind.

"I do not wish to inquire into your affairs," she said, "which are sacred to yourself; but I think I can trust you to understand what I am going to say. Remember that any tie which gives you an influence and power over another, perhaps the strongest and firmest that life can give, is a great responsibility—a great trust to be used as something that God has given us. Remember—I cannot help saying this to you—remember to use the power you have nobly and generously."

These words went into my heart, and though I never thought the man or woman lived that could have made me speak about my own secret thoughts of Barbara, I felt as if this woman had called like an angel on my heart, like the very voice of God. The words came clear and straight to my tongue, and I told her that I did understand her, and that my great hope was to help Barbara and her brother, and to stand between them and trouble to the end. I told her how I had resolved this the day I found them poor orphans, almost alone in the world. I made her understand how like a child the girl was still, and how little she thought of me, and this being so, I could not ask her to be my wife, though that was all my hope for the future, when the time to ask her should come. "And having this hope," I said, "I would not have her know that I had had a hand in this business, or that my bit of money had helped her to the new work. It would be a sort of fetter to her mind," I said, "and I care for her too well to wish to overweigh her judgment by the least thing."

The lady stood up; and after a moment or two she said, holding out her hand, "I will keep your secret till, with God's blessing, it need be no longer a secret. Send Barbara to me in the morning."

So Barbara went to the office in Macgregor Square, and this was the beginning of a happy life to her. Miss Vernon was very kind; she seemed to know the heart of every one about her, and she gave help and counsel to each one as they needed. She was very good to Barbara. I used to think there was something about Barbara that would win love from any one, and that Miss Vernon felt her pretty bright ways and the innocent gay spirit that lay under them, too. Barbara, too, was an orphan, and perhaps that made her specially kind; at any rate, she lent her books, and took her once or twice into the country with her alone, to spend the day out in the fields, and talked to her more beautifully and wisely than any written book; but never by word or sign, I found, did she reveal what I had told her that first day when I saw her at the office.

CHAPTER VI.

PATIENT LOVE.

"Forget not yet the tried intent
Of such a truth as I have meant,
My great travail so gladly spent,
Forget not yet!"

SIR T. WYAT.

I THINK Barbara had been about six months at the office in Macgregor Square when her aunt died. I had not seen her for a good while, for during those six months I had gone little near her, knowing she was safe and happy, and that I was little use to her. But when her aunt died, and she was left, I felt as if my time perhaps had come again, and I could help her.

I went down to Berners Street the evening of the day her aunt was buried. The streets were just beginning to be lighted, and it was a wet and murky night, such as we have in November. I was thinking of the future as I walked down, and trying to find out what was best to do for Barbara and her brother now. Tom had still nearly a year longer to stay at the Lambeth school, and during that time I could look out for work for him. Barbara was now without a home, and my heart yearned with a patient hope that I might take her to my own. I had been that morning to see Miss Vernon, but I had only said to her, that if she thought it the best thing for Barbara to enter the house in Macgregor Square as a boarder for the next three or six months, I was ready to pay the few pounds that were required for that purpose, and would make the payments in instalments. Miss Vernon said she was quite sure this was the best thing to be done, and asked me if I would let Barbara know that I had a hand in her going to the Home; but I said, No, if she pleased, I would rather not—not at least till I had seen Barbara myself.

I could see a faint light burning in the window of the room, as I looked up from the street; I knew Miss Vernon had been with her during the day, and I thought it likely that some of the neighbours might be there then. I knocked twice before I heard her voice say, "Come in." When I opened the door she was standing in the middle of the room, a candle with a long wick was burning on the table; the boy lay asleep on the bed. I think she had been beside him, and the two young things had been crying together till he fell asleep.

She looked very pale, and her eyes were red with crying. She set me a chair near the fire, and sat down herself. I don't know what I said to comfort her. I could not say much. I only wanted her to feel a little, from what I said, that she could turn to me whenever things went ill with her, or trouble was upon her; and I tried to say it so that she might feel I made no claim upon her, and expected no reward, for as she talked, I saw that she was calm, and settled in her purpose to go on with the work with Miss Vernon, and that, besides her sorrow, was the only thought on her mind. So I sat quiet, with my hand over my eyes, while she told me how Miss Vernon had been with her and arranged for her to board in the Home at Macgregor Square.

"I can't earn enough yet to pay the terms, I know," she said; "but Miss Vernon says she has a certain fund, left with her expressly for a case like mine, which will cover the expenses of my board and lodging. I never heard of this fund before," said Barbara, going on, "and I cannot help thinking that it springs from her in some way. Oh, how good she is! But when I asked her she said, 'Oh no!' and then she spoke so beautifully about Christian acts of love and kindness, which sometimes it was only worldly pride and hardness to refuse. But do you think it could be owing to her, after all, and that she withheld what she had done from me out of kindness?"

"Well," I said, "it's hard to tell, of course; but she told you very plain that it wasn't she as supplied the money, you see."

I felt almost ashamed to meet Barbara's clear eyes, knowing she was deceived; and I think, too, if she had asked one more question, or looked as if she guessed the truth, I should have told her all; but her next words showed that she had no thought of me in the matter.

"My heart is full of love and gratitude to Miss Vernon," she said; "and I could not bear to owe so much to any one else in the world."

"Of course, my dear," I said, "it's quite right to accept a kindness when it's kindly meant; and Miss Vernon would never advise you to do anything that wasn't wise and straightforward for a young woman to do."

Then we talked about her poor aunt, and the tears kept rising to her eyes as she spoke. She seemed weak and excited both. "You're weak and tired," I said. "Have you had anything to eat?"

"Oh yes," she said, "the woman from below came up and brought me some tea a while ago; but Tom was so tired, I got him to go to bed after he had had his, and I forgot mine."

I got up and fetched the neglected cup of tea and piece of bread-and-butter, and stood beside her as she drank, and ate a morsel. She seemed better for the nourishment. The clock of St. Paul's struck eight. I counted the strokes as I stood there, and then I knew I must go. I had been there more than an hour.

"The woman from next door will be coming in directly," I said, "and I must go now. Good-night!"

"Good night!" she said, and then quickly she took my hand in both of hers, and said, "You are very kind! oh very, very kind! I shall never forget how kind you have been to us!"

"It's all the happiness I have," I said, "to help you. There's nothing in the world I would not do for you." And she smiled, with the tears upon her face; and so we parted.

About the end of March I got a letter from Barbara, saying that she was going to a situation in the country, as telegrapher at the Airley junction, on the South Weald line of railway. I felt almost stunned when I read this letter, for the Airley station was the nearest station to Birchfield, and within a stone's throw of my mother's cottage on the common. I wondered whether Miss Vernon had known of this; and after a while I was sure she had, for when I saw Barbara, a few days later, she told me how, the week before, Miss Vernon had taken herself and three other girls into the country for the day. She told me they had been to a wood near Airley Common, and there Miss Vernon had left them for a time, while she went to make a call somewhere in the neighbourhood. "And think," said Barbara, "it was to inquire about a lodging for me in a cottage near the Airley station, and who should be living in the cottage but your mother! She had thought of all that, and how much happier I should feel with people I should know about."

It did my heart good to see her bright and smiling, and clapping her hands, as she said how pleasant it would be to live with my mother, and I thought of the Sundays I would spend at home; and all the future began to brighten before me.

"It will be so nice that you are still in London," she said, as we parted, "for Tom's sake. I couldn't bear to leave him only I know you will be here, and you will go and see him, won't you, sometimes?"

CHAPTER VII.

RISING JEALOUSY.

"Oh, if thou knew'st how thou thyself dost harm,
And dost prejudge thy bliss, and spoil my rest!"
Earl of Sterline.

I PROMISED to go and see Tom as often as I could, and to take word of him down to her at Birchfield when I went home for my four days' holiday at Easter, which was near at hand then. But I thought when I said "good-bye" to her, and saw how the tears started to her eyes, and how troubled her heart was to leave Tom alone in London, and to part from Miss Vernon and her old life, I made up my mind that if I could any way get the people of the school to let him go, I would take the boy down with me to spend a couple of days with his sister. And so I did.

It was a soft spring afternoon, I remember, as I walked up the fields from the station, with the lad by my side. The sky was clearing after a shower, and a robin was singing in the hedge. All looked so familiar, so like the old days, and yet there was a change over everything. I was trying, as I walked along, to make my old life and my new life join hands as it were, for Barbara belonged now to both. The roses on the house side had grown since last summer, and there were tall lilac trees just bursting into bloom by the garden gate.

Barbara was standing on the walk, with a shawl and bonnet in her hand, as if she had just come in from walking. She looked up, and then ran forward with a cry of joy, and threw her arms round the boy, falling on her knees to look into his face, and then shut her eyes and laid her head upon his shoulder, and kept on saying, softly, how she loved him, and how good he was—how good. Then she held up her hand to me, still kneeling, with tears floating over her eyes, and the kindest smile on her face. And we went into the house together, where my mother was sitting knitting at the window, waiting for me. What a happy evening that was! I remember every incident of it, how it seemed like a dream to see my sister and Barbara sitting together whispering over their work, and Barbara's pretty ways to my mother, threading her needle and looking so at home and, as it seemed to me, like a daughter to her. Tom sat watching Robert cutting ornamental flower-sticks for his sweet-peas and carnations, for he had got a place as a gardener at a gentleman's place near. Now nothing would suit little Tom but he must be a gardener too, and come and be under-gardener to Robert, as soon as ever he left school. Ann was the only quiet one, and I fancied she looked paler than she used, and graver than girls of her age; but then I knew she was very serious and religious in her feelings, and that, I thought, might be the reason.

It was a very happy evening; and as I look back I feel again the old glow of happiness that was over it, and which made it seem like an hour of sunshine before the clouds gathered and darkened over days of gloom.

They had a great many questions to ask me about my London work, and then Robert told me the news of the village, and one thing and another that he knew I should like to hear.

"You'll have to go down to the shop and see Mr. Brereton, Ned," says he, "he'll be glad to see you, and show you some of the alterations there."

"Charlie will be here, I expect, to-morrow," says my mother; "he is mostly here on Sundays."

"Charlie won't tell Ned much about the workshop, mother," said Robert, smiling; "it's not his way, you know."

"How is he going on?" I asked.

"Oh, very well," said Robert; "he works very well when he gives his mind to it, but he is so fond of amusing himself. I don't think he ever will do much on the steady line. He hasn't judgment enough for a working man; he ought to have been born a gentleman, ought Charlie. He isn't a bit proud though," said Robert, going on. "Why, another fellow, you know, that had come to be partner in a business like Brereton's, wouldn't come visiting his old friends as regular as Charlie does, you see."

"Yes," says my mother, "and he's very easy with his money too. What do you think, Ned! He comes up the other evening and finds Barbara watering the flowers I have there in the window, and wants her to give him a sprig of one of them, and somehow or other he upsets a pot of geranium; and then nothing would suit him but he must bring some fine greenhouse flower in its place. There it is, that great scarlet thing, with a name as long as my finger. Ann, just fetch the flower-pot for Ned to see. It's a fine handsome thing, no doubt, but it shades the light sadly."

"Never mind, Ann," I said; "I'll take the candle and look at it myself," and I went to the window. My heart stopped beating with a sudden angry feeling, for on the stick the Latin name was scratched through with a pencil, and underneath was written "Barbara Milton."

It was the first sharp pang of jealousy, such as I had to bear for many a day afterwards.

It is no use to tell of those days that followed; they were honey and gall to me. Once, for half an hour perhaps on Sunday, I talked with Barbara of the days in London, and her aunt, and Miss Vernon, and I could see how faithful a memory she kept, and for many an hour that night I went over again the happiness of those few minutes.

But all this vanished like a vapour, or seemed to turn and mock me like a cruel face, when Charlie Brereton came, and I heard him laugh and talk to Barbara more familiarly than I could do, who had known her so much longer. For now I saw plainly how that he had every quality to charm a woman that I had not. He just stretched out his arm and took what I could only wait for. And yet I felt my life was bound to Barbara's by a stronger tie than even happiness can give, and that while I lived it never could be broken. It is no use, as I said, to go over those four days—which have only left a clear place in my memory, worn bare with bitter thoughts, like the patches on the common where it has been seared with fire—and I must go on with my story to the end.

(To be continued.)

CHRISTIAN GRACES.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A., RECTOR OF ARMAGH.

HUMILITY.

"Be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace unto the humble."—1 PET. v. 5.

THESE words set humility very high among the Christian graces, so high as to make one suspect that she herself, like those who learn of her, has long been quietly sitting down in a lower place than she deserves. There are many virtues that men admire, even when they neglect them. False men admire truth; intemperate men admire self-control; covetous men admire generosity; spiteful men admire meekness. All this proves that when people turn away from humility with a sort of lofty scorn, that is not merely because they are fallen creatures. They are fallen from other virtues besides this—from others which they reverence, as well as from this which they despise. One does not like to be called "an humble person:" one delights in hearing it said that his position is "a proud one;" and we almost expect a man to whom we look up to bear himself proudly in trouble or before his enemies.

Now, there are two reasons for this contempt into which humility has fallen. One is, that it can very easily be confounded with a despicable vice, and it has come in for part of the hatred that vice deserves. The other is, that pride can easily be confused with an excellent virtue, and people assume pride in order to get credit for what it looks like.

Who needs to be told what the vice is that mocks humility? Who has not heard people protest they can only do very badly what they know they do particularly well, to be praised; refuse a place of honour, to be pressed into it; call themselves humble and obscure individuals, to fix people's eyes on their importance? The most intolerable self-conceit of all is that which is constantly thrusting its lowliness upon our admiration, and calling on us to burn incense to a shrine where the veil of modesty is dropped over the brazen face of self-conceit. One longs to take these disguised boasters at their word, by consigning them to the obscurity they claim, putting another in the place they shrink from, and admitting, what is often true enough, the extreme badness of their work. Genuine humility is dishonoured by this wretched counterfeit; and men think it well to push and scramble for the foremost place, chiefly because it is even more straightforward and more manly to push and scramble, than to crawl there by low intrigue and falsehood.

Therefore, our first lesson in this virtue may well be this—to see that our humility is genuine, and shrink in abhorrence from saying lowly words to men, which we do not say as readily in our secret confessions to our God; and even if the words be honestly felt, we need not say them for the sake of saying them. If a man were thoroughly humble, he would never talk about it; he would never know it; he would rather suspect himself of being proud; and he would much rather take a place of honour quietly, than make a noise first and be forced there afterwards. Beyond doubt, there are hundreds of truly lowly men, whose great modesty has never once been noticed, except by God.

And then again, pride has been confused with something that is a duty to yourself and to society. It is not well to be constantly standing on your rights, and bridling up, if any one, in the push and hurry of affairs, or in ignorance and forgetfulness, sets an unconscious foot upon your side of the line; but it is well to prevent deliberate and wanton trespass. To stand rigidly on your rights is one thing; to let every wilful intruder trample them down is quite another. If you do this you encourage him to trample next upon your neighbours; you set an example that could not be widely followed without overturning society, and putting the world at the mercy of every insolent intruder. Just as one applauds the patriot who resists an usurper, or the citizen who prosecutes an impostor, so do we admire that cool dignified self-assertion from which impertinence recoils abashed. But people do not see how such a bearing may be worn as a breastplate by modesty herself. They think, most falsely, that humility is a matter of mere outward conduct, while it is really a state of mind, of temper, and of heart. One may feel himself most unworthy of an office or a rank, and yet he may be stern and terrible towards those who would refuse to give it due respect. "It is not myself, it is the position; the proper regard for exalted station; the homage due to those who bear great responsibility and do high service—it is these that are attacked in me, and these I will vehemently and resolutely defend." Is there any vanity in this?

And one more such assertion must be made. It is not pride in any man to know what he can do best, and honestly to enjoy the doing of it. The sense of pleasure in good sound work, the feeling of its value, even the sober, moderate enjoyment of that praise which follows it, is a right reward for its performance. If only that man were modest who habitually underrates himself, then modesty would be grounded in a mistake, and you would upset that great fundamental law of things, that whatever is true is good, what is false and erring is in just the same proportion bad.

What then is the true meaning of humility? It is the taking, not a false view, but the true view of our works and ourselves; knowing, indeed, what we can do, but also remembering all that we cannot. It is such an estimate of ourselves as does not forget our neighbours, and their gifts, abilities, claims, graces; and it is an estimate whose result is sobered down by the solemn question, "What have I that I have not received."

Now, I say that no man ever duly examined, not only a few showy things that may lift up his heart, but all that is within him and around, without learning a lesson of self-abasement.

There is something that you can do, or have already done well, and your pride begins to stir. But stay a moment. Think how much better it might have been done if the most had been made of your early opportunities; reflect whether many of those over whom your vanity now exalts itself would not, with your training and your chances, have greatly outshone your bright achievement; look how much more patience, and labour, and skill than ever you could boast have been poured out upon some far humbler object that you despise—upon the pattern of your coat; upon the baking of your bread—and the hues of your boasting will begin to fade. Then think, "A man has countless gifts and qualities, and if I am strong in one, how weak I am in others! Perhaps I have learned much, but what about thinking? I have thought much, but what about feeling? I have felt much, but what about action?" And then, once more, remember tongues shall cease; knowledge shall vanish away. Would an army rejoice in its flags and guns if it knew that at nightfall they would be surrendered to the foe? And shall we pride ourselves on what is to be for ever yielded when the night cometh?

Oh, that men were wise! that they would consider how all passes except the soul, and ask, before they boasted, what about the priceless deathless tenant in this frail tent the flesh? How can I be proud of a momentary wealth, when the soul is poor and naked? proud of a decaying fairness, when it is covered with wounds and bruises? proud of health, when it is dead? proud of wisdom, when my madness has killed it? O God, put out the torchlight that flares here upon the glitter of a mock jewel, and there upon the flush of tawdry paint, and bring up the clear and searching and exposing light of a conscience which the Holy Spirit has illuminated! Show us the reality of things! Teach the stiff neck to bend, and the proud tongue to stammer; and make us willing to stoop, that we may enter by a lowly door into the fold where humble and helpless creatures are safe in their Shepherd's helping!

God resisteth the proud. Awful, but most righteous truth! He resists them, because they resist Him. Every chance and change, every shower that foils their pleasure, every illness that drains their strength, every danger that shakes their valour, every failure that mocks their efforts, is God's labour to convince them of their weakness—and all these they thwart. He resists them, because they give Him the lie.

Everything about them bears His call to abase themselves. Not only the majesty of ocean and mountain, not only the sober splendour of night and the dazzling blaze of noon, but every inimitable blade of grass, every inexplicable breeze that bloweth where it listeth, every child's question that sages cannot answer, all of these speak to us of our smallness, our weakness, and our ignorance.

And His Gospel, with its picture of One who had to die an evil and shameful death to gain us leave to live; and Christ Himself with his pleadings, His warnings, His words of encouragement to all the lowly, and rebuke to all the proud—these are flatly and knowingly contradicted by every lofty look, by every boastful thought. He resists them, because they rob Him. Suppose every claim of the ambitious and braggart heart were true; what then? To whose glory should the claim be made? Look at the marsh when the tide is out; how flat, and grey, and tame it is! And shall it boast when the blue wave tosses and sings above it, as if the colour, the movement, and the music were its own? And now look at the maniac, the idiot, the felon, or the crowned murderer, who, perhaps, at this hour, may drench a continent in blood. I tell you it is only the covering tide of the goodness and bounty of your God that saves you from being such as they. As justly would the swamp deny to the deep seas the honour of their sparkling waters, as you or I claim any merit for ourselves, and not for the deeper, broader, brighter ocean of the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. No wonder He resists the proud pauper, the boaster who lives on God's forbearance, and yet snatches at God's honours for his own. But this is wonderful—that He gives, without merit or labour, without plea for the past or strength for the present or prospect for the future, He giveth grace unto the humble. And yet, if you think of it, you will find this the mainspring of all His Gospel scheme; this is the ground-plan of Christ's redemption—grace for the humble.

What is the first step towards knowing God, or rather, being known of Him? It is that step of abhorrent recoil from self which the soul takes when God shows us what we are—how our time has been wasted, our powers perverted, our Father despised, our flesh pampered, our spirit starved, and our whole being led captive by the devil at his will. Christ is so lowly, that our first step towards him is a downward step; so that already, at the very outset, the Lord causeth the arrogancy of the proud to cease. And what is the next step towards salvation? It is that which brings us within sight of matchless abasement, willingly endured by matchless rank, and worth, and dignity. Behold our Lord lifted up to draw all men unto Him, but not high and lifted up, as in prophetic vision; He is raised aloft to be a show and a derision, and a sign spoken against! Behold the meek, the lowly of heart, led to the slaughter like a lamb, and silent as a sheep before the shearers. See Him give to the nail to pierce that hand which wielded the sword of heaven, and the feet which trod down rebellious angels and archangels in the winepress of the wrath of God. Hear Him pardon one and pray for all, when it needed but the saying of a strong stern self-asserting word to scatter like an evil dream the world which these murderers had polluted, and to leave the Eternal and Almighty Son alone with his co-equal Father! Yes, stand upon that awful slope, and look and listen, and in the light of that dear and sacred countenance, more marred than that of any man, yet fairer than the children of men—say, then, what do you think of self-assertion, and parade, and boasting.

And yet, answer not till another word is spoken. You, proud and haughty man, whose tongue has no tremor, and whose heart has no qualm — your vileness was measured by those pains and sorrows. He was put to death for your sins, and it is from the altar of sacrifice, as Ezekiel in vision saw, that the river of healing rolls.

When we come to Him without a plea but our wretchedness, and receive wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption at His hand, without money or price, then we know the meaning of Paul's question, "Where is boasting, then? It is excluded."

But that is not all. The grace of every holy thought, of every temptation vanquished, of every sacrifice wrought—all, from the first breath of spiritual life to the crowning hour when the sting of death is broken—all, all is given to the humility which utterly distrusts itself, and therefore clings to the Saviour and His work, and His very present help, as a child in danger clasps the hand of a strong and trusted friend.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XIII.

MR. TEXLEY returned from Worthing a day or two after the scene we have just described, and came to Chessington Park to see Eda. He expressed himself much pleased to find her recovering so rapidly, but when she told him she hoped to resume her duties at the school very shortly, he began to look embarrassed.

"The school—ah, yes, the school. It is very kind of you to be so anxious about it—very kind; but I have been thinking, my dear Miss Granton, that until the Parliamentary scheme of education has been fairly tested, I had better let my own remain in abeyance."

"Then you do not intend to re-open the school?" Eda observed, with a sinking heart.

"Well, no; I think not—at all events, I am not inclined to do so just at present. In fact, I require the building for other purposes," and he launched into a description of an elaborate plan he had devised of rearing silkworms, on a scale large enough to give employment to an immense number of people.

Eda endeavoured to be polite, and listen with some appearance of interest; but she was thinking all the while of her own blighted prospects; and after he had gone, she sat turning over her last quarter's salary, which he had put into her hand, feeling as indignant as she was grieved at this summary dismissal.

She was still musing sorrowfully over the dilemma in which that gentleman's want of stability had placed her, when the countess came in.

"It is such a warm morning, my dear, that if you are not afraid to trust yourself with Eudora, she might drive you round the park in my pony phæton. What do you say; will you go?"

Eda drew her hand across her eyes. Ah, it was so pleasant here! But she must be resolute, and face the world again; and so she steadied her voice to reply: "If Lady Eudora will drive me back to Weston Hayes, I shall prefer it. Mr. Texley tells me that he shall not require my services any longer, and I must go to London at once, and consult my brother about getting something else to do."

The countess did not seem surprised at the announcement. "There is no hurry," she said, kindly. "You have scarcely regained your strength yet, and we are very glad to have you here."

Eda cast another lingering gaze around, and then frankly said she thought it would be better for her to go at once. Lady Chessington sat down opposite her. "You say this because you think it your duty to go. But if I could arrange for you to remain with us, would you like to do so?"

The joyful "Oh, madam!" was sufficient reply.

"Whether you do or do not leave us, we shall never forget that we are indebted to you for the life of our only child. But it is not for that reason I ask you if you will stay at Chessington. It is because I think —I hope—you have influence with my daughter, and would use it for her good."

Eda looked doubtful. Just at present Lady Eudora seemed pleased to come in and out of the room and chat, whenever she was in the humour, which was often, and always treated her with much kindness and confidence; but it would be no easy task to retain the good will of a wayward girl who rebelled against parental control, and could only be governed by appeals to her feelings.

"I see—you are afraid that I should expect too much," observed the countess, who had been closely studying Eda's features, "and perhaps blame you for some of Eudora's shortcomings; but you mistake me. I believe Miss Texley is right when she says that you are well-principled and—religious. I should be very glad for my daughter to have the example of your consistent conduct always before her eyes. I have great faith in example, Miss Granton; and as you are about her own age, and she likes you, the companionship may be beneficial to both. You shall

(Drawn by F. Barnard.)

"I do not choose to tell you all my secrets, sir."—p. 103.

share the lessons Eudora still takes, and I shall insist that she studies with you for a certain time daily, so that you may have opportunities of improving yourself while you are with us."

"I should like it very, very much!" Eda now replied, unhesitatingly; for she could not be insensible to the advantages of such an arrangement. "Mamma always regretted that her illness interfered with the education she intended to give me. But what will Lady Eudora say? I fear that I am not sufficiently advanced to be of much service to her, even if she were willing to accept my instructions."

"We will not ask you to assume so responsible an office as governess to Eudora has always proved," the countess answered, rather sadly; "it would be placing you in an awkward position, and would certainly defeat my object. But the little she knows has been learned so carelessly and superficially, that I think you will find her far behind you in all useful acquirements. This is why we wish you to urge and invite her to take a greater interest in them. If she sees you steadily striving to advance yourself, we have a hope that she too may become more studious and feminine."

"I am glad you are to stay with us!" Eudora said, when Eda had gratefully accepted the post of useful companion to the young lady—"very glad; but don't try your hand at converting me into a good little body like yourself. Mamma has tried and failed, and I'd rather not undergo the process again."

"Don't be alarmed!" was the smiling reply; "I have not sufficient faith in my abilities to attempt such a task. Besides, I'm not quite sure that I should like your ladyship to be precisely as myself. You possess qualities of which I could not make much use, while my homely tastes and fancies would not sit very well on Lord Chessington's daughter."

Eudora shrugged her shoulders. "You dive more deeply into the marrow of the matter than I do. However, you must not forget my warning. I like you very much; but you are not to preach at me every time I think my way the best, and follow it."

"I will remember to guard my tongue."

"And your eyes too," Eudora told her. "I don't like to be subdued by a look; it provokes me dreadfully; and you have an exasperating way of wincing and colouring if I speak a little—ever so little—rudely to mamma, even when you ought to know that I don't mean anything by it."

"You are schooling me rather sharply. Will you not make one concession in return for the many you demand?" asked Eda, still smiling.

"No, no—not one; for you are shrewd enough to bind me down by some promise I should have a trouble in fulfilling. If you live with me, you must put up with me as I am!"

"Then your ladyship must be equally forbearing,' said Eda, gently but firmly. "I cannot change my nature nor my habits of thought; neither would I wish to do so. I will not intrude them upon you, if I can help it; but it will be easier for you than for me to do away with my tendency to look sad and sorry when you vex the countess."

"By behaving better, I suppose! Are you offended with me, Miss Granton, that you administer such a sharp reproof?"

"I was not pretending to reprove; only to remind your ladyship that you must allow me a little latitude as well as yourself."

"As you please!" said Eudora, carelessly. "I think we have had enough of this subject, and so I'll thank you not to force it upon me again. I came to tell you that if you feel well enough, mamma would like you to come down-stairs this evening. She wishes to introduce you to papa and my cousin."

Eda began to feel excited and nervous at the prospect of the introduction.

"If Lady Chessington wishes it, of course I must obey, but I shall be glad when the ordeal is over."

Eudora laughed. "Why, you're not afraid of papa, surely! He is a tall, imposing-looking old gentleman with a deep gruffy voice; but he's the easiest, kindest old dear that ever lived! He's not half as terrible as my cousin Eustace, though he is very mild and gentlemanly, and never uses slang, nor smokes horrible cigars, nor gets quarrelsome after dinner, as I have seen men who give themselves greater airs. But then you cannot help knowing that all the while he is saying such civil things he is gauging you mentally, and that you cannot speak a word awry, or commit a foolish action, but he detects it, and despises you for it."

"I do not suppose Mr. St. Orme will trouble himself much about such an insignificant person as I am!" Eda replied, less moved by this description than she would have been if the young lady had not taken an aggrieved tone, as if prompted by resentment for some offence Mr. St. Orme had given her.

"But he will trouble himself about you, for you are to be my companion, and he professes so much cousinly affection for your humble servant, that he will want to satisfy himself whether you are all mamma and Miss Texley represent you."

"I should like to see Miss Texley, and thank her for speaking of me so kindly," said Eda, with grateful warmth.

"Pouf! she would only read you a lecture for wasting her time. Why did you interrupt me? I was telling you about my cousin Eustace."

"But you spoke as if you found the subject a disagreeable one," Eda reminded her.

"So it is. I do not mean that Eustace is personally a disagreeable fellow, quite the contrary; but it's just because he is always in the right that I don't like him; at least, not as much as I might but for that provoking fact. It is a pity," she added, stooping to pat the Maltese kitten that had established itself on Eda's footstool—"a great pity, because when papa dies, Eustace will have the title, and I the estates. By the way, you are not to enter into any compact with mamma respecting this wonderful cousin of mine. I'll not have his praises sung in my ears, nor his good qualities rehearsed at every opportunity. I would not marry him if I loved him, just because I can see that every one is so eager for me to do do so. Well?" she queried, raising her hot face, when she found that Eda made no comment upon her speech; "why do you not say what you think? I shall not quarrel with you for it."

But Eda would not be drawn into discussing so delicate a matter. "I am afraid I have not been listening very attentively. I am troubled about my dress. What ought I to wear this evening?"

"Pink gauze and spangles, of course!" laughed Eudora. "Oh, you goose! what could look nicer than the black merino you are now wearing?"

With her customary consideration, Lady Chessington came up-stairs herself to fetch Eda, glanced approvingly at her simple toilet, and had established her in a corner of her own sofa when the gentlemen joined them. The ordeal was not such a trying one, after all, as she had expected it to be. Mr. St. Orme, a quiet intellectual-looking young man, merely bowed, and went to a distant table to finish a design he was drawing for the countess's worsted-work; and the earl, after shaking her hand warmly, and telling her he should never forget what she had done for his dear little girl, buried himself in a newspaper, and bade Eudora give him some music.

She went to the piano, carelessly dashed off a hunting song and a march, then jumped up again, and ran off to frisk on the lawn in the moonlight with a couple of huge hounds, whose rough gambols would have frightened many girls of her age.

"Dear Eustace, will you ask Eudora to come in?" the countess said, anxiously. "She will wet her feet, and catch a violent cold."

Mr. St. Orme rose, and left the room, but returned presently without the truant; and Lady Chessington, after struggling a while with her maternal fears, appealed to the earl. "Pray call Eudora in, John; there is a heavy dew to-night!"

"Nonsense, dear! it will not hurt her," he said, without looking up from his paper.

"But if I wish it?"

"Why, then, send Eustace to fetch her."

"He has been, and she refuses to come," said the mother, her voice quivering with indignation.

"Oh well, don't be cross with her, mamma; she means no harm; her high spirits carry her away," the earl remarked, as he rose to open a glass door, and insist upon the young lady's return.

"You are abominably disobedient, Eudora!" he exclaimed, as she came in, shaking the drops from her tangled tresses, and clasping her hands so coaxingly round his arm, that he relaxed into a fond smile. "Why will you do such mad things? I'm quite ashamed of you!"

"Oh, but it was so lovely out there in the moonlight!" she answered, enthusiastically, "and dear old Ponto had been tied up all day. It was quite a charity to give him a run. Now wasn't it, papa?"

"Talking of dogs," the earl observed, "Colonel Sorbett wants to buy Ponto, and I have half promised to let him go. We have more dogs about the place than we know what to do with."

The father and daughter were instantly deep in an argument on the subject, and Eudora's prank was forgotten, till Lady Chessington interposed, to bid her go and take off her wet shoes.

"I don't think they are wet, mamma; but," she added, the next moment, "to oblige you, I'll put on another pair."

"Ah yes, always do as your mother tells you, my dear child," said the earl; and then he resumed his article in the newspaper, satisfied that he had done his duty, and quite oblivious of the disobedience he had left unrebuked, or rather rebuked in such a manner that utter silence would have been preferable. Lady Chessington heaved a bitter sigh; but no one seemed to divine what she must feel when her authority was thus set at nought except Mr. St. Orme. He came to where she was sitting, ostensibly to show her how much progress he had made, but really to draw her into a pleasant chat, in which Eda was courteously included.

Eudora, who was always restless, presently flitted towards them, but on finding that the subject under discussion was a serious one, she seized the first opportunity to challenge Mr. St. Orme to a game at chess. But she overrated her power; he could not forget that not an hour since she had wilfully resisted his entreaties, and, with a cold politeness that made Eudora's eyes emit angry flashes, he declined. He was just going to the library, he added, to fetch a review in which there was an article Lady Chessington would like to hear, because it bore upon what she had just been saying.

"It would only bore me to hear it," said Eudora, pettishly, "so I'll go and rouse papa from his nap. I dare say he will be civil enough to play at bésique or backgammon with me. It was much pleasanter out on the lawn than it is here."

As no one made any reply to this rude speech, she walked away, and avoided her mother's corner for the remainder of the evening.

CHAPTER XIV.

"You have not told me what you think of my cousin Eustace," Lady Eudora observed, on the following morning, as she was assisting Eda to select some books for their studies, and decide how much time should be given to each.

"I have not seen enough of Mr. St. Orme to venture an opinion; but I thought him very different to what you had led me to expect."

"Because he was tolerably civil to you? How could he be less? You are a stranger. But you must have seen how ungracious he was to me when I invited him to a game at chess."

Eudora appeared to have quite forgotten her treatment of her much-enduring cousin when he carried to her the countess's message, and added his own urgent entreaties that she would obey it; but Eda, who had been on thorns during the scene, could not be equally oblivious.

"Mamma is very fond of him," said Eudora.

"I dare say. His manner to Lady Chessington is very nice."

"And mine is not, eh?"

"I was not instituting any comparison," Eda assured her, with truth, for her thoughts had flown to her own mother and Mark.

"But that is what your observation implied," Lady Eudora persisted. "Come, be brave, Miss Granton, and say yes."

But Eda would not do this. She did not see any reason why she should be drawn into saying things that gave offence, because Lady Eudora's conscience pricked her so continually.

"I thought you always spoke the truth," she was tauntingly told.

"And so I hope I do; but your ladyship should not insist upon knowing what I think on subjects that do not concern me."

"Why, little honesty, why?"

"Because you know that I cannot say I think you behave well to the countess."

Eudora eagerly defended herself.

"Pray, was there any harm in my being on the lawn last night? Was it unladylike or unfeminine, as mamma is so fond of calling everything I do?"

"I am not here to be the judge of your actions," Eda reminded her. "Shall we read together?"

"I should have come in-doors directly," Eudora went on, "if Eustace had not been sent to enforce the command; but I do not choose to be dictated to by him."

"Which of these French dictionaries do you use?" she was asked.

"Either—both—I don't care. Do talk to me, Eda, and never mind offending me. If you would only enter into my difficulties a little, you would see that I am not always to blame. The root of the evil is that mamma and I have not a thought nor feeling in common, and therefore it is impossible for us to get on together. You see, she made my going out last night—though I did it without a thought of its being wrong—a crime, a positive crime!"

"For shame, Lady Eudora! how can you say so? The only feeling your mother expressed was anxiety lest you should catch cold through your imprudence."

"But I never do catch cold."

"I beg your pardon; it is not half an hour since you complained that your throat felt sore."

"Then I am in the wrong for once; but in general it is as I said—mamma and I can never see things in the same light."

"And you consider that Lady Chessington ought to set aside her opinions in deference to those of her daughter," observed Eda, with good-humoured sarcasm.

"No, I do not; but still I maintain that I have assigned the true reason of our quarrels; can you say that I have not?"

"Yes, Lady Eudora. You bid me be frank, and so I will plainly tell you that I fear your own selfishness is the real cause of all your troubles."

"This is the first time I have ever been called selfish," said Eudora, haughtily; and there was a long silence, during which Eda, distressed at having given offence by her plain dealing, was debating whether she ought to have said so much.

"What influence can I ever hope to have with this young girl," she asked herself, "if I begin by blurting out things which displease her? Yet she bids me be frank, and insists upon hearing the truth from my lips. If I were to stoop to side with her, or even prevaricate, I should despise myself."

"Shall we not begin reading, Lady Eudora?" she said, presently; and, receiving no answer, she read alone the first page of the book they had selected.

"I do not understand this sentence," she observed, presently; "it is an idiom, and puzzles one."

"Does it? Let me see what I can make of it!"

Lady Eudora was interested at last! Whenever there was a difficulty to surmount she could generally arouse herself to do battle with it; and already Eda's offences were forgotten.

"We must ask Eustace, he is an excellent French scholar, he will tell us," she said, after puzzling over the page for some time; and a servant was despatched to the library to request Mr. St. Orme to come to the pretty sunny apartment Lady Chessington had set apart for the fair students.

He came directly, his dark and rather impassive face softening into smiles when Eudora jumped up to induct him into her own chair, and paid him the unusual compliment of listening to his explanations, continuing the lesson till Lord Chessington sent for his daughter to write some notes for him.

"Do you like your new friend?" Mr. St. Orme asked his cousin, as they quitted the room together.

"Yes, but it is against my will," was the laughing response. "She makes me look into myself, and I do not like it."

"Pourquoi?" Mr. St. Orme demanded; but Eudora put her finger on her lip.

"I do not choose to tell you all my secrets, sir. Have you forgiven me for being so rude to you last night, when you brought me mamma's message?"

"Certainly," he answered, with an amused yet tender smile. "It would be the height of folly to brood over the caprices of a spoiled child."

"Don't snub me just as I am really sorry for my naughtiness," she said, with a look that completed her victory.

"Prove it by walking with me this afternoon as far as the rectory, will you, dear coz?"

"No," said Eudora, her mood suddenly changing. "As mamma would not let me ride with papa yesterday, I will not walk with you to-day."

"Very well, little whimsical, then I will walk alone," he answered, and kissing his hand to her, with a smile, he went away; but when Eudora could no longer see his face, it became heavily shadowed, for he loved her dearly. Why was he obliged to feel that, even if she would consent to fulfil the wishes of her parents and become his wife, he could not hope to be happy with her? It is true that she often evinced the most passionate regret for her faults, and would plead for forgiveness with such coaxing words and caresses, that those who loved her found it difficult to refuse her anything; but unfortunately her repentance was never lasting. How could it be, when, as Eda had truly averred, self—her own will, her own wishes—were the dominant chords of a heart as yet untuned to better things?

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 7. The First Martyr.

Chapters to be read—Acts vi., vii., (parts of).

INTRODUCTION. Ask what was the special work of the apostles, and what special gifts were given for this work; but what other work had now devolved upon them? Show how the care of so many converts would press unduly upon them, and take up too much time. They sent out as missionaries for something better than merely distributing food. Besides, difficulties had arisen: some began to join their number for what they could get; some began to complain that they did not get enough—what could the apostles do?

I. Stephen chosen. (Read vi. 1—8). Question on the appointment of the seven. From xxi. 8 show that being called "evangelists," their work was not merely to see after the poor, but also to teach and preach. Show the same fact from Stephen's preaching (ver. 14), and Philip's mission work in Samaria (ix. 29). Still their primary work to "serve tables," i.e., receive money, distribute food, keep accounts, &c. What sort of men would be selected? Why honest? Also must be full of wisdom from above, so as to decide such disputes as had arisen. Remind of Solomon, who asked for and received special wisdom for his work (1 Kings iii. 12). Notice the election. Seven, the perfect number, chosen by the Christians generally, brought to the apostles; special prayer offered up, an ordination by laying on of hands (v. 6). Now see Stephen's identity: for what was he specially noted? (ver. 5, 8) and what was the result of his faith? So that faith was not only required in the person healed, but in the performer of the miracle. But great success in God's work is sure to meet with opposition.

II. Stephen accused. (Read vi. 9—15.) How did the Scribes often treat Christ? Did they succeed in "catching Him in His talk?" Whence had He His wisdom? The same now descended on Stephen: how can they then catch him? Only by false witnesses. What shall they accuse him of? The Jews all devotedly attached to the Temple and laws of Moses; a cry raised against that sure to be caught up. So the Council (Sanhedrim) again assembled, and Stephen brought in as prisoner. Is he afraid or nervous? What was promised to be given in the same hour? (Matt. x. 19.) How did his face look?

III. Stephen's defence. It will not be well to attempt to read the whole of Stephen's speech. Let the children clearly understand the charge: that he had spoken blasphemous words against (a) the Temple, (b) the law—viz., that Jesus was going to destroy the Temple, and change the laws of Moses. How will he defend himself? Tell the children how fond the Jews were of hearing the story of their past history. So he began with that to show how their forefathers worshipped God long before the building of the Temple and the giving of the law. Question as follows:—Who was the father of the Jewish race? How did he worship God? What special revelations did he have? To whom else did God appear? How often to Jacob? What three promises as to the land, the seed, and the Messiah, were made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob? Who was raised up afterwards as the great deliverer? Where did God appear to Him? How did He reveal Himself? (ver. 32). What had he to do on the Mount Sinai? Why put off his shoes? What made it holy ground? When did the Israelites worship God? What became of the Tabernacle in their wanderings? Who was the great Jewish king? What did he desire to do? Why was not David allowed to build a temple? Who did build it? Yet, even then, what had Isaiah said about God's temple? (ver. 49), &c., &c. Then point out the lessons from all this. (1) That the patriarchs lived in full communion with God 450 years before the law was given on Mount Sinai, therefore, the laws or customs of Moses (i.e., the law of ceremonies), could not be universally binding. (2) That as the Temple was not built till Solomon's reign, it could not be so absolutely necessary. Remind what Christ had said of the nature of spiritual worship (John iv. 24), and that though He allows a house of prayer, He looks at the worship rather than the place.

IV. Stephen's end. (Read 56—60). Point out how the Council evidently became impatient. So he rebuked them boldly for the murder of Christ, like the prophets before him. Contrast their fury, gnashing of teeth, &c., though his judges, with the calmness and dignity of the prisoner. What peace had he in his heart? What special vision was vouchsafed him? His full faith enabled him to see the heavens opened. Now picture the scene of his death: the members of the council frantic with rage, stopping their ears so as not to hear his words, shouting out so as to drown his voice, carrying him along headlong down the slope of the city through the gate, the crowd rushing after them, catching the excitement; the Christians (although 5,000) powerless; at last the place of execution reached, the witnesses, laying aside their clothes, casting the first stones (John viii. 7), the others joining in; Stephen calm and composed, first commending his own soul, and then praying for theirs, till he falls asleep; devout men carry his body to be buried (viii. 2), and angels carry his soul to glory.

V. The Lessons. His life and death show the beauty of (1) personal holiness. Why was he specially chosen? What kind of witnesses were they compelled to bring against him? Let children ask themselves if their lives are like his—no outward sins to be taken hold of. Remind of Daniel—people who wished him harm could only find his religious zeal to bring against him. (2) Faith. Show how his implicit faith entered into his whole life; could do wonders, speak wisely, endure boldly, because he had implicit confidence in God. How was this faith rewarded? May be ours, too, if sought for. Should put up prayer, "help Thou mine unbelief!" (3) Forgiveness. Like his master, prayed for murderers. Children find it hard to forgive little wrongs, but must forgive or will not be forgiven. Remind of parable of unmerciful servant, and of Lord's Prayer. If like Stephen, may, like him, receive crown of glory. (James i. 12.)

Questions to be answered.

1. Why were the seven evangelists chosen?
2. Show from lives of Stephen and Philip what their work was.
3. What charge was made against Stephen?
4. How did he answer the charge?
5. What two lessons may be learned from his defence?
6. What are the lessons of his life?

MAY FLOWER, or "SERVANT OF ALL."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LITTLE BUTTERCUP," "NOTHING BUT A SONG," "HOW TO ENTER INTO REST," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

"Forgiving one another, as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you."—Eph. iv. 28.

"Charity never faileth."—1 Cor. xiii. 8.

AND how had it fared with those at home? Geraldine expected May to join her in vain.

At last, when she did not come, she told Mrs. Hurst what had happened.

"I know she gave up coming to let me enjoy a nice quiet time all by myself with you. Won't you and Dr. Hurst come and have tea with us?—it will be such a nice surprise for her!"

"To be sure we will! I am so glad to see little May Flower growing gentle and patient. We must do all we can to help her, Gerrie; it's a sore fight for that wayward little heart sometimes, but I believe it is set so true that it will come forth a fine polished shaft. Go to the study, dear, and tell the Doctor what you have just told me, for he is busy, and nothing else will bring him; but that will, for he's a shepherd that sets great store by the lambs of his flock."

Geraldine soon returned with the Doctor, and the three strolled up the little wood

There was a joyous welcome for kind Dr. and Mrs. Hurst; and then Geraldine asked, "Where's May?"

"May?" said Phillis, "we thought she was with you."

"Oh, it's all right," added Stephen; "I saw her go off with Tom, and afterwards met the young Lincolns looking for him, and wanting him for tea and supper, so they are sure to have taken her with them."

"I am disappointed," said the Doctor, gravely. "I came on purpose to have tea with the May Flower, and now you tell me she's out."

"Will you go home again, Dr. Hurst?" asked Gerrie, saucily.

"No, Geraldine, for I see I must remain to keep you in order."

"And to cheer us up a bit, Doctor," said Stephen. "We have dwindled down to nothing, it seems, now Jem is away, and the two children out."

And so they spent a very happy evening together, not so much as dreaming of the little prisoner close at hand.

It was long past ten before they began to think of the absentees.

"How late the children are!" said Phillis, "nothing can have happened, can it, Stephen?"

"Oh dear no, they are all right with the Lincolns. Ah, here they are!" and footsteps came running to the door.

"I only hear one!" said Geraldine, nervously, and the next instant Tom bounded into the room.

"Such a jolly time we've had!" he exclaimed.

"But where 's the May Flower?" asked Phillis.

Tom stopped short, dazed and bewildered; then pressed his hands to his forehead.

"May? May?" he repeated.

"Yes, May; where is she?" Stephen demanded, sharply.

"Oh, my word! what shall I do?"

"Speak this moment, Tom!" he commanded.

"I locked her in the tool-house at the bottom of the fields, and forgot all about her." He fumbled in his pockets. "Here's the key."

There was a moment of intense silence. Their mother's and father's most precious legacy to them—their little white May Flower—shut up in that gloomy place all these hours alone, and away from every one!

Tom was the first to speak. "Oh, Stephen—Phillis—Dr. Hurst—I didn't mean it!"

Stephen seized the key, and they started up together.

"Don't all come," he said decidedly; "it may frighten her worse."

Frighten her worse! the words were dreadful, for they remembered too well May's terror of the dark; her dread and fear of being where no one could get to her.

"Oh, do let me come!" Tom groaned.

"Let him go with you, Stephen," pleaded Gerrie, he can come back quickly to us. Stephen was already off, with Tom at his heels, the old Doctor following fast.

What a weird eerie place it looked! They trod lightly as they neared it, and before putting the key in the lock, Stephen called to her—

"May, May!" No answer, and he tore the door open. The starlight let him distinguish a heap on the ground, and he knelt down over it.

"May, May—here's Stephen."

"Oh May!" cried Tom; and then she shivered and spoke—

"Oh Stephen, Stephen!"

"Here I am, darling!" and presently she knew she was gathered up and safe in his arms.

"Run on, Tom, and tell them it's mostly all right, and let them get a warm bath for her."

"Oh, Stephen, I knew you'd come; I knew you would! why were you so long?" and her wild clinging told him how fearfully he had been expected and longed for.

"My poor little May Flower, we none of us knew where you were, or we would never have been so cruel!" and comforting and soothing the trembling child, very much as her mother might have done, he carried her home, and gave her into the safe care of Phillis and Mrs. Hurst.

Tom, having entreated Geraldine not to leave him, sat in a wretched state of misery.

"Now Tom, how did this happen?" asked Stephen, in a severe voice.

"Stephen," said Geraldine, "he is dreadfully sorry and troubled."

"So he ought to be," answered the brother in a voice that struck terror into Tom's heart.

"He has told me how it happened," Geraldine went on, and then she gave a short sketch of what had taken place.

"I cannot say what I think of such utter carelessness and selfishness," said Stephen, indignantly; "to shut a tender girl like that up for hours alone, without food, and in cold and darkness, just because you had chosen to exert yourself to put her in a passion; she might have screamed there for ever, and never have been heard—and very probably did."

"Can I go to bed?" asked Tom.

"Of course you can," and he followed him out of the room.

Geraldine trembled and sorrowed.

"My dear," said Dr. Hurst to Geraldine, "you must be content to leave Tom to his brothers. I fear he has not been going on altogether well lately, and it may be just as well to let him know it. If I'd a boy of my own, I'd trust him to Stephen sooner than to any one. He's most like your father of any of you, and not so unlike your mother."

"It seems so hard to do without them sometimes," she said.

"Surely it must, my child; so hard that it is no wonder He says, 'as one whom his mother comforteth so will I comfort you.' But you must not, and I know you do not, grudge them their happiness. It would have been very woeful for one to have long outlived the other, though either of them would have been content to do it for their children's sake, if it had been God's will."

Stephen returned as he said the last words; and Gerrie, whose heart stood strongly to forgiving and comforting those who were penitent and sorrowful, spoke again.

"Have you forgiven him, Stephen?"

"Nothing of the sort, Geraldine."

"If I may say so, my dear fellow," said Dr. Hurst, "don't be too hard on him now."

"Why, of course, Dr. Hurst, you may say anything to any of us; but Tom must learn some way or other that this sort of thing cannot be allowed. Why, anything might have happened to a nervous child like May."

"Indeed, I grant it is serious," continued the Doctor; "but I think he has learnt the lesson pretty severely this time. His cheeks were white enough to tell that tale."

"Am I hard on him, Gerrie?"

"I suppose it is right to be hard," she said; "but I do think, Stephen, that now kindness and forgiveness will make him take it more truly to heart, than if we treat him as if he were in disgrace."

Phillis came down to say that, beyond the fright and a slight cold, May was all right. Mrs. Hurst was saying her adieux to May Flower and Tom, and begged the Doctor would be ready when she came down. Geraldine went to fetch his coat, and he followed her into the hall.

"Don't let your sunny face grow long, my dear," he said; "depend on it it will be all right, and Tom will be much the better for this. I think you are a little apt, all of you, to think Stephen a bit hard; but I fancy you're mostly wrong there; and, Gerrie, I don't mind telling you, for it will make you all the better to him; but I know right well, there is not one of you—not even you, my child—who misses your dear mother as he does."

Then Mrs. Hurst came down, and they went. The others said "Good-night," glad to get to their beds; but Stephen went off to Tom.

"Tom, old fellow," he said, sitting down on his bed; "I'm afraid lest I've been a bit hard on you. I've done things just as careless and wrong, and worse; don't fret about it now. May seems all right, and we have too many failings ourselves to be hard on each other."

Then the sorrow had its course, and Tom protested against having meant to hurt, or frighten, or really annoy May; to all of which the elder brother assented. Then came a little talk about May, her brightness and sweetness, her tiresome, naughty, teasing ways; and then Lawrence gave him an idea of some of the talks he had had with her; and at last left him to fall asleep, with the thought of their May Flower's value, and some idea of what a noble thing it must be to be a Christian, such as it was the dear wish of her wild eager little heart to be!

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

37. That the Saviour's own kinsmen would disbelieve in Him was distinctly foretold in the Psalms. Quote the exact words of the prophecy, and give an instance of its fulfilment.

38. By how many of the sacred writers is the Lord Jesus Christ designated a "Mediator?"

39. Indicate any point of resemblance between the charge brought against our Lord and that against St. Stephen.

40. "Take heed," said our Lord (St. Mark viii. 15), "beware of the leaven of Herod." How frequently are the Herodians mentioned in the Gospels?

41. Quote the exact words of the oldest letter recorded in Holy Scripture.

42. Find the earliest mention of the city of Damascus—and state where it is referred to for the last time in Scripture.

43. Give a complete list from the Old Testament of those who were raised from the dead.

44. Before how many tribunals was the Saviour brought after His apprehension?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 80.

25. Luke ix. 45.

26. St. Luke (ix. 31) says they "spake of His decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem."

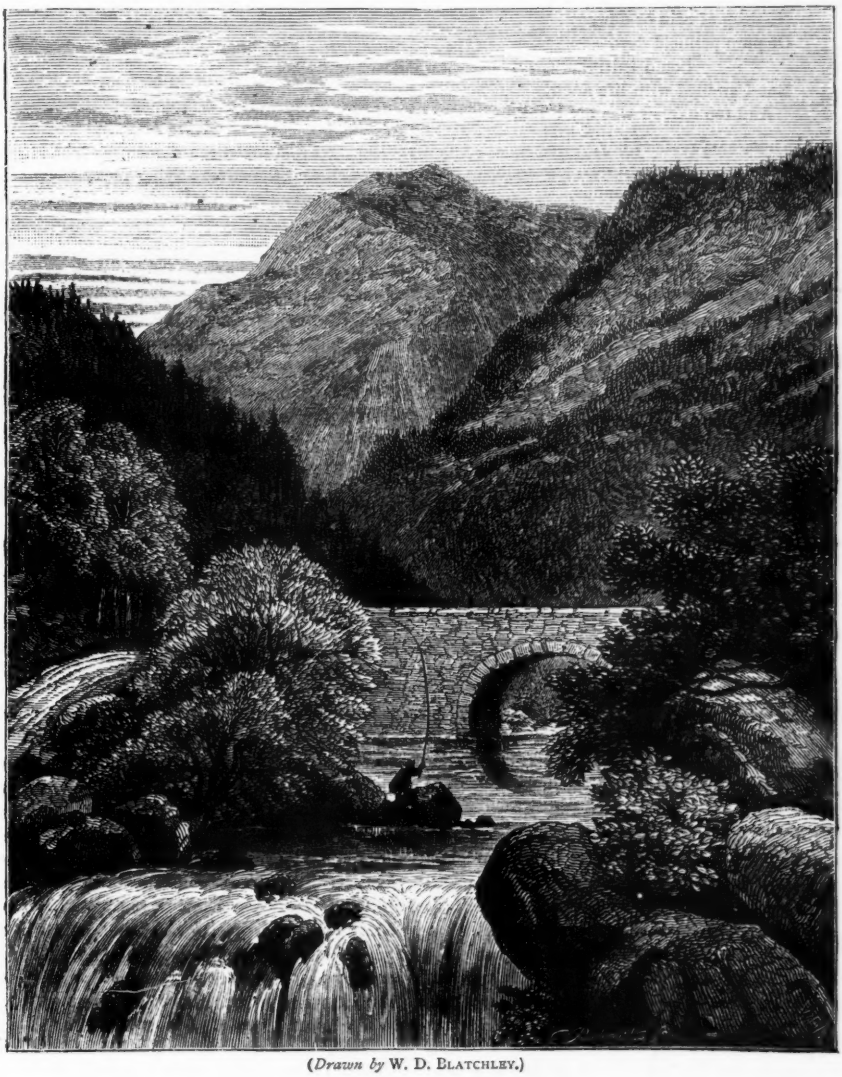
27. "I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all" (1 Cor. xiv. 18).

28. Mark xiii. 1; Luke xxi. 5, 6. He foretold the destruction of the Temple.

PEACE.

BY THE REV. M. G. WATKINS, M.A.

NOT where a mighty senate sways
With august laws a conquered land;
Not when the sea, 'neath soft grey haze,
With kisses soothes a much-vexed strand—



Not there doth Peace, exalted high,
Breathe her best blessings on the earth;
Nor where the summer twilights die,
Nor spring cheers all with sudden mirth.

But seek with me my rustic home,
Close bosomed in the heath-pink hills;
There large-eyed Peace oft loves to come,
And every house with plenty fills.

There rests she, in some yellow field
Tufted with wheat-sheaves; or she strays
Where orchards mellow fruitage yield,
Or by the river's devious ways.

And oft around the farms her feet
Roam, while above the pigeons flit,
And swallows dart; and children meet
To play, while dames, regarding, knit.

'Tis there Peace waves her olive wand,
Throned on a breadth of sunlit plain;
Gives blessings with ungrudging hand,
And brings the Golden Age again.

(Drawn by W. D. Blatchley.)

THE MOUNTAIN STREAM.

BY MRS. G. LINNÆUS BANKS.

AMONG the giant hills,
The cloud-veiled grand old hills,
I was born;
And the mist with tiny rills
Softly fed me night and morn.

The spirits of the snow,
The soft delicious snow,
O'er my head
Shook their pinions to and fro,
Till their plumage filled my bed.

I grew, as grows a child,
A laughing, lisping child,
At the breast;
And my mountain-mother smiled
As her granite lips caressed.

No drop of rain or dew,
Of pure pellucid dew,
Could I drink,
But I swelled with life anew,
And too narrow was my brink.

Then, as a restless boy,
A brawling wayward boy,
Out of bounds,
On I leapt with noisy joy,
Fleet as stag outstripping hounds.

Headlong o'er stone and rock,
O'er rough and craggy rock,
Plunging deep,
Till I staggered with the shock,
And in spray was forced to weep.

Then, mad, and stung with shame,
Hiding in glens for shame,
Sullen, dark,
Till I flashed to light again
Fresh and gleeful as a lark.

'Mid pealing heather bells,
Sweet, chiming, purple bells,
Did I mate,
And my wedded bosom swells
As I onward roll elate.

Now see me in my prime,
My full developed prime,
Sweep along,
Though monotonous as Time,
Yet sonorous as song.

A noble mountain stream,
A torrent of a stream,
Giving back
From my sheen the sunset beam,
And the silvery flying rack.

The solitary hills,
My old ancestral hills,
Sigh for me;
Yet though ev'ry ripple thrills,
With fondest memory,

My stream will see its nest,
Its hoary mountain nest,
Nevermore;
For ambition fills my breast,
And I seek a wider shore.

I quit the shade of pines,
Dark, moaning, perfumed pines;
Fleet and fast
Through the world my course inclines
And I seek the Sea at last.

THE OPENING OF THE GATES.

BY THE REV. J. SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL."

"Jesus said unto her, I am the Resurrection, and the Life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die."—ST. JOHN xi. 25, 26.

HOW often, in circumstances of solemnity and sadness, do these words fall on our ears! In the cemetery or the churchyard, whither we go, following the remains of some loved object to their last resting-place, these sentences are uttered or read to cheer the mourners, and to lift the thoughts from the gloom of the grave to the glory of the future. Wondrous words in a world of separation, sorrow, and death, well calculated to soothe the soul in the midst of the deepest grief! They were spoken to a sorrowing sister, who mourned the loss of an only brother. They were spoken by One who Himself was a Man of Sorrows, and acquainted with grief, who was poor and despised amongst men, and who shortly after died. They were uttered in a world where all men die; where the living tread on the dust of their fathers; where death, with gloomy pomp and resistless sway, sweeps generation after generation into the tomb. In the face of the universal dominion of mortality, and in the very presence of the grave, Jesus Christ proclaimed, "I am the Resurrection and the Life." The very idea, to say nothing of the reality of such a thing, was in the highest degree sublime; as far above all that mere men had conceived, as heaven transcends the earth. While philosophy was speculating, and reason was groping in the dark, and men's minds were occupied with the question of the soul's immortality and wondering whether there was any light for man in the terrible darkness of the future, One in human form appeared, who declared, with the authority of God, "I am the Resurrection and the Life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Here was more than positive doctrine; more, if possible, even than the certainty of Divine utterance: the very Conqueror of Death had come! Without hesitation or reserve Christ proclaimed Himself the Lord of Life for evermore.

I. Our Lord's words, "I am the Resurrection and the Life," were in answer to Martha, one of the sisters of Bethany. Jesus had said to her, "Thy brother shall rise again;" to which she responded, "I know that he shall rise again in the resurrection at the last day." She knew as a matter of ordinary belief that, after a long series of events, when the end of the world came, and the day of judgment arrived, her brother Lazarus would arise at the general resurrection of the dead. But to her remark the Saviour replied, "I am the Resurrection and the Life," thus claiming the resurrection of the body as a thing entirely within the sphere of His power and operation; that at His own pleasure He could give or restore life at any time; that His power to impart it or restore it was not limited to special times and seasons; and that all life in time and eternity was connected with Him, and depended on Him. The redemption of the body is one of the results of Christ's mediation and sacrifice—one of the achievements of His glorious mission—one of the triumphs of His incarnation and resurrection. The remains which we commit to the dust will be reanimated in undying form; the sea will give up its dead; and all, small and great, that have ever lived, will receive an incorruptible body, and stand before God. Curious questions regarding the nature of this body have often been asked; but the inquiry is only speculative, and can receive here no clear and definite answer. It is enough for us to know that what is sown in dishonour will be raised in glory, what is sown in weakness will be raised in power, what is sown a natural body will be raised a spiritual body; that the present corruptible body must put on incorruption, and that this mortal tabernacle must put on immortality. The forms which we have looked upon with love become changed in death, and must be buried out of our sight, to be sown in corruption amid the putrescence and gloom of the grave; but they will be raised again, and reappear, to be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body.

Another truth implied here is that the resurrection is altogether and entirely in the power of Christ. It will not in any sense be the mere work or development of Nature, but entirely supernatural, the direct act of Him who is the Master and the Lord of Nature. The whole power to accomplish it is in Christ, and that, too, not by delegation from another, but in virtue of His own supremacy in the universe, and from His position as Mediator. The Eternal Word "without whom was not anything made that was made," He, and "not a succession of physical causes and effects produced all life at the beginning; and He, and no operation of material forces or natural laws, will reanimate the dead at the Resurrection." In Him, independently of time, are the whole truth, reality, and power of the resurrection.

Further, it is here taught that this resurrection-power is in Christ in virtue of the fact that He is the life. "In Him was life;" and He is the Resurrection, because He is the Life. All life for the creature is in Him, emanates from Him, and depends on Him: hence death cannot cope with His power. It is but a part of His arrangement, to accomplish His will and execute His purpose. As all life has its source in Him, so, of course, He can continue it, suspend it, or restore it, at His pleasure. He is the Fountain and centre of life, and must be the cause and principle of all resurrection. The resurrection is life in conflict with death; and the victory is declared in the power and exhibited in the person of the Lord Jesus. He came to give life to men, and "He that hath the Son of God hath life," now and for evermore.

II. Based on the assertion respecting Himself, our Lord says, "He that believeth in Me, though he were dead [though he have died], yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die." Those words are for us and for the children of men in all time. Our Lord speaks both of natural death and of spiritual life. In the words live and die, as understood merely of natural life and death, there is a seeming paradox. "The believer in Me, though he should have died naturally, shall live, while the living man who really believes in Me shall never really die: belief in Me shall ensure life after death, against death and in the very midst of it." The meaning of the Saviour's words is that in reality there is no such thing as death to the believer in Christ Jesus. And this fact is stated in two forms: first, that the believer, though he die in the body, yet for all that shall live; secondly, that the true life of the believer is continuous and eternal, not subject to anything that can rightly be called death. "The former statement is meant to meet the case of the departed, as dead in the body; the latter to meet our own case, as living both in the body and the spirit." In the same way, and with the same import, the Saviour had previously said, "If a man keep My saying, he shall never see death" (John viii. 51). The first statement is that the believer, though he must die in the body, and though he should have already died naturally, shall live again. This is simply the announcement of a resurrection, and of a blessed resurrection to all who sleep in Jesus. Our relatives, our friends, our companions, pass away out of our sight from the land of the living; with much grief and many tears, with hearts oppressed and hopes darkened, we follow their remains to their resting-place in the narrow house appointed for all living. But we sorrow not as those without hope. As disciples of Christ Jesus, the Conqueror of the grave, death is to them but as a sleep, and they will awake and arise at the last great day with their bodies fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body; for Christ himself arose, the first-fruits of them that sleep; so they that are Christ's will arise at His coming. The bodies of those loved ones which you have followed to the grave, the forms which you decorate and care for now as the earthly tabernacles of your spirits, will moulder into dust and disappear. But that very dust is precious in the sight of God, and at the Resurrection a spiritual body will arise, possessing a specific and individual identity, not an identity of particles and organisation—"for flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven"—but such an identity as will show that the new body belongs to the man, the parent, the brother, the child, the friend, or whoever he may be, and not to another. And for all that we now know the germ of this future spiritual body may belong in some way to the body which dies, just as the seed corn has in itself the germ of a coming harvest.

But the Saviour goes beyond this statement, and says that the man who lives now and believes in Him, the man who lives by the faith of Christ, will never die. Death, as it is ordinarily understood, contemplated, or feared, will not be death to him. This is for our encouragement and hope. No man who lives by faith in the Son of God, no man whose life Christ is, shall ever "taste of death" (John viii. 52). Death to the natural man has a sting, and over him the grave has a victory; but to the Christian death has no sting, and over him the grave has no victory. God makes him the conqueror, through Jesus Christ the Lord. It is true that he must die, and descend into the tomb, like other men; but in his case the aspect and character of death are altogether changed. Death cannot claim him as its victim, and is only the messenger of his Lord, to convey him to a land of unspeakably higher life and greater glory. When the bell of the prison-house strikes the fatal hour, the officers of justice enter the cell of the condemned prisoner, to bring him forth to execution. His life has been forfeited, law claims him, and he ascends the scaffold, the victim of justice, to expiate to society his crimes by his death. So men, in their unregenerate state, under condemnation, die. But to the Christian it is not thus: to him "there is no condemnation." Neither death nor law can claim him, for he belongs to Christ, and "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." "All things," says the Apostle, "are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours, and ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's" (1 Cor. iii. 22, 23). The believer in Jesus, then, does not belong to death: he cannot be its victim. On the contrary, death belongs to him, and is one of the processes necessary to his perfection. It comes not to claim him, but as a friendly messenger, to introduce him to a higher life, and to bring him to a purer and more resplendent home—the inheritance of the saints in light.

What is death, as ordinarily contemplated by men—death to the natural, unregenerate man? Mark the contrast, and you will see with what force of truth the Saviour says, "He that liveth and believeth in Me shall never die."

1. Death to man naturally is a cessation of this present state of existence, the life to which men fondly cling, and in which they would fain continue; but to the Christian it brings an increase of his true life. Men seek no higher life than the present sensuous and material existence, and death, when it comes, closes this for ever. But the man who believes in Christ Jesus, and abides in Him, has a higher life—the divine life—in his soul. All life has the capability and property in the living thing of sustaining relations to other objects. This is of the very essence of life. The plant has relations to the soil, the sunshine and the showers of heaven. When these are severed, it dies. The animal has relations to others of its species, and to the food which sustains it from day to day. So man has these physical and sensible relations in this world; but his true life is spiritual, having its highest relations to God and to eternity. Yet, alas! in human degeneracy these are not duly recognised. While intellectually, and, in some sense, morally alive, men are spiritually dead, and the reign of spiritual death is co-extensive with the reign of sin. The life in man which depends on the visible and the material ends by death; but the true life of manhood, in its relation to God, death cannot touch. It is divine. This new and better life the Christian reaches and realises through faith in the Incarnate Son of God by the power of His Spirit. He possesses it now, as the true life of his being; and death, when it comes, brings no cessation of it, no interruption to it, even for a moment. On the contrary, it leads to a wonderful increase of life, and actually gives our being a glorious expansion. How many things hinder, hamper, and depress that life in this world! The entanglements of the flesh, the pains and propensities of this "vile body," the temptations and weaknesses incident to the present state of being, often act as clogs and hindrances to the higher life of manhood; but death to the Christian is emancipation from all these, so that his life rises with a celestial elasticity, to soar and exercise itself amid realities unknown before, or only dimly seen by faith. Hence the Christian does not die: death is no penal visitation to him; it does not end or interrupt his true life, but is the way to its increase and expansion.

2. Death to men naturally is an end of activity and labour; to the Christian it issues in an increase of activity, and leads to a higher sphere of service. The man who in commerce, or business, or daily round of toil lives to himself, has his course of activity ended at death, it closes all his effort, and interrupts all his labour. Death changes his countenance, stops his energy, paralyses his powers, and sends him away. He may have been buying and selling and getting gain, all for himself and without any thought of God, but the end of this comes when he dies. To the Christian, however, who has not lived to himself, but to his Lord, who has found in daily duty and in secular toil the discharge of a spiritual obligation and the rendering of a spiritual service, death is no interruption of his activity, no cessation of his service. His powers in this world have their highest exercise in doing the will of God and seeking His glory, and death but issues in an increase of activity, and leads him to a grander and wider field of service. More harmoniously, more fully, more felicitously, will all the powers of the redeemed soul engage in the service of Christ among the spirits of the just made perfect. The same song will be sung, the same service will continue, the same powers will be exercised for ever. Death to the Christian will be neither end nor interruption of activity. 'Tis true he returns not again to his counting-house; he is seen no more in the place of merchandise; his home, his study, his books shall not know him any more; but the powers with which he served God in these spheres on earth are only emancipated, purified, elevated by death, and his energy is expanded and increased for a service which will be as a rest and a reward for ever. Hence the believer in Jesus does not die, does not find in death any end of his activity for his Lord.

3. Death is to man naturally an interruption of friendship; to the Christian it is a closer union with the highest Friend, a more intimate realisation of that friendship which is the charm of life. Death bursts the bonds and cuts the ties of all mere human friendships. "Yours till death" is not an unfrequent mode of expressing attachments here, tacitly acknowledging that beyond this world they do not go. Friendship may watch at the bedside of the dying, affection may soothe the last hours of earthly life, it may shed tears over the grave of the departed, and mourn the ruthless power which respected not its bonds and vows; but death absolutely ends many of the friendships of this life, and interrupts them all. We cannot follow our friends, even in thought or imagination, into the unseen state; but death is no interruption to the highest friendships of the soul, only a closer, dearer, purer realisation of them. At home in the body here we are absent from the Lord; absent from the body we are present with the Lord. Death only brings the soul into closer fellowship with his Divine Friend—brings him to be with Christ, which is far better, and introduces him to other friendships in the general assembly and church of the firstborn. With Christ, beholding Him, made like Him, in the innumerable company of angels, the fellowship of prophets, apostles, martyrs, to these holy friendships death is the way; so that the Christian's highest bonds of affection and interest suffer no interruption when he falls asleep in Jesus. He does not die.

4. Finally, death to men in their natural state is separation from their sources of enjoyment; to the Christian it brings an inconceivable accession of enjoyment. Where the treasure is, there will the heart be also. If here the affections are set on Mammon, on worldly property, or pleasure; if with eager grasp and strongest love the soul clings to the things of this life in any form as its highest ambition and pursuit, death will bring separation from them for ever, and the soul, stripped of its pleasures and joys, will pass into the unseen to encounter unaided the realities of eternity. But by the believer here the highest joys are found in the love of Christ, in communion with God, in fellowship with saints, in the beauties of holiness, and in devotion and service to his Saviour and Lord. To these death is no interruption; from these it cannot separate the soul. In the unseen state to which death introduces the Christian, the love of Christ will be paramount, the beauties of holiness triumphant, communion with God perfect, and His service an untiring devotion and delight. Hence, for the Christian "to die is gain;" he passes into higher ranges of blessedness; he will find all his means and sources of enjoyment continued, augmented, purified, whether they be intellectual, social, or spiritual; and he will rise to inherit, in all its wealth and freshness, the joy that is unspeakable and full of glory. Yes, "to die is gain." To pass away from toil and sorrow, from suffering, imperfection, and tears, to the land of celestial song, untiring service, and everlasting joy, to be for ever with the Lord, this is not, in the ordinary human sense, to die. Death is but the gateway of life, the entrance on a state of perfection, resplendence, and glory inconceivable now. It takes from the Christian no energy, no activity, no prospect, no joy, no holy acquisition; but, on the contrary, introduces him, emancipated from the burdens of imperfection and sin, into a mansion in the Father's house above, amid the effulgence of ineffable light and eternal glory. He passes away from earth, but his noblest life continues, and rises to blossom and bear fruit in the paradise of God. He does not "taste death;" in his case it is "swallowed up in victory." Thus do all who have right to the tree of life "enter in through the gates into the city."

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

"IN THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH."

THERE are some of whom we might be ready to say, They dwell in that valley, that the shadow of death lies darkling before them, constantly enwrapping them, enshrouding them in gloom. We are accustomed to think so of persons suffering from what we call incurable diseases, some of which are painful, occasionally agonising, others susceptible of relief from the suffering that attends them.

We are so apt to forget that we are every one of us incurable. Though we may not at present be aware of the nature of the disease that will bear us further and further into that valley, where the wings of the great angel, so seeming dark as to overshadow all things, may yet be revealed to us as glowing with the brightness of the light which yet our unaccustomed eyes cannot behold, we are none the less certain to succumb to it. It may be that some of us will live to be conscious of no other than the most fatal of all diseases—because no mortal cure has been or ever will be found for it—incurable old age. There have been those who lived long enough to look calmly at the slowly lengthening shadow in the valley, and almost to wonder if Death had forgotten and were departing from them, leaving only the black trail behind; but the time at last came, perhaps when they had learnt to see more than shadow, to catch the glint of the heavenly glory beyond.

It is a happy thought that many a poor afflicted child of God has seen this too, and continues to see it daily, although, like St. Paul, they also die daily. It is comforting to believe that many who know what their disease is—who are pronounced to be "hopelessly incurable" in a rather different sense to that in which we may all be declared to be hopelessly incurable also—do not dwell perpetually in the Valley of the Shadow. Christ has come to them and taken them out of it, that even in this life, where He is they may be also, secure in the love of the Father, having already, if one may so speak, overcome death through Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. The great, the essential difference between these sufferers and the rest of mankind is that they are almost always conscious of the disease which is incurable because of its accompanying pain, and that they are disqualified for many of the ordinary uses, and also most of the ordinary enjoyments of life. Perhaps the chief poignant sense of their condition is that they are no longer capable of fulfilling the ordinary duties of life either. They must be dependent always; and to many souls the suspicion that they may live only to be a burden on others, to take instead of giving, to lean upon instead of supporting, is itself almost intolerable, until they learn to look higher, and acknowledge that not only all the things of the world, but we ourselves, they and theirs, belong to God, and that life and death, height and depth, principalities and powers, are but His creatures, incapable of separating us from His love. The same reflection, coupled with that of our own incurability and our own constant liability to be stricken down with hopeless and painful malady, should surely lead us to recognise the duty of helping some among the thousands who have not only lost health, but with it the means of maintaining life, and, more sadly still, the hope of restoration to former strength, or even temporary recovery.

I have already spoken of the work done by convalescent homes and hospitals; but there are those who, being sick unto death, yet do not soon die—those who must be discharged from hospitals uncured, in order to make room for the curable, and who, unable to work, unaccustomed to beg, and almost ready to meet death itself rather than sink into sordid abject pauperism, know not whither to turn in their dire necessity. It was to aid these that an appeal was written twenty years ago, asking for funds to establish an institution for the reception of those suffering from hopeless disease. It is to see what has been the result of that appeal that I visit the Royal Hospital for Incurables at Putney Heath to-day.

It was in 1854 that Doctor Andrew Reed—to whose indicating hand we are indebted for the installation of many of our noblest charities—made an urgent appeal on behalf of those who, being discharged as incurable from various hospitals, were left helpless, and often destitute, since, amidst all the institutions which beneficence had founded, there were none to which they could prefer a claim.

Let us see what has been done in twenty years to alleviate what might seem to be almost hopeless suffering.

Let us, coming face to face with the mystery of pain, and looking as it were from afar on that dark shadow which yet always lies so near to every one of us, note how in the heart of the mystery there is hidden a joyful hope for humanity, how in the very shadow of death there is a light that never yet has shone on land or sea.

It is a still autumnal day, and as we turn up the wooded lane on the left of the hill leading from the Putney Railway Station to Wimbledon, a tender gleam in the grey clouds betokens coming rainfall. A light hanging drift descends upon the distant hills, and breaks into pale vaporous shapes amidst the wooded slopes and valleys. The yellow leaves that strew the ground lie motionless, as though they waited for their late companions to fall gently from the branches overhead and join their silent company.

Coming into a broader roadway, and passing through the gate of a lodge, we come almost suddenly upon a glorious sloping lawn, adorned with goodly trees, worthy of the great building—meant for a ducal residence, and now put to nobler uses—which, for all its stately look, has about it a home-likeness that is full of promise. Even the matchless landscape lying around it—the expanse of wood and dale, the soft slopes of Surrey hills, the deep-embowered glades where the bronze-and-gold of moving tree-tops takes a changeful sheen from slowly-drifting clouds, or reflects strange gleams of colour from the glistening silver of the rain—will not hold us from the nearer glow of windows bright with flowers, which give a festal look to the place, although it is so quiet that we stand and imagine for a moment what it is that we have come to see. For this great mansion, with its long rows of windows, and wide-spreading wings, is the home of a hundred and fifty-four men and women, some of whom have been suddenly stricken down, and others have slowly fallen day by day into a condition of incurable disease, and, in many cases, also into a condition of utter bodily helplessness. They, and the attendants whose constant kindly services are essential for their relief, constitute the family of what is known, plainly enough, as "The Royal Hospital for Incurables." There are no distinctions among its members, though in their previous lives they have belonged to various grades—no distinctions, at least, except those which arise from personal qualifications.

The claim for election to the benefits of the charity is the necessity which is implied in the name of the institution itself; and once within its sheltering walls the patients, whose failing eyes brighten, and whose wan cheeks flush with every loving mention of it as their home, are all alike sharers in its benefits.

Not only the 154 at present within its walls, however, but 327 of those who, having family and friends with whom to dwell, receive pensions of £20 a year each, and so cease to be a heavy burden to others.

Do you think at first sight, and from the external appearance of the building, that charity here has gone beyond precedent in providing such a place—a palatial pile standing amidst scenery that one might well come far to see? Remember what is the need of those who have to be lifted out of the dark hopeless depths of what is almost despair, of those who, finding themselves banished from hospital wards, unable to earn their bread, feeling themselves a burden upon those for whom they would almost consent to die rather than live upon their poverty, of those who, in the midst of hourly pain, have the mental anguish of knowing that the long calendar of darkening days may find them utterly dependent on the toil of those most dear to them, and whose few expedients can bring little ease, and will not serve to hide the ever-present sense of disappointment and distress.

Think how much wealth is wasted daily in the world, and what a small part of it suffices to lighten by every available means the burden of such lives as these; the sorrow of those who, in the dreadful deprivation of what to us seems almost all that makes life dear, have no resource between that provided for them in such a place as this and the infirmary-ward of a workhouse, amidst sordid surroundings and the hard mechanical unfeeling officialism, which in such cases is little more than organised neglect.

There are people who would reduce all charitable institutions—yes, even such as this, of which living personal interest, and the care that comes of more than merely casual benevolence, are the very foundation and corner-stone—to a dead level of official rule, in which benevolence should be represented by a mechanical department, and the sentiment of charity by a self-elected board of control, dealing with public subscriptions as though they were a poor-rate, and recognising neither individual interest nor the right of contributors to give it expression. Such a system would lack the very qualification most needed here, and to be found only in that voluntary personal interest that brings to the recipients of bounty more than the mere bounty itself, the heart-throb of sympathy, the feeling that the gift means more than the cold official recognition of a national duty, that it is the expression of loving-kindness ever active and living; and so making for the helpless, the destitute, and the dying, not a mere asylum, but a home.

(To be concluded.)

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XV.

LADY CHESSINGTON was satisfied with the results of her experiment, when she found that, after a few weeks passed in the society of Eda, her daughter became less hoydenish in her habits, more respectful to her, and more considerate to every one about her. Had Eudora been asked whether this was in any way owing to the quiet thoughtful girl with whom so much of her time was spent, she would have ridiculed the idea, and declared that it was she who influenced Eda; for the latter had one of those temperaments that are rarely disturbed by trifles, and it was no trouble to her to submit to the often capricious and always imperious behests of the young lady. They walked, rode, or studied, when and where Eudora pleased, for it cost Eda no effort to give up her own wishes; only, when the question came, "Is it right or wrong?" she was firm as a rock; and, not a little to her surprise and vexation, the earl's daughter found that it was she who must yield, or go her way alone.

In a long affectionate letter to Mark, his sister related her change of abode, and the circumstances that had led to it. The answer was as warm and sympathising as Mark's letters ever were, but Eda laid it down with a disappointed look, for it contained nothing from Richie, whose congratulations she had been counting upon. It was rare that he forgot her now. Indeed, Mark was apt to grumble, when Richie, finding him occupied in writing to his sister, would start out to buy some trifle—a sachet, an ornamental card, or a photograph of some illustrious personage—that he insisted on enclosing in the letter. Trifles all, costing Richie far less than the cigars and new gloves on which he expended a larger amount of his earnings than he could well afford, but they fed the flame of the liking with which he had contrived to inspire Eda; and all the romance of her nature centred round the handsome youth, whom—unpleasant remembrance that would force itself upon her—Mrs. Granton had distrusted as much as it was in her gentle nature to distrust any one.

Eda was engaged in her own room one afternoon, availing herself of the absence of Lady Eudora, who had gone with her parents to pay some calls, to alter one of her dresses, when the countess's maid knocked at the door to tell her that a gentleman from London was asking to see Miss Granton on business.

"My brother! It must be my brother!" she joyfully exclaimed, as she started from her chair to run to him; but Morison shook her head dissentingly.

"Lor' no, miss! it can't be, for this person is grey-haired, and looks quite aged."

On hearing this the affectionate sister was filled with alarm. Surely something must have befallen Mark, and this stranger had come to the Park to acquaint her with it! The thought was such an agitating one, that she was pale and trembling when she entered the library, where he awaited her.

Morison had correctly described his appearance. She found herself confronted by a gentlemanly man, whose stooping shoulders, grey locks, and coloured spectacles, gave him quite a venerable aspect. He extended his hand, but she did not take it, for she was trying to decide what it was about him that seemed so familiar, although she could be positive that she had never seen him before.

"Don't you know me, Eda? Don't you really know me?" he asked, and she started violently, for the voice was Richard Atwood's.

He pushed back the grey wig to display the curly chestnut hair beneath, removed his glasses, and the muffling wrapper that had helped to hide the lower part of his face, and then laughed heartily at her disconcerted looks.

"Aren't you glad to see me?" he asked, sobering a little, when he found that she did not speak. "I could not keep away from you any longer! I wanted to satisfy myself that you are well, and kindly treated, and so on; and as Mark could not be coaxed into taking holiday with me, I came alone. You don't blame me for it, do you, Eda?" he asked, in his low sweet tones. "Was it not natural that I should be anxious about you?"

"Blame you! How could I be so ungrateful?" she exclaimed. "But why this disguise?"

Richie laughed and reddened. "You dear, simple child! What would my lord and my lady say, if they heard that a gay young fellow of two-and-twenty had been visiting you? I think it was a very bright thought of mine, to make myself so like your grandpapa that no one could raise an objection to me."

"But the deception, Richie!"

"Excellent, isn't it?" he answered, with an amused glance at himself in a looking-glass opposite. "I flatter myself I have played my part admirably. The smart lady's-maid who ushered me here wheeled forward the easiest chair she could find for the asthmatic old gentleman who could scarcely find breath to thank her!" And Richie began rehearsing the feeble movements and wheezing cough with which he had imposed upon Morison, as well as the footman who had admitted him.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"Looking over the sketches the artist had added to his portfolio."—p. 123.

But Eda could not share his mirth, nor force a smile, when he reminded her how he had assumed a similar guise in a charade the last Christmas they had spent together. She could not help thinking of what Richie ignored—the false position in which his heedless act had placed her. He was here under false colours; if his masquerading were detected, she would be overwhelmed with shame; and if it were not, she would have the burden of the secret upon her—a secret which would keep her in continual terror lest it should leak out, and give her kind friends cause for displeasure. If the earl and countess returned before Richie departed, they would good-naturedly insist on exercising their hospitality towards her visitor; and even if he quitted the house at once, Eudora would hear of his coming, would question her concerning him, and what could she say?

Her distress became so apparent, that Richie perceived it, and taking both her hands in his, entreated to know what was the matter. It was difficult to make him comprehend the view she had taken of his mad freak; but when he saw that she was absolutely unhappy lest Lord and Lady Chessington should find him there, he hastily resumed his disguise, reproaching himself the while.

"If I were not the most thoughtless of fellows, I should have taken these things into consideration; but the prospect of seeing you, and the fun of dressing up, must have blinded me to the folly of the act. I begin to think Mark is right when he says my head is always leading me into blunders that make my heart ache in the repairing. But pray don't look so uneasy, dear Eda; say you forgive me, and I'm off! Send me away with a smile, or I shall be miserable for ever! Ah, if I had such a dear little thing as you always at my elbow, I should not be continually getting into scrapes, should I?"

But Eda, whose eyes were fixed on the carriage drive by which the Chessingtons would return, could scarcely answer him; nor did she breathe freely till, leaning on his walking-stick, he had crossed the park in the direction of the nearest railway station, and she had no longer reason to fear a rencontre which might end in his detection.

It was not until her agitation had subsided that she began to find excuses for Richie, and to think that his good intentions deserved a better requital than her averted looks and cold speeches. For a few days she continued to feel both grieved and vexed at the heedlessness with which, in the fun of proving himself an excellent actor, he forgot who might be compromised by it, as well as the insult to the earl and countess such trickery involved. But when Richie's regrets were repeated in a very penitent and affectionate letter, Eda ceased to recollect anything but that his attachment for his old playfellow had been stronger than his prudence, or she might have said with truth, his sense of honour and honesty.

"Morison tells me that you had a visitor while we were out," Lady Eudora observed, the morning after Richie's escapade. "You dismissed him very abruptly, didn't you?"

"He was in haste to get back to town," said Eda, with burning cheeks and downcast eyes.

Something unusual in her voice made Eudora raise her head from her book to glance at her. "Did this old gentleman bring you any bad news? Is your brother well?"

"Quite, thank you; I have not had any bad news; but don't ask me any more questions, please."

Eudora looked suprised, but changed the subject directly, and in the pleasure of teaching fresh tricks to her Skye terrier forgot all that seemed odd in Eda's reticence respecting her visitor.

The winter was now setting in. Eda had been at Chessington for a considerable period, and still the countess hugged herself on the success of her experiment. The chilliness of the weather was certainly one reason why Eudora was sometimes found drawing and writing at times that used to be devoted to a romp with the dogs or a visit to the stables with her father. But another and more powerful one was to be found in the attachment with which Eda had inspired her. She was often haughty and capricious, and would even tease her quiet little companion for her conscientious scruples; yet it was for these scruples she loved and respected her; and, as Lady Chessington had predicted, the steady unobtrusive course of one who took the Bible for her guide in all things influenced Eudora more than she was aware of. She could not wrangle with, nor set her will against Eda's, as she did against her mother's and Mr. St. Orme's, because Eda refused to be drawn into arguments, or to assist her in finding excuses for her conduct. What Lady Eudora was proposing to do was either right or wrong; there could be no middle way, no alternative, but positively obeying or disobeying; and the wayward heiress often found herself refraining from some folly, lest she should seem to deserve the reproach of selfishness that had already stung her so deeply.

"Do you think me selfish, Eustace?" she asked her cousin, one day when she had been pondering over the annoying charge.

"Quite the contrary, dear Dora; I have often had to tell you that you are disposed to be too generous."

"Ah, but I do not mean in that sense of the word. I am fond of giving; I like to relieve the poor, and so on; but in what Eda would call the deeper and truer meaning of the word, now tell me, am I selfish?"

"I am afraid so, Eudora!" and he spoke in such low, pained tones, that she divined what it cost him to say this. She was beginning to dimly perceive that one may be the possessor of many virtues, and even pride oneself on being liberal to the needy, courteous to inferiors, and capable of many acts that recommend us to those about us, yet do none of these things in singleness of heart. Neither was it so easy as it had been to thrust the blame of her misdeeds on her mother. Lady Chessington was treated by Eda with an affectionate respect that shamed Eudora into imitating it; and a severe illness, that left the countess so weak that she required constant attention, drew the mother and daughter still closer together.

During the festivities of Christmas, Mr. Allonby, the artist, came to Chessington Hall on his way back to London, and Eda was pleased to be able to renew her acquaintance with him. He had been in Scotland, he told her, copying a picture for a nobleman to whom the Earl of Chessington had recommended him, and his stay had been protracted till he was longing to get back to the old friends at home.

"You will scarcely be in time to spend your Christmas with them," Eda observed, as, with Lady Eudora, she sat looking over the sketches the artist had added to his portfolio. "Are you one of a large family, Mr. Allonby?"

"Yes, Miss Granton; but there are only three of us left in the old home—Gran, who presides over our domestic affairs, my sister Doris, and I."

"Though last, not least, I suppose," Eudora jestingly observed. "Confess now, Mr. Allonby, that you are an autocrat when in the bosom of your family."

He laughed good-humouredly. "I leave the defence of my character to Doris and Gran. I am content to know that they will be glad to have me back. Doris assures me in her last letter that, although I give her no end of trouble with my 'untidy ways,' I am very much missed."

"For the identical reason you have just alleged?" Eudora demanded.

"Possibly. Did I not just tell your ladyship that I am too prudent to attempt my own defence? By the way, I have a sketch somewhere here of my sister. She has one of those statuesque faces we artists find excellent studies."

As he tossed over the bits of cardboard he had taken from a pocket of the portfolio, two or three fell at the feet of Eda. She stooped for them, and was transfixed with surprise, for, portrayed on the largest, she beheld the smiling eyes and somewhat sensuous but winning features of Richie Atwood.

Involuntarily she glanced at Mr. Allonby for an explanation, but he was talking to the countess, who had just joined them, and Eda had had time to overcome her astonishment when Lady Eudora peeped over her shoulder.

"What are you looking at? What a very handsome man! Who is he, Mr. Allonby?"

"Do you really call that a handsome face, Lady Eudora?" the artist inquired, as she held the sketch towards him.

"Certainly I do," she promptly responded. "Do not you?"

"In some respects, yes; but it lacks something without which no mere animal beauty can give any real satisfaction. This face is weak. If there were greater breadth in the brow, and the chin and upper lip were moulded in a more resolute cast, how it would improve it!"

"Ah!" said Eudora, carelessly, "you look at all these things from an artistic point of view. Do you ever find your ideal? But of course you do not; how should you, when your too critical eyes detect imperfections in the most perfect?"

"Isn't that a paradox, Lady Eudora?" Mr. Allonby asked, with a smile.

"I dare say it is, for I am not great at arguing. You have not told us the name of this gentleman over whose portrait we are disputing. Is he one of the shining characters of this generation?"

"No, indeed," the artist answered, quickly, and in rather disparaging tones; "that is the head of a young fellow who visits at the house of one of my relatives, and his name is ——"

"I can tell you the name of the original of that sketch, Lady Eudora," said Eda, crimsoning to the temples, but speaking very distinctly. "It is Richard Atwood, and he is my brother's friend—and mine."

She moved away as she finished speaking, to answer a signal from the countess, who wanted her help in some difficulty in the worsted-work with which she was amusing herself.

CHAPTER XVI.

With his eyes fixed on the unfortunate sketch, Mr. Allonby sat for several minutes, trying to recall the precise words he had used in speaking of Richie; but Lady Eudora, quick to perceive the ludicrous, laughed at the recollection of the startled look with which he had heard Eda proclaim her acquaintance with the young man, and began to rally him upon it.

"You owe Miss Granton an apology," she said, "for you certainly did not give her the impression that her friend is a favourite of yours. You had better follow her, and make your peace."

But Mr. Allonby did not move. "Don't you think, Lady Eudora, that it is sometimes wiser and kinder to let an awkward matter rest? On reflection Miss Granton will, I am sure, acquit me of any intention of offending her." And, as if determined to change the subject, he began asking her ladyship if he was to have the honour of a sitting from her before he went to town.

"Yes," said the earl; but "No, no!" cried his daughter, so persistently that, when alone with her, Eda asked if she had any real objection to having her portrait taken.

"Yes, one that is insuperable," she answered, frowning and colouring.

"Lady Chessington wishes it very much," she was reminded.

"And that is why I refuse. It sounds awfully undutiful, doesn't it? But I happen to know that mamma wants my miniature for Eustace, and I do not choose that he should have it."

"And yet I believe you to be sincerely attached to Mr. St. Orme!"

"Yes," said Eudora, blushing still more deeply, "I believe I am. He is a good man, and wonderfully patient with me. If he were not my cousin, and if I did not know that all our friends think it would be an excellent match for both of us, I might learn to like him well enough to marry him some day. As it is, I hope he will find a better wife than I should be—don't you?"

"Mr. St. Orme certainly deserves to have a greater value set on his affections than you are testifying," Eda answered, with warmth, for she did not like the flippant tone she had taken.

"Hear, hear!" cried Eudora. "I dearly love to work you up into a pet, O championess of all the injured and abused! But you are quite right; Eustace deserves a bride who will be more submissive and sweet-tempered than I should be. I don't think I shall ever consent to leave my own dear indulgent father; but if I do, it shall be to marry in a more romantic style than mamma proposes for me; and I'll certainly not have a man whom I can twist round my finger!"

"That is an unworthy boast, Lady Eudora," said Eda; and Lady Eudora had the grace to look ashamed of it.

"So it is, very unworthy. Please forget that I ever spoke so foolishly. I wish my tongue would not run away with me so often. Of course, I did not mean what I said."

How far this was true, who shall say? But certain it is that some of the light words just spoken so carelessly were destined to be remembered and regretted long afterwards.

Mr. Allonby, after another vain attempt to obtain a sitting from Lady Eudora, went to town, every one expressing themselves sorry to lose him, for he was so cheerful and well-informed as to be a valuable companion in a dull country house. Talking of him and her little adventure in the railway carriage, Eda was led to speak of the brother she had left in London; and Lady Chessington questioned her closely about Mark and his present position.

The loving sister intended to be very sincere in her replies, but she was devotedly attached to Mark, and it was more natural to dwell upon his good qualities—his energy, his abilities, his horror of all low vices—than to speak of the faults of his character. With regard to his position, she only knew that he held a small agency, and was struggling very hard to obtain more lucrative employment. Sometimes his short and always unsatisfactory letters were couched in hopeful terms, sometimes in very depressed ones, and of late—but this she could not bring herself to mention, for she believed that Mark's disappointment rendered him unjust—he had complained bitterly of Richard Atwood's selfishness, declaring that he should not be able to put up with it much longer.

"Has your brother no friends in London who would render him more efficient assistance?" Lady Chessington inquired, after one of these conversations.

Eda explained that they were almost strangers in the great metropolis.

"Then it is a great, a very great pity that he should be there alone. Nothing seems sadder to me than the thought of a young man being cast upon the great world homeless. I have been talking about him to the earl, and telling him what I have learned from you about your brother's position."

Eda's work dropped in her lap. If Lord Chessington, who was both rich and powerful, would interest himself in Mark's fortunes, how thankful she should be!

The countess smiled at her eager upraised face.

"For your sake, my dear," Lady Chessington went on, "we shall be glad to lend a helping hand to your brother. But we must first know what he is fit for; and so the earl has been suggesting that he might perhaps come here for the present as his secretary and librarian."

"Our books are in a disgraceful state," interposed Eudora. "Eustace was saying only yesterday that many of the finest works are spoiling."

"If Mr. Granton accepts our offer, he will catalogue and arrange them for us," her mother replied; "and so, Eda, we will leave you to write to your brother. Tell him that the arrangement is merely to be a temporary one, and that its duration will depend on circumstances. If Lord Chessington is satisfied that he will do credit to his recommendation, he will lose no time in endeavouring to procure him a more lucrative post."

Eda could scarcely find words to express her thankfulness; and as soon as the countess left her she flew to write her letter to Mark, and tell him what bright prospects were opening before him.

"You will make me wish I had a brother, if you look so ridiculously happy at the prospect of seeing yours," Eudora merrily told her. "I hope he is the very moral of you, as the old women say."

"I don't think Mark is much like me," Eda answered; and from that moment, though she could scarcely have told why, a feeling of distrust mingled with her joy. What if Mark proved himself unworthy of the earl's goodness? The thought was indignantly scouted as soon as it presented itself; but it came back again and again; and it was throbbing in her heart when she was told that Mark had answered her letter in person, and was waiting in the morning-room to see her.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 8. Philip.

Chapter to be read—Acts viii.

INTRODUCTION. Ask the children what Christ had foretold about the spread of the Gospel. What had He compared it to? (Matt. xiii. 31). Have seen it spread from one hundred and twenty to five thousand in Jerusalem; how was it to spread its branches in other places? What had its enemies tried to do? Who was forbidden to preach? With what success? What was done to Stephen? Who kept the clothes of the witnesses, and made himself active in persecuting? What would the Christians do to avoid persecution? Just as Christ had told them—to flee to other cities (Matt. x. 23), but what did they do when they got there? Thus, persecution only spread the Gospel more, so became a proverb, "Blood of the martyrs the seed of the Church." Trace spread of Gospel in Samaria.

I. A False Convert. (Read viii. 5—25.) Ask who Philip was, and where he was now sent. When had Samaria been visited, and by whom? Remind of Samaritan woman talking with Christ, and of the converts made (John iv. 39); of the grateful Samaritan leper; therefore Samaritans prepared to hear more. What power did Philip possess to confirm his preaching? (v. 6). What power did he not possess? Who were sent down by the Apostles, and for what purpose? (v. 14). Hence show that Philip the deacon or evangelist (xxi. 8) preached, baptised, and worked miracles, but could not impart the special gifts of the Holy Ghost.

Now inquire about Simon. Describe him as a village sorcerer, pretending immense power. Whence derived? (v. 10). All the village consulting; ignorant rustics and even upper classes are alike beguiled. Now they hear of a greater power of God, and see the miracles. Remind of magicians who could not stand before Moses (Ex. viii. 19), acknowledging God's power; so this sorcerer, professing true faith, is baptised. How the news of Samaria receiving the Gospel is carried to Jerusalem. Who were sent down? Picture the scene: the arrival of the two apostles; the excitement among the new converts; the solemn service; the laying on of hands; the descent of the Holy Ghost. Who was watching the proceedings? What request does he make, and how does Peter answer it? What did this show on Simon's part? (a) Ignorance in thinking God's gifts could be purchased. For passages showing that they are free gifts, see James i. 17, Rom. vi. 23, and many others. (b) Pride, evidently wanting this power to retain influence over the village. Still, evidently some good at work in Simon, as he asks Peter to pray for him (ver. 24).

Practical Lessons. (1) Sin of witchcraft. Ask for the first commandment, and show the folly and wickedness of consulting witches, fortune-tellers, &c., as dishonouring to God. (2) Freedom of God's gifts. Were they to be bought, could not be universal; being free, within reach of all (Isa. lv. 1), to be obtained by prayer (Luke xi. 13).

II. A True Convert. (Read 26 to end.) Philip having preached to villages, has now an individual to instruct. Who was this proselyte, and where returning? Let the children tell the following points in his character—(a) He was earnest. Look out Ethiopia in map to show the distance he had come for worship. (b) He was studious. Solemnised by the services of the Temple during the feast, he was returning in a thoughtful mood, and reading: what chapter? (c) He was docile. Not content to read through a chapter and then stop; wanted to understand.

Who was watching the Eunuch, and who was sent to guide him? Show how God is thus intently seeking out men to worship Him aright, not leaving them alone, but guiding them in the use of means: thus the Magi astrologists by a star are led to Christ; Peter, the fisherman, converted by draught of fishes; the Eunuch, when reading the Scriptures, has a heavenly-sent guide. Now picture the journey continued—Philip; the Eunuch; the earnest conversation; servants catch snatches of it; what had Christ coupled with faith? (Mark xvi. 16). The Eunuch taught this duty, desires the Christian rite. What is the requisite? Does he possess it? (ver. 37). Philip's work over, he is taken elsewhere. The Eunuch realises the fruits of the Spirit—love and joy (Gal. v. 22).

Practical Lessons. (1) Seekers will be taught. None ever sought God in vain. Question is, are we seeking Christ, anxious to learn of Him, become like Him. He will teach us by His Word, His Spirit, His ministers, His providences. (2) The importance of true faith. Simon received a curse, the Eunuch a blessing. Both seemed sincere. Believe on Christ, pray for true faith, use outward means, and will have joy in believing.

Questions to be answered.

1. What was the effect of Stephen's persecution?
2. Who preached in Samaria, and with what result?
3. What mistake did Simon make, and what did his mistake proceed from?
4. What two lessons does story of Simon teach?
5. What three points do you notice in the character of the Eunuch?
6. What practical lessons may we learn?

COMFORTABLE WORDS.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"The Word was made flesh."—St. John i. 14.

WHEN St. John, in his Epistle, cautions his disciples to "keep themselves from idols," he means, we suppose, to warn them against those conceptions of the Deity which men frequently frame for themselves, and which do not correspond with the reality. Idols of wood and stone the Christians of that day were little likely to bow down to; but with so many false teachers abroad in the world, and so many new heresies broached, it was not improbable that some of them should be induced to set up what was really a mere projection from their own minds, and call it "God," and worship it. The Apostle, then, was anxious that his "little children" should know the true God. And no wonder, for nothing is so important, so indispensably necessary to us, as this knowledge.

To say nothing of those who are ignorant of revelation, consider how often even Christians go astray, what detriment they suffer, what loss of comfort and of strength they undergo, from imperfect acquaintance with the subject! It is no unusual thing for us to fancy that God grudges us our happiness, or that He takes a kind of delight in inflicting suffering upon us, punishing where punishment is by no means necessary. More frequently still, we find it difficult to accept unreservedly the offers of grace, whilst we intellectually repudiate the idea of merit, and talk glibly of our own unworthiness. The feeling still clings to us that we must do something—perform some good work, it may be, or accomplish some important reformation — before we can expect to receive the fulness of the Divine favour. These misapprehensions are sad impediments to the spiritual life. They obstruct its flow. They render impossible a perfect confidence or open communication between ourselves and God. It is they who "know Thy name, who put their trust in Thee."

Most important, then, is it for us to form and retain a true conception of God. Now, where can we find such a conception?

The same St. John who warns us against "idols" tells us also that Jesus Christ is the "Word of God." The phrase is peculiar to his writings, but it is easy enough to understand it. Language is the utterance of the man—the going forth of that which is in him. "Speak, that I may see thee," said the old philosopher. And though we may express our meaning partially by signs and looks and gestures, it is not until we put into language the thoughts that are passing within, that we become fully intelligible to those who are round about us. When, then, the Apostle calls Jesus the "Word of God," he implies that Jesus Christ expresses what God is; that it is through Jesus Christ, through His person and His teaching, that the Eternal Jehovah, Whom no man hath seen or can see, becomes intelligible, becomes comprehensible, to the mind of man; or, as the Saviour himself expresses it, "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." Do you want to know what God is? Look at Jesus of Nazareth, study Jesus of Nazareth, there you will find the object of your search.

Now let us touch upon one or two thoughts which suggest themselves.

First: Is not the revelation which we have of the unseen God in Jesus Christ a very surprising one? Of course we are used to it now. But try to put yourselves in the position of a man who is expecting an Incarnation, but who does not know what the manner of that Incarnation will be. All he knows is, that God will enter into human life, and manifest Himself in a human form. Now, would such a man ever conceive of the meek and lowly Jesus, the companion of peasants and artisans, the carpenter's son—Jesus, who submitted to every insult and indignity, who lived a hard life, and died an agonising and ignominious death upon the Cross? Would he? I think not. He would form altogether a different idea. He would associate with the Incarnate God the idea of power, of lofty station and unlimited wealth, of extensive territory, fleets and armies and victories; or, at least, of mighty intellectual achievements, and the quiet triumphs of peace. These are the circumstances with which we should all be inclined to surround the Divine visitant. Jesus of Nazareth would be far from our thoughts. But is it not consoling for us poor, tempted, feeble, anxious, perplexed creatures to find in Jesus Christ what the great God with Whom we have to do really is? The Old Testament has taught us something in this direction. The high and lofty One, that inhabiteth Eternity, dwells also with him that is of a contrite and a humble spirit. The Lord, Who is great and of great power, and Whose understanding is infinite—the same Lord healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds. But until Jesus Christ came to earth, and moved amongst us, God manifest in the flesh, we could hardly have fully understood that the greatest and most powerful of all beings—the Being Whom our fearful hearts so strongly incline us to dread—is also the gentlest and kindest and tenderest and best.

Then, is it not a great advantage to have God brought down within our reach, and made, as it were, tangible to us? If I look at God apart from Jesus Christ, I am bewildered. He is eternal; He is infinite; He is omnipotent; He is the great origin and source of life—"uncaused Himself, but causing all besides." Yes; but there is little here, for my affections at least, to lay hold of. I have got little more than an abstraction. But when I turn to Jesus Christ, and see how He loves me, and cares for me, and sympathises with me, and notice the wondrous combination of purity with tenderness, of gentleness with power, that He presents—I feel I have come to a real Person standing before me; and I can throw myself at His feet, as Thomas did, and exclaim, "My Lord and my God!"

Lastly: Is it not also a great advantage to us to possess that fourfold portraiture of Christ which we have in the Gospels? Each Evangelist carries us to his own side of the One majestic figure. To Matthew, He is the King—the King, winning His crown by suffering and death. To Mark, He is God's servant, pervading human life with a strange and irresistible activity, the great Worker for God and man. To Luke, He is the compassionate Son of Man, embracing in the arms of His sympathy the entire human race, holding humanity precious for humanity's sake. To John, He is the Son, God of God, Light of Light, the co-Eternal Word of the Eternal Father. Each plants us at His own point of view; and as we, under the Spirit's teaching, follow each guide, and listen to his descriptions, we become more like Him Whom we contemplate—we are "changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

MAY FLOWER, OR "SERVANT OF ALL."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LITTLE BUTTERCUP," "NOTHING BUT A SONG," "HOW TO ENTER INTO REST," ETC.

CHAPTER X.

"I have known a luxuriant vine swell into irregular twigs, and bold excrescences, and spread itself in leaves and little rings, and afford but trifling clusters to the winepress, and a faint return to his heart which longed to be refreshed with a full vintage; but when the Lord of the vineyard had caused the dressers to cut the wildor plant and make it bleed, it grew temperate in its vain expense of useless leaves, and knotte i into fair and juicy branches, and made account of the loss of blood, by return of fruit."—JEREMY TAYLOR.

"A quiet abode at His feet,
That shall not be taken away."—L. A. W.

MAY'S cold was but slight, and after a long night's rest, she awoke, to see Phillis standing beside her.

"Well, May, how do you feel?"

"Oh, all right," she answered; and then finding how late it was, was glad to get up.

Just as she finished dressing, Geraldine came in; it was always a comfort to see her bright face, and May begged her to stay with her.

"I can't stay now, May Flower; but Stephen wants you to go down to him in the study when you are ready."

"Yes," she answered with a half sigh, "is he very angry?"

"Angry?"

"Yes, about yesterday?"

"Oh no, darling; you need not be afraid."

"I don't think I ever am exactly afraid, but you know I was so very bad yesterday."

"I'm sure he only wants to help you to be better. Be quick and run down."

And surely she did get helped. Neither excusing or defending her or Tom, he showed how the things had been in themselves. Then he went to the deeper ground—what the life of those who were wholly given to Christ should be.

May listened, more gentle and quiet than he had ever seen her before.

"'I am with you alway,' is the promise Christ has given us," he said; "and that promise we must use and live on; that is, that possessing the Lord Jesus Christ, we must now live on Him, and do every act of our life, even the very commonest, most lowly act for Him, for His sake. If we do this, May Flower, our lives will grow holy to the very centre, for Christ's presence will gradually, but most surely, cast out all that is sinful and wrong."

"It is easier for you, Stephen, than for me," she said.

"Why?"

"You are older, and you are a clergyman."

"That does not make it easier, child. It is just how closely we are living to our Lord, that makes a thing easy or difficult. As for being older, think of the bud of a rose; is it not a perfect and beautiful thing? In its way it is just as perfect as the full-blown flower, so, though you are only a child, you may be a child of God, and walk in the sunshine of His presence, loving and pleasing Him. And then, as for my being a clergyman, that again has nothing to do with it. I believe it is the highest and noblest profession a man can embrace; but a clergyman ought not to be more given up to God than a business man, nor than a child. Our profession and circumstances have nothing to do with it in one way; wherever we are, and whatever we are, we must be wholly and utterly surrendered to God, and we must close our hearts to all that might separate us from Him, and open them wide, fully to receive all the love and blessing He is ready to bestow."

"Oh, I want it all so much," she said.

"And you are far more anxious to-day than you were yesterday?"

"Far, far more, Stephen," she answered, with her hands clasped. "Somehow, I saw it all more plainly yesterday than ever before, and I'm just set on it."

"And you are not afraid, May Flower?"

"Yes I am; but you know what you said just now, 'Lo, I am with you alway.'"

"Yes, child; never let go of that, for it will carry you through all, and 'in His presence,' even in this life, 'is fulness of joy.' Now I have something else to tell you of. This morning there was a letter from——"

"From Rosamond?" May whirled with delight.

"Asking you," Stephen went on, "to go there next Tuesday. Well, I'm afraid we can't manage that, but I go away on Friday, and you will have to wait till then, and I can drop you at Uncle Fernaval's on my way."

So the long-desired visit was at hand.

"Oh, it is delightful!" she cried, and then flew to the others.

How the days passed she knew not, but at last the Friday came; the baggage, the fly, the train, and she was close there before she thought how long it would be till she saw Stephen again.

"Oh, Stephen," she said, suddenly, "I shan't see you again till Christmas!"

"Just thought of that?" he asked.

"Only just. Oh dear, I shall miss you, when I get back!"

"Do you know what I shall most want to know, when I come back again at Christmas, May Flower?"

"No," she said, looking as if she knew very well.

"I shall want to know if your verse has become very much dearer to you," he answered.

"'I am with you alway?'" she asked; "I am sure it will be, Stephen."

"Here we are!"

The train ran into the little station, and May was given up to her aunt Mrs. Fernaval, and Rosamond, who stood waiting on the platform for her.

Those six weeks were a happy time; the long, golden autumn slowly fading into winter; then the return home; the short days, and long evenings; the first frosts and snows, till Christmas was at hand, and Stephen home again.

Very bright and cheerful the fire looked the evening of Stephen's arrival, and very comfortable May found the few moments in the study, leaning against her brother as he sat in his arm-chair, before tea.

"It's all right, Stephen," she said.

"What's all right?"

"Your text."

"Is it, child? I knew it was when I looked at you; is it better than when I was at home in the summer?"

"A thousand times," she said.

"Well then, we must follow the first part of the text, 'Teaching them all things whatsoever I have commanded you.'"

"That is more for you than for me."

"I think not; we have each our little world to live in, and our words, and looks, and ways, must all teach what He has commanded us, so surely as He is with us alway."

And he found it had begun already, though unconsciously enough to her. There was no doubt but that it still was a very hard thing to her to be "a servant of all," yet it was a thing she could never give up; for without it she knew she could never truly show herself "a good servant of Jesus Christ," which it was the deepest longing and desire of her bright eager spirit to be.

THE END.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

45. Give the passage from which we may assume that the prophet Isaiah, from his position in society, was of royal lineage, or at least of high rank.

46. Give six instances of the use of the word "church" to denote a particular assembly of persons meeting for religious worship.

47. "If," said Zacchæus, "if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold" (Luke xix. 8). Show that this was greatly in excess of what was required by the Mosaic law.

48. Show from one of our Lord's discourses that the manna which fell in the desert was a type of the Lord Jesus Christ.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 96.

29. Our Lord before His death had promised to meet His disciples in Galilee after His resurrection, and notwithstanding their unbelief, He kept His promise. See St. Matt. xxvi. 32; xxviii. 7, 10, 16, 17; 1 Cor. xv. 6.

30. In one only, that of the rich man and Lazarus (St. Luke xvi. 19—31).

31. "Render," said our Lord, "to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's" (St. Mark xii. 17).

32. Ezek. xxvii. 18.

33. St. Matt. viii. 29; St. Mark iii. 11; St. Luke iv. 34, 41.

34. For the freewill offering a blemished animal might be offered. See Lev. xxii. 23.

35. The battle of the four kings against five. See Gen. xiv.

36. Isaac. See Gen. xxii. 6.

(Drawn by A. Hopkins.)

THE FORTUNE OF WAR.

'TIS after the battle! the field is strewn o'er
With that which shall love, struggle, suffer no more!
More awful this hush than the warfare's wild din.
'Tis after the battle. The posts they ride in.

But the proud glance of triumph is dimmed with regret,
The cheer of acclaim trembles faltering yet;
Too late come the laurels that honour would shed
O'er ranks of the dying, o'er lines of the dead.

He has fought through the battles; the roll of the drum
Is still, and she watches!—the letter has come!—
A letter has come, but the writing is strange—
O heart, still thy beatings! oh, read of a change!

——"I have fought my last fight. You were noble and true,
And the hardest of all, love, is parting with you!
The strong arms whose hope 'twas your refuge to be,
Are shattered and lost; now farewell, you are free!"

* * * * * * * * *

Down the hospital lines, by the dying and dead
She has passed—she has found it! she kneels by his bed!
She has bathed with her tears her brave warrior's brow,
Once lover, but lord, hero, conqueror now!

"Free! free! yes, the depths of my heart's love to know,
By the might of a love that could ache for me so!
In the prime of thy strength I was careless and cold,
Now life, to be near thee, is all turned to gold!"

She will love him and keep him, in sickness and health;
She will have him and hold him; her love is her wealth.
For sorrow and pain tear disguise from the heart,
But the two they have welded fall never apart.

ALESSIE BOND.

EDWARD TURNER, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.

BY AGNES MACDONELL, AUTHOR OF "MARTIN'S VINEYARD."

CHAPTER VIII.

AN UNPROFITABLE SUNDAY EVENING.

"Oh, how better a thing it is to look into happiness through another man's eyes!"

ON the Sunday evening Charlie Brereton came in, as he seemed in the habit of doing. We had been reading a book that Robert had got from the village library; but after Charlie came the peace of Sunday evening was gone. He began to tell us about some of the Shakespeare readings he had attended in London. He could describe the scenes, and repeat the words sometimes, and make it all so real, that my mother even would get interested, and listen. This evening Charlie began to tell about one of Shakespeare's plays he had heard read. It was "Othello." He told the story of the Moor who murdered his wife from jealousy, being worked on by a wicked friend to believe her false. Charlie sat on a low stool by the fire, and when he told the end, when the Moor finds out his error, and stabs himself in remorse, he leaned forward, with his hand against his heart, and repeated the dying words of Othello in a low voice. I saw Barbara's hands had dropped into her lap, and her eyes were full of tears fixed upon his face, and I felt her heart had gone to him. I heard my mother say she didn't like the story and the murderous talk; if people listened to those sorts of things they must get to feel wicked themselves, she was sure, she said.

"Do you think I talk like a bloodthirsty man?" said Charlie, laughing; "why, I couldn't hurt a woman with my little finger. You don't believe I could, do you?" he said to Barbara.

She began to laugh, as if she was ashamed of her tears.

"Oh no, you could not do what Othello did," she said; "you're too—too easy for that."

"Yes," he said. "There's another fellow in the play, called Cassio, he is more in my way, I think. It takes a quieter man to get as angry as Othello, mad enough to kill his wife—a quiet chap like you, Ned."

After they had been talking over the story a bit, Charlie began again about the readings, wanting the two girls to go to London with him to hear them. He had talked of this before, I found. My mother opposed it a good deal; but Charlie knew he could argue and persuade her into anything. Barbara would not say either yes or no. She laughed, and said he had made her cry over his description, and that was enough for her. She was standing by the fire, with one foot on the fender, and I thought her face looked troubled. She looked at me once, as if she expected me speak for her, but an angry heart held me silent. He went on saying that she did not care how much she vexed him by saying she would not go; that he would get reserved seats, so that she need not go before the time of the office closing; he knew she wanted to go, and why need she persist in saying no.

Barbara said, "Please don't insist so. It's very kind of you; but I cannot promise till—till I have talked it over with Ann."

He went on in a low voice, and I could not hear her reply, and then he said, "But if she wants to go, and says she will, you will promise to go too—it's a bargain; if you won't—well then, I'll take her alone!" and he laughed, but half angrily.

He went across to the side of the table where Ann sat apart, and drew his chair up to her's, and began talking in his quick earnest way. Ann looked down on her work, and shook her head; but as he went on, she looked up at him, and I heard him say, "I know you will not refuse the first, the only thing I have ever asked you!" She turned away her head as he bent towards her and laid his hand upon her shoulder.

"Come," I said, for I could bear it no longer, "it is time you were going, Charlie! Say 'good-night!' and come!"

"Let go of me, Ned, I say! I am going to get a promise before I go," he said, and he turned back in the door-way.

"Now promise me, Ann; say one word to make me know that you will please me."

She said in a low voice, "Yes;" and then he turned suddenly to Barbara, with a look of triumph. He whispered something in her ear that made her start, and her cheeks flush, and ran down the garden walk.

"Stop!" I cried, "I want to speak a word with you. Don't wait up for me," I said to Ann; "shut the door, and leave the candle on the table; I shall not be long."

Charlie Brereton was waiting for me at the gate.

"What is it, Ned?" he asked; and I thought his voice sounded uneasy in the darkness. "It's very cold out here these damp nights, and not pleasant standing."

"Look here," I said, "I want to speak with you, and get a plain answer from you, Charlie."

"Well," he said.

"I don't like this Shakespeare business——nor what you have done in the matter," I was going to say, but he interrupted me quickly, and impatiently.

"Oh, hang it, what fault do you to find with it? It will be a bit of amusement, that's all."

"You shall not go alone with those two girls."

"Please yourself about going," he said, angrily; "but if you're going to be as precious sulky as you were to-night, they would enjoy it as much without you, I should think."

"Look here, Charlie Brereton," said I, "I want to tell you one thing. I don't see that you are acting right; and I want you to remember that if you are thinking of just playing with either of the women in the house, then you'll have to answer me about it."

"What do you mean?" he said, impatiently.

"I mean," said I, "that you shan't come up here talking night after night, and making love to one and the other, and then turn off with the next girl that comes in your way. I know your fickle faithless light ways, and you shan't play them here. I'll throw up my London place, and come to Birchfield, and work by the day, sooner than I'll let you bring mischief here!"

He laughed; but I don't know whether it was from uneasiness and shame, or whether I did him too great a wrong when I thought him a heartless villain; but, quicker than the thought, I had caught him by the throat. He struck up my arm, but I held on, and we closed, and struggled hard and fierce in the darkness. It was the first taste of triumph and exultation to me. He had seized the happiness of my heart in his light fingers, and thrown it down, but now I held him in my grasp. He was lighter and more active than I was, but his purpose was not so strong. I heard his short panting breath, and the crackling of the ling beneath our feet, but no word was spoken; I knew that he was in my power. At last he fell. It is an evil thing when a man lets the hatred of his heart possess his whole body, like a fiend, that urges him on beyond his will in this way, and makes him feel—as I felt then—nothing but fierce triumph as his adversary lies at his feet. Many a man has been hurried into a crime that has blackened his whole life and his memory after him through a burst of anger like mine; but through God's mercy I was spared that doom—Charlie Brereton was not dead, he was only stunned, and in a few moments he was upon his knees feeling about on the heather for his hat. It gave us both time to cool.

He got up, and stood before me, and said, "I see what you mean by all this, Ned Turner," he said. "If you think I am to be dictated to like a child, you're mistaken. Do you think I am going to harm any one? well, you're mistaken; but if you think you're going to frighten me out of the way—but, indeed you shall not—and so I give you warning!"

He flung off at a brisk pace down the hill-side, and left me with my evil thoughts in the darkness.

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

"IN THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW OF DEATH"—(concluded).

THE entrance in the hall of a cheerful, genial gentleman, with a kindly, brisk manner, and a reassuring expression of deliberation and repose in his observant face and easy bearing, rouses us from melancholy fancies, and with a few words of courteous welcome we are at once conducted to the door that is to open to us the first scene in this wonderful visit.

A spacious assembly-room—let us call it by the good old name of "parlour," for there is much quietly animated talk going on—talk, and needle-work of all kinds, from the knitting of a warm woollen shawl to the manipulation of delicate lace, and the deft handling of implements for making those exquisite tortures of society known as anti-macassars. With ever so wide an experience of halls, salons, suites, or drawing-rooms, the visitor can see nothing resembling this wonderful parlour elsewhere. A room of noble proportions, one end of which is occupied by an organ; the great windows reaching almost from floor to ceiling, and overlooking a broad expanse of lawn, with a glorious view of hill and woodland beyond; on the tables flowers, books, ornaments; in every kind of couch and chair—many of which are comfortable beds on wheels and springs—a company of women, with bright, cheerful, intelligent faces, full of a recent interest, and, even in cases where some paroxysm of pain is passing, with a certain serene satisfaction which it is infinitely good to see.

There has been a morning service, conducted by a visiting clergyman, and there is a general expression of approval which, if the reverend gentleman himself were present to witness it, would surely prove highly gratifying. The congregation has settled down to easy talk, and has resumed its occupation of plain and fancy needlework. Here is an old lady whose silver hair adds to her natural grace and dignity, who is busy with wool-work, and at the same time engages in a discriminating criticism of the address to one of the many visitors who sit and spend an hour of their afternoon in agreeable chat. There is a pretty but rather sad-eyed mignon lady, whose excellently-fitting silk dress, delicate hands, and general "niceness" of appearance, quite prepare us to see the beautiful examples of all kinds of fancy work of which she never seems to tire. All the work of the patients is for sale, and every year, in June, they have a grand bazaar at the hospital, so that those who are skilful and capable are able to clothe themselves as they please—everything except clothing being found by the charity to every inmate, except two or three who are able to pay for their own maintenance. Now we hear the low tones of cheerful talk, the pleasant ripple of laughter—note the brightening glance, the quick smile, the feeble but earnest finger-clasp which greets the cheerful salutation of the house governor, Mr. Darbyshire, or the presence of his wife, the lady matron of this great happy family of incurables.

Nor is the wonderful revelation of cheerfulness, of light in shadow, less remarkable in the dormitories themselves. But then what rooms they are! Each bed is as it were set in an alcove of its own snow-white hangings, relieved by bits of colour which would delight an artist's eye—pieces of embroidery, framed illuminated texts, bright flecks of Berlin wool-work, or glistening designs in beads, or deep glowing knick-knacks wrought in silk and lace. Each little bedside table, though it may hold medicine and diet—drink and requisites for the sick—is decked with flowers and little framed pictures, gaily-bound books, and bright-hued toys and trifles, that make it look like a miniature stand at a fancy fair. In some cases the sense of combined purity and glow of colour is so great, that it is difficult to realise that we are in one or other of a series of sick-rooms. Everything is so spotless, so exquisitely clean and orderly, that nothing less than perfect nursing could explain it—for be it remembered that the place is open to visitors every day—and amidst some of the most terrible afflictions from which humanity can suffer there is nothing revolting. Expressions of pain and of utter prostration and weakness there are, of course; but even these are only alternative from the general placid contentment and thankfulness that is the prevailing characteristic.

Even in two severe cases of cancer the terrible effects of the malady are less notable, because of the surrounding conditions. A sprightly and engaging girl, with features and social life alike marred and obliterated by this dreadful malady, is surely one of the saddest of all the sad sights in such an institution; but here the brightness and genial influence of the place, and of those who are its ministrants, have had their effect, and even the half-obliterated features gain a grateful, loving, cheerful expression; the poor eyes beam with pleasure as the governor starts some reminiscence of that pleasant summer water-party of his, in which one of the two sufferers had to be carried to the boat in his arms, and both of them, deeply veiled, were rowed by those same guarding arms for a glorious voyage on the river, where the summer's sunshine and gladness stole into the hearts of the sufferers, and left a halo of remembrance that is not perhaps so very far from the anticipations of that stream which maketh glad the children of God.

Here are rooms wherein only two or three beds are placed, while few of them contain more than six, but all of them are bright, airy, lofty, full of space, and with the same sense of purity. And from every window some fresh and lovely view of the surrounding landscape, with all its changeful aspects, may be seen—the beds being so placed that every patient has her own special expanse of territory to solace her waking hours, even though she be unable to go down to the assembly-room. Here, in a room particularly bright and cheerful, lies a young woman with a wealth of dark hair on the pillow where her intelligent face beams with a certain courage, although her body and limbs have been for years immovable—only one arm, for an inch or two, and three fingers of the right hand, can be stirred—and yet, as we stand and talk with her, some small simple jest about her own condition causes her to laugh till the bed shakes. She has learnt to write by holding a pencil in her mouth, and inscribes neat and legible letters on paper placed on a rest just in front of her face. She is not only cheerful, but actually hopeful, though she has been for years in this condition; and her relations, great and small, visit her, to find her always heartily determined to look on the bright side. At the foot of her bed, near the window, is a swing looking-glass on a pedestal, and in this she sees reflected the distant prospect of autumn wood and field, extending miles away. Judging from her nobly equable and smiling face, she must be the life of the room of which she has been so long an occupant. In another apartment a poor schoolmistress suffering from hemorrhage of the lungs lies reading for many hours a day, her face bearing a painful expression, her manner eager, her constant craving to work on by the study of books concerning the problems of this earthly life and the sciences that strive to demonstrate them and yet only bring us to the barrier of the eternal world. She yearns for one more day amidst her classes, and for the opportunity of testing the results of sick-bed thoughts on a method of education which should adapt itself to the individual temperament and mental peculiarity of each child. Amidst a troubled tide of thoughts that are perhaps sometimes too much for the weary brain, she may learn to recognise the rest that comes after hearing the Divine voice say, "Peace! be still;" and so a great spiritual calm may fall upon her, and give her rest.

Yet another visit, and we find a girl who, from an accidental fall, is as immovable as a statue, her dark questioning eyes and mobile face alone excepted. Yet she is sometimes lifted into a wheel-chair that stands stabled by her bedside, and joins the company in the great parlour downstairs. There is another little parlour, with quite a select coterie, under the presidency of an elderly gentlewoman, who is busily knitting at a table, while her friends recline at the windows, on their special couches; and in several of the dormitories patients are sitting up, reading, working, or looking at the fitful aspect of earth and sky on this October afternoon. Sufferers from heart-disease, with that anxious contracted expression so indicative of their malady, are numerous; but the larger number of the patients seem to suffer from rheumatism, or paralysis—among them one lady, with silvered hair, and yet with bright, expressive eyes, and still bonny face, who was once a well-known singer in London. She is unable to rise from couch or bed, but the readiness of repartee, the bright inquiring look, the quick appreciation and retort, remain, as do a certain swift expressive action of head and hands, which is marvellously suggestive of dramatic gesture; for, happily, her hands and arms are still capable of movement, and she has several periodicals on the coverlet among them the latest monthly part of the QUIVER, in one of the stories in which she is evidentlyinterested. She, with two or three others, are inmates of the hospital at their own charges.

We have but little time to devote to the men's side of this great institution; but its plainer dormitories and furniture, its large day-room, where daughters sit talking in low voice to fathers, sisters to brothers, wives to husbands—its pleasant out-door contingent, who have just returned from slowly perambulating the grounds in wheel-chairs, or sit basking outside in the latest gleam of sunshine—its club in the rustic hut especially appointed for this purpose — all might bear comment. Here is a sturdy youth, who, falling from a tree, and alighting on his heels, incurably injured his spine, and now lies all day, mostly out of doors, and without a coat, frequently engaged in knitting. There is a poor gentleman, who has for sixteen years been almost immovable, from rheumatism, even his jaw being so fixed that he takes food through an aperture in the teeth. He has been through two or three hospitals, and under the care of the most eminent surgeons, and has come here now as to an ark of refuge, where he can read and talk, and be wheeled about the neighbourhood on occasional visits. Only one case of all those that we witness is startling in its melancholy sense of terrible loss and incurability; that rigid, grimly-set face, in the ward where the corner bed in which the grizzled head lies is the only one occupied this afternoon. The body belonging to that face is almost immovable—the ears are deaf, the tongue is mute, the eyes are nearly sealed—not by sudden calamity, but by gradual yielding to decay or disease. He has been an inmate several years, and is the one case here before which we may almost quail in our solemn sense of affliction; and yet, and yet, to the touch of certain loving hands that dead face kindles; that mind, seemingly locked in stupor, wakes to life; that intelligence, encased in a casket iron-bound and motionless, can understand the signs that are made upon his own hands or forehead, and interpret them so as to give some kind of grateful answer. It needs the touch of the lady nurse to bring out this strange music from an instrument so unstrung; but that it should be done at all is an evidence of the hold that loving sympathy and some subtle influence almost beyond mere bodily capacity of expression has taken in these dear souls of the sick and the afflicted. That is where the shadow lifts, even in the darkness of the valley; that is how the Spirit of Christ may abound; and the soul, in recognising the work of the disciple, may recognise the Lord therein, and remember the Living Word—"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me."

ENGLISH SACRED POETRY.

THE tone which characterises the early poetical literature of most countries has always been strictly religious. In Greece we find the earliest bards thoroughly pervaded with a religious spirit. Homer sang hymns to his gods; Hesiod has devoted a long poem to their glory; and when Athens had reached her climax of political and intellectual splendour, the religious element lay at the basis of her finest poetry, her sculpture, her painting, and even her oratory. Among the Romans we find the same principle equally illustrated. The earliest specimens of their literature which have come down to us are fragments of hymns; and a great German critic finds reason to believe that the greater proportion of the early poetry which has perished was of a religious character also. In reading the history of early Oriental literatures the same truth strikes us. Sardi, Ferdusi, Jani, and even Hafiz, have left us some beautiful specimens of sacred poetry; and the Seven Poems, which are the earliest specimens of Arabic literature, were dedicated to the deity of the Arabians, and suspended in the temple.

Sooner or later, however, under the deteriorating influences which follow in the train of advancing civilisation, the religious and secular elements in poetry become separated, and poetry suffers from the disunion. The two modern nations which are especially rich in sacred literature are the Germans and ourselves. A finer and nobler mass of religious poetry the world has never seen. Each of these literatures, however, though presenting many points of similarity, is marked by its own peculiar characteristics. English religious poetry has more fire, more energy and buoyancy, than that of the Germans, which is often sombre and oppressed. The prevalence of shadow and gloom which marks their painting and much of their architecture, finds its expression in their poetry. The majority of the German sacred poets, moreover, were, as compared with their secular brethren, second-rate men. Many of our sacred poets, on the other hand, stand among the first in our literature, as Milton, Young, Cowper, Addison.

The first poet of any note, nay, some say the very first poet who appeared in England, was a religious poet, Cædmon. There are few more touching episodes in literary history than the tale of this simple bard's life, for he was a true son of song. Amid the lovely scenery of Whitby—where the Lady Hilda, one of those sweet saint-like figures which pass like a ray of sunlight over the dark page of sanguinary and chaotic early history, had founded her monastery in the year 657—Cædmon dwelt. He was originally a pagan, but, falling under Hilda's influence, he became a Christian, and "a brother in her monastery, specially distinguished by divine grace" (we are quoting the venerable Bede's account of the poet, "for he used to make songs apt to religion and piety, so that whatever he learnt through interpreters of Holy Writ, this he, after a little while, in poetical words, composed with the utmost sweetness and feeling, would produce in his own tongue, that of the Angles." But Cædmon did not become a poet till he was of advanced years, and then the gift came to him miraculously in a dream. Bede tells the tale, and we cannot do better than quote it exactly as he tells it, availing ourselves of Mr. Morley's very literal version:—"Cædmon was of secular habit until of mature age, and never learned any poem. Sometimes, therefore, at a feast, when, for the sake of pleasure, all should sing in their turn, he, when he saw the harp coming near him, rose from table and went home. Once when he did that, and, having left the home of festivity, went out to the stables of the beasts, whose custody was on that night intrusted to him, and there, when at the usual hour he yielded to sleep, one stood by him, saluting him, and calling him by name. 'Cædmon,' he said, 'sing me something.' 'I cannot sing,' he said; 'for I have come out hither from this feast because I could not sing.' Again he who spoke with him said, 'But you have to sing to me.' 'What,' he said, 'ought I to sing?' But he answered, 'Sing the origin of creatures.' Having received this answer, he began immediately to sing in praise of God the Creator." And from that moment the poor cowherd Cædmon became a mighty poet. We must not, of course, be too critical in reading such a legend, but read it as we read poetry, for its great beauty and suggestive symbolism. Cædmon's poem, which has come down to us, is written in the Anglo-Saxon language; it very nearly perished in the wreck of Anglo-Saxon literature, and the one little copy which preserved for us a poem so noble and interesting, is deposited in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and is a small folio consisting of 229 pages. The poem is entitled "Cædmon's Paraphrase," and commences with a fine exordium, which may be thus translated:—"It is very right that we praise with our words, love in minds the Keeper of the Heavens, Glory King of Hosts. He is the source of power, the head of all His great creation, Lord Almighty. He never had beginning, nor was made, nor cometh any end to the Eternal Lord; but his power is everlasting over heavenly thrones. With high majesty, faithful and strong, He ruleth the depths of the firmament, that were set wide and far for the children of glory, the guardians of souls." The poet then, beginning with the fall of the rebellious angels, tells how God resolved to create a better race and a fair earth. He then describes the Creation in a passage of considerable graphic power, part of which, with the assistance of Mr. Sharon Turner's version, we subjoin :—

"There was not then here,
Except gloom like a cavern,
Anything made ;
But the rude ground
Stood deep and dim
For a new lordship,
Shapeless and unsuitable.
On this with his eyes he glanced—
The King, stern in mind—
And the joyless place beheld.
He saw the dark clouds
Perpetually press
Black under the sky,
Void and waste.
* * * * * *
Then separated,
The Governor of victory
Over the water-flood,
Light from darkness,
Shade from shine.
He made them both be named
Lord of life.
Light was first,
Through the Lord's word
Called day.
Creation of bright splendour,
The Creator after separated
From the pure shine.
Our Maker,
The first evening.
To him ran at last,
A throng of dark clouds ;
To these the King himself
Gave the name of night ;
Our Saviour there separated."

After giving an account of the creation of Eve (for the leaves describing the other part of the Creation are cut out of the MS., which is unfortunately mutilated in other places), the poet passes on to the rebellious angels in hell. Satan is haranguing them :—

"He raised himself
Against his master ;
He sought inflaming speeches ;
He began vain-glorious words ;
He would not serve God ;
He said he was his equal
In light and shining."

Satan then sends a dark messenger, who finds Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden. Disguising himself as a serpent, he tempts Eve to eat the fruit. The Fall ensues, and Cædmon then describes the exultation of the fiend, and how he returns to the "broad flames, the roofs of hell, where lay his master bound in fetters." After this follows a description of the misery of Adam and Eve, and their expulsion from Paradise. Cædmon then versifies the narrative of the events related in the Book of Genesis, in their chronological order, till, by an abrupt transition, he passes on from Abraham to Moses, and sings of the overthrow of Pharaoh's host in the Red Sea. At this point the poetry, which rather flags in the interval, becomes suddenly full of fire and spirit. This scriptural paraphrase closes with Belshazzar's Feast. The MS. ends with a poem, having for its subject Christ and Satan, and represents Satan in hell dreading the power of the Mediator, the descent of Christ, and the rescue of souls, known in old legends as the harrowing of hell. This part of the MS. is, however, very imperfect, being full of gaps and misplacements. The most interesting fact connected with this poem of Cædmon's, irrespective of its own intrinsic worth, is that, beyond doubt, it supplied Milton with the idea of his "Paradise Lost." The reader will note the similarity between the plot of this poem and that of Milton's great epic. He will note how closely such a passage as the following, for instance, corresponds with the description in the first book of "Paradise Lost," and with Satan's first speech :—

"But iron bands
Lay around me ;
Knots of chains press me down ;
I am kingdomless.
Hell's fetters
Hold me so hard,
So fast encompass me ;
Here are mighty flames
Above and beneath ;
I never saw
A more hateful landscape.
This fire never languisheth,
Hot over hell ;
Encircling rings,
Biting manacles,
Forbid my course."

To gratify the reader's curiosity we quote the original Anglo-Saxon of this passage, that he may see what it is like :—

Iren benda
Rideð racentan sal
Ic eom ricesleas !
Habbað me swa hearde
Helle clommas
Fæste befanȝen
Her is fyr micel
Ufan and neoðone
Ic a ne ȝeseah
Laðran landscipe
Liȝ ne aswamað
H'at ofer helle
Me habbað hrinȝa ȝesponȝ
Slið hearda sal
Siðes amyrred."

With all his uncouthness, and habit of falling into prolix description, Cædmon is a genuine poet, and sees everything, as Johnson says of Thomson, with the eye of a poet. In his narrative, for instance, of the Flood, he does not forget "the exulting fowl perched on the floating corpses." We must now say good-bye to this honest old bard, to whom we should be grateful for the true poetry which, to use his own words, "like a clean animal ruminating it," he turned into most sweet verse, and left to his country. Cædmon left a few disciples behind him, and has considerably influenced the character of the Anglo-Saxon literature subsequent to his age; but as these disciples and their poems are very obscure and very uninteresting, we make no scruple in passing them by, and will proceed to King Alfred, for the intermediate names of Wilfrid, Aldhelm, Bede, John Scotus Erigena, do not stand high in the rank of poets, and moreover, they wrote for the most part in Latin. King Alfred's translation of Boethius is the next important work which touches on sacred poetry, inasmuch as it is interspersed with versions of Boethius's poems. Boethius was a philosopher who lived in the sixth century, in the reign of the Ostrogoth Emperor, Theodoric, and he wrote in Latin a book which has always been a great favourite with the thoughtful scholar. This book is entitled "De Consolatione Philosophiæ," or, "Concerning the Consolation of Philosophy," and, though written by a pagan, is full of the most beautiful morality. It is written in Latin prose, interspersed with Latin poetry, and these pieces of Latin poetry were translated by King Alfred into Anglo-Saxon. Alfred, it must be confessed, does not keep very close to his original, and is somewhat inaccurate in his translations of certain passages. His version is, however, on the whole, spirited and adequate. The following is his version of the Address to the Deity:—

"Oh, thou Creator
Of the pure stars,
Of heaven and earth,
Thou on high seat
Ever reignest,
And thou all the swift
Heaven turnest round;
And through thy holy might
The stars compellest,
That they obey thee.
* * * * *
Oh, though Eternal,
And thou Almighty,
Of all creatures
Maker and Governor,
Pardon thy miserable
Offspring of earth—
Mankind,
Through the power of thy might."

This we give as a fair specimen of Alfred's poetical powers. By the way, the reader should remember that Anglo-Saxon poetry, though not rhyming, has a metre of its own, which we fear is rather imperfectly caught in the very literal versions with which we have in this paper presented them. The peculiarity which distinguishes Anglo-Saxon poetry from prose is a very regular alliteration (that is to say, a succession of words beginning with the same letter), so arranged that in every couplet there should be two principal words in the line beginning with the same letter, which letter must also be the initial of the first word on which the stress of the voice falls in the second line. It is necessary to remember this in reading Anglo-Saxon poetry, or versions of it which aim at reproducing the original. To proceed, however, with our narrative. In addition to this translation of Boethius, and his many other books, William of Malmesbury tells us that Alfred had begun a version of the Psalms, but that before he completed the first part he died. Sacred poetry has sustained a loss in this, for it would have been very interesting to read King Alfred's version of the works of a great king with whom he had so much in common, and the vicissitudes of whose life bore in many ways so striking a resemblance to those of his own. The next sacred poem in the Anglo-Saxon tongue is a very striking ode, and may be found appended to the menology. The concluding lines of it we subjoin:—

"The Creator alone knows
Whither the soul
Shall afterwards roam;
And all the spirits
That depart in God.
After their death-day
They will abide their judgment
In their father's bosom.
Their future condition
Is hidden and secret;
God alone knows it,
The preserving father.
None again return
Hither to our homes,
That any truth
May reveal to man
About the nature of the Creator,
Or the people's habitations of glory
Which he himself inhabits."

After Cædmon's Paraphrase, however, by far the most striking sacred poem of the Anglo-Saxon, is a short fragment describing the grave. This belongs to a later period of Anglo-Saxon, when the language was becoming Normanized, and is supposed to have been written about the reign of Henry II. It begins:—

"For thee was built a house
Ere thou wert born;
For thee was a mould shapen
Ere thou of thy mother camest;
Its height is not determined,
Nor its depth measured."

But as our readers are probably familiar with it in Longfellow's version, we forbear to quote further. Such then was sacred poetry among our rude Saxon forefathers, unpolished and simple, but full of fervour and energy, and imbued with that sweet child-like simplicity, that unaffected earnest spirit of devotion, which marks the early literature of most nations.

(Drawn by F. Barnard.)

"Your brother is too proud!"—p. 139.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XVII.

PERHAPS a fear that she had been doing him some injustice made Eda more than usually demonstrative when she ran into the arms of her brother; but, in truth, she was delighted to see him, and she thought she should never grow weary of gazing at his beloved face.

"Aren't you quite sure that it's I myself?" he quizzically demanded, at last. "Shall I give you another kiss to convince you? Oh, Eda, you don't know how often I've wished that I had never let you leave me! I didn't know the value of your sympathy till I couldn't have it!"

"I would have come to you; I would have endured any privation that we might be together, dear Mark!" she tearfully assured him.

"Didn't I know this? and wasn't it because I should have been ashamed to take advantage of your good nature that I did not tell you how sorely you were missed?"

"But we need not part any more now, Mark! Lord Chessington's offer——"

"Ah! what about it?" and Mark Granton, who had grown very manly during their separation, released his sister from his embrace, and, putting her in a chair, sat down beside her. "Is it worth accepting, my dear? Because I feel rather unwilling to turn my back on London, although I am not doing any good for myself at present."

Then Eda repeated, more diffusely than in her letter, all that the countess had said she and the earl were willing to do for him, and finished by asking enthusiastically, "Are they not good and generous?"

"They could not help being good to you," he answered, kissing her again. "As for the generosity of the offer, I suppose I shall be expected to work for my wages; in which case the obligation will be mutual, eh, Eda?"

"But do I not tell you that the earl only proposes to have you under his own eye for a while, that he may be better able to recommend you to something more lucrative? I thought you would be as pleased as I am."

"Why, so I shall be, if he fulfils his promises; but really, Eda, when one has been knocking about in the world, one learns to doubt all indefinite pledges. I should not care to be mewed up here long!" and he cast a disparaging glance around him.

The brightness was fast fading out of Eda's smile. "Surely, Mark, you cannot prefer the noisy smoky City to this beautiful park and mansion!"

Mark laughed. "I should like this place uncommonly well, if it were my own; and I do hope to possess something of the kind before I die. But there 's a high hill to climb first; and if the nearest way lies through the smoke and noise, why, I must put up with them."

"I wish, dear Mark, you would not talk as if you thought of nothing but making money."

"It 's a way one gets into, when one lives with people who do nothing else," he carelessly replied. "How well you are looking, my little Eda! How do my lord and my lady use you? because I shall not consent to come here if my sister is not treated as she ought to be."

"Indeed, I am very happy, and no one could be kinder than the countess or Lady Eudora. The earl does not speak to me often; but that must be entirely owing to my feeling so shy of him; for only last week, hearing some one say that it was my birthday, he gave me this dear little watch and chain."

"The very thing I longed to be able to bring you myself, if I could have raised the cash!" said Mark, as he admired the earl's pretty present. "But you must take the will for the deed. I have had hard work to keep my head above water, I can assure you."

Mark did not appear to remember that a large and valuable ring was glittering on his finger, or that the simple watch-guard of hair he used to wear had been replaced by a massive-looking Albert chain, with two or three trinkets attached. But if he had been reminded of this inconsistency, he would only have averred that in London a man must make an appearance if he would do any good for himself.

Lord and Lady Chessington came into the library together, as soon as they returned from their drive; and Eda's uneasiness vanished, when she saw how favourable an impression her brother created. To her—who knew how young he was, and how short a time had elapsed since he was living quietly in a secluded village, with no more knowledge of the world than he gained from books—there was something verging on the ludicrous in the grave and self-possessed manner in which he discussed the principal topics of the day. She knew that he must have great confidence in himself, or he would not have ventured to approach subjects of which he could know so little. But the earl and countess were as much pleased as surprised to find him so well-informed and intelligent. They had expected to behold a shy rustic youth, who would require a great deal of drilling to render him presentable, and lo! he talked and behaved with the air of one to whom courts are familiar.

Before Mark Granton left Chessington House

arrangements for his speedy return had been made; and the earl did not attempt to conceal his belief that he had secured a valuable assistant. Seeing her kind friends so well satisfied, Eda permitted herself to feel unalloyed happiness in the thought that ere another week had elapsed, she and her brother would be once more dwelling beneath the same roof, and enjoying daily intercourse.

It was not till Mark was bidding his sister adieu that he saw Lady Eudora; but learning from the countess that he was just going, she ran into the room with a lovely bunch of exotics, plucked in the conservatory, for Eda to give to her brother.

Eda, who was writing down the address of a bookseller on whom Lord Chessington had asked Mark to call, did not hear in what terms he thanked her ladyship, but as she went towards them, she was rather scandalised to see him stoop for a spray of myrtle with which Eudora had been toying while she talked, and lay it between the leaves of his pocket-book, saying that it should be his memento of the first happy hour he had known for many months.

"You should not have done that!" said Eda, as the young lady, her eyes downcast, her cheeks crimson, glided away.

"Done what? How strait-laced you are! I am not coming here as a serving-man, who must not presume to speak above a whisper to the ladies of the house. I shall expect to be treated as a gentleman."

"I know that, dear Mark; but I do not think the countess would have been pleased if she had been here."

"Nonsense! This little Eudora is a charming girl, and my act of homage was rendered too respectfully to offend her."

"I was not speaking of Eudora, but of her mother. You know, dear Mark, we must not let the kindness of the earl and countess tempt us to forget——"

But here she was ruthlessly interrupted. "Thanks, Eda; I know all the rest. Please to remember that I am no longer a boy, whom you are at liberty to lecture whenever you feel inclined. I'm not at all likely to forget that your belle amie is heiress of Chessington. Bid me good-bye, or I shall lose my train. I begin to think that I shall like my new berth, after all."

"And Richie?" his sister inquired. "You have not told me anything about your old friend. Will he not miss you very much?"

"Richie? Oh no; why should he? We have not seen much of each other for some time. He is so disgustingly selfish, that I could not stand it."

"Richie selfish!" Eda repeated, incredulously; for in his boyhood he had been remarkable for his generosity.

"Well, I don't mean in the matter of giving!" Mark explained. "No fellow could be readier to share what he has with any one who needs it; but his good-nature is all on the surface. Ask him to really inconvenience himself for your sake, and he will contrive to forget all about it. In fact, he is more ready to promise than to perform. Such instability would not do for me, and so I cut him."

"Perhaps you were too exacting," Eda ventured to say, in defence of the absent.

"Perhaps I was," Mark carelessly replied. "Anyhow, I cannot stay to argue the point. If her little ladyship should have taken offence at what I did, you must smooth it away as well as you can."

But Eudora made no comment upon what had occurred, so it soon escaped Eda's memory, especially as nothing happened to revive it.

Mark came on the appointed day, and proved so efficient a secretary, that the somewhat indolent earl frequently congratulated himself on being so well served. His correspondence no longer worried him by getting into arrears, his papers were gradually brought into such order that he was spared periodical hunts for missing ones; and sundry business matters, that by neglect had fallen into almost inextricable confusion, were disentangled and made plain once more. Mark also found time each day for the work he had undertaken in the library, where he catalogued the rare volumes and manuscripts collected by an ancestor of the present earl; and besides all else, he was always ready to copy music or mount drawings for Lady Eudora, or execute commissions for the countess, who, since her health had become so precarious, was often glad to have some one at hand to whom she could delegate any little affair connected with her charities either in the neighbourhood or in town.

In fact, the young man found so much to do that his sister saw very little of him. He was generally busiest during those few hours she called her own, and though cordially invited to spend his evenings in the drawing-room, he rarely did so, preferring to carry his book into a cosy room that adjoined the library, and was therefore known as the study, although its principal use was as a receptacle for Lord Chessington's guns, whips, &c. There Eda would sometimes join him; but though always welcomed pleasantly enough, he would soon give her a kiss and send her away, alleging, and perhaps with truth, that the crabbed letters of the German he was teaching himself to read, danced before his eyes when he knew that she was sitting by and watching him.

Sometimes, when Eudora and Eda were returning from the long rambles in which they indulged as the spring advanced, they met him strolling in the plantations, and stayed to chat for a few minutes; but he was always the first to move away, even though Eudora sometimes pouted at his haste.

"Your brother is too proud!" she would say; "he avoids us as if he feared contamination."

"He did not intend to offend you," Eda assured her, with a smile at her pettishness. "He admired our flowers, accepted the one I gave him for his button-hole, and then, hearing me say you were tired, wisely and kindly walked on, and left us at liberty to do the same."

"But he is always the same," Eudora complained. "He keeps us at arm's length, and will not let us be friendly!"

"So much the better; Mark's self-respect teaches him his position and yours."

"Of course you take sides with your brother; but it is not pleasant, say what you will, to be so continually reminded of one's rank. We cannot help being born rich, although Mr. Granton treats one as if it were a crime."

Eda laughed outright. "My dear Lady Eudora, what queer ideas you take into your head! If Mark were to show any signs of forgetting that you are the daughter of his employer, would you not be quick to resent it?"

"No; for I am beginning to hate and despise these foolish distinctions!" she answered, with vehemence.

"Do not say so in Mark's hearing, for he sets an undue value on what you are just railing against."

"No one should blame him for aspiring to be great!" said Eudora, with emphasis.

"But Mark and I differ as to the meaning of the word. A man may be immensely rich without being great or estimable."

"Not if he possesses all those qualities—energy, intellect, ambition—that make a man both!" was the eager reply.

"If; how very few combine with them the lowliness of heart that I have heard my dear mother say must be at the root of all true worth."

"I wonder to hear you disparage your brother so unkindly!" exclaimed Eudora. "You should not expect a young man, so well fitted to shine in the world, to adopt your old-fashioned notions."

"I am not finding fault with Mark," the surprised Eda answered; "on the contrary, I would make any sacrifice to further his interests."

"But you think he ought to be contented to fritter his youth away here, making out stupid business letters for papa, and running hither and thither for mamma. You would have him say, 'Thank you' for their condescension in permitting him to do it, and consider himself a very fortunate youth because he earns enough to buy himself a few clothes."

"I think Mark has reason to be very grateful to Lord Chessington for having him here; but I am not ashamed to confess that I cling to his lordship's promise to obtain him a higher post," Eda told the impetuous girl.

"And so he shall!" cried Eudora. "If no one else can sympathise with Mr. Granton, I can, and do; and I predict that in the course of a few years even you—stolid little unenergetic Eda—will wake up, and be pleased to find that your brother is making a name and growing famous."

"I haven't the least objection to such an awakening," was the amused reply. "But pray what have I done or said to make you think me indifferent to my brother's prospects?"

"That's just it; you are, as you express yourself, indifferent; you do not enter into his hopes and wishes, as a loving sister ought to do."

"Has Mark been saying so?" asked Eda, seized with a suspicion that he must have been complaining of her.

But Lady Eudora laughed at and evaded the question. "How ridiculous! Is it likely that he would complain of you? and to me, of all persons in the world! I use my powers of observation, which are not as mean as you seem to think them."

"But you do not form just conclusions, if you think I am careless about Mark," Eda persisted.

"Then I'll never make unjust remarks again, for I do not like to bring the tears into those kind eyes of yours! After all, you are the best little friend and sister in the world; and if I grumble at you myself, I'll never never let any one else do so!"

Lady Eudora gave her companion an affectionate hug, and nothing more was said about Mark. But, after rating Eda so sharply for her coldness, it certainly was odd that she did not appear to share the proud sister's pleasure when the editor of a scientific journal accepted an article Mark had written on some Roman remains in the locality.

"I am sure Mr. Granton is very clever—very clever indeed; but—no, thank you, I do not care to read the paper. I know nothing about antiquities." And she turned away so hastily, that poor Eda, who had reckoned on her sympathy, was very much disappointed.

However, it was not at all unusual for Lady Eudora to be whimsical, and perhaps she afterwards repented her unkindness, for in the evening Eda heard her discussing a passage in the aforesaid essay with her cousin Eustace, who had just returned to Chessington from the Highlands, where he had been staying for a considerable time; or a fancy that she had hurt Eda's feelings may have induced her to peruse the paper, after all, for some days afterwards it dropped out of a secret drawer in her davenport, though with a blush she flung it back to Eda, professing to wonder how she came by it.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Mr. St. Orme seemed a little surprised when he found Mark domiciled at Chessington, but he did more than tolerate him. He treated him with a considerate kindness for which Eda knew not how to be sufficiently grateful. Never by word or look did he remind the young man that they were not equals, but assisted him in his labours in the library, and interfered in his behalf whenever he thought the earl oblivious of the fatigue and monotony of his secretary's occupation. It was owing to one of his suggestions that the brother and sister were set free for an hour before luncheon daily, that they might walk or sit together, and enjoy a little unrestricted intercourse.

Eda gladly accepted the privilege; but that daily hour did not prove as pleasant as she had anticipated. Mark was wearying already for the greater excitement of the metropolis, and he spent the time in murmuring at his lot.

"You may say what you will," he told her, "but the inequality with which fortune's gifts are meted out is horribly exasperating. Look at me, reduced to be a dependent in another man's house; then turn your eyes on the earl, and ask yourself if it isn't a pity that we cannot change places."

"Why, Mark, will nothing less than a coronet content you!" his wondering sister exclaimed.

"Why not? What use is it to the man who owns it? Lord Chessington is a very good, stupid sort of an old chap, with just sense enough to ride decently and shoot well; and to this inane thick-headed old fellow are given these fine estates and a title, while I am a pensioner on his bounty."

"Are you very sure that you would do more honour to the earldom than its present owner?" asked Eda, satirically.

"Quite sure. I only wish I could prove it to you."

"But I do not," she answered; "for his lordship is an excellent master to his servants, and a liberal, thoughtful landlord to his tenants. He may appear rather inert to a brisk impatient youth like you; but, with one or two trifling exceptions, he is my bear ideal of the 'fine old English gentleman.'"

Mark curled his lip. "My dear, the species is effete and useless, and the sooner it dies out the better. We want men in England who can infuse a little new life and spirit into our aristocracy."

"England can never cease to need men who 'fear God and honour their Queen,'" she retorted; "and the earl does both."

"Ah yes, he is very well in his way; but it's no use to talk to you, Eda, for you are one of those poor-spirited creatures who think that if a man is a lord he must be perfection."

She looked hurt at the tone he was taking. "I am not aware that I carry my reverence for rank to such extreme lengths; nor do I think you ought to ridicule me for disliking to hear Lord Chessington discussed so slightingly. He has been very kind to both of us, and so has Mr. St. Orme."

"St. Orme is a prig," said Mark; "but it is his nature. You could not make anything else of him. What a shame it is to propose throwing Lady Eudora away upon such a poor spiritless piece of humanity as he is!"

"Lady Eudora is sincerely attached to her cousin, and recognises the worth which you do not seem able to appreciate," said Eda, rebukingly. "I hope, when you talk in this strain, that it is only to tease me; but I cannot help telling you that it is both unkind and ungenerous."

However, Mark only laughed at Eda's indignation. "My dear child, I never pretended to share your sentiments towards my lord and my lady, so you should not get in a temper with me for my candour. I do my duty, and obey all the behests of my titled employers; does not that content you?"

"It can only be lip service, if you mean what you have been saying," she told him.

He evaded a direct reply, and complained that she was too exacting. "You ought not to expect me to get up an immense fund of gratitude to these people because they pay me a decent salary for my services. Could they do less?"

"Perhaps not; but you need not turn and sting the hand that loads you with benefits," she retorted; for Eda was now too much annoyed to be very careful what she said.

Her angry speech, however, had such an effect upon its auditor as to startle her. The colour receded from Mark's face till it left him ghastly pale, and he grasped her almost fiercely by the arm as he asked her what she meant.

She hastened to apologise. "Forgive me, dear Mark; I spoke too sharply. You had vexed me very much, or I should not have done so."

"But you must have a reason for bringing this charge against me!" he exclaimed, with a distrustful and searching look. "Has Mr. St. Orme, or Lady Eudora——"

"Neither of them have ever said anything about you but what is most kind, most generous!" she interposed. "I talked at random, for you had provoked me by your disparaging mention of Lord Chessington. Pray forget it. Do I not know that, say what you will, you are incapable of doing anything that would appear ungrateful!"

"You go from one extreme to another," he muttered, crossly. "I cannot speak to you as freely as I should like to do, for I never know whether I shall not trench upon your high-flown notions of what is right and honourable. But, under any circumstances, I do not think my only sister should be the first to censure me."

"I will not be so hasty and unkind again, dear Mark," she assured him; for Eda was now beginning to think she must have been unjust as well as severe in her strictures.

"We shall see, when I put you to the test," he answered, in freezing accents; and barely permitting the affectionate embrace with which she besought forgiveness, he left her.

It was their first serious difference since he had been at Chessington Park, and Eda made herself unhappy about it till they met on the morrow, when it was a relief to find that he had overcome his ill-humour. Nay, when she made some allusion to her offence, he stopped her directly, saying—

"Tush, little sis! let bygones be bygones. I wish I were half as good as you are, then we should never fall out; but as I cannot be, why I must submit to be lectured sometimes, or else to keep you at arm's length."

He laughed as he said this, and, throwing his arm about his sister, gave her a kiss; and she might have decided that he spoke more in jest than earnest, if she had not found that from this moment a barrier grew up betwixt them which no effort of her own could remove. Mark was always smiling, always kind, when they met; but he never sought her, and she knew that he no longer reposed any confidence in her. To outward appearance he was unchanged, and there was even a caressing tone in his voice that it never used to have; but it did not deceive Eda. Others might and did say how fondly he was attached to his sister, but she was bitterly conscious that the ring of true affection was not in the pleasant-sounding words he lavished upon her, though she puzzled herself in vain for the real cause of the estrangement, over which she fretted in secret.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 9. Saul of Tarsus.

Chapter to be read—Acts ix. 1—31.

INTRODUCTION. Have seen the progress of the Church in Samaria, now turn back to Jerusalem. Remind of Stephen's death, and of what it gave rise to: persecuted Christians fled everywhere: who was active in the persecution, kept the clothes of the witnesses, proceeded to more active measures? What led Saul to all this? Not told much of his early life and education in this chapter, but gather it from elsewhere. From Gal. i. 14, see what an eager, zealous Jew he was—eager to propagate Jewish religion and destroy its enemies. From 1 Tim. i. 13, see how sincere he was in so doing, really thinking he was doing God service. This eager, impulsive, persecuting Jew, is to become a devoted servant of Jesus Christ.

I. The Persecutor (Read Acts ix. 1—9). Question on Saul's work. Not content with delivering up Christians at Jerusalem, filling the prisons there, must needs get leave to extend his persecuting work. The High Priest, mad against Christ and His people, gives him letters authorising him to seize Christians as far as Damascus, and bring them to Jerusalem. Remind how signally High Priest had failed hitherto to put down the Christians. Peter and John had defied him, and the numbers had increased largely; so Saul and a number of like-minded friends (xxvi. 14) start for Damascus. Let children compare the accounts in chaps. xxii., xxvi. with this. They will see that all saw a light brighter than the sun, that all fell to the earth, and heard a sound, but that Saul alone heard the words of the speaker. Ask when another man travelling to curse God's people was suddenly stopped, but pointing out that Balaam was doing it for gain, while Saul was doing it (as he thought) for God's glory. Now picture the scene—the sudden light; the start of fear; the falling to the ground speechless; Saul addressed by name; his question; the reply, his second question; his willingness to obey; his blindness; cannot even mount his ass again; led to Damascus, a three days' journey.

Practical Lessons. (1) Sins of ignorance. Remind how under Jewish law sacrifices were appointed for such (Lev. iv. 2). Two prayers should be offered: "Teach me Thy way," lest make fearful mistakes, like Saul; and "Cleanse me from secret faults." (2) Christ and His people one. Whom had Saul been persecuting, and of whom does the voice speak? (ver. 5). So Christ calls Himself the vine (John xv. 1), and if, being members, we suffer with Him, shall share His glory (Rom. viii. 17).

II. The Young Christian. (Read 10—22). Question on the story of Saul at Damascus, showing the natural hesitation of Ananias to receive him, and the gentle and patient way in which God bears with him; his doubt removed, he at once obeys. How had Saul been spending the three days? Remind how Christ always coupled fasting with prayer (Matt. xvii. 21). What would he be mourning over? the wrong use of his talents. What would he be praying for? pardon for past and strength for future. What would he be resolving? on a changed life. Now, at the end of three days' fast and prayer, comes Ananias. Notice his kind words. How does he address him? Also alludes to the vision of Christ on the way, and states his message. What happened? Sight to his eyes. What to his mind? This always work of Holy Spirit—to teach, show error, lead to Christ, strengthen will, purify soul. What did he do at once? Remind children that he was a well-educated man, learned in the Scriptures, only had wrongly understood them; now, being taught by Holy Ghost, at once sets forth Christ as the Messiah in Damascus.

Practical Lessons. (1) The work of the Spirit. Impress on the children the need for constant prayer for this. Only they led by Spirit are truly God's sons (Rom. viii. 14—16). (2) Work begins at home. Many when converted want at once to go away from home. Saul began at Damascus; let our light shine first in our family, school, &c.; then, like Saul, may be called to higher work.

III. SAUL PERSECUTED. (Read 23—31). What had Christ said to Ananias about Saul's suffering? (ver. 16). Soon begins. Why is this? Because Satan always hinders a good work. Notice that the Jews, and not Gentiles, of Damascus, opposed him, as their priests had done to the apostles at Jerusalem. Picture the scene of the escape; some friend with house on wall (like Rahab's, at Jericho) lending aid; the window stealthily opened at dead of night; the watch till the sentinel's back turned; the Apostle placed in the basket; the cords carefully secured and slowly lowered; the whispered inquiry as to whether all was right; hurried answer, and instant flight; escape to Jerusalem, head-quarters of the Jews. Ask how disciples received him; at first doubtfully. Who brought him forward? Perhaps Barnabas, a friend of Ananias, and had special letter from him. Now welcomed, shares their work, and preaches Christ boldly.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Persecution. Christ had warned all His disciples to count the cost. So must children be ready to endure hardness, perhaps lose friends; give up comforts for the sake of what is right. (2) Boldness. No cowardice in Saul's flight, because Christ told disciples to do so; but who would have gone right into heart of Jewish head-quarters but a bold man? So children must be bold for Christ at school—in rebuking bad words; in saying prayers; in refusing to cheat masters, &c.; at home—in setting good example, &c. So will receive Christ's blessing at His coming.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe Saul's life as a Jew.
2. Describe the events of the journey to Damascus.
3. Give two lessons taught by the vision.
4. What happened to Saul at Damascus?
5. Describe his escape.
6. What practical lessons may be learned?

THE BRANCH OF HOLLY.

PART I.

SNOW had fallen heavily during the night, and the sky was still dark and lowering, as a cart laden with holly passed along the wet and plashy streets, while an admiring crowd of children followed its course with longing eyes. At length, in turning the sharp corner of a lane, a small branch fell to the ground, at the very feet of a poor little girl who was crossing just at the moment. Her sad face lighted up with an expression of pleasure as, eagerly seizing it, she gazed on the polished leaves and scarlet berries. "Mother will like to see this," she thought. "Poor sick mother! it will put her in mind of many a happy Christmas long ago. But stay——"

A sudden idea induced little Essie to set off running after the cart, and, going timidly up to the driver, she said, holding out the branch, "Please, sir, this is yours."

"Well, little one," he replied, good-naturedly, "keep it, as you've got it. There's many a one wishing for a pretty bit like that."

The child hurried off with her prize. "'Tis really mine now; and after all we'll have something to mark Christmas!" But Essie slackened her pace as she pictured to herself the dingy room, empty of furniture, and the wretched bed on which her mother lay, hungry and shivering, while all she had to bring home was a branch of holly. "And yet," she thought, "God, who made these pretty green leaves and bright berries, has sent them to me, just to show He doesn't forget us altogether; and perhaps, if we trust Him, He'll do more."

As this gleam of hope was passing through Essie's mind, she stood near a shop-door; and presently these words caught her ear: "Oh, mamma! do look at the lovely piece of holly that little girl has in her hand, with more berries than any we have at home! It would just do to decorate my baby-house! May I ask her if she would sell it?"

"Certainly, dear, if you like; but remember all the toys you want to buy."

"Oh, I would rather have the holly!"

Then, approaching Essie, she said, "Little girl, I will give you sixpence for that branch."

The bargain was soon concluded, and Essie, scarcely able to credit her good fortune, darted off with the money to a provision-shop. "She might recover, if I could bring her something nourishing every day. And how easy it was to sell that holly! I wish I could get some more. I wonder where it comes from?" Thus thinking, she arrived at home, and after mother and child had enjoyed an unusually plentiful meal, Essie told her story, and how much she wished to obtain more holly.

"No use, child," replied the mother. "It grows far away in the country—too far for you, so think no more about it."

But Essie could not give up the idea; and the more she looked at the pale careworn face of her mother, the more determined she felt to carry out her new plan. As soon, therefore, as the sick woman had again settled to rest, she went out; and after wandering about in the cold wet streets, and asking many questions without obtaining any satisfactory replies, to her great joy she espied the same man who had given her the holly-branch in the morning, returning with his empty cart. Forgetting her timidity in anxiety to gain information, Essie ran towards him, and begged he would tell her where holly was to be found.

"Well, you're an honest little one," he said, at once recognising the child, "and I don't mind telling you I got mine at a place called Hollybank, about three miles from town. But why do you want to know?"

"Because I sold the piece you gave me for sixpence, and if I had more I could sell it too. Mother's ill, and I have no food for her. If it's only three miles, I could walk that far. Which is the road, please?"

"I'll give you a lift, if you're set on going, child. Jump into the cart, quick!"

She would have liked to go home and tell mother, but this was too good an opportunity to be neglected; so, climbing in at once, she was soon on her way. Notwithstanding the cold, it was pleasant out on the country roads. And, to Essie's surprise, the fields were all of a dazzling whiteness, and the trees, though bare and leafless, had a beautiful snowy clothing on every bough. After a while the cart stopped at a cross-road. "Now, little one, down with you; our ways separate here. Go on to the right, and you'll soon reach Hollybank."

"And may I climb up and take as much as I want?" asked Essie.

"Why, child, it's not really a bank at all. 'Tis a gentleman's place. You'll see a grand gate, and if you can get through that and up to the big house, I wouldn't be surprised if the young ladies gave you some holly to sell for your sick mother."

"Thank you, sir," said Essie, setting off at a quick pace, and full of hope.

After what appeared to her a long walk through the soft snow, she arrived at a large gate, with a pretty little cottage at one side. The gate was shut, and as she tried to push it open, a woman came forward. "There's no admittance here for beggar-children," she said.

"Please, ma'am, I'm not a beggar. I came all the way from town, and I want to go up to the house."

"From town, indeed! I'm sure we've enough of your kind here already; we don't want more."

"Oh, ma'am, mother's so ill."

"I knew you were a beggar—be off, at once!"

"I'm not, indeed! Do let me to the house!"

"What do you want?"

"Holly; I was told the ladies would give me some."

"Well, they won't, for no more can be spared. A cart-load of it went off this morning. So go away."

And after making sure that the gate was locked, the old woman hobbled back to her lodge. It was useless waiting longer, and poor Essie turned away, bitterly disappointed—a long dreary walk before her, and no hope of bringing anything home for mother. She was not even certain of the way, and wandered on for some distance without meeting any one, when suddenly the cold became more intense, the sky darkened, and soon a heavy shower of snow began to fall. Bewildered and frightened, the poor child looked round for shelter, and found that she was standing near the parapet of a bridge. Perceiving a little sloping path at one side, she descended cautiously. The stream was almost dried up beneath, and the arch afforded a tolerably comfortable refuge from the storm, so, crouching behind a large stone, Essie could not resist the drowsiness which came over her, and soon forgot all her fatigue and disappointment in a sound sleep.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

49. How frequently does St. Matthew quote from the prophet Zechariah? Give chapter and verse.

50. In what part of the Bible is reference first made to battering-rams?

51. Prove from the Psalms and the prophecy of Isaiah that the nation of the Jews was intended by the vineyard mentioned in Matt. xxi.

52. Mention three memorable intercessory prayers of our Saviour.

53. Why did God forbid the Israelites obtaining horses from Egypt?

54. Where is the first mention in the Bible of "money" as used by the merchants?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 112.

37. "I am become a stranger unto my brethren, and an alien unto my mother's children" (Ps. lxix. 8). See St. John vii. 5.

38. By St. Paul only. See 1 Tim. ii. 5; Heb. viii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24.

39. Both were charged with blasphemy. See St. Matt. xxvi. 65; Acts vi. 13.

40. Three times (St. Matt. xxii. 16; St. Mark iii. 6; xii. 13).

41. "Set ye Uriah in the fore front of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten, and die" (2 Sam. xi. 15).

42. Gen. xiv. 15; Gal. i. 17.

43. 1, The son of the widow of Zarephath (1 Kings xvii. 17—23); 2, the Shunammite's son (2 Kings iv. 18—37); and 3, the man buried in Elisha's grave (2 Kings xiii. 21).

44. 1, Before Annas; 2, before Caiaphas; and 3, before the Council. See St. John xviii. 13: St. Matt. xxvi. 57; St. Luke xxii. 66.

(Drawn by CHARLES GREEN.)

VAIN REGRETS.

ALAS! that sunshine of a sultry noon
Should scorch and wither up the tender grass;
Alas! that all we love is lost so soon;
Alas! alas!

Alas! that fragrant flowers should fail and fade,
That with the passing summer they should pass;
Alas! that beauty in the dust is laid;
Alas! alas!

Alas! that riches should have wings to fly,
That years of toil have taken to amass;
Alas! for breaking hearts beneath the sky;
Alas! alas!

Alas! that on the white and wasted cheek
The hectic colour should the rose surpass;
Alas! that death in slow decay should speak;
Alas! alas!

Alas! that in our grief we only see
That bliss beyond but darkly through a glass;
For there the burden of no song will be,
"Alas! alas!"

J. R. EASTWOOD.

THE TRIPLETS OF THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. J. BILES HITCHENS, AUTHOR OF "THE FURNACE," "THE FACE OF THE KING," ETC.

I.—THE THREE-ONE GOD.

"In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."—MATTHEW xxviii. 19.

IT is said that when St. Augustine was writing his discourse on the Trinity, he strolled by the seaside in meditation. There he saw a child digging a hole in the sand, and then attempting to fill it with sea-water by means of a shell. In answer to the student, the child said he intended thus to empty the great deep. "Impossible!" said Augustine. "Not more impossible," replied the little one, "than for you to explain the mystery of the Trinity." Truly, there is mystery incomparably great—mystery unfathomably deep—in the doctrine suggested by the text. Utterly incomprehensible is the manner of God's existence. But the presence of difficulty should not be regarded as any valid objection to the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity. Indeed, we should welcome mystery on such a theme as being presumptive evidence of the truth; for in the nature and attributes of the Blessed One whom we denominate "God," there must needs be arcana far beyond the reach of mortal minds. We never, never expect to "pierce the marble hardness of God's secret with the leaden point of our dull apprehension;" and yet, so far as the light of Scripture will guide us, we desire to force our way, believing that it is the Christian's privilege and duty to compare spiritual things with spiritual, to prove all things, and thus seek to the utmost to understand what Heaven has designed for our perusal and profit.

Now, that there are three Persons in one God certain followers of Dr. Priestley wholly deny. They hold that Deity belongs to the Eternal Father alone. They teach that "Jesus of Nazareth was a man, constituted in all respects like other men, subject to the same infirmities, the same ignorance, prejudices, and frailties;"* that His death was simply the death of a martyr to the truths He proclaimed; and that the Holy Ghost is nothing more than an influence, or property, or power, by which the One God communicates with man, and operates on the hearts of men. Holding the essential personal oneness of God, they reject the precious doctrine of the Atonement, and declare that nothing is needed in order to acceptance with God besides true repentance on the part of man. With such views being every week propounded, and with men who conscientiously embrace such sentiments ever and anon crossing our path, it is wise for us to survey the foundations of our faith. Let us, then, go at once to the teaching of our grand old Bible; for if the doctrine of the Trinity is not taught therein, we are under no obligation to accept it; but if it is discovered in the sacred records, then it is our solemn duty to embrace the same, however greatly it may surpass our power of comprehension. Indeed, unless we accept the light of revelation, we are altogether in the dark: there may be only one, and there may be a multitude of gods, for aught we know. The voice of Nature, as Paley and others have clearly shown, will suffice to teach us that there is a oneness of purpose, a harmony of counsel, but not that there is but one First Cause. The fact of the Divine unity is found alone in Scripture, where it is the uniform and unequivocal teaching. We should therefore search for the explanation of the fact in the sacred writings. The inspired men who are the first to declare must be the best to define the doctrine.

Opening the Bible at its very first page, we are impressed with the fact that the Infinite Being is referred to by plural appellations. The fourth word of Scripture—"Elohim," translated "God"—is plural, and is joined with a singular verb. It strictly reads thus: "In the beginning Gods created the heavens and the earth." This plural form is of repeated occurrence. Thus, for example, we should properly read: "Know ye that Jehovah, He the Gods, He hath made us." "The Lord our Gods is one Lord." "If I be Masters, where is My fear?" "Remember now thy Creators in the days of thy youth." "The knowledge of the Holy Ones is understanding." In perfect accordance with this, we find the plural form of speech used. Thus, in the first chapter of Genesis, God the Father, as President of a mystic Council, declares His will thus: "Let Us make man in Our Image." Again, it is written: "And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become like One of Us." "And the Lord said, Let Us go down." These are not artificial expressions, but are the common forms of speech in the oracles of God. No criticism has yet succeeded in resolving them into mere idioms. They defy all explanations but the one we offer, the plurality of Persons in the unity of the Godhead. They unmistakably suggest both unity and distinction.

* Belsham.

In harmony with these plural forms of expression, we must have observed that three, and only three, Persons are alluded to by the inspired scribes under divine appellations, and that each of these three has the attributes of divinity explicitly applied to Him, whilst the very same penmen as explicitly teach that there is but one God. The ancient form of benediction, used by the Jewish high-priest, is worthy of notice: "The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make His face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace" (Numb. vi. 24—27.) Here are the three Persons—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—distinctly appealed to. The Father is the Author of all good; He it is who blesses and preserves. The Son redeems and reconciles; He it is who brings light and grace for fallen man. The Holy Ghost is the Giver of peace and joy. We cannot read this Jewish benediction without being reminded of the Apostolic blessing, in which the distinct existence and work of the three Persons in the Trinity are so unmistakably set forth. The Aaronic benediction breathes with the Gospel. As we listen to the high-priest of the old economy uttering those beautiful words, we seem standing by the side of the preacher of righteousness, in the nineteenth century of the Christian era, as he says, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all." The Jews regarded the Aaronic benediction as containing allusion to the Trinity; for, according to some of the Rabbis, the blessing was pronounced with the hand uplifted, and the first three fingers of the hand extended, to express a triad, or trinity in the Godhead.

That was a remarkable vision the Prophet Isaiah was favoured to enjoy, which he records in the 6th chapter of his prophecy. He tells us that he saw the Lord in the temple, sitting upon a throne, and accompanied by seraphs, who veiled their faces before Him, and shouted with alternate responses, "Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord of Hosts!" Now, I am aware that some commentators and others say that the threefold use of the word, "Holy" was simply a superlative expression, and intended only to give emphasis to the declaration. But in the presence of what is elsewhere written concerning that vision, I venture to affirm that it is not so. There is evidence of a Trinity in Unity here. In the 8th verse it is recorded that, whilst overwhelmed with what he saw and heard, he also caught the accents of a supernatural voice, saying, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for Us?" The Evangelist John makes reference to this vision (chapter xii., verse 41), and says it was Christ whom the prophet saw:—"These things said Esaias, when he saw His (Christ's) glory, and spake of Him." Then in the Acts of the Apostles (chapter xxviii., verse 25), St. Paul alludes to the vision, and quotes the words of the prophet as being the language of the third Person of the Trinity, saying, "Well spake the Holy Ghost, by Esaias the prophet, unto our fathers." Now, for a moment think of this: three times the seraphs repeat their homage —"Holy, Holy, Holy." The Jehovah speaking says, "Who will go for Us?" John says it was Christ who was thus seen by Isaiah; and Paul asserts it was the Holy Ghost who spake to the prophet. Taking these facts together, I think our conclusion is a safe one, that the adoration referred to the Divine Three in the one essence of the Lord of Hosts.

In other places of Holy Writ the distinction is made between the Persons of the Godhead. Isaiah, in chapter xxxiv., verse 16, says, "Seek ye out of the Book of the Lord and read, for my mouth it hath commanded, and His Spirit it hath gathered them." Here is one Person speaking of the Spirit —another Person. Again, in Isaiah xlviii. verse 16: "Now the Lord God and His Spirit hath sent Me." These words are spoken by the Messiah, for the prophet adds immediately, "Thus saith the Lord, thy Redeemer." The prophet Haggai, (chapter ii., verses 4—7), has these words: "I am with you, saith the Lord of Hosts; according to the word that I covenanted with you when you came out of Egypt, so My Spirit remaineth among you: fear ye not. For thus saith the Lord of Hosts, I will shake all nations, and the Desire of all nations shall come." Here are three Persons mentioned—the Lord of Hosts, the Spirit, and the Desire of all nations.

Ever and anon, throughout the Old Testament, we discover allusion to a mysterious Personage who appeared unto men. In that garden where the spotless infancy of our race was passed, a Being was alone with Adam—a Being who bore the title and wielded the power and exercised the prerogatives' of God. On the unveiled countenance of that Being our first parent was permitted to gaze, and the accents of that Being's voice he was privileged to hear. Abraham saw the same Person, and heard words from His lips. Jacob spent the whole night, at the ford of Jabbok, in His hallowed company. Moses looked on the face of that Being till his own countenance was radiant with brilliant glory, and he heard Him declare, "I am the God of thy fathers;" "I am that I am." Isaiah saw that wondrous Visitor attended by celestial intelligences; and many others saw, heard, and were permitted to worship Him, and speak of Him, as God. Yet we read that God is a Being "whom no man hath seen or can see;" and Jesus says, "No man hath seen God at any time." How are we to reconcile these statements? Let us hear the Great Teacher. He says, "Before Abraham was, I am;" "Have I been so long time with you and yet hast thou not known Me, Philip? He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father, and how sayest thou, then, Show us the Father?" He whom the Apostle describes as "the image of the invisible God," "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of His person," and of whom it is written, "The Word was with God, and the Word was God"—He it is who appeared unto men under the Old Testament economy, manifesting Himself by the temporary assumption of a sensible form.

This Jesus in the fulness of time appeared among men as the "Son of Man" as well as the "Son of God." His Messiahship He satisfactorily proved by the miracles He wrought, by the words He spake, by the death He endured, and by the resurrection and ascension which followed. He was the "masterpiece of His own art; the subject of His own teaching." Speaking of Himself he said, He had all things in common with the Father; that He was in the Father and the Father in Him; that the kingdom of God is His kingdom; that all power in heaven and on earth is His; that the angels are His; that He gives eternal life; that He will judge all; that He is with His people for ever; and that without Him nothing good can be accomplished. Now, all He said of Himself must be accepted as truth, otherwise nothing He uttered deserves a moment's credit. If He were not what He declared Himself to be, He was of all impostors the most impudent and impious: His pretensions were crimes of the most colossal magnitude. But accepting His teaching as divine, we shall discover in His utterances repeated evidences of the doctrine of the Trinity. Indeed, if the divinity of Christ be granted, the question is settled; for He not only claimed to be Himself "equal with God," but declared that there was a third Person whose presence in the Church was a necessity. Addressing His disciples, just prior to His departure, He said, "When the Comforter is come whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of Truth who proceedeth from the Father, He shall testify of Me."

The divinity of the Spirit is not so repeatedly declared as is the divinity of Christ. This might be expected after the assurance of Jesus—"He shall not speak of Himself;" "He shall testify of Me." But sufficient is revealed to conduct the unprejudiced reader to the conclusion that the Holy Ghost is God. His divine agency is interwoven with the entire texture of the inspired writings. It cannot be eliminated. The attributes of deity are ascribed to Him. Holiness, eternity, omniscience, omnipotence, omnipresence, and sovereignty—perfections exclusively belonging to God—are His. He is represented as performing the work of God, and receiving the worship of men. Sins against the Spirit are sins against God; whilst His work is portrayed as absolutely necessary for the illumination, regeneration, sanctification, and comfort of the soul of man. The paternal love of the Father required the redeeming love of the Son to display it; and the redeeming love of Jesus required the sanctifying love of the Spirit to apply it. Christ provided the price of our redemption, and the Spirit supplies the power. The one would be inoperative without the other. Immanuel declared whatsoever He received from the Father; and the Eternal Spirit of Truth first faithfully preserved in Scripture, and now lovingly applies to the soul, whatever Christ declared. This the Apostle fully recognised when he wrote such words as the following:—"Now, I beseech you, brethren, for the Lord Jesus Christ's sake, and for the love of the Spirit, that you strive together with me in your prayers to God for me." "Through Him (Christ) we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father." "Praying in the Holy Ghost, keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."

Thus underlying all Scripture, as the foundation upon which the superstructure rests, is it taught that there are three Persons, and yet that the Lord our God is one Lord. The only conclusion that can be accepted, if Scripture be accepted, is this, that there are three Persons in one God—"One Divine nature or essence common unto three Persons, incomprehensibly united, and ineffably distinguished; united in essential attributes, distinguished by peculiar idioms and relations, all equally infinite in every Divine perfection, each different from the other in order and manner of subsistence. That there is a mutual existence of one in all and all in one; a communication, without any deprivation or diminution in the communicant; an eternal generation and an eternal procession, without precedence or succession, without proper causality or dependence; a Father imparting His own, and a Son receiving His Father's life, and a Spirit issuing from both, without any division or multiplication of essence. These are notions which may well puzzle our reason in conceiving how they agree, but ought not to stagger our faith in asserting that they are true. For if the Holy Scripture teacheth us plainly, and frequently doth inculcate upon us, that there is but one true God—if it as manifestly doth ascribe to the three Persons of the blessed Trinity the same august names, the same peculiar characters, the same Divine attributes, the same superlatively admirable operations of creation and providence—if it also doth prescribe to them the same supreme honours, services, praises, and acknowledgments to be paid to them all—this may be abundantly enough to satisfy our minds, to stop our mouths, to smother all doubt and dispute about this high and holy mystery."*

Unable to comprehend the mystery, the best we can do is to accept with confidence what the Bible declares, and learn how in Nature the doctrine is often illustrated and set forth. A familiar object will frequently serve to simplify a most abstruse theme; and so, in things sacred, the natural often throws light upon the supernatural. You stand in your garden, and gaze with pleasure upon the blades of grass, the blooming flowers, and the ripening fruits. Well, remember each has three distinct qualities—colour, shape, size. Separate, yet essential, these three qualities together form one idea. You sit in the winter season by your fireside, and as you watch the curling flame, and enjoy the genial warmth, you note that the fire on your domestic hearth has substance, light, and heat—yet it is but one fire. You thank God every day for the light—do you not know that it is constituted of three primal colours? You look daily upon the cheerful faces of the little ones entrusted to your care—each boy or girl is a creature to God, a child to the parents, and a subject to the Queen. You introvert your gaze, and study yourself—you find the will, the affections, and the thoughts to be three distinct consciousnesses, but you are a unity of such consciousnesses.

"Matter, and breath, and instinct, unite in all beasts of the field;
Substance, coherence, and weight, fashion the fabrics of the earth;
The will, the doing, and the deed, combine to frame a fact;
The stem, the leaf, the flower; beginning, middle, and end;
Cause, circumstance, consequent; and every three in one.
Yea, the very breath of man's life consisteth of a trinity of vapours,
And the noonday light is a compound: the triune shadow of Jehovah."

It is surely worthy of notice that Trinitarian Christianity has everywhere found a hearty welcome, whilst the cold and cheerless creed of its opponents has slowly grown, and has never widely spread. Heaven has smiled most graciously upon the one, and frowned upon the other. Though storms of opposition have gathered round it, and tempests of persecution have spent their fury upon it, Trinitarianism, like a house founded upon a rock, has stood safe and strong. Two unequal wills have again and again come into collision—the will of the rebel man and the will of the Infinite Creator—but in every struggle the glory has been accorded to God. His supreme purpose has been effected by man, in man, and in spite of man. Of old, Constantius, Julian, Valens, and Apollinaris, and latterly Strauss, Rénan, and others, laboured in vain. All who have ever set themselves against the Lord's Anointed have been ingloriously defeated. The stone which the builders rejected has become the head-stone of the corner. If the sceptics were in the right, surely the God of truth would have caused their opinions to take root and cover the land; but after eighteen centuries, it is still a weak, unpopular, unwelcome, and, in the majority of places, an unknown thing. But the doctrine it opposes has secured world-wide triumphs. Our Christian religion, honouring the three Persons in the one God, has propagated itself amongst all races, and has penetrated all climes. The world's hopes of progress and prospects of peace and purity are based upon it. Every month renews and intensifies our anticipation of the time when the triumphant shout shall be raised: "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our God, and of His Christ."

The rejection of this doctrine involves the repudiation of the sages of antiquity. Separate nations, springing from the one family, received this doctrine by tradition. Over that traditionally received truth God graciously watched, despite the polytheism and idolatry which prevailed. Hence the idea was possessed by the wise men of all the great heathen nations. "It was warbled by the lyre of Orpheus and the lips of Plato; it was hieroglyphed upon the pyramids of Egypt and the pagodas of India and China; it is stamped upon the Lama of Thibet, and sculptured in the gigantic and dateless temples of Elora and Elephanta. The sages of China, and the Druids of Britain, and the Runic bards of Scandinavia, and the priests of Mexico, as well as the astronomers of Chaldea and the fire-worshippers of Persia, had all their oracles or emblems of a trinity long before Christianity taught the doctrine of Judea." It is not, therefore, a doctrine of to-day. We did not receive it from the theologians of modern times. We are not indebted for the belief of this truth to any of the creeds. It has come down to us from the beginning. It is as old as the world. It was first a matter of sacred tradition, and then of inspired revelation. To reject this doctrine is, therefore, to treat with scorn and opposition the voice of all antiquity and the verdict of the Christian Church.

* Dr. Barrow.

But we cannot reject it, for it is vitally connected with the value and influence of the Scriptures. If the doctrine of the three-one God is not worthy of reception, then the Bible is no longer deserving of the reverence, regard, and research of mortals; it is not a lamp unto our feet, and a light unto our path, but a destructive and delusive mirage; it is not the guide of our steps, but the betrayer of our confidence, and the destroyer of our souls; it gives no longer a certain sound; it aims no more at my happiness; it is, in a word, a bad book, and undeserving of perusal. Either we must accept the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, or, to be consistent, we must give up our Bibles! There is no middle course. For consider, the avowed end of Revelation is to bring man to love God with all his heart, and mind, and soul, and strength; the first commandment is "Thou shalt have no other Gods before Me," and idolatry is held forth everywhere in the Book as "that abominable thing which the Lord hateth." Who, then, is Jesus Christ, who is commended as the object of affection, admiration, confidence, and worship? And who is this Holy Spirit whom we are called on not to grieve, and to sin against whom is to sin against God? If Jesus and the Spirit are mere creatures, then, whilst the Book cautions us against idolatry, and teaches us there is but one God to adore, it holds up two others for our adoration. Its language is deceptive, and its tenor dangerous. There is no other book of such doubtful morality that would be admitted into our homes. An author who ostensibly aimed at one object, and yet throughout his volume inculcated the very reverse, would very soon cease to be read. But if the doctrine of the triune God is granted, then the whole Scriptures agree in all their parts, and the statements throughout accord with the moral and spiritual end proposed.

Moreover, the doctrine of a plurality in the Divine essence is vitally connected with our Christian experience. If we reject it, then the graces which we have been taught to foster in our hearts are wholly valueless, or they are wrongly based; the fabric of our hopes falls ingloriously to the dust; the pinion of our faith fails any more to carry us into the realms of blessedness; the floodgates of joy are for ever barred and bolted; the river of our peace stagnates into depression; the tongue of supplication cleaves to the roof of our mouth. We who deemed ourselves possessed of privileges, and honours, and riches, are lonely, poor, degraded outcasts. We have not the surety for our debt we thought we had. We have not the sacrifice for our guilt we had joyously believed. We have not a Mediator in the High Court of Heaven. We have not a High Priest in the Upper Holy of Holies. We have not an ever-present and sympathising Friend. We are not instructed by a Supreme Teacher within, nor sustained by a Holy Comforter. There is no one to take us by the hand and introduce us to the King; no one to help our infirmities; no one to set us a perfect example; no one to give us any revelation of God's character; no one to show us that there is really a hereafter! If this doctrine be not true, ours is a condition of utter helplessness, hopelessness, and horror. This Dr. Priestley allowed shortly before his death. He said to Dr. Miller, who differed from him: "There neither can, nor ought to be, any compromise between us. If you are right, we are not Christians at all; and if we are right, you are gross idolators." Thank God we accept this doctrine, we rejoice in it, we are prepared to cleave to it. Let us, then, learn to render to each person in the Godhead the honour due to Him. Let us recognise distinct operation on the part of each, but be sensible that the work of each is absolutely necessary for our ultimate admission into the realms of life, and light, and joy.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 10. Cornelius.

Chapter to be read—Acts x.

INTRODUCTION. Ask to whom the Gospel had been preached at present: to Jews on the day of Pentecost; to Samaritans by Philip; to Eunuch of Ethiopia. Now shall hear of a Roman soldier being taught the Christian faith.

I. Cornelius at Home. (Read 1—8.) Make the children describe the character of Cornelius: his inner life—fearing God, praying without ceasing; his outward life—bringing up his family well, giving alms liberally. Remind how Christ connected prayer with alms in Sermon on Mount, as fulfilling man's duty to God and his neighbour (Matt. vi. 4, 5). What happened one day? At what time? What used to go on at the ninth hour? (Acts iii. 1.) He being a Gentile, not admitted to privileges of Jews in Temple, was praying at home. Why was he afraid? Who else were afraid at appearance of angel? (Luke ii. 9). What did the angel tell him? For whom was he to send? Who went on the errand? Remind of Joshua, the captain, who would only have God-fearing servants in his house. So he told his servants the story, and sent them away.

II. PETER AT JOPPA. (Read 9—18.) How long did the journey take? Reached Joppa at sixth hour, i.e., noon. What was Peter doing? Like David, who prayed at noon as well as morning and evening. Describe Peter on the house-top. Gone up for quiet, and rest, and prayer, in heat of the day. Flat roof, awning overhead from sun; would look down on blue waters of Mediterranean; little vessels putting into port of Joppa; children playing on sand; fishermen mending their nets; the Apostle hungry, probably had a busy morning convincing Jews, makes his noon-day devotions while dinner preparing. Question upon Peter's vision, explaining from Lev. xi. 4, &c., which animals were considered unclean; remind of the Jews' prohibition as to swine to this day. How often were the dream and the voice repeated? Remind how Pharaoh's dream, repeated twice, was to make it more certain (Gen. xli. 32). Now let the children see the meaning of the dream. Who were meant by the clean animals? The Jews, admitted into covenant with God, receiving all the promised blessings, the Messiah, &c. (Rom. ix. 4, 5). Who were considered unclean? Jews not allowed to eat with Gentiles (Acts xi. 3)—more than that, Jews could not endure that Gentiles should be preached to; heard St. Paul with patience till he announced his commission to the Gentiles (Acts xxii. 21). But to whom had Christ come? message to shepherds was "to all people." What Gentiles saw Him soon after His birth? So His lifting up was to draw all men to Him (John xii. 32), and Apostles were sent to all nations. Till now they could not have understood this, so this vision was sent. God, by His Son's death, had cleansed Gentiles as well as Jews, so they were no longer common.

III. THE MEETING. (Read 19—33.) Peter meditating on the vision, is told to go with the men. Whose office is it to teach? So the Spirit taught him as it had Philip, not merely for great things, like the speaking with tongues, but for incidents of everyday life. How happy the servant would be when he saw Peter. How was the return party enlarged? (ver. 23). How was Peter received by Cornelius? Did it make Peter proud? (ver. 26). Cornelius tells his story while the large company listen.

IV. THE SERMON. (Read 34—43.) Peter's sermon being read, let these heads be noticed:—(1) All who fear God are accepted by Him. All His creatures equally cared for, acceptable in His sight; no one, then, need feel forgotten; seek God and shall find; draw near Him, and He will draw near you. (2) Peace comes only through Christ. All Jewish sacrifices pointed to Him; His death for all, Jews or Gentiles; He, full of Holy Ghost and power, man and God, is Saviour of world; His death an atonement for sin; His life one of devotion to His people. He must be believed in if would have peace (ver. 43). (3) Christ also the Judge. Came at first to save; if not accepted, will condemn; therefore Christ must be accepted for life, death, and judgment.

V. THE BAPTISM. (Read 44—48). What followed immediately upon the sermon? Their hearts prepared, the word not caught away. How did Peter's friends regard it? What then did Peter suggest? In whose name were they baptised? Notice (1) that the inward grace was in this case given before received the outward sign. (2) That they were baptised immediately on believing in Christ. What a happy party they would be; no wonder invited Peter to spend a few days.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Man's equality in God's sight. Let it teach us never to despise others not had same advantages and privileges. (2) Obedience to God's will. Cornelius acting on message, received these great blessings. Peter acting on vision, received first Gentile family into the Church.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the character of Cornelius.
2. Describe the vision to St. Peter, and explain it.
3. Show the feeling of the Jews to the Gentiles.
4. Analyse Peter's sermon.
5. What was there remarkable about the baptism?
6. Give two lessons taught.

A SUNSET.

"We shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is."—1 JOHN iii. 2.

THE sun sinks calmly, and entire;
But in the lake beneath it seems Like a distorted, restless fire,
As 'twere the sport of airy dreams;
And yet it figures forth realities
Familiar to human hearts and eyes.

For man himself, at best, we find
Resembles much yon borrowed blaze,
Now flickering to the evening wind
Which o'er the tempting water strays,
Full soon to fade away from mortal sight
Into the quietly absorbing night.

But faith looks deeper into space
Beyond our feeble vision's range;
And whispers sweetly of a place
Where bliss is undisturbed by change;
And not a ripple passes o'er the soul,
But Jesu's image is reflected whole.

D. G.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XIX.

EDA was in the library one morning, searching for a book the countess wanted, and Mr. St. Orme, who was sitting there writing, had courteously laid down his pen to assist her in finding the missing volume, when they were interrupted by the entrance of Lady Eudora; she came in panting and glowing with excitement, holding an open letter in her hand.

"Oh, Eustace, I am so glad to find you here! I want to ask you something. A boon, a boon, sir knight! Don't run away, Eda, it's no secret; and it concerns you, or, at least, your brother, which is the same thing, isn't it? First of all, tell me, coz, if mamma is right when she says that you are hand-and-glove with one of the cabinet ministers, Lord —— ?"

Though Mr. St. Orme answered with a smile, there was a little constraint in his manner, which escaped the notice of his impetuous cousin.

"I must be allowed to doubt my aunt using the expression you impute to her; but she tells you correctly that I am on intimate terms with Lord ——. We were at Eton and Oxford together."

"Yes, and you still correspond," Eudora eagerly added, "and he wants you to go into Parliament; and it was you who recommended to him the secretary who is just leaving him. This letter is from mamma's old friend, Mrs. Burton; just listen to what she says:—

'Tell Mr. Orme, if he is still with you, that his protégé, young Maurice, has been so ill that his physician advises a warmer climate, and through his patron, Lord ——, the young man has been appointed to a consulship at one of the Italian ports. So Lord —— will want another secretary.'"

She paused, and fixed her eyes on Mr. St. Orme, who was looking at the pattern of the carpet.

"Well, Eustace, you will recommend him another, won't you? Mamma was saying that it would be an excellent opening for Mr. Granton, and so I came to you at once. Write to his lordship directly, will you?"

"Affairs of this kind require some consideration, Eudora," she was gravely told.

"Nonsense!" the young lady retorted; "I hate to be answered with such unmeaning words. Do you think Lord —— would refuse if you asked him to give the berth to Mr. Granton?"

There was a pause, and then Eustace St. Orme answered, "No, I do not think he would; but——"

"But you do not like to ask favours. Neither do I; only as this is not for yourself you may do it with a good grace. Sit down and write the letter, there 's a dear boy; papa shall give Mr. Granton testimonials of his ability and so on, and I'll reward you for your good nature by singing you all those horridly doleful ballads you think so beautiful!"

She dashed across the room to an escritoire, put pen, ink, and paper ready, and then uttered another half-coaxing, half-impatient, "Come, Eustace, come!"

"First let me have a little conversation with you, dear Dora," he urged; and Eda, whose hopes had risen higher and higher while Lady Eudora was talking, caught a glimpse of his sober face, and hoped no longer. She saw that whatever might be his reasons for it, he did not intend to recommend Mark to the vacant situation, and made her escape from the room to relieve him of the embarrassment her presence evidently occasioned.

"Eda has run away," Lady Eudora exclaimed. "How ungracious she must think you to hesitate in this manner! She will not feel half as thankful for your recommendation as if it had been promised more promptly and kindly."

"I should be much grieved to hurt Miss Granton's feelings; she is a most estimable young woman; but——"

"Another horrid but! What is the matter with you this morning, Eustace? Aren't you willing to use your interest in Mr. Granton's behalf?"

"Certainly; I will do anything I can conscientiously do for a person of whom your father thinks so highly as he does of Mr. Granton."

"Well then, write to Lord —— without any more delay."

"But, Eudora, I am afraid I cannot think with you that this young man is fitted for a post of such importance."

The young lady began to redden angrily. "Why not? He is gentlemanly, intelligent, and anxious to rise in the world. Oh, Eustace, you cannot be so cruel as to stand in his light!"

"Gently, dear Dora. I do not deny that Mr. Granton is what you describe him; and so far from wishing to injure him, I am ready to do aught that lies in my power to further his interests."

"Isn't this blowing hot and cold with one breath? You will and yet you won't; how am I to understand you? I wish you wouldn't be so over-cautious, Eustace."

"Can I be too careful whom I recommend as a trusty and valuable servant to one of my best friends?"

"Too careful? No. But what have you to say against Mark Granton?"

"This much, Eudora; that he has not inspired me with the confidence I must feel in the man I send to Lord ——"

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"It had been her mother's."—p. 155.

"You do not like Mr. Granton. You are jealous of him!" she exclaimed, passionately.

"Jealous because your father finds him a more useful and sociable companion than I! Nonsense, Eudora; you ought to know me better than to think me capable of such meanness."

Still she pouted, and drew away the hand he would have taken, asking, "What do you know to Mr. Granton's discredit?"

"Nothing; nothing whatever. Don't you see, dear coz, that he may be a very well-conducted young man, and yet not fitted for a berth of so much importance?"

"No, I do not see it. In my opinion he has every quality that fits him to undertake it, and it's horribly aggravating that when such an opening presents itself, you are so heartless, so cold-blooded, as to stand between him and good fortune."

"Gently, Dora, gently! It is scarcely fair to abuse me because I am as loyal to my friend as you are to yours. As soon as I find an opportunity of serving Miss Granton's brother without losing my own self-respect, I will do so."

"Promises, especially evasive ones, mean nothing," Eudora scornfully asserted, "and your refusal to fulfil the pledges I gave in your name will look like an insult to Mr. Granton. I know I should regard it as one were I in his place. He will be cruelly mortified, cruelly!"

"I hope not," Mr. St. Orme replied. "I shall be sorry if I have hurt or disappointed him; even though it is so indirectly that I am sure he has too much good sense to blame me for it."

"But what will he think of me?" and Eudora's eyes began to fill with angry tears; "I felt so sure that you would use your influence for him, that I did not hesitate to say so."

"I will go to Mr. Granton and explain that your good-nature led you into an error. He is so young, and so well placed here, that he can afford to wait until something more suitable offers."

"No," said Eudora, planting herself between Mr. St. Orme and the door, "you shall not gall him still more by an hypocritical pretence of regret for your ill-nature. I will myself tell him that I made a terrible mistake when I depended on your good feeling."

She left the room, and Eustace St. Orme returned to his writing; but her reproaches had vexed and disturbed him so much, that his letter was thrown aside unfinished. He did not like Mark Granton; and though he thought he had good grounds for distrusting the young man, he knew that it was no use saying so; that he could not make Eudora think with him. He loved her for the generous warmth with which she pleaded the cause of her friend's brother; but at the same time it grieved him that she had not sufficient faith in his own affection to understand that he did not willingly refuse her anything; but had acted in this matter according to the dictates of his conscience.

Nor did the affair end here; he was obliged to see that both Lord and Lady Chessington shared in some measure their daughter's vexation at his refusal to recommend Mark Granton to the vacant post. Eda was the only one whose demeanour towards him was unchanged. She was too sincere to pretend that she did not regret it, but she had studied Mr. St. Orme's character sufficiently to feel satisfied that he had excellent motives for what he had done; and telling herself that Mark's youth and inexperience justified him in asserting that her brother was not fitted for so onerous a post, she strove to reconcile him as well as herself to the disappointment.

That Mark did feel it bitterly, she was sure, but he would not acknowledge it. "Pooh!" he said, carelessly. The berth was not such a catch that he need fret at losing it. St. Orme had acted just as he anticipated, and anything was better than lying under an obligation to such a prig. He dared say he should do very well without the patronage of a fellow he disliked.

Eudora said nothing—a most unusual course for her to take, for she was accustomed to talk so fast and loudly when displeased, that every one in the house was made aware of it; but in these passionate utterances her wrath ordinarily evaporated, and it was as new as it was unpleasant to her cousin to see her avoid him day after day, and refuse to be conciliated.

Perhaps he was the only person who noticed how much she had changed of late, for Lady Chessington had been seized with another attack of lung disease, violent enough to confine her to her own suite of apartments, and Eda was in such constant attendance upon her, that Eudora was left to her own devices for several hours each day. But she no longer cared to ride or drive with her father, or Mr. St. Orme—who attributed her refusals to the angry feelings she still cherished—and either took long solitary strolls, or shut herself up in her own room where she read or dreamed her mornings away.

Eda found her there one day listlessly scribbling on the margin of a volume of poems, and peeped over her shoulder to see what author she was ill-using.

"Byron! I do not wonder that you are such a careless reader, for we agreed, did we not, that his writings are not to our taste? But why are you reading them at all?"

"Why? I don't know. Oh, because I am too idle to care for anything better. Some of his verses are very melodious, and chime in with my feelings just now."

"Just now," repeated Eda, smiling, "you would have been better engaged if you had accepted Mr. St. Orme's proposal, and rambled as far as the waterfall, for your hands are feverish, and you look tired. Dear Lady Eudora, you stay in-doors too much."

"I am very well," she answered, briefly, and was withdrawing herself from the affectionate caress, when a little gold chain she wore round her throat caught in the button of Eda's cuff; it snapped, and a trinket suspended from it fell to the floor.

Eudora stooped for it directly, exclaiming in great perturbation, "My locket, my dear little locket, is it broken?" and was returning it to her bosom, when Eda, with pale cheeks and dilated eyes, arrested the movement. She had caught a glimpse of the ornament, and recognised it. It had been her mother's, and since Mrs. Granton's death had passed into the hands of Mark. How came it in the Lady Eudora's possession?

CHAPTER XX.

For a brief interval Eudora, with drooping head, sat cowering before her friend, too confused or shame-stricken to meet her anxious gaze; but in a little while she rallied her spirits, and throwing herself into Eda's arms, exclaimed—

"Don't look at me so strangely! You know all at last, and I am glad of it; very glad. It has made me miserable to have such a secret, and from you!"

"What secret? What is it I have to hear? Not that Mark has dared to——"

But Eudora sprang up, and imperiously made a sign to her to be silent.

"Not a word against him; I will not hear it. If any one is in fault, it is I! But no one can blame us for loving each other. There, now I have told you all. I have promised to be Mark's wife, and I mean to keep my word."

"Mark must be mad!" was all his distressed sister could find voice to say; but Eudora laughed, though it was a little wildly.

"People always are when they fall in love. You are not very complimentary to me!"

"I am not thinking of you, but of my brother," Eda replied. "I must see him, reason with him, remind him of his position and yours, before he can commit worse follies."

But Eudora held her tightly when she would have quitted the room.

"You shall not scold him; I say you shall not! Is it such a very great folly to love me? I know I am heedless and in many respects unworthy of him; but I mean to be wise and thoughtful for his sake. Oh Eda, my little friend and sister, you will help me and teach me, will you not?" But Eda scarcely had patience to hear her out.

"Let me go to Mark, and insist that he leaves this house at once! You are a silly, romantic girl, Lady Eudora, and you cannot know what you are saying!"

"I do not deny that I am what you call me," said Lady Eudora, still retaining her grasp on Eda's dress; "but Mark has promised to put up with all my faults, and I love him dearly. Eda, I will be a true wife to him, and do my utmost to help him to become as rich and famous as he aspires to be."

"You do not know what you are saying," Eda repeated. "What kind of love is that which is told secretly, and which leads a young girl to deceive her parents? For shame, Lady Eudora! Where was your own sense of honour when you listened to Mark's wooing, knowing as you do that Lord Chessington will never sanction it?"

The young girl bit her lip, and coloured high.

"I never intended to meet him secretly. It was by chance, the merest chance, we encountered each other—at first," she added. "And no one else sympathised with him, no one else understood him, nor comprehended what high and noble aims he has."

"Very noble, certainly, if leading you into clandestine proceedings is a specimen of them!" exclaimed Eda, bitterly.

"I tell you the fault rests with me," Eudora interposed. "You are cruel to judge us so harshly. You ought to be on our side, and help us in the struggle we have before us."

"Help you! to do what?"

"To overcome mamma's opposition. I shall be able to manage papa myself. When he finds that I am resolute, he will give way; and then, oh then, Eda, we shall all be very happy! Mark will be such a dutiful son to my parents. We shall always live with them, you know; and papa will get him into Parliament, and—and don't say anything unkind, pray don't!"—Eudora's head was now resting on her friend's shoulder, and she was sobbing convulsively—"for I am very, very wretched. I never concealed anything from mamma before; I never wilfully fretted papa; and when I think how disappointed he will be to find that I cannot marry Eustace, I feel that I could not go through with it if it were not for Mark.'

"I am glad he has not taught you to quite forget what you owe to your parents," Eda retorted. "He must go away, Lady Eudora, and you must never think of him again."

"What! after promising by everything I hold dear and sacred that I will be his wife!" cried Eudora, dashing away her tears and assuming a resolute air. "I shall grieve very much if mamma refuses to forgive us, but I shall not alter my determination. I will never give Mark up unless he gives me up. I vowed to be his, and I will keep my word!"

Eda put aside her clinging hands, feeling too much annoyed to argue longer, but Eudora would not be shaken off.

"Where are you going? What are you going to do?"

"I shall first seek Mark; tell him what I think of his conduct, and warn him that if he does not take steps to put an end to this disgraceful affair, I must."

"But I forbid you to interfere. You have no right to do so!" cried Eudora, angrily. "How can you meditate anything so dishonourable? I gave you my confidence, telling you my thoughts and intentions freely, because you are the sister of my plighted lover, and you are not justified in repeating even to him anything that I have said."

"My first duty is to my employers," answered Eda, steadily. "How could I look them in the face if I knew that I was conniving at my brother's base endeavours to entrap you into a secret marriage?"

"Mark is not base," was the passionate retort. "It is you who are harsh and unkind. What was more natural than for me to love him when I saw him struggling with so many disadvantages, and knew that with my hand I should be able to give him the wealth and position which are all he needs. For the first time in my life I am glad that I am rich; yes, and glad that Mark will owe something to the 'silly romantic girl,' as you call me, whose faults he does not see so readily as you do."

Eda looked at her with angry wonder, struggling with her pity. To a girl of Eudora's temperament there might be a strange sort of gratification in being wooed in this fashion; but how could she have so thoroughly forgotten her duty and self-respect, as she must have done, to pledge herself to Mark secretly? As for him, she could scarcely trust herself to think of what he had done. There must have been stolen interviews and assignations, to keep which both must have deceived those who trusted them. She was accustomed to find excuses for everything her brother said and did that militated with her own conceptions of right and wrong; but she could not do so now. With his boasted knowledge of the world, he must be well aware that in such a marriage he only could be the gainer, and that he was taking unfair advantage of Eudora's romantic generosity, as well as betraying the confidence of her parents.

"Don't look so worried, dear little Eda," the young lady was whispering, when she roused herself to listen, "It will all come straight by-and-by. It isn't the first time that a demoiselle of high degree has fallen in love with a fortuneless knight; and if I am satisfied with my choice——"

"But are you? Can you feel that you would be happy with one whose first step has been to teach you to deceive your best friends?"

Eudora bit her lip, and began to lose her temper.

"You are behaving just as Mark said you would; making the worst of everything, and taking the most exaggerated, distorted views of what we have done, instead of suggesting some plan for us to act upon. Remember, Eda, we have gone too far to retreat, and you will but precipitate matters if you are rash and obstinate."

"I must talk to my brother," she answered. "If no thought of the countess's grief or your father's anger has had power to deter you from acting so madly, how can I hope that my remonstrances will have any effect?"

"I have only done as hundreds have done before me—pleased myself," Lady Eudora retorted, so recklessly, that Eda would not be detained any longer, but went at once in search of Mark. The sight of Lord Chessington, who came out of the study as she approached it, smiling at some little jest of his own, made her shrink back, feeling as guilty and ashamed as if it were she who had been sinning against him; nor was her embarrassment lessened by finding Mr. St. Orme with her brother, assisting him in looking over some plans that had been sent in for a row of almshouses the earl proposed building.

How kind, how good, Eustace St. Orme looked! There was the shadow of a great sorrow on his brow, but it was never allowed to interfere with his duties, or his readiness to serve others. Mark, though by far the handsomer of the two, always appeared to disadvantage beside the man in whose clear soft eye there was never a look of guile; and whose life, if an uneventful one, was stained with no excesses.

Mark must have guessed the nature of her errand as soon as he glanced at Eda's troubled face, for he put out his hand directly, saying, "I know what you want, my dear little sis., but I really cannot stop to talk to you just now. I shall be at liberty by four o'clock, when you will find me in the library. Will that suit you?" As Mr. St. Orme was present, there was nothing for it but to assent and retire; but those hours of suspense were very painful ones, and rendered almost intolerable by being spent with the countess, who, as Eudora avoided her room on pretence of a headache, sent for Eda to read to her.

This she did so badly that Lady Chessington soon asked her to leave off, saying, "I cannot listen to you to-day with any pleasure, for your voice is husky, and you read as if your thoughts were ever so far off. But never mind, my dear," she kindly added, when Eda apologised, "you cannot always feel equal to the task of reading aloud. If you will wind these wools for me, we will talk."

At first it was not difficult to keep up the conversation, for the countess was merely making inquiries respecting some sick poor Eda had been visiting for her; but somehow, though neither knew in what way it happened, she began to speak of her daughter, and insensibly adopted a more confidential tone than usual.

"If her health improved," she said, "Eudora must soon be introduced into society. It was pleasant, though, to see that she was not so restless and eager for change as she used to be. Did not Eda think she was more womanly of late? Mr. St.

Orme thought so; and he was sincerely attached to his wayward little cousin. Ah! what a husband—gentle, yet firm—he would make for the woman who was able to appreciate him. What a comfort it would be to see Eudora united to so excellent a young man!"

It was torture to sit there and hear the fond mother thus hinting at her own hopes and wishes, knowing all the while how sadly they were to be disappointed; and at last the distress Eda could not conceal was noticed by the countess, who fancied that the closeness of the room had affected her, and kindly insisted that she should go into the garden, and try whether the fresh air would not revive her.

Eda thankfully accepted her dismissal, and went to her own chamber, to arrange some plan of proceeding; but her brain was in such a whirl that she could not think coherently. She could only throw herself on her knees, and pray, in broken words, that her entreaties, or if those failed, her indignant remonstrances, might awaken Mark's slumbering conscience, and prevail with him to bid Lady Eudora farewell for ever.

In this manner, or restlessly watching the hands of the clock, she passed the time till the hour had arrived at which Mark had promised to meet her, and then, with as composed an air and steady a step as she could assume, she hastened to the library.

(To be continued.)

THE CHRISTIAN GRACES.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A., RECTOR OF ARMAGH.

LOVE.

"Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment, because as he is, so are we in this world."—1 JOHN iv. 17.

IN this passage we have a question suggested, and two direct statements made.

1. The question is, How may a loving character be obtained? Who can bring a tender thing out of our hard and stony hearts? Wherein is our love made perfect?

2. We are told, secondly, that likeness to God must be sought in character, not in powers or talents or acquirements, for it is when our love is made perfect, that we are as He is.

3. And we learn thirdly, that such a character will give us boldness in the day of judgment.

First then, we have to ask, Wherein is our love made perfect? What remedy can be discovered for the heartless selfishness which is the disease of the whole world, and the source of all its miseries? We find in the context exactly the answer which a Christian ought to expect. What is the centre of Christianity but Christ? Who else is the good physician? It pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell—in a person, not in doctrines, nor church organisations, as such.

Therefore the 14th and 15th verses tell how "the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world; and whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God." That is to say, although he was despised and rejected—a tender-hearted man of sorrow, who put forth His compassionate hand to the leper's loathsomeness, and took the youth he had raised and delivered him to his mother, and in the garden restored the ear of one who had come out against him as a thief, and pitied the daughters of Jerusalem in the hour of his own anguish; although he had no stoical hardihood, no theatrical grandeur, no splendour of this world, yet whosoever believes that Almighty God was in His pitying dying love, God dwelleth in that man, and he in God. Knowing Jesus, you lay your hand upon the very heart of love, you feel it throb, its pulses pass into your own; and thus you know and are partaker of love itself, which is divine, which is God. For God is love, as the passage goes on to insist, and so it is plain that if God dwelleth in any man, then love dwelleth in him, and he in love. This is the inspired answer, "Herein is our love made perfect."

Yes, if you want to really love your fellows, and your God, you must study Christ in the Gospels: the beauty, the infinite and sacred beauty of His life and death must grasp your lives, and be a power in them. You must not be content to excite in your breast a half-religious and half-hysterical sensation, which will pass away and leave you weary and hard and disappointed; but you must acquaint yourself with the fairest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely, that the beauty of His Divine character may raise you to the love of God, and that the example of His Divine compassion may inflame you with the love of man. There are people in our day who would fain brush aside all thoughts of God and Christ and supernatural things, to enthrone instead some vague feeling of benevolence and charity. Alas! human benevolence would soon grow cold, without the example of the Cross to feed its fires. When they tell us that benevolence is the true religion, we answer, "Not so; but religion is true benevolence." When we have confessed, with the 15th verse, that Jesus is the Son of God, and in Him perceived, with the 16th verse, that God is love, it is then, it is herein, that our love is perfected.

II. We are told that so far as we are thus made perfect in love, we bear God's image; we are as He was in the world. Now there are two great roads along which man has toiled in the pursuit of the summit of perfection, to be like his Maker. One is power—physical, political, mental power. We rightly think of knowledge as an attribute of Him whose eyes, as a flame of fire, read the past and the future like an open scroll. We rightly ascribe authority, splendour, pomp, to Him whom the noble army of martyrs praise while the angels bow their crowned and imperial heads. And therefore there has always been a strong temptation to think of God's likeness in the increase of power, and pomp, and knowledge. It is said of the conqueror at his feast, that—

> "Erect in awful state
> The godlike hero sat."

Herod in royal apparel, delivering the speech on which the hearers' lives depended, enjoyed the flattery which said it was the voice of a god. And man's first temptation was to be as God, knowing good and evil. Yet at the moment when he listened to the tempter's lying whisper, he was already more like God in the possession of an innocent free will, than when his eyes were opened only to discern his own abjectness, and skulk away and hide what was made in the image of God.

We do not deny that there is something Divine in knowledge. If God is light, and if whatsoever doth make manifest is also light, then there must be some faint and dim reflection of His excellent glory, in the patient meditation which measures the sun, and weighs the moon, and tells the materials of the stars. But yet every new exploit of the intellect proves more painfully that the tree of knowledge is not that of life. The stars are cold fires, but with power to burn and brand his littleness into man. Still, the passions of civilised nations and of profound students rage and clamour, and our eyes are opened, only to know that we are naked.

Not such is the true road to a recovery from the disastrous opening of the history of our race.

It is when the character is renewed, when love is made perfect, that we are in the world as He is above. For indeed Christ, who declared Him unto us, did so by the magic of a loving nature. It is true that the power of God was with Him, diseases shrank from His touch, and His voice recalled departed spirits from their shadowy home to the deserted mansions of the flesh; but it is also true that we think, in his most amazing works, less of their miraculous energy than of their sweetness and tenderness. The words, "He that was dead came forth bound hand and foot with grave-clothes" are less striking than the words, "Jesus wept." That the rocks should be rent and the graves opened is less impressive than the prayer of the dying Lord, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Therefore it is that the evidence of mere power lingered only a little while with the infant Church; but the broad seal of hearts renewed, of Christ-like characters, is on her commission from the first age until now. The clearest answer to the sceptic is in this moral miracle, in the power to turn to loving and holy lives, and say, "These are our epistles, known and read of all men." But there is no worse sign of a church, even from the merely controversial standing-point, than that the love of many should wax cold.

Wherever the Gospel is a power, there the water of life is not only a well to quench the individual thirst, but also a river of living water, to dispense blessings far and free.

III. And lastly, this perfecting of love makes us bold in the day of judgment. It is much to have assurance even here. The touch of disease, the cold shadow of the angel of death, even a sighing wind, even the cadence of some boding melody, has power to shake many a bosom with vague spiritual fears. What shall it be at last, in that infection of terror when kings of the earth, and every bondman and every freeman shall call to the rocks and hills to cover them?

> "When louder yet, and yet more dread,
> Swells the high trump that wakes the dead?"

No assumed composure, no hardihood of temperament will resist that strain; no self-respect will nerve the man who sees the last veil torn away, and the record of all secrets opened before men and angels.

He will not fear who recognises in the Judge the Saviour; who has walked with him year by year; whom grace has taught to resist and overcome everything that would separate between him and his God; whose love has resented and cast out all that intrusive and tormenting fear that was really a slander on the heart of the Father, and on the adequacy of the satisfaction. He has long since spread out his sins before a pardoning God. He has found a strength to overcome and cast down the accuser of the brethren. He has owned and realised the worst, and trusted, in spite of the worst, that Christ would keep that which he had committed unto Him unto the day which has now come. He who sits there is his Redeemer; and, as he gazes, the most glorious of all faces wears the expression, the character, on which the saint has so often pondered, and which at last, in some poor measure, has also become his own. And he has boldness in the day of judgment, because as God is, so is he in this world.

THE SPIDER, FLY, AND CREEPER:

A FABLE.

A TREE-HOLE spider (if you know
The ground on which we call him so,
For some might rather hear him hight
In finer speech a Dendrodyte)
Had taken up, to shield his poll,
In some big elm, a small-doored hole;
And there, before his sally-port,
Around his lofty wooden fort,
Had built, with ropes of awful size,
His web, foreboding death to flies.
By chance there came a-walking by,
A silly many-footed fly,
And, climbing to the fort on high,
He asked the crafty spider why
He had the repework up so nigh
His house; and eke so wide and high.
The spider now, as ever, sly,
With head and lidless eyes awry,
Spoke up and answered with a lie,
"For my defence against my foes,
Who else might trouble my repose;
For my defence, and only that:
I would not hurt a friendly gnat."
Just then had sought the tree, and heard
His words, a Treecreeper, a bird;
"Oh, what a lie that wretch has told!"
He said. He scuttled to his hold.
"Why ran you to that hole? Come here."
"I'm glad," he said, "my hole was near.
I ran in hither for defence."
"Defence," replied the bird, "forsooth,
And where, Sir Sprawler, is your truth?
Defence, indeed, and why not get Behind your strong defence the net?"
"No," spider said, "I need not stand
By that, with these good walls at hand."
"Ah!" said the bird, "you crookèd hips,
I'll prove your lies by your own lips;
You cheat the fly with your pretence
That you build webs for your defence.
With this defence, ten times as good,
Within this castle of hard wood.
I'll have you yet, if I've good eyes,
Before you've cheated many flies;
I'll nab you running up and down
Some tree, before the leaves are brown;
I'll snap you up the while you sprawl
About the side of some old wall."
"And then," said spider, "shall I die,
All out of justice to the fly?
Or else, that righteous you may eat
My wicked body for your meat?"

The spider here, and eke the bird
Betoken hypocrites in word—
The men who hide their selfish aims
Beneath the shams of worthy names.

THE BRANCH OF HOLLY.

PART II.

MEANTIME, a merry party of boys and girls, laughing and talking gaily, and enjoying their walk through the fresh-fallen snow, arrived at the cross-roads. Unlike poor Essie, they were well muffled against the cold; and to those who are light of heart and surrounded with all the comforts of life, a white Christmas seems only to bring an increase of mirth and pleasure. After many farewells, and promises of meeting again soon for another walk, three of the number, consisting of a brother and two sisters, separated from the rest, and took the way towards the village. "I think we're going to have a fall of snow," said Mary, the eldest of the girls; "see how dark it is growing." "And shan't we go on?" asked little Bella. "I want to buy a great many things for Christmas."

"Not to-day," replied her sister; "we must turn at once, for here comes the shower."

"And a heavy one too!" said Richard. "I say, girls, you'd better run to the bridge for shelter. It's a jolly place in frost."

Taking each other's hands, the three children hastened on, and soon reached the friendly arch. As Richard hoped, the roof was hung with icicles of every shape and form, making the rough stone-work appear like the walls of a fairy grotto; but while they were examining these beauties with wonder and delight, Mary whispered mysteriously, "There must be some one here besides ourselves; listen!" Pausing for a moment, they all heard distinctly a sound like deep breathing close to where they stood.

"It might be some wild animal!" exclaimed little Bella. "Do let us go out again into the snow!"

"No, no; we must find out what it is first," and Richard walked courageously to the very centre of the arch, and, looking carefully about, perceived a little figure lying on the ground, in the shadow of a large stone. Beckoning his sisters forward, he pointed to the spot. "Oh, 'tis a poor little child asleep!"

exclaimed Mary. "How cold she must be in such thin clothes this perishing day!"

"We'd better rouse her up," said Richard, "for I've heard 'tis dangerous to sleep in the snow."

The three children then stooped anxiously over Essie, and Mary, gently touching the pale cheek, said softly, "Awake, little girl; this is too cold a place to rest."

But it was a harder task to rouse her than they had anticipated; and when at length the poor child opened her eyes, and endeavoured to raise herself, she felt giddy and bewildered, and for many minutes was unable to stand without support. Richard proposed that when the snow-shower ceased they should see her home. "I don't think you'd be able to reach it by yourself," he added; "but where do you live, for I don't remember ever having seen you about here?"

"I'm a stranger from town," began little Essie, "and I came here in a cart with a kind man, who gave me a seat. Mother's ill, and she'll fret about me, and I don't know how to get back."

"But why did you come?" asked Mary.

Then followed the story of the holly branch, and of all her hopes, and subsequent disappointment.

The children looked at one another, and seemed greatly interested when she mentioned the name of the place to which she had been directed, and after a little whispering together, Mary said, "We live at Hollybank; so perhaps you have not had your journey for nothing after all. God, who sent that holly-branch which you took as a promise that He would do more, has guided you here, and sent the snow-shower to drive us into shelter, so that you might not be left to sleep in the cold. If the old woman at the gate had let you up at that time you would not have found us at home, but now, if you will come back with us, we will ask papa for some holly; for though he said he had given away all he could spare this year, I think he would let you have a little, as you have come so far, for your sick mother."

The snow had by this time ceased, and the four children set off for Hollybank, where, after a good dinner before a comfortable fire, Essie began to feel rested and revived. But she could not forget her mother's anxiety, and when called up to the Hall to receive the holly she had been promised, declared she was quite able to set off at once with her precious load. Then Richard mentioned that his father had met the driver of the cart, who had corroborated her story, praised her honesty, and offered her a seat back to town later in the evening. This was good news indeed to Essie, who had dreaded losing her way in the dark; and now she felt as if all her troubles were at an end. Bright and happy the poor child looked, notwithstanding the cold, when seated, about an hour after, beside the kind carter, with a bundle of holly at her feet consisting of the very choicest branches Richard could select covered with scarlet berries and shining leaves.

"I shall be able to spare a little of it for our own room," she said. "Mother will enjoy the sight, and I have something more to bring her this time;" and she glanced with delighted eyes at a basket filled with good nourishing food, which Mary and her little sister Bella had been allowed by their mother to pack for the poor sick woman. That was a happy evening indeed, when Essie displayed to her astonished mother all the good things she had brought home to make her strong and well. "And we shall have a real Christmas after all," she said, holding up the holly, branch by branch, for admiration, while the poor woman declared the sight made her feel brighter and more hopeful than she had been for many a long day. "For surely the God who sent such beautiful things into the world in the middle of winter could send comfort and relief in the season of darkest sorrow!"

* * * * * *

A year passed away, and again it was Christmas Eve. Again Essie was decorating her mother's room with holly; but how changed was everything around! It was no longer in a dingy lane, but a pretty cottage in the country covered with evergreens—in fact, it was the very gate-lodge of Hollybank from which Essie had been turned just a year before. The old woman had gone to stay with her son at some distance; and now Essie's mother, strong and well, thanks to the kindness of her new friends and the good fresh air, lived there with her little daughter, who attended school every day, worked for the young ladies, and considered herself the happiest child in the world. "And all my prosperity," she used often to say, "commenced with that branch of holly."

S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

55. On what special occasion did Aaron lay aside his high-priest's dress while in the administration of his office?

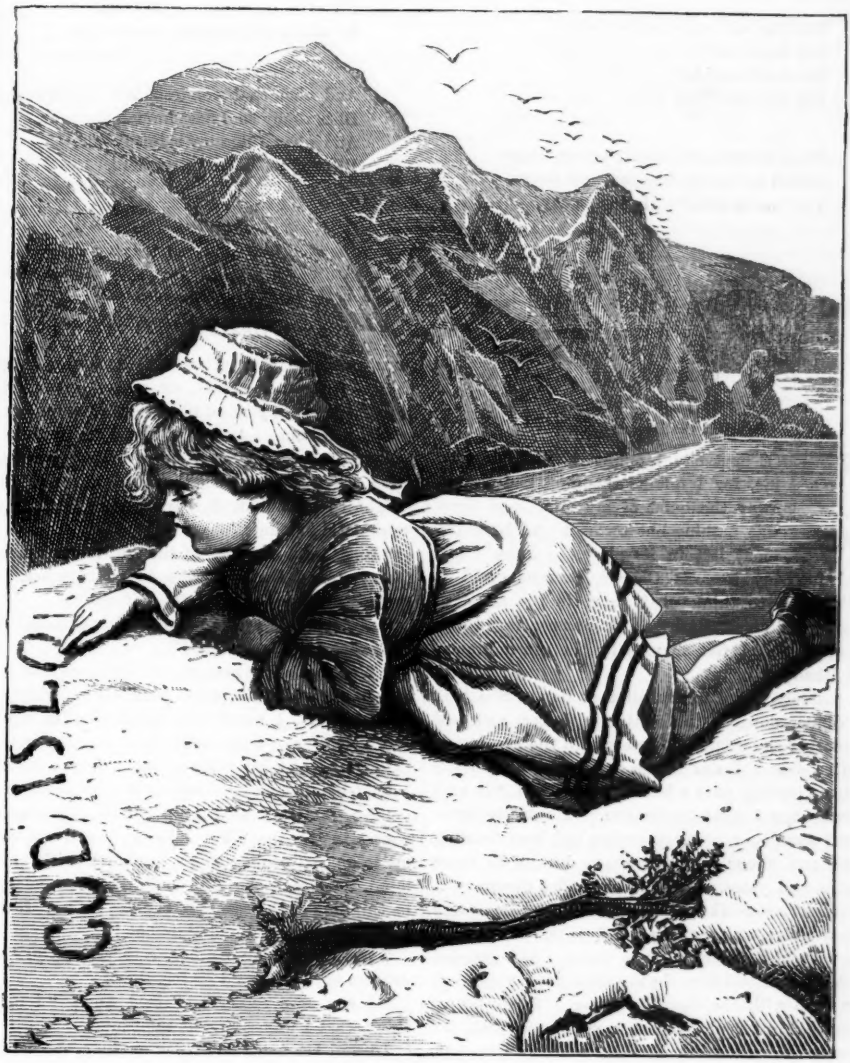
56. Who was it caused the destruction of the city of "Nob?"

57. What is called in the Bible, "The Royal Law?"

58. Where, and by whom was St. Paul called "Mercurius?"

59. From whom were the Kenites descended; and on what occasion do we find any of them serviceable to the Israelites?

60. Prove that the children of Korah were not destroyed in the destruction which came upon "Korah, Dathan, and Abiram."



ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 128.

45. From the position in society of those who were sent to him by the king, as recorded in 2 Kings xix. 2.

46. Acts ix. 31; xiv. 23; xxi. 5; Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. xiv. 23; xvi. 19.

47. See Numb. v. 7.

48. St. John vi. 27—58.

(Drawn by J. LAWSON.)

THE WRITING ON THE SHORE.

The author of this little poem saw "God is Love" written on the Trusthorpe Sands.

I READ one morning on the sand,
And written by a childish hand,
A truth the billows cannot teach—
A truth past human wisdom's reach—
God is Love.

It seemed a very angel's trace,
God's footprint in that lonely place;
It brightened up the sea and sky,
And glad I was I could reply,
God is Love.

And much I thanked my little friend,
Who thus her joyous creed had penned;
And may she know for evermore
The truth she wrote upon the shore—
God is Love.

The tide will come again to-day,
And wash that lovely print away,
But death and hell cannot erase
The charter of the child of grace—
God is Love.

What though an absent darling sleeps,
Gulfed in the sea's remorseless deeps,
Yet "all is well." He took away
But what He gave, still I can say,
God is Love.

What though I bear an evil name,
And wrongly suffer bonds and shame,
I'll write upon my prison floor,
As saints and martyrs have before,
God is Love.

And when that wondrous love has brought
Bliss to my soul past human thought,
And when I don my raiment fair,
I'll sing as loud as any there,
God is Love!

GEORGE S. OUTRAM.

EDWARD TURNER, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.

BY AGNES MACDONELL, AUTHOR OF "MARTIN'S VINEYARD."

CHAPTER IX.

THE ACCIDENT.

"Out of the jaws of death."

THE next day brought its reckoning for me, for I felt as though I had thrown away the quiet of my mind, and there was nothing but torment and bewilderment left in its place. I knew I had acted foolishly towards Charlie Brereton, and it troubled me to think of it now, in the midst of all my grief about Barbara. It was contrary to all my ways, and I felt shamed by the remembrance, as if I had got drunk.

I scarcely saw Barbara all that day. She took her dinner down to the station with her, and told my mother she would not be back till the evening.

After dinner I was in the little shed behind the kitchen, looking over a box of tools I had left with Robert when I went to London. I scarcely knew what I was doing. My thoughts had been drawing closer and closer round Barbara during all these months and years, and now the sudden discovery of last night came like a sharp knife, and cut every hope asunder, and sent my life floating wide like a ship without a rudder. Every pound I had saved—all the work I had done during these past years—had been done with the thought of her. Every bit of success I had had had been sweetened with the thought that some day I might share it with her. And while I had been hoping and waiting—often with a sick heart at the hope deferred—Charlie Brereton had been winning her away from me. He who had called himself my friend—whom I had served as a friend many a time—he had done all this. I forgot in my anger and bitterness that I had never told him of my friendship with Barbara, and I accused him, with all his thoughtless lightness, of having laid deliberate schemes of treachery. I sat for an hour or more that afternoon in the little shed, thinking these thoughts, or rather letting them whirl through my mind like sticks in an angry and eddying stream. As I sat I heard my mother and Ann talking. They had been talking some time, but I had not heard what they said till now, when I caught the sound of Barbara's name, and the word "dramatic readings."

"But," said mother, "I thought it was a bargain that you and Barbara were to go together. She won't go without you, for she said so."

"Oh, mother, I cannot go. I wish I had never said what I did last night!"

"Well," said my mother, "I don't see how you're to get out of it now, when you've both given your word to go. I never was in London in my life, and I don't like these excitements either; but still, perhaps once in your life it might do you no harm. I don't like people breaking their promises."

"No, mother," said Ann, quietly, "it was very wrong to say that; but I know it will not do for me to go. I could not go to church with an easy mind, nor teach the little children on Sunday, and be thinking of the scenes of the day before. It would be like serving God and Mammon!"

"Well," said my mother, rather sharply, "what did you say you would go for, then?"

"I was over persuaded," said Ann; "I did not think what I was saying at the time."

I heard her voice was thick as she spoke, as if she were trying to keep back her tears.

I took my hat, and as I went through the kitchen I said, "I have heard what you've been talking about, mother, and I think Ann's right. I haven't liked the plan from the first; and, any way, Ann won't ever repent trying to follow her conscience, and giving up a pleasure that she doesn't think it right to have, you know."

I went out of the house, for I was restless and ill at ease; and though I had no special object in taking a long walk, I went on for miles that afternoon far into the country. I passed Brereton's workshop on my way through the village, and stopped a minute or two in the yard, to speak to one of the men.

Charlie Brereton was not there; he had not been there since dinner-time, I heard them say.

It was late in the afternoon as I neared Birchfield, on my way home. I was tired with my long walk, and as I went through the fields that lie up the hill-side, above the Birchfield valley, I sat down to rest on a stile, leading into a hop-garden. I sat there looking down over the long lines of the hop-poles, and across the sloping meadows, to where the spire of Birchfield church rose above the trees. All this was very familiar to me, and I scarcely knew what my eyes were resting on, till I noticed the train coming down the cutting, in the bottom of the valley, just the distance of the hop-garden and one field from the place where I sat. It had scarcely gone by when it was followed by a long excursion train. I was thinking how quickly they ran them one after another during these Easter holidays, and wondering, though I tried not to think of it, whether this was the reason that Barbara had stayed so close at work at the station all day, when suddenly another train swept round the turn at full speed, and, with a long whistle, passed into the tunnel, through which the line runs just about a quarter of a mile below the Airley junction. I thought to myself that 's the 4.40 train from London, but she must be before her time to follow the others so close, and took out my watch, and held it in my hand, seeing how long she took to come through the tunnel. Minute after minute went on—three, five, six—then the whistle began to sound again and again, till it was like one continual cry, and the danger-signal was run up at the end of the tunnel. I knew something wrong had happened. I put my watch in my pocket, and ran down, breaking through the hop-groves, towards the line. Before I had got down the embankment, the sounds that met my ears told me what had happened. There, in the dimness of the tunnel, I could just see the engine lying almost on its side, the red-hot ashes scattered over the ground, and behind a dreadful confused mass, where the carriages lay piled one over the other.

The newspapers told the story of the accident next day. Two trains, the first a luggage, the second an excursion train, had gone down the line, followed by the "4.40," a quick train from London. Both the slower ones should have reached the Airley junction, and run on to a siding, before the quicker one reached the tunnel. The pointsman at the higher end of the tunnel signalled that both the slow trains had passed through, when in fact only one had done so. The 4.40 train steamed on at full speed, running into the excursion train midway in the tunnel.

The 4.40 train, which had done the mischief, was not damaged at all, and, when I reached the spot, was slowly backing down the line for help from the nearest station. A crowd of men and women were running to and fro, some crying out distractedly for their friends; some doing what they could to help the sufferers who were still among the carriages, which had been hurled together, and crushed into one confused heap, reaching up to the very roof of the tunnel. The darkness, the cries of distress, the shouting, the whistling of the engine echoing in that dismal place, made the scene more horrible still. The first and third class compartments had suffered most; two carriages were turned almost upside down. I saw the oil-lights in the carriages were setting fire to the wood-work, and, feeling I was more handy at this sort of work than some of the gentlemen who were busy in other ways, I set myself to getting them out.

There was one young gentleman that was very active, moving about, telling people what to do, and making them forget their fear in doing something to find their friends. He called me to him in a while, to help him as he lifted the poor creatures through the windows; some fainting, some bleeding, some only half dead with fright. He laid those that were worst hurt on a railway-rug, and so we carried them out to the fresh air, and placed them on the embankment. People saw his quickness, and the way he worked; and through the windows I heard them calling to him to come and save them, for the love of heaven; and some women's voices, God bless them, praying him to save not themselves, but some one else, an old man or a child. I broke a hole through one of the lower carriages, and through it I crept, into a dreadful den of broken glass and splintered boards, where the worst injured lay, and so I lifted them out to the doctor—for so I found he was afterwards—one by one.

Just as we had got the last woman out there comes a cry of "Fire, fire!" The smoke was rising in a column from one carriage, which we had not entered, and which lay side upwards, half buried beneath the tender. The guard said he believed there was one man in the carriage, but there was no sound of distress issuing from it. The smoke rose in such volumes through the windows that it was impossible to see anything within.

Several people shouted, "Water from the boiler! water, water!" But there were no buckets, and the water was scalding hot. The only chance for the man inside was to get him out at once. There was so little air in the tunnel that the fire could not make much way, but the smoke was suffocating.

I climbed on to the roof, and held a lantern down through the window, and looked in. The smoke cleared for a moment, and I saw a man's face; he was lying on the floor, his head resting on the seat of the carriage. The eyes were open, staring upwards, and there was blood on his cheek. The smoke closed in again, almost blinding me; but in that moment I had recognised the face of Charlie Brereton.

CHAPTER X.

ANN'S SECRET.

"Her eyes are homes of silent prayer,
Nor other thoughts her mind admits,
But—he was dead, and there he sits,
And He that brought him back is there.
* * * * * * * *
Thrice blest whose lives are faithful prayers,
Whose loves in higher love endure."

Several voices called me back, and said it was no use to go in, that the fire was spreading fast; but I gave the lantern to another man, and lowered myself through the window. As I dropped in, the smoke gathered about me like a choking sea, blinding my eyes and filling my lungs. I groped with my hands along the floor; there was broken glass and woodwork, a great hole in the floor through which the hot smoke was pouring in. I was almost worn-out, and fainting, when I felt an arm—I clutched it, then, with all my strength, I lifted him, and dragged him up, for he had fallen through the floor, and was half crushed beneath the wood-work. I threw his cap through the hole—for I could not speak—and raised him on my shoulders; they seized him from above, and dragged him up. The smoke grew denser round me as the hole was stopped up, and I fell, sickened and suffocated, against the seat, and thought I should never see light again. But they did not leave me there to die. I had just strength left to grasp the arms that were held to me, and was dragged up. Some one led me out to the fresh air, for my head was very weak and dizzy, and I sat on the bank among the crowd, gradually finding out where I was, and what all the noise and distress about me meant; I saw them bring out Charlie Brereton's body, laid upon an unhinged door. I went over to where they laid him on the bank. The doctor knelt beside him, examining his hurts.

"Is he dead, sir?" I asked.

The doctor looked up at me a moment, but did not answer my question, only saying, "Take some of this brandy from the flask," and he pointed to one lying by him in the grass; and he went on listening with his ear on Charlie Brereton's heart, and binding the wound on his cheek with a handkerchief. Then at last he said, "No, he is alive; but he is very badly hurt, and the smoke has nearly done for him. You have had quite enough of it yourself, I see; take a little more of the brandy. I want you to attend to this poor fellow; take him to the nearest house, and go for a doctor; if you cannot get one to go to him directly, come back here for me. A gang of workmen has been sent from the station: most of the worst cases have been removed."

Our cottage was the nearest to the Airley Junction, and there we carried Charlie Brereton, and laid him on the little bed in the room down-stairs. My mother was the only one in the house. Ann had gone up to the parsonage with some work, and Robert had taken Tom down with him to the garden. I left my mother by the bedside, and ran to fetch the doctor, who did not live far out of Birchfield. He came back with me at once. Ann was watching for us at the door. She only stared at me, with a blank look, when I I spoke to her, and led us into the room where he lay. The doctor stayed for two hours and more, and when he went, he said, "The poor fellow is in a very critical state; I have been able to set one bone that was broken. Now the great thing is to keep him perfectly quiet. The shock he has had is worse a great deal than broken bones, and noise of any kind will cut off his last chance of life, which is small enough now. I will come up again at nine o'clock."

While the doctor was in the house I went down to the station, and told Barbara. She knew, of course, about the accident, but not that Charlie Brereton had been in the train. I told her all as gently and quietly as I could, and what the doctor said, and how he gave us hope, though not a strong hope, that he might recover. She listened, leaning against the door-post, very pale and still; and then she asked where Ann was. I told her; and thinking that she desired Ann for comfort in her trouble, I said, "I will tell Ann to run down to the station to see you when I go back."

But she said quite quickly, "Oh no, don't send her down; I shall be coming up very soon myself; please let her stay where she is."

When I was going out of the door, she followed a step or two, and said, "You are not hurt too, are you? you look so ill!"

I said, "Oh no!" and went home.

That night I sat by Charlie Brereton's bedside. A little after midnight I persuaded Ann to take my mother to bed, and I was left quite alone with the sick man. He looked so pitiful and child-like lying there, with his hands straight down by his sides, and his face so beautiful and death-like, that all the feeling in my heart towards him was pity; and all the anger I had felt towards him seemed blotted out, even when I saw lying on the table the three green tickets that had fallen from his waiscoat pocket as we undressed him. Poor young chap, he had been to London to get them, and was bringing them home in triumph when a stronger arm than mine had stopped him on his way!

He lay as if in a stupor most of the night. Only once he roused up, and spoke a few words which were wild and wandering, and then, groaning, he sank back again into the dead trance, out of which he had wakened for a moment, just to the knowledge of his pain, and nothing more.

I dropped the medicine between his lips, as the doctor had ordered, hour by hour, but he made no sign. I had many thoughts as I sat there alone, watching as it seemed in the presence of death—thoughts that were a leaven to my life ever after, and left me a different man from that hour. The hatred and anger of my heart were melted, and I had forgiven him; and I thought of Barbara, and longed to comfort her in the grief I thought she must be suffering.

Just at dawn I took off my shoes, and went softly into the kitchen, which opened on to the room where Charlie Brereton lay. Ann was there, and had been there all night, though I heard no sound through all those long hours. The candle stood upon the table, and a book lay open by it; I could only guess how she had spent the night. I never saw her look as she did then; she was so pale, and her eyes shone like stars; and in her face I read that she too had been offering the love of her heart to God, after many years of patience.

She stood beside me, and we talked in low tones about the sick man lying on the bed within. I had to go back to my work that day. She and my mother would have to take charge of him, most likely; for Charlie had no female relation but his aunt, who was old and feeble, and who kept the Breretons' house. We knew the chances were he would not live to be removed to his uncle's house, but would die where we had laid him.

"The judgment of God has fallen upon me!" said Ann, for she seemed to know that I had that in my own heart to make me understand her, and that now she felt no shame in showing me the quiet secret of her heart. "It has fallen very heavy upon me!"

"Not for your own fault," I said; "not for your own fault, Ann."

"Yes," she said. "Oh, Ned, for my folly and vanity the other night, when I thought more of myself than of my duty; but, oh, Ned, as I prayed to God this night that I might bear the punishment alone, it seemed to me—it came strong upon my heart—that God would save his soul at last; that is what I have prayed for all these years, and now I can bless the Lord for his great love, even," she said, and clasped her hands together—"even if he should die."

She bowed down her head, and a trembling fell upon her whole body with the spasm of pain and grief that that thought gave her.

Then she looked up, and drew the curtain back from the window, and we could see the faint streaks of the sunrise above the lines of the purple heather, solemn and still. "Oh, Ned!" she said, "our lives, with all their foolish hopes, seem like this candle when the sun rises, they are swallowed up in the light of the Lord, in whom is no darkness, neither shadow of turning. Blessed be His name! oh, blessed be His name!"

Charlie Brereton did not die. He lay at the cottage for full five weeks before the doctor would suffer him to be removed, and it was many weeks more before he was able to get about. Mother and Ann nursed him all through those five weeks; for although his aunt did come up every day, she was an old woman, and not so active or so able as they were to tend him as he needed in so bad an illness. It was a hard struggle for life; but his youth and spirit, the doctor said, and the good nursing, brought him through the narrow gates of life again. I did not go to Birchfield for many months after this. I was sent off into the country to superintend a rather important work soon after I went back to London; and even if it had been easy to go to Birchfield, I don't think I should have gone.

My whole life was changed now; my work seemed dull and to have lost most of its interest to me; and I waited on from week to week for the news that I thought must come, and for which I tried to prepare myself—that Barbara was going to marry Charlie Brereton. I went on with my trade steadily, and somehow prospered in it; but sometimes, in the middle of my work, the old thought of Barbara came back, and I pictured her standing in the garden as I had seen her that happy evening in the spring, or walking up from church, and Charlie Brereton at her side, and the old bitterness and misery fell over me, and seemed to blind and stifle me as the smoke had done in the tunnel that day.

I heard how Charlie Brereton was getting slowly better, and after a while Robert, who wrote to me now and again, began to tell how Charlie was much changed. Either the weakness that followed his illness had loosened his taste for his old pleasures, or the danger he had gone through had made him a more serious-minded man.

He was very quiet, Robert said. He came to the cottage sometimes, but not so often as he used to do. (To be continued.)

THE ORGANIST.

THE shadowy corner in the loft,
When music loud as thunder's roll
Broke from the organ up the aisle,
Grew bright with lightning from his soul.
And when the anthem sank to notes
As soft as those the evening bird
Sings o'er the glowworm on the bank,
Then low, and lower, till scarce heard;
The ceiling of that shadowy loft
To him was as a starry sky,
Whence echoes, as from angel-hymn,
Twice answered, "It is sweet to die."

E. G. CHARLESWORTH, M.A.

THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

II.—THE SECOND WORD: THE WORD OF KINGLY MAJESTY.

"And he said unto Jesus, Lord, remember me when Thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise."—ST. LUKE xxiii. 42, 43.

WE come now to Christ's second utterance from the cross, which we have characterised as the word of kingly majesty. The promise to the dying thief of immediate entrance upon the joys of Paradise, and communion with Himself therein, was evidently the second word spoken from the cross. The first was the word of intercession, the second the word of promise. We see Christ first praying for the forgiveness of His murderers, and we then see Him throwing open the door of grace to one of the greatest sinners. We first see our Lord's high-priestly character shining forth in an intercession founded on His sacrificial death; we then see Him declaring His kingly majesty, and at the very moment when His kingly office was subjected to the most supreme contempt.

But to understand this second utterance of Christ, we must consider the petition which called it forth.

What immediate effect was wrought in the minds of those who listened to the remarkable prayer of Christ for His murderers it is hard to determine. In the case of some, we may suppose, it was the occasion of thoughtful and anxious inquiry, if not of instant repentance. But we gather from the narrative that the result, in the majority of cases, was excitement to a more desperate and determined energy of evil in word and deed. While we cannot read the secrets of their hearts, we are presented with a most impressive picture of the outward conduct of those who were congregated around the cross.

There is Christ lifted up on the accursed tree—crucified between two thieves. And how are men regarding Him? What are they saying, thinking, feeling, in respect of Him? Had we mingled with that large multitude then assembled at Calvary, we should have found men and women regarding the same event with widely different feelings, a fact we should have soon discerned had we only looked upon the varied expressions of their upturned faces. There are Scribes and Pharisees, who have walked out to the scene of the crucifixion that they might enjoy the cruel satisfaction of witnessing the issue of their malignant conspiracy; some looking on in the silence of their bitter hate, others expressing their intenser enmity in the mocking words, "Let Christ, the King of Israel, come down from the cross, that we may see and believe Him." And many passing by reminded Him of the charge of the perjured witnesses, wagging their heads and saying, "Thou that destroyest the Temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself." While all cry, "Save thyself. If thou be the Son of God, save Thyself; come down from the cross and we will believe." Ah, but then He would not be worth believing in! They, the poor deluded ones, know not that He so suffers, and there, spite of all their revilings, remains, because He is the Son of God. He cannot save Himself and them too. It is love for sinners, it is His unchangeable determination to save sinners, which binds Him to the cross, and not the cords and the nails. He must bear the curse of the law which they have violated, in order that they may be saved therefrom. Besides these, Christ's more determined enemies, there were the common people, regarding with stupid astonishment the result of their own insensate shouting, and the soldiers, regardless of all save the execution of the sentence, and manifesting the impassiveness which only Roman soldiers could. But with all these, who were merely thoughtless or malignant spectators, there were some, and let us hope many, who were looking on with widely different feelings. There must have been many thoughtful men there, who wondered greatly what these things might mean, and in what they would finally issue. Many, beholding the things which were done, smote upon their breasts and returned. There were some there, doubtless, whom Jesus had helped and blessed, who had been the subjects of His miracles of healing, and who could not have seen the sights, nor have heard the sounds of that day of days, but for Him who was then hanging in agony and apparent helplessness upon the cross. On the outskirts of the crowd were some of His acquaintances and disciples, with a love which would not suffer them to go quite away, and a fear which kept them afar off. But if we confine our attention to the three crosses, we shall discern a diversity of feeling as great as any that we can distinguish in the surrounding multitude.

The enemies of Christ, whose malignity seems to have been unbounded, not satisfied with the accumulation of insults and injuries which preceded the crucifixion, or with the agony and ignominy inseparable from crucifixion as ordinarily inflicted, resolved, by crucifying Him between two thieves—as though He were the worst of the three—to increase, if possible, the infamy of the crucifixion itself. Everything was arranged with the design of rendering the very name of Jesus of Nazareth an offence, and of alienating from Him for ever the affection, respect, and loyalty of men. And how can they do this better than by crucifying Him between two thieves? They little thought what they did in thus numbering Him with the transgressors—that all this should turn out for the furtherance of the Gospel, and for the honour of Christ; and that in doing all this, they were acting according to the predeterminate counsel and foreknowledge of God, and that in the case of the conversion of one of these men the world should be called to witness a most remarkable triumph of redeeming love.

We have here, then, claiming our attention what we may speak of as the conversion of the thief on the cross. We have proof that he was converted while on the cross—for we read "the thieves also, which were crucified with Him, cast the same in his teeth." But after an interval—and it is but a short interval—the words of blasphemy give place, in the case of one, to words of penitential confession, earnest and believing prayer.

There are few scenes in Gospel history more striking and impressive than this, which, excluding the other circumstances of the crucifixion, forms quite a picture by itself. Who that has read the narrative can ever forget how this poor crucified felon, upon whom the shadow of death was falling, was led to look in faith to the crucified Saviour, and was able to forget the agony of crucifixion in the joy of knowing that he was to be that day with Christ in Paradise!

Here there are two things to be considered by us—the prayer of the crucified thief, and the reply of the crucified Saviour.

I.—The prayer presented by this poor crucified thief—"Lord remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom." In order to estimate the significance of this prayer, we must take into account the circumstances under which it was offered. There were many things calculated to discourage this man from offering such a petition.

There was the position of Him to whom it was presented. It was really addressed to Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of men. But it needed a very strong faith to believe in Christ at such a time—Christ on the cross, forsaken by friends, reviled by enemies, addressed constantly in the mocking but seemingly conclusive words, "He saved others, Himself He cannot save." Does it seem to us even now an easy thing for one to have ventured upon Christ in such circumstances? Yet it was at such a moment, when exposed to influences so disheartening, that this poor man cried, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom."

The faith so suddenly expressed by this man is found associated with all the marks of genuine faith that are conceivable in his case. There is the expression of deepest penitence on account of past sins; there is no attempt at self-justification, he says to his associate in crime and suffering, "We indeed suffer justly, for we receive the due reward of our deeds." There is appreciation of Christ's character, the fullest recognition of His innocence. "This Man," he says, "hath done nothing amiss." There is sympathy with Christ in His sufferings; and he who but a short time before had been uttering blasphemy himself, now attempts to shield Christ from the blasphemous revilings of his companion. And with all this there is the recognition of Christ as his Sovereign and Saviour; his prayer is, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom." Yes, even then he was able to recognise the kingship of Christ, and to commit unto Him the keeping of his soul, as One able to save even to the uttermost.

Touchingly beautiful is this short and simple prayer, expressive of the deepest humility and the most implicit faith. He asks for nothing but remembrance. He does not ask for some chief place in the kingdom, or even for any place therein at all, but only to be remembered. He feels that to be borne upon Christ's heart in remembrance is enough. He asks this as a free gift; he feels that Christ might well forget him; he has no claim to be remembered; his prayer is, "Lord Jesus, I ask thee, for Thy love's sake, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom."

In considering this prayer, we have to think not only of Him to whom it was offered, but of him also by whom it was offered. How unlikely a man he was to have offered any prayer at all! He was a condemned malefactor—a man whom we might, not unreasonably, have concluded to have been hardened against every good and gracious influence. He was a notorious sinner, and the crime for which he was suffering must have been one of great heinousness. Yet this man, apparently so abandoned, was, and quite at the close of his misspent life, saved by an exercise of faith in Christ.

Witnessing this great and unexpected change, we cannot but inquire as to the way in which this transformation was effected. That the agent was God's Spirit none can doubt. What power less than Divine could work so great a change as this? If we believe in the Bible at all we must believe that God's Spirit is the uniform agent in conversion. There is but one Spirit, though there is a diversity of operations. This case is exceptional as to some of the surrounding circumstances, but as to all essentials it is the same as every other case of true conversion. In every case alike there must be the same real and effectual change from darkness to light, and from sin to holiness, which can only be effected by the working of God's Spirit on the mind; that Spirit who is ever at work, turning men from the power of Satan unto God.

But we find that the Spirit of God always operates in connection with certain appreciable means—some form of the Truth; and though we have here little to guide us, we have no reason to regard this as an exceptional case. Truth may be expressed in many different ways; and while on the cross the malefactor witnessed enough, and heard enough, to convince him that his fellow-sufferer was One to whom he might commit the keeping of his soul. But it is not needful, nor, on the whole, reasonable to suppose that this man knew nothing of Christ till he was introduced to Him on the cross. This man was probably one of the Barabbas gang, who had been lying long in prison before he had been brought out to suffer, and he had, it is likely, heard much of Christ, though he had heeded little. How came he to have such an idea of Christ's innocence? How came he to have such an idea of the Messiahship of the crucified One? We know not, of course, the antecedents of this man's life; but it does not seem reasonable to suppose that he should have spent his time in wandering about Judea, and have never heard of Jesus, who was everywhere talked of, and whose pretensions to the Messiahship were everywhere discussed. And if he were of Jewish parentage he must have had some acquaintance with those Old Testament prophecies, the remarkable fulfilment of some of which it was his privilege to witness, and in one instance to take an unwilling part in.

As that man hung extended on the cross, we can conceive of God's Spirit bringing many long-forgotten and despised truths to his remembrance, and applying them with power to his heart. The home-scenes of childhood, the prayers and aspirations of early days of comparative innocence, may have been brought back to his mind; and it is far from improbable that he had previously met with Christ Himself, who mingled much with the lowest of the people. He may have heard some of His life-giving words, and have witnessed some of His deeds of love and mercy. On these points we can affirm nothing; the thing which we are mostly concerned in knowing is this: that he who had wandered so far, who had sinned so grievously, who seemed lost beyond the hope of recovery, was led at last to believe in Him who is able to save to the uttermost. We have here faith which is well-nigh or absolutely without a parallel. It may be questioned whether the faith of many a lifetime would, if concentrated, equal the energy of that which found expression in the prayer of this poor dying felon. Christ might have said of it what He said of a less remarkable exhibition of faith, "Verily I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel."

II. We have now to consider the answer returned by the crucified Saviour. It is prompt and gracious, a word of majesty and mercy—"Verily I say unto thee, this day thou shalt be with me in paradise." Very impressive is the interval of silence between Christ's first word of intercession, and this second word of promise. We are awed by the majestic tranquillity He maintains in these moments of suffering. There He is on the cross, exposed to the successive indignities and revilings to which we have referred, and He answers not a word. Our blood leaps and surges in our veins at the very thought of enduring such indignities; and yet, looking on that cross, we all feel it to be a grander, nobler thing to suffer uncomplainingly as Christ suffered, than, however aggrieved, to avenge one's self.

But we are glad that the silence is broken. Had Christ, after having spoken the words of intercession, uttered no other words, it might have been questioned whether the silence He maintained was not the silence of unconsciousness. We should have been tempted to say, May not His eye be growing dark, His ear heavy in death, may He not in the weakness, or even in the insensibility of dissolution, have ceased from the vindication of His innocence? But all such questionings are at once met by the circumstance here recorded, that when the cry of penitence and prayer fell upon the ear of the dying Saviour it elicited an immediate response. He who disregarded the revilings of the multitude turned upon the dying thief a look of love, and uttered those ever-memorable words, "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise." The answer was not long delayed, and when given it was full and satisfying. "To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise." Paradise! the word used to denote the original Eden, and that state of ultimate felicity which was but faintly symbolised thereby. The heavenly paradise is the true garden of delights, where neither thorns nor briars shall grow, where painful labour shall give place to spontaneous and unimpeded activity—a garden in which no tempter shall lurk, into which neither sin, nor sorrow, nor death shall enter, and in which men shall again walk with God, and realise a communion more perfect and blessed than the primal. The word only occurs three times in the New Testament—here, 2 Cor. xii. 4, and Rev. ii. 7—and the reference we may take to be an unequivocal and appropriate one to that state of felicity in which the disembodied spirits of the just shall dwell more blissfully and securely than did our first parents, for too short a season, in the material paradise.

The assurance given to this poor man is not only that he shall be admitted to paradise, but that he shall be with Christ in paradise. "To-day," says the dying Saviour, "thou shalt be with Me in paradise."

"To-day," says Christ, "thou shalt be with Me in paradise." There is to be no waiting—no intermediate state—no weary delay in some outer court of purification. To be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord. There is an immediate transference. To die is gain. The saints who walked here in faith and patience are now inheriting the promises. What is death in relation to this world is but birth into a higher state.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"She is our only child; let us have patience with her!"—p. 172.

To every dying believer Christ says what He said to the crucified thief, "To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise." Whenever and wherever we are called to die, may it be our joy to see our Divine Saviour bending over us, and to hear Him whisper into our ear these words of gracious assurance, "To-day thou shalt be with me in paradise."

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXI.

MARK, who was standing on the hearth-rug in a thoughtful attitude, came to the point at once with an easy carelessness that astonished Eda, until she remembered that Lady Eudora had had time and opportunity to warn him of her determined opposition, as well as to repeat to him her own vehement promises of fidelity.

"So, my dear sis., you have been admitted into our secret; and I hope you intend to congratulate me on my prospects. Neither you nor I dreamed, when I came to the Chessingtons, that I should find a precious little wife under their roof, did we?"

"Pray do not talk in that strain!" was the indignant reply. "You must know as well as I do that Lady Eudora can never be your wife."

"And why do you say this, Eda? Because she is rich and I am poor? It is not pleasant, I'll admit, to be forced to owe every advantage in life to the hand of the woman I marry; but I do not feel disposed to break the poor little girl's heart because she has the misfortune to be an earl's daughter."

His sorry attempt at a jest only heightened Eda's displeasure, and his familiar mention of Lady Eudora sounded like an insult in the ears of one who believed that true affection is always accompanied with respect.

"I cannot think that Lady Eudora's heart is concerned in the matter. I fear you have bewildered her with indirect appeals to her generosity, till she imagines she is doing a very noble deed in consenting to wed you. If you were an honourable man, you would not have extorted a promise that it will degrade her to keep."

"What are you saying?" he demanded, sternly. "Do you know that you are bringing most scandalous accusations against me? If I had deliberately schemed to win the young lady's affections——"

But here his sister interrupted him by bursting into tears. "Oh Mark, Mark! that is just what I am afraid you have been doing! She was wilful when you came here, I know, but too frank to commit such treachery as you have led her into!"

"I see no great treachery in a few billets-doux and stolen meetings. Stratagems in love and war are considered excusable," said Mark, flippantly; but Eda refused to listen to such sophisms.

"You and I were never taught to consider any kind of deceit pardonable; the dear mother who strove to make us follow in her own steps detested it! Had you quite forgotten all her lessons when you led Lady Eudora to meet you, and listen to words that should never have escaped your lips?"

"Now, my dearest Eda," said her brother, adopting a coaxing tone, "you have scolded quite enough, so do take a more reasonable view of the affair! It began, as I dare say Dora has told you, through an accidental rencontre in the shrubberies. I found her a charming companion, and she—well, she liked me, and was too naïve to attempt to conceal it; and so, almost imperceptibly, the intimacy has progressed, till we have fallen over head and ears in love with each other, and have resolved to risk all, but never be parted. I shall be sorry to bring disunion or dissension into a noble family; but I will not relinquish the hope of calling Eudora mine!"

"And her father?" he was asked. "Do you forget him? Does she?"

"Of course, she owes obedience to the earl, and if he insists on keeping us apart till she is of age, we must submit; but after that time his authority ceases. I regret, on Eudora's account, that I am not the fortunate possessor of a few thousands a year; but why should money be weighed against happiness? If Lord Chessington will procure me a colonial appointment, I can take my bride abroad till all scandal has died away; or we could travel a while till the earl felt inclined to join us."

"He will never consent, Mark!" Eda exclaimed. "How can you hope it? How could you go to the kind old man, who has been so good to both of us, and say, 'I am doing my best to make you miserable. I am requiting your generosity by doing my utmost to rob you of your only child'?"

"I certainly shall not put my request in that form of words," he retorted, drily. "And if you will oblige me by holding your tongue and knowing nothing, I dare say I shall manage matters very well. You can play your favourite part, the peacemaker, when the storm bursts."

"Mark!" cried Eda, catching hold of his arm, and gasping for breath, "you are not going to persuade Lady Eudora to marry you secretly?"

"And if I were, what then?"

"It would be frightfully dishonourable! You must not—you shall not do it!"

"Shall not, Eda?" and he knit his brows in displeasure. "I did not say that I intended doing anything of the kind; but whatever I do, I forbid your interference."

"It would not be acting fairly by Eudora," he asserted. "Nothing shall induce me to desert her. And really, Eda, you could not say more if I were some disreputable scoundrel whom the Chessingtons would be ashamed to acknowledge. I am of respectable parentage; my abilities are so good that they will have no trouble in pushing me on in the world; and I flatter myself that in every respect but money I am the superior of St. Orme. If they are willing to give their daughter to a fellow who hasn't half a dozen ideas in his head, they need not make a fuss if she prefers taking me instead."

"Mr. St. Orme has the fear of God before his eyes," said Eda, warmly; "and if he loved Eudora ever so dearly, he would not ask her to be his wife without the full consent of her parents. He would feel that a marriage entered upon under such circumstances could neither be a holy nor happy one."

"Then he is well named; but as I am not a saint, I prefer to do as any other man would who was similarly placed—grasp the prize fortune has placed within my reach."

"But is it right? Can you do it with a clear conscience?" Eda persisted. "Dear, dear Mark, do put these questions to yourself. What will it profit you to gain the whole world, and lose——"

She was rudely interrupted. "Don't cant, Eda. You haven't had much experience, certainly, but I should have thought you had learned by this time the impossibility of always keeping so close to the line. Pray say no more, for I have neither time nor inclination to listen. All we ask of you is to be silent; and if you will not help us, why, do nothing to our injury. You will promise this?"

"First tell me if you intend to see Lord Chessington at once, and make him acquainted with your position with regard to Lady Eudora."

"At once? No. I am not prepared to speak to the earl yet!" Mark confessed, after some hesitation, and an effort to evade the question altogether.

Eda's dread that a clandestine marriage was in contemplation revived.

"You will not speak to him? Then I will. I shall go to him as soon as I leave you, and, telling all I have learned, bid him save his daughter from the consequences of her own folly!"

"You cannot be serious, Eda!" exclaimed the angry Mark. "Would you ruin me?"

"Would you have me stand by and see the child of my benefactors plunge herself into misery? I would do a great deal for you, my dear brother, but I cannot burden my soul with such a sin as this."

Really alarmed at her determination, Mark entreated, threatened, and painted in powerful colours the despair of Lady Eudora if they were forcibly separated: but his eloquence was wasted; he could not move Eda from her purpose.

"No," she answered to his expostulations; "I am very well aware that nothing I can do or say will alter what has gone by, and I am sorry that your secret has been revealed to me. I would rather have remained in ignorance, than be ashamed of my brother and my friend. But having discovered it, my duty is clear, and I shall certainly do it."

"Can it be a sister's duty to destroy my happiness and blight my prospects?" Mark demanded; and Eda's tears began to flow again. Seeing this, he followed up the fancied advantage, and, with many caresses, entreated her to take time to consider, and not do anything that could bring trouble on others from a mistaken sense of the obligations she was lying under to the earl and countess.

"It is not you who will suffer by this revelation," he added, insidiously. "You will be applauded for making it, by some, even if you are despised by others. It is Eudora and I who will be the injured parties; whereas, if you let us take our own course, all might be well."

"Might!" Eda incredulously repeated; though she consented to give the matter serious consideration before she carried out her original intention. Mark looked relieved, and tried to extort a still more definite promise; but in this he failed. All his plausible speeches—and he made many—had not blinded her to the fact that his suit was a wrong and an insult to the parents of the infatuated girl who was the object of it; and she broke away from him even more dissatisfied and unhappy than when she first learned that Eudora had pledged herself to be his wife.

CHAPTER XXII.

EDA excused herself from going down-stairs again that evening, for she could neither bear to meet Eudora nor her parents; and, turning the key in the door, that the former might not gain entrance, she strove to decide what to do. For some time her sense of right and wrong was confused, for Mark's entreating voice was still resounding in her ears, and she loved him so dearly that the idea of doing him any serious injury was a grievous one. Then the temptation assailed her to obey his injunction—to be blind and deaf to what was going on, and let him marry Eudora secretly, as he purposed doing. He had said with truth that, as far as outward appearance went, the earl and countess would have no reason to be ashamed of such a son-in-law; and there was no doubt that he would step into wealth and position with an ease and confidence that would go far towards reconciling the world to the incongruity of such a match.

Eda pondered and prayed till her head ached, and still without coming to any solution of her perplexities. Sometimes she felt strongly inclined to pack up a few necessaries, and take flight. The Ingles would receive her with open arms, and she could stay with them till this clandestine affair came to a climax, and comfort herself in being relieved from any further responsibilities; but every personal consideration was forgotten whenever her thoughts reverted to the earl and countess. Running away from her own difficulties would not lessen theirs, nor prevent their daughter taking a false step. And so the end of every mental debate was the same:—"I must speak to Eudora's parents. It is right that they should be informed of the engagement she has entered into, and I must not let any selfish anxieties as to the result deter me from doing my duty."

She looked at her watch—Lord Chessington's gift—and was not sorry to see that the hour was so late that every one in the house had most probably retired to rest. The dreaded interview could not, then, be sought until the morrow, when Mark himself might be more reasonable, and agree to her wishes. But scarcely had Eda began to cherish this visionary hope, when she heard a step approaching her door; and the next moment she heard the earl himself requesting admittance.

Imagining directly that all was known, she opened her door, looking so ghastly with fear and shame that her visitor was quite concerned.

"What is the matter with you, Miss Granton? Sit down, sit down, child. You are ill; I am sure of it. My lady fancied you were, and could not make up her mind to go to rest till some one had ascertained what ailed you. I shall fetch her."

But Eda, who had dropped into the nearest chair, started up to prevent it, and held out her hand so imploringly, that he paused, and regarded her with astonishment.

"Is this illness, or trouble? Don't be afraid to speak, my dear. But perhaps you would rather see Lady Chessington."

No. The countess was in delicate health, and any sudden shock might bring on a relapse. Eda retained sufficient presence of mind to remember this, and falter that her ladyship must not be told too hastily.

"Then it is something about Eudera!" the fond father exclaimed. "But she is well, and sleeping soundly. Her mother went into her room and looked at her just now. What is it you know or fear, Miss Granton? Don't hesitate, but tell me bravely the whole truth, and I will help you, if I can."

Eda obeyed; but how she framed her sad story she never knew, for the darkening face of her hearer, and the sternness of the eyes which seemed to read her very soul, frightened her so much that she could scarcely stand before him.

"Your brother is secretly paying his addresses to my daughter! And pray how long has this been going on? When were you first seized with remorse for your share in these disgraceful proceedings?"

Eda would not pause to vindicate herself, but hurriedly replied to his first question—"I fear that it has been going on for some time, and that your lordship's immediate interference is necessary. Oh, sir, they are both young and inconsiderate; be merciful in your judgment! Deal gently with them!"

At first Lord Chessington did not answer, but in his agitation he had dropped the china candlestick he carried, and Eda saw that he was unconsciously grinding the fragments beneath his heel.

"Is it a mere boy and girl flirtation, entered into in sport and idleness, or is it something worse?" he asked presently, his voice so hoarse and changed that it was not recognisable. "Does this brother of yours think I shall let him marry Lady Eudora? Speak, I say! Let me have nothing withheld, now you have begun to make confession!"

"Lady Eudora herself told me that she was resolved to marry Mark," Eda tremblingly acknowledged.

"Will she tell me so? Will she dare tell me so?" demanded the infuriated earl. And he was striding away to his daughter's chamber to arouse and interrogate her, when Lady Chessington, white as the robe de chambre she had wrapped around her, stole forward and threw herself in his way, with supplicating looks and gestures.

"Not to-night, dear John—dear husband! She is sleeping; do not awaken her with angry looks and words! She is our only child; let us have patience with her!"

"You do not know!" he gasped.

"Yes," was the sorrowful reply; "I have been here long enough to learn that a very great misfortune threatens us. Is this your doing, Eda?"

"Oh, madam!" was all the troubled girl could say; but the indignant protest her voice and look conveyed was sufficient to exonerate her, and the countess held out her hand, touched already with remorse for her unjust suspicion.

"My good girl, if I have done you injustice, pray pardon me!" she kindly said; and when the earl would have questioned Eda again, she whispered—"Spare her, John! The young man is her brother, and she suffers terribly when she is forced to accuse him. Help me back to my room, for I am growing faint; and to-morrow Eudora herself shall confess the extent of her fault."

Eda timidly offered her assistance, but the offer was rejected by the earl, who still regarded her with distrust, and desired, in the sharp tones of ill-repressed anger, that she would confine herself to her chamber for the present, and not attempt to hold intercourse with any one in the house. She promised to obey, and then, with sinking heart, watched him as he sustained the feeble steps of his lady while she re-crossed the gallery.

When a closing door had hidden them from her sight, Eda went back to her chamber, but not to rest. Opening her shutters, and folding a shawl about her, she sat watching for the dawn of the morrow whose events would be so full of grave importance to herself; but when it came, and the sunshine flooded her room, she shrank from it, and would fain have hidden herself from every living creature. It was a relief that no one invaded her seclusion but the servant, who brought her some breakfast, and stayed to put things in order, looking the while extremely inquisitive as to the cause of her sorrowful silence.

Soon after mid-day the same girl came to beg Miss Granton to go to Lady Chessington in her dressing-room, and with beating heart Eda obeyed.

She found both the earl and countess awaiting her, and with them was Lady Eudora, whose stormy looks testified to the nature of the conference her parents had been holding with her. In the face of this great trouble the husband and wife appeared to have changed characters. It was Lady Chessington who was now the more tender and indulgent to her wayward child, while her lord—all his supineness cast aside—seemed bent on showing that he could be firm as well as kind, when an absolute necessity arose for stringent measures.

"Eda, my daughter has exonerated you from all blame in this sad affair——" the countess began to say; but Eudora impatiently broke in—

"Pray, mamma, don't take that doleful tone! I cannot consent to hear my engagement alluded to as if it ought to be grieved over. No objection can be offered to it but Mr. Granton's want of money, and that is one papa can remove, if he will."

The earl scarcely had patience to hear her out. "Are you expressing Mr. Granton's opinions or your own," he asked, "when you hint that I am expected to provide him with the means to consummate one of the greatest pieces of audacity an ungrateful girl and knavish young fellow ever contemplated?"

Eudora bit her lip, and reddened. "You express yourself very strangely, papa! Of course, Mark does not wish anything unreasonable, but would not refuse an appointment under Government, if you procured him one."

"To do which I must give him a recommendation setting forth that his conduct in my house has been praiseworthy, that I have the greatest faith in his honour, &c. Can I do this?"

Eudora fell back upon her former argument. "It is no sin for us to love each other! We have not done so wilfully. If Mark were a rich man instead of a poor one you would not withhold your consent; and surely, papa, my happiness ought to be of more consequence to you than money!"

"My dear child, what you say might have weight with me if I were sure that I should be furthering your happiness by consenting to this match; but at present you have failed to convince me that Mr. Granton is the kind of man to whom I ought to entrust my daughter."

"Because you are prejudiced against him. But Eda will tell you that his life has been a blameless one; that he has been the best of sons and brothers."

"Can Eda endorse this?" asked the countess. "Does she think that her brother has acted well? No, I can see by her looks that she does not."

"I wonder at you for appealing to her, mamma, after she has shown her bias by so meanly betraying us!" exclaimed Eudora, with an inconsistency that under other circumstances would have been ludicrous. "Mark has no friend here but myself; but I will be true to him—I will, I will!"

This declaration was followed by a burst of hysterical sobs; and the countess leaned back on her sofa, sad and weary, while Lord Chessington thoughtfully paced the room until his refractory daughter grew calm again.

"Eudora, it is no use to keep going over the same ground, or to dwell upon your deceit and disobedience. You are inflated with a false notion that you are behaving very nobly in keeping the promises you have made to this young man, and what we suffer in consequence you choose to ignore. Hush, child! you may as well spare me any protestations. The question is simply this: Will you obey me, and decline all further intimacy with Mr. Granton?"

"I cannot, papa!" she answered, excitedly. "I know that I committed a great error in entering upon this engagement without your sanction; but I cannot alter it now. As long as Mark is true to me, I will be true to him."

"But if he proves himself unworthy of you—what then?"

"He will not, sir!" she answered, positively. "You do not know him as well as I do."

"We shall see," the earl told her—"we shall soon see, Eudora, for I am going to put him to the test." And as Eda heard this, involuntarily she grew pale, and shivered. How would Mark pass through the ordeal to which he was about to be subjected?

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. FIRST SERIES No. 11. THE LAST OF ST. PETER.

Chapters to be read—Acts ix., xii. (parts of.)

INTRODUCTION. Ask which apostle had taken the lead hitherto. To whom has he first preached? Where had he been sent with John, and on what errand? (viii. 14.) Now, having finished his tour in Samaria, St. Peter visits all the Churches, and in the course of time comes to Lydda and Joppa. Show Joppa on the map, and describe it as a bustling seaport town, and Lydda a little country village. What work was there for St. Peter here?

I. ST. PETER'S MIRACLES. (Read ix. 32—43.) Describe the bedridden man Æneas: how long kept his bed? his anxiety whether the great apostle will come and see him; the visit and straightforward words. The same name powerful here as elsewhere, the name above all names (Phil. ii. 10). The same thing required of the sick man; the same effect produced in the place; the whole village stirred, and turned to Christ.

Now describe the death of Dorcas, and notice these points:—(1) She was unselfish, not thinking of her own loss, but of the wants of others poorer and more unhappy than herself. (2) She was useful. What did she do? Having much spare time, spent it in needlework, not merely for adorning herself, but in clothes for the poor. Remind of Christ's words about such in parable of sheep and goats (Matt. xxv. 36). (3) She was beloved. Like the widow of Nain, had many friends who mourned her loss. She was not disagreeable in the way she did good. Now question upon the miracle. St. Peter, like Elijah on similar occasions (1 Kings xvii. 19), must be alone. This special miracle required special prayer, and the widow was raised to life.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) The blessing of usefulness. Let each child ask, What am I doing for others? Can imitate Dorcas, and make something for some poor child. Smallest deed done for Christ accepted by Him. (2) The way to make friends. Kindness, acts and words of love, sure to win friends. How pleasant to be missed when we are gone!

II. ST. PETER IN PRISON. (Read xii. 1—5.) (1) The prison. Ask how the father of this Herod had persecuted Christ (Matt. ii. 13). Now the son does the same to the Christians. Whom was he really persecuting? (Acts x. 4.) Which disciple was first killed? Remind of the question asked Christ by the mother of James and John (Matt. xx. 21), and how these two and Peter had been always singled out by Christ as if for special discipline. A break up in a family party always sad, this more so; one apostle dead, another in prison, and he the one they could spare the least, bold, full of faith, doing most wonderful miracles. What can his friends do? Entreaties no use, force no use—no, but One on High, mightier than all; so they can pray. Let as many Christians as possible meet at Jerusalem; at whose house? (ver. 12) and hold a meeting for prayer. (2) The deliverance. (Read 6—11.) Picture the scene: large stone building, surrounded by two sets of walls, each guarded by party of four soldiers; St. Peter in innermost cell, dark and gloomy, damp streaming down the walls, little light from narrow grating, lying on stone floor, bound by chains to two soldiers. How should we expect him to feel? sad, complaining, &c.? No; has said evening prayer, left his cause with God, and is sleeping quietly, like a little child. Now suddenly awoke; bright light in cell—what is it? the Paschal moon?—a light as of men come to fetch him for execution suddenly, like John the Baptist? Seems a soft bright light, and a bright face of some one speaking. Picture him, in answer to the summons, rising up quickly, the chains dropping off, putting on his clothes and sandals, fearful of disturbing the sleeping soldiers, stepping lightly over them, following the angel, half asleep and half awake, fancying it a dream, right through the gate, past all the sleeping soldiers, till finds himself at bottom of street, alone. (3) The news told. Where will he at once go? Of course, to tell his friends. Picture him hurriedly running to Mark's house; knocks loudly, stands waiting impatiently for the maid to come; knocks again; at last Rhoda comes; cannot believe her eyes; slams the door in his face, and goes in with the news. What did they say? And yet had been praying for his deliverance! St. Peter knocks again; door opened; they surround him, with questions; are told to be silent; he tells his story; sends messengers to different companies of Christians, and also goes himself. It is true, and Peter is safe.

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Need of faith in prayer. They prayed and yet did not look for the answer. Children must pray for grace to overcome temper, check hastiness, &c., and must expect answer. (2) God's care of His own people. Had still work for Peter to do, so preserved him. James having finished work, taken to rest. So need not trouble about future; are all in God's hands; will be kept safe in life or death.

Questions to be answered.

1. What were the two miracles wrought by Peter?
2. Describe the character of Dorcas.
3. What lessons does her life teach us?
4. Describe Peter's deliverance.
5. How did he bear his imprisonment?
6. What practical lessons may we learn?

FANNY FORREST; OR, EVIL COMMUNICATIONS.

CHAPTER I.

THE sun was high up in the afternoon sky, a blue haze of heat was slowly creeping over the distant horizon, casting a vapoury veil over all its outlines, and blending them into one indistinct mass, as Owen Campbell, stepping out from beneath the linen awning in front of Mr. Howard's establishment, printer and stationer to the little town of Bentham, closed the door of the side entrance with a contented slam, and with scarcely a glance at the beautiful scene stretched below him, began with quick steps to ascend the steep and narrow street which formed the principal thoroughfare of the town.

In such a small and out-of-the-world locality as that in which Bentham is situated one is obliged, reluctantly though it be, to give up all idea of living a life unnoticed or uncommented upon by one's neighbours; indeed, on the contrary, one has to become indifferent to the fact that the smallest and most inconsiderable events of one's daily life are gathered together by our neighbours and speculated upon greedily by those whose engagements are not sufficiently arduous to keep hands and eyes busily employed on their own affairs, and who therefore pass their leisure moments in following the pursuits of their companions with gaping and often mischievous curiosity.

Thus it was that, as Owen appeared in the High Street of Bentham at such an unwontedly early hour of the day, betraying by his holiday dress and beaming countenance that business formed no part of his errand, many of the good townsfolk came from behind their counters, and stood in their doorways to watch him, as he passed along, whistling cheerily to himself; and more than one dame, as he nedded to her pleasantly on his way, wished him a good day, throwing out at the same time a jest or a compliment, to lure him on to conversation.

But, kindly as their intentions were, and innocent though their curiosity in this instance might be, Owen seemed in no way inclined to notice them, or dally on his way. Right up the narrow street he went, and from thence, by many a short cut through humbler entrances to the town, out upon the dusty highway; and it was not till this too had been left behind, and he had turned through lanes and meadow by-paths to a considerable height above the town, that at last he stopped, and, turning round, drew in with one long steady glance, the rare beauty of the landscape stretched before him.

Straight down below him now lay the little town of Bentham, nestling under its weather-beaten cliffs and old ruined castle, separated from him only by the meadow-lands through which he had just passed, in whose hedges trailed the graceful pink-and-white convolvulus and sweet-smelling eglantine. The spires of the churches, and the roofs of the quaint gabled houses, were glittering in the bright sunshine, and up the narrow almost perpendicular streets Owen could just distinguish the strong patient horses toiling along, with careful steps, beneath their burdens; and there to the right stood the bridge spanning with its graceful arches the river below, where fishing-smacks and trawling-vessels, and other craft of more ambitious make also, lay clustered together in picturesque confusion, the sun sparkling on them from off the rippling water, making each spar or mast, each red sail or fluttering piece of canvas, add its share to the general beauty of the scene.

But away to the left there was spread out a wilder view, and one which it would seem Owen enjoyed with even a keener appreciation, as, leaning forward, with his arm thrown round a branch of a tree beside him, he gazed out over the ever-widening river, to the broad expanse of ocean further off, where, even on this glorious summer day, the white-crowned waves were dashing themselves against the rocky shore, or breaking in long lines of surf upon the pebbly beach beyond.

It was not often that the lad had such an afternoon as this, which may account, perhaps, for the amount of pleasure it seemed to afford him. The town of Bentham might seem a sleepy enough locality to those accustomed to the traffic and roar and noisy bustle of our manufacturing towns; yet, for all that, business was rife within it, and holidays—or even half-holidays—fell rarely enough to the lot of those who, like Owen, held places of any responsibility.

It had come to him now as the well-merited reward of patient and untiring industry. After long summer days had been spent uncomplainingly within the shop, and long twilight evenings had been passed as uncomplainingly in other duties imposed upon him, he had been given at last this summer afternoon to himself, to wander out where he chose, and rejoice to his heart's content in the pure air and calm lengthening twilight. He had been given, too, to carry with him in his heart, and to add their sweetness to the rest, words of high praise and commendation, and expressions of confidence, from his employer; and it was now the remembrance of these words stirring within him which made Owen smile pleasantly to himself, as he withdrew his eyes at length from the scene before him, and turned his steps towards the more inland situation of his home.

It was a picturesque home certainly that to which Owen was wending his way, though humble enough as regarded either outward or inward decoration. It was remarkable only for its curious irregular gables, its dwarfed chimneys and old-fashioned windows set far in under the sloping roof, its wooden galleries added in imitation of foreign style, its roses and sweet clematis, which, with clinging tendrils, had clambered to the very eaves.

Owen's father, and his father before him, had held the situation of head gardener to Squire Taunton, whose lands stretched far beyond Bentham to the distant downs; and here, in this rustic lodge, with its bright patch of flower-garden in front, its bee-hives, its little pebbly stream trickling through moss and ferns behind the house, Owen had spent all the earlier years of his life, till such time as, rather to his father's disappointment, he preferred to leave these rural scenes to join the more stirring life within the town.

Owen, as he walked along through the green oat-fields—where here and there the scarlet poppy thrust up its glowing visage, boldly asserting its right to attract the attention of the passer-by—pictured to himself over and over again the glad smile of astonished welcome with which his father would greet him as he opened the rustic gate and surprised him at his evening meal, the effusion with which his sister Ruth would fall upon him, and forgetting the should-be decorum of her years, half strangle him with her embraces; and as Owen thought of this, he could not but think too of the sweet face and gentle voice which, could they have been restored to him, would have hailed his advent with even a tenderer love, and have welcomed him with yet more loving gesture. But this could never be again; two or three years ago the last good-bye had been spoken between the mother and her son, the last embrace had been taken; and thus it was that, in the first outbreak of his grief, all contentment and satisfaction in his previous life seemed to have been taken away when she was taken too, till at last, with an effort scarcely understood or appreciated by any, he broke through all previous habits and associations, and exchanged for the country life of his earlier years the monotonous and weariful routine of a stationer's apprentice.

He was a pleasant-looking lad, any one, without even a parent's partiality, would have said, as he strode along—a lad with an open, smiling countenance, broad, rather high-shouldered figure, and easy, pliant limbs, giving him but little trouble to vault the stiles and low wooden gates which marked the fields from one another. There were not many more to cross now before the well-known lane leading with familiar windings to his home, and Owen's keen eyes were already on the watch on the chance of seeing a certain brown straw hat, with a face as bright and open as his own beneath it, peering, according to the wont of his sister Ruth, for visionary treasures amongst the wild flowers in the hedges or in the deep mossy ditches below them.

But as he laid his hand lightly on the rung of the last stile it was certainly not Ruth's cheery voice which fell upon his ear, in such pitiful cadence that Owen could not but stop to listen.

"Fanny, Fanny!" wailed a little child's voice close beside him, though the speaker was hidden by the thick green leafing of the hedge—"Fanny, where are you? Come back, do; you told my mammy that you'd bring me home quite safe, and now you've left me all alone, and I'm afraid!" And fresh sobs testified to the sincerity of the words.

Owen waited no longer; it was not in his nature to listen unmoved to such a complaint without coming to the rescue, and springing across the wooden stile, he found himself in close companionship with a little mortal whose tear-dabbled face and frightened gestures called upon Owen's charity for assistance.

But as he came suddenly forward the child, who had before made his complaint so loudly, failing to perceive in him a protector from his fears, now only crouched still further back beneath the hedge, and, with a still more piercing cry, again called to Fanny for relief.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

61. Of what people is it said that they could "sling a stone at a hair breadth?"

62. By whom was Jericho rebuilt, and what prophecy was then fulfilled?

63. Quote the passage in which Elisha calls Ahab a "murderer."

64. Who is it calls Jesus "the Shepherd and Bishop" of souls?

65. To whom does St. Paul write, "Prepare me also a lodging?"

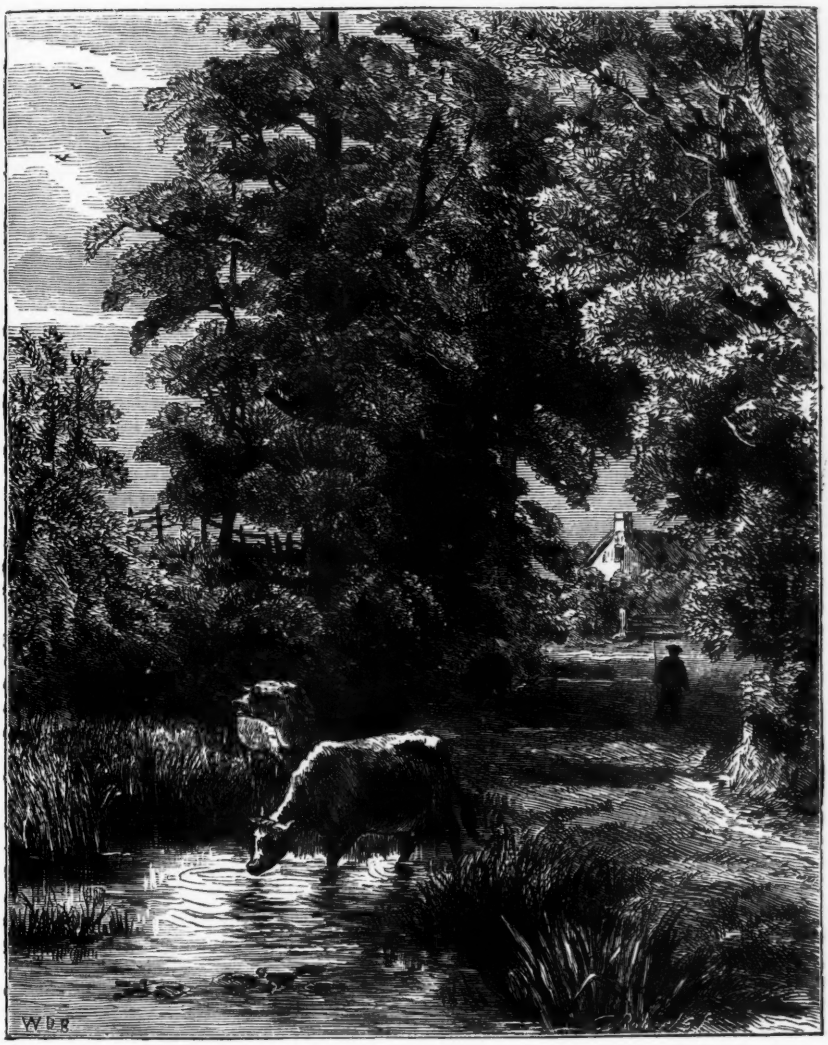
66. What persons are mentioned as being able to use both the right hand and the left in hurling stones and shooting arrows?"

67. Where is Moses stated to have been a "very meek" man?

68. How many cities were given to the Levites for their use?"

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 144.

49. Thrice—1, St. Matt. xxi. 5—Zech. ix. 9; 2, St. Matt. xxvi. 31—Zech. xiii. 7; 3, St. Matt. xxvii. 9—Zech. xi. 12, 13.



50. Ezek. iv. 2.

51. Isa. v. 7; Ps. lxxx. 8—15.

52. 1, When Jesus prayed for St. Peter (St. Luke xxii. 31, 32); 2, when He interceded for His Church (St. John xvii.); 3, when on the cross He prayed for His murderers (St. Luke xxiii. 34).

53. Because God had said to the Israelites, "Ye shall henceforth return no more that way" (Deut. xvii. 16).

54. In the purchase of the field of Machpelah by Abraham (Gen. xxiii. 16.)

(Drawn by W. D. Blatchley.)

TRANQUILLITY.

LYING far down 'midst sheltered vale,
A pleasant pool half-hid by trees,
Surfaced with lilies pure and pale,
Soft-rippled by the summer breeze,

With sedgy fringe of soughing reeds,
Protecting from the outer life,
Save where one well-worn pathway leads
To human labour, human strife:

A spot well loved by lowing herds,
So cool, so free from all unrest;
Save carollings of warbling birds,
Or chirpings from some little nest,
No sound disturbs the placid calm,
Or breaks the silence soft and low—
A scene that acts like soothing balm
On spirits torn by bitter woe.

As this fair spot on Nature's face
So are the lives of some good men:
Hid far away in quiet place,
Beyond the reach of this world's ken,
They live a calm and placid life,
In harmony of peace and love;
Far from the busy scenes of strife,
They contemplate the life above.
And thinkest thou that men like these
Have not their mission here below?
As flowers that scent the summer breeze,
They purify the deepest woe;
'Tis theirs to cheer the fainting heart,
To soothe the sad and weary breast,
And in their lives to show a part
Of the bright future's heavenly rest.

G. WEATHERLY.

EDWARD TURNER, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.

BY AGNES MACDONELL, AUTHOR OF "MARTIN'S VINEYARD."

CHAPTER XI.

LONDON AGAIN, AND A DAWNING HOPE.

"The day begins to break, and night is fled, Whose pitchy mantle over-veiled the earth."

SO nearly six months went by. One evening, as I was giving the last orders to the men, and about to leave the workshop, I met Charlie Brereton in the doorway. He was changed since his long illness—thinner and paler. He was well dressed, and looked, I thought, just like a gentleman, as, after we had shaken hands, he stood leaning against the bench. Was it any wonder Barbara preferred him to a plain fellow like me?

"I am going up to Mr. Smith's to night," he said; "but I wanted to see you, Ned, and came here first. Cannot we sit down here a while? I have something to say to you."

"Come to my room," I answered, "it is but a step from here, and you can rest there, and we can talk easier than here."

"Yes," he said; "that will do. I am quite tired with walking up from the station. I am not up to my old mark yet, you see," he said, with a faint smile.

He raised himself, a little weakly, from leaning against the bench, and slipped his arm through mine. So we walked up the street together. He made no remark on anything by the way. I asked him how his uncle was.

"Oh, very well," he said; "but stop a bit till we get into the house; I cannot talk in this noise."

It was strange to hear Charlie Brereton speak in that way of the London streets. When I got to my room I lit the fire, and while I got some tea ready he sat in the easy chair, with his head lying wearily back and his eyes on the fire. I could see not only in his face, but by the look of his hands, as they lay on the arms of the chair, that he was worn, and bore the marks of his great suffering.

I thought something was on his mind, too, and I wondered what he had to tell me. I thought I knew what it must be; and all these months I had been making up my mind to bear it; but I wished he would speak out and not keep looking into the fire, as if I were not there. Suddenly he said, "Ned, I have come to tell you that I am going abroad."

"Abroad!" I said, thinking I had not heard him rightly.

"Yes; the doctor says I ought to have a sea voyage to set me up again, and so I've made up my mind to go to America, and I am going pretty soon."

"I hope it will do you good," I said. "I hope it will do you good with all my heart! You've had a bad shaking; but, dear me, I never thought to see you looking as well as this the last time I saw you!" I felt so confused with the strangeness of the news that I scarce knew what to say.

"Yes; the doctor says it is the best thing for me. I have got over the hurts and the broken bones; but the shock, you see, has left a sort of general weakness, which only a change of climate will clear off. Uncle has held back from the plan of my going for a good while, but he is content now, seeing the doctor speaks so strong about it; and the thing I came to speak to you particularly about now Ned, is a plan I've got. You see, uncle will want a partner in the shop at Birchfield in my place, and I want him to take you. In many ways you'll suit the business better than ever I should; all your experience here will tell finely down there."

"But you're coming back again to England," I said, still confused with the sudden change things seemed to have taken all in a few moments. "You'll be back before six months are over as strong and well as ever."

"I can't say, Ned, how that may be; I haven't made up my mind. I am going to start a fresh life in America. I have thought a great deal about this while I have had to lie still and do nothing. When I was lying at the cottage, thinking I should never live to get up again, I saw things in a different light, and my own life in a different light, Ned; and, that's one thing I wanted to say," he said, and turned his face towards me, as it lay against the back of the chair.

"You have been very good to me, Ned. I don't mean only that you saved my life, you know. I heard all about how you got me out of that burning carriage the other day. I made Ann tell me, and she—she is as good as you are, Ned; well, but I mean you've been good to me in many ways, when you didn't know it, or mean it perhaps either, altogether. You kept me straight when I might have gone worse than I did——"

I tried to stop him by saying I took blame to myself in many things; and then I spoke again about his coming back to England.

"Yes," he said, "there are many things that will always keep my thoughts here, and never let me forget England; and if my health 's restored, well, you will find me back again, perhaps, to see if my old friends remember me."

"There'll be some that won't forget you," I said; and then I made up my mind to speak out plain, and let him feel that he might trust me as an honourable man, not to intermeddle, if there was anything between him and Barbara; so I said, "Charlie, I was looking for different news from you when you came in than this about your going abroad. And now, let me say, if there 's anything betwixt you and Barbara Milton, why tell me plainly; for her sake, and yours, and mine, it will be better."

I saw how his face flushed as he looked away, I think because his mind went back to that evening of our own quarrel, and said, "No, Ned, no. I was a fool then; half set on to act out my folly because I saw it vexed you. She 's pretty enough to make a man forget himself perhaps, but she 's good enough and clever enough to set him right too. She laughed, and was pleasant with me, but her heart was as cool to me as a winter's day."

I could not find any words to answer this. I wanted to be alone to think of all they meant; and Charlie, seeming shy too, began to talk about the Birchfield plan and of my going there, and as we talked I found, though old Brereton was willing enough to take me as his partner, the scheme was Charlie's in the beginning and the end. When I said something about seeing all this, he laughed in his old way, and said, "Oh, it will suit my uncle to a T to have you back again, and you will do my work again, you see, as you used to do, only you'll do it by the day now, and not by the piece, you see."

I got holiday for half a day, and went down with Charlie Brereton to the ship, and saw him sail. We parted almost like brothers, and the last words he spoke were, "There's nothing that will be so pleasant to me in the distant place I'm going as to hear of any good fortune that may befall you; and tell them at Birchfield that I'll never forget them—your mother and Ann, who have been like a mother and sister to me, and brought me through more than bodily illness. God bless them! I shall never think of Barbara any more except as your wife, Ned."

Those were the last words he said.

(To be concluded.)

"WITHIN THE VAIL."

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC., ETC.

"With Me in Paradise."—ST. LUKE xxiii. 43.

THESE words of our Lord, in answer to the prayer of the penitent thief on the cross, contain much that is instructive, and suggest more, regarding the life of the departed in the home of the blessed. What a wonderful transition from the environments, trials, and imperfections of time to the inheritance of the saints in light! To us on this side, notwithstanding the thinness of the vail between, the change is inconceivable; and the experience of the soul who, by the conquest of death, has passed through the gates into the celestial city, is that of which we can have no adequate idea. Yet, from the statements of Scripture, we get glimpses of the coming glory, well calculated to inspire and intensify our hope, to encourage us to live in the present for the future, and to throw back a glowing light on our pilgrimage through this world.

The sphere of this future life is here designated by the great Teacher as Paradise. This is a word of Persian origin, signifying a park or garden, and taken, doubtless, from the designation of the first beauteous and happy abode of man in Eden, from which he was banished on account of his sin. The term seems to be topographical, and to suggest the idea of actual locality; but, as we are not informed where the place is, it is vain for us to speculate about it. The earthly Paradise, attractive with the freshness and variety of its new-created verdure, life, and beauty, was but a faint type of the scenery and splendour of the promised land of glory. We may be well assured that "Paradise lost" was not to be compared with what "Paradise regained" will be. St. Paul tells us of one, doubtless referring to himself, who was caught up into Paradise, which he explains as being caught up into the third heaven, where he heard "unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter" (2 Cor. xii. 2—4). There blossoms the tree of life, the fruit of which the Saviour gives to every one who overcomes in the conflict with sin; for it is "in the midst of the Paradise of God" (Rev. ii. 7). There need be no question, then, that by Paradise Christ meant the present home of holy and redeemed souls, where "the spirits of the just made perfect" dwell in the fullest felicity, and amid unfading resplendence.

It is to be observed, moreover, that our Lord's words to the dying thief, To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise, make no allusion to any future probation, and entirely exclude the idea of purgatorial fire. Even the penitent thief passed at once, through faith in the Saviour, and with a new nature, from the penalty and suffering of a shameful death to the beauty, repose, and perfection of Paradise. It is a state of conscious existence, and of holy felicity, where every cause of sorrow is ended, and every source of grief and misery for ever dried up. Truly, then, to the Christian death is but the gateway of life—the door of entrance to the land of perfection and glory. While to us on this side, from its outward appearances, it is called a sleep, the Divine declaration here clearly announces a state of consciousness, where all the powers are awake to activity and enjoyment. The spirit of man does not, of course, reach its complete and final condition of blessedness and glory until united to the spiritual body at the resurrection; but the place of "the spirits of the just made perfect" now "waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body" is a region of conscious being, where life is perfect according to its conditions, and with all its faculties in perfect and joyous exercise. For all practical purposes here, by a process of Divine foreshortening, Scripture often speaks of the future life—the intermediate state, and the condition after the resurrection as a completed whole. "Absent from the body," the saint is "present with the Lord." St. Paul says to the Philippians that he had "a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better." Victory is better than conflict, fruition better than hope, the rest of heaven better than the toils and trials of the pilgrimage, and home better than the way to it. We may look at life "within the vail," life in Paradise, a little more minutely, learning both from the intimations of Scripture and from the powers and possessions of our life here; for death does not change our human character, nor destroy our personal identity. It will be life in the absence of all that can depress its energy, or shorten its existence—life in the enjoyment of all that can minister to its glory and promote its triumph.

These words of Christ to the penitent thief—"Thou shalt be with Me," as well as the teaching of the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, and the presence of Moses and Elijah at the transfiguration of the Saviour, clearly indicate that life "within the vail" is a state of full consciousness and perfect blessedness. Hence we are sure that the departed Christian has carried with him into the unseen all the powers and attributes of his redeemed manhood, to be exercised in perfection for ever. Humanity fallen and redeemed will have a glory and resplendence higher and brighter than unfallen and untried it could have had, and will have experiences and felicities in its victorious condition impossible to it if it had never been tempted and had never sinned. Look at some of the attributes of our nature here.

1. For instance: We are sensible creatures, having the capacity of receiving impressions from external objects. Here, in our present condition, this endowment is connected with our bodily organisation; but we cannot suppose that life in Paradise will be deprived of all instruction and impression from objects beyond ourselves. Even in the intermediate state there will be modes and means of conveying delight to "the spirits of the just made perfect," equivalent to the bodily senses here. We are related in time to an external world, which supplies us with many sources of enjoyment, and many means of improvement. What contributions of delight does the eye afford in the varieties of form, of colour, of motion; in the beauties of creation, and the grandeurs of the empyrean! How constantly and largely are we indebted to the ear for the pleasures of melody, the harmonies of sound, the utterances of eloquence and love! And shall we not see and hear in the Paradise of God? Assuredly we shall; of what avail else the sights of glory, and the songs of heaven, of which we read in Scripture? The saint in the fulness of the future life is not to be "unclothed, but clothed upon;" and "the body of this vileness," redeemed as well as the soul, is to be exchanged at last for a spiritual body, in which all the energies and exercises of our sensible nature will be perfected, all that is mortal and corruptible for ever left, and the soul amid scenes and circumstances where there will be nothing to clog its enjoyment, embarrass its action, or cloud its vision any more. "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens" (2 Cor. v. 1). What scenes of glory and beauty will meet the eye, what sounds of melody and song will greet the ear, what marvels of experience will thrill the soul, the future must reveal; but the capability of such enjoyments, free from all present imperfection and infirmity, will assuredly belong to us.

2. We are rational creatures, with the powers of intellect and imagination, of thought and will; and these powers will go with us into the mansions of our Father's house above, there to be exercised in perfection, free from all that hinders and hampers them now. The frail and fleshly tabernacle in which the spirit now dwells will have for ever ceased to depress the efforts and aspirations of the soul. On earth, notwithstanding our infirmity and imperfection, thought and imagination are sources of high delight. Here, where often "the spirit is willing but the flesh weak," the pursuit of truth, the quest of knowledge, and the exercise of our affections, yield a sacred pleasure; and will there be no equivalent in the character of our life hereafter? Certainly there will. Our consciousness, and all our faculties of reason and intelligence, will belong to us then as now, but with a purity, a power, an elasticity, and a freeness, inconceivable by us in the present state. If here the pursuit of truth, and the exercise of reason, the power of reflection, and the glow of imagination, yield us high enjoyment, what must they be to us in Paradise, where all scales have for ever fallen from the mental eye, where no cloud bedims the intellectual vision, and where we shall see and know as we are seen and known? "Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face; now we know in part; but then shall we know even as also we are known" (1 Cor. xiii. 12). It is reported of Sir Isaac Newton, that when, after years of laborious investigation, he was just about to reach a point in the discovery of truth where he could see things in the realms of science hitherto unseen and unknown, the joy of success seemed too much for him: he sat down and wept like a child! And if our intellectual powers can give us by their exercise such exquisite enjoyment here, what must it be hereafter, when we are beyond the reach of imperfection, darkness, and error? On what fields of truth, on what heights of knowledge, amidst what scenes of glory, reason, emancipated and clear, will there rejoice to roam, we cannot tell; but we may be well assured that the attributes, the works and the ways of God, will afford us ceaseless themes of study for fresh discoveries of truth, new experiences of delight, and multiplying sources of adoration and worship.

3. We are moral beings. This, in truth, is the great distinction of humanity here, and it will be the glory of our perfection hereafter. The instinct of many of the brute creation often approaches the reason of man, if it is not, indeed, to some extent identical with it; but "the spirit of man goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast goeth downward to the earth." There is no evidence of any moral quality in the beasts that perish; this is the distinction exclusively of manhood here. Our moral nature, damaged by sin, but redeemed by the blood and regenerated by the Spirit of Christ, we shall take with us into the celestial city, where its perfection will be our unfading glory. The effulgent glory of the Divine Being is His character—the glory of infinite goodness: so the highest glory of His people in their future life and home will be their moral perfection—"the glory which shall be revealed in us." Reason will no more be clouded by sin; inclination will no more war with judgment; imagination will no more be swayed by lust; and passion will no more contend with conscience—all the powers of our intellectual, moral, and emotional nature will be in happy harmony and joyous exercise. This almost surpasses our conception now; because so many elements of evil are within us and around us, but hereafter the Christian will be beyond the reach of sin and the range of Satan's dominion. Moral evil will no more have a place in his nature or a power in his life. Conscience will have perfect action; reason will have perfect light; and the heart will be filled with pure affection. To those who here fight the good fight of faith, and contend earnestly with indwelling sin, how glorious is the prospect! Into heaven there cannot enter anything that defileth, nor anything that worketh abomination, nor anything that maketh a lie. The "measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" has been reached, and the inhabitants, redeemed from the earth, have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. What a wondrous transition, what a glorious change! No error will then lead the intellect astray, no sin defile the heart, no impurity pollute the conscience. In the sublimest sense all old things will have passed away, and all things become new. The saints will be faultless before the throne of God and the Lamb, "not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing." The pure in heart alone can see God spiritually here, and commune with Him: hereafter their purity will be perfect, their communion uninterrupted and complete; and "holiness unto the Lord" will be enshrined in their being, and encircle them with glory for ever.

4. Further, we are active creatures. Incessant activity is a characteristic of life—pre-eminently of human life. Man was formed for action, and there is, perhaps, no greater misery than condemnation to complete inaction. Adam tilled and dressed the garden in the earthly Paradise before he fell, when labour was not a toil, and had not a curse connected with it. Activity is essential to true happiness on earth; and can we suppose that there will be no fitting exercise or occupation for man's emancipated powers in the world to come? We cannot suppose so; there will be activity, significant, varied, and most blessed. It is true that > "There the wicked cease from troubling,

> And the weary are at rest;"

but "the rest which remaineth" for the people of God, though sure repose as contrasted with the vexation, trouble, and toil incident to this world, will not be inactivity. The angels ever are active, "ministering spirits sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation," consecrating all their powers to the service of the Eternal King; and shall not the heirs of salvation, when they have entered on their inheritance, be active? It must be so, although we cannot tell now what services we may perform, or what works we shall accomplish, or in what ministries we may be engaged. Doubtless the activity there will be varied as it is here—varied as are the faculties and talents of Christians upon earth—varied as are the exercises and engagements of the unfallen angels now. Every power will have its fitting employment, and every saint will have his appropriate service. The law of Christ's kingdom here is, "To every man his work;" and this is surely but in preparation for the untiring service and the unwearying employments of Paradise, where the saints "serve God day and night in His temple." As kings and priests unto Him there must be service for them to perform, and occupation to enlist their sympathies and exercise all their powers. But "it doth not yet appear what we shall be;" we can know little or nothing of that higher moral state; of "that consummate condition of the soul;" of that consciousness of the full and perfect activity of all the powers and feelings, which will so largely constitute our bliss above. In faith, in hope, in patience, we wait for it, cheered by the assurance that in Christ "now we are the sons of God." Not more wonderful is the change to the infant on its entrance into this world than will be the experience of the Christian on passing through death into the Paradise of God.

5. We are social beings, made for brotherhood, formed for association with others. Although selfishness is the curse of this world, yet there would be no field for its exercise were it not for the attractions and bonds of society. Protracted solitariness may depress all energy, induce misanthropy, and even dethrone reason. The love of society is an element of our nature, which yields us here, in its realisation, both elevation and delight; and since it is so amidst the entanglements and imperfections of this life, what will it be amidst the resplendence and perfection of heaven? Here on earth, society at best is mixed, and human fellowship, even where it is most cheering and stimulating, is more or less impure. But in Paradise our social feelings, redeemed from all impurity and selfishness, will have perfect exercise and uninterrupted scope. What a gathering there, in "the general assembly and church of the firstborn;" the goodly fellowship of the prophets, the glorious company of the apostles, the noble army of martyrs, an innumerable company of angels, in "the heavenly Jerusalem," around the throne of God and the Lamb. What a bond of union! what a sympathy of love! what a fellowship of souls, to be realised then! and what will it be to be there? This will be association in perfect unity—the communion of heavenly love, beyond the reach of fear, and envy, and jealousy for evermore. This will be to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, with patriarchs and apostles, in our Father's house above. This will be the enjoyment and realisation of the inheritance of the saints in light. This will be the perfect, triumphant, and glorious life to come, for which the present is a sacred probation and an earnest preparation. This will be the consummation and the perpetuation of faith, and hope, and love, centred in that living Lord, whom to know is life eternal.

Shall we know each other there? Shall we recognise our friends, and will they recognise us in Heaven? I do not think it can be doubted. The idea of such recognition is in entire harmony with the genius and spirit of the Gospel. Moses and Elias had preserved their identity as they appeared at the transfiguration of Christ Jesus; and do not Peter and John and Paul know each other in the heavenly world? Shall we sit down at "the marriage supper of the Lamb," and mingle in the fellowship of Paradise, with patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs, without the privilege of knowing them? How can there be the fulness of celestial communion and love without heavenly recognition? Knowledge here is essential to the happiness of true affection, and it must be so hereafter. The communion of saints cannot be perfect unless there be the recognition of one another. Then shall we know even as we are known, and the scope of our knowledge in this respect will be ever expanding, even as it does in time—an element of joy—a means of instruction—an exercise of interest and delight, as eternal ages roll on. Thus will the social element of our nature, perfected, be a continuous privilege and enjoyment "within the vail."

But the consummation of the felicity is suggested by the words, "WITH ME in Paradise." "I will come again," said the Saviour to His disciples, "and receive you unto myself; that where I am there ye may be also." (St. John xiv. 3.) To the same purpose are the words of His intercessory prayer:—"Father, I will that they also whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am, that they may behold My glory." (St. John xvii. 24.) As if in response to these words, St. Paul says of his own prospective death, "Having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better." (Philipp. i. 23.) And St. John says of the future life, "It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is" (1 John iii. 2.) This will in itself be heaven to all His faithful disciples—to be with Him, to be where He is, to behold His glory, to gladden in His presence. To see Him as He is, and to be like Him, was St. John's highest ideal of felicity and glory. And well it might be. Christ Jesus will be the manifested Deity. Then He will be visible; then He will be known; then we shall hear His voice, gaze upon His beauty, be transformed into His likeness, and dwell in His presence for ever. What more is necessary to constitute the blessedness of Paradise than to be with the Lord, reigning, rejoicing, serving; our perfection derived from His, and our glory the reflection of His, world without end? Where He reigns there must be unclouded light streaming forth as from a resplendent sun. Where He dwells there must be boundless blessedness, springing as from a perennial fountain; and because He lives His people shall live also—a life to know no end. Such will be life "within the vail." Verily, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him." Light and love, felicity and rest, intelligence and triumph, gladdening and untiring service, spotless purity and spiritual perfection, scenes of grandeur, tones of delight, and visions of glory, make up the presentation to us now of the Christian's life in his future home above. And all this is going on now "within the vail," and is a matter of experience to those who have crossed the river of death, and passed through the gates into the celestial city. "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as He is pure."

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THERE was a short pause, and even Eudora's faith in her lover did not prevent her breath coming a little faster, as she eagerly waited for the earl to explain himself.

"I shall put Mr. Granton to the test," he repeated. "I have had some conversation with him this morning, and I came away from the interview convinced that it is for the advantages he would derive from the connection, more than any affection for my child, that he woos her."

Eudora indignantly defended her lover. Mark had told her again and again that he wished she was as poor as himself, that he might prove the disinterestedness of his affection.

"He shall prove it!" her father answered, in sterner tones than he had ever before used to her. "I hoped that the entreaties and remonstrances of the best of mothers would have prevailed with you; but you are obstinate: you will not see that a marriage entered upon in such a disobedient spirit must be an unhappy one. As you will not listen to me, I must try what can be done with Mr. Granton."

"But you will not be harsh to him, papa! You will not forbid him to see me again! We will submit to any probation you stipulate for. We will——"

But here the earl's uplifted finger stopped her. "I shall make no stipulations. I shall tell this young man that if he renounces all pretensions to your hand I will pay into my bankers, to his account, the sum of two thousand pounds!"

"He will reject such an offer with scorn!" exclaimed Eudora.

"We shall see," the earl replied. "I shall also tell him that if you persist in marrying him, I cannot prevent it; but I shall make him clearly understand that he will never reap any benefit from the match. I have always felt that there was injustice in the will that separated the title and the estates, and I should not be acting fairly by my nephew Eustace if I permitted him to succeed to the earldom a poor man, while the property that should be his went to enrich an adventurer."

"Mark is no adventurer!" Eudora interposed.

"I shall therefore, if you determine on this marriage, give my lawyers directions to settle upon you, for your own private use, the sum of two hundred pounds per annum. More than this you shall never have from me. For myself, I shall break up my establishment here, and for the future reside abroad. The change of air and scene may benefit your mother, and enable both of us to forget our ungrateful daughter."

"Would you consent to such an arrangement, mamma? Would you cast me off for ever?" asked Eudora, who had never contemplated such severe measures. She had assured herself, as well as Mark, that her father's annoyance would be fleeting, and that for her sake he would reconcile himself to the husband of her choice.

"My child," the countess mournfully replied, "it is you who leave us. I may regret your father's decision; but I must look to the necessity for it."

The rebellious girl stood for some little time struggling with conflicting feelings, her parents anxiously watching her the while; but it ended in her saying, "Then, so let it be. I will not break my promise. Mark wants me worse than you do, papa, for you have everything you can wish for, while he has nothing but my love."

The earl shook his head, but he did not make any comment upon this assertion, and was quitting the room, when, moved by an impulse of which she was half ashamed, Eudora flew to detain him.

"Oh, sir, either let me go with you, or promise that you will not unfairly exert your influence to induce Mark to give me up!"

"This passes my patience!" the earl exclaimed, angrily. "I might say with truth that Mr. Granton deserves no consideration from me. He has behaved with a duplicity that warrants me in calling him a scoundrel—a thorough scoundrel! But I shall not waste many words upon him. I shall merely tell him what I have told you, and let him do as he pleases. I certainly shall not stoop to entreat your high-minded lover to accept my terms. I feel more inclined to let you both take the course you have chosen, and abide by the consequences."

He went away, and Eudora was left with her mother and Eda, who, miserably humiliated by her brother's disgraceful conduct, had retreated to a distant window. No one spoke, for the countess had long since given up the contest in despair, and now lay on her sofa, secretly echoing her husband's self-reproaching exclamation—"Oh that we had made our child bear the yoke in her youth, instead of suffering her to grow up headstrong and unchecked!" It was no use to tell themselves that they had erred in love; they were beginning to distinguish between the weakly indulgence that will let a sore canker till past remedy, and the affection that can probe a wound with firm hand if it be to cure it.

"Papa has no pity for me!" Eudora complained presently; for she was not at peace with herself, and longed for some one's sympathy. "He has no pity, or he would see that it was the most natural thing in the world for me to become attached to Mark Granton, and that it breaks my heart to find my love and duty at variance!"

"You forget," said her mother, "that if you had kept within the limits of the latter, you would not have been drawn into clandestine proceedings."

"But one does not think of these things until it is too late," she confessed. "And I have always felt so sure that papa would forgive us; and he would if—if Eustace pleaded for us," she added, in lower tones.

"Could you ask your cousin to do this?" the countess reproachfully demanded; for the look of surprise and anguish with which Mr. St. Orme had received the tidings of his cousin's secret engagement was still before her eyes. "Do you deserve any favour at the hands of one whom you have so shamefully deceived?"

"Mamma," said Eudora, her bosom heaving, her lips quivering, "I never consented to marry Eustace."

"But you knew our wishes, and how dearly he loved you. His has been faithful affection indeed; and we all hoped that you were beginning to appreciate it. Could he, could any of us, think that the graciousness of your manner during the last few weeks was only assumed to hide the treacherous game you were playing?"

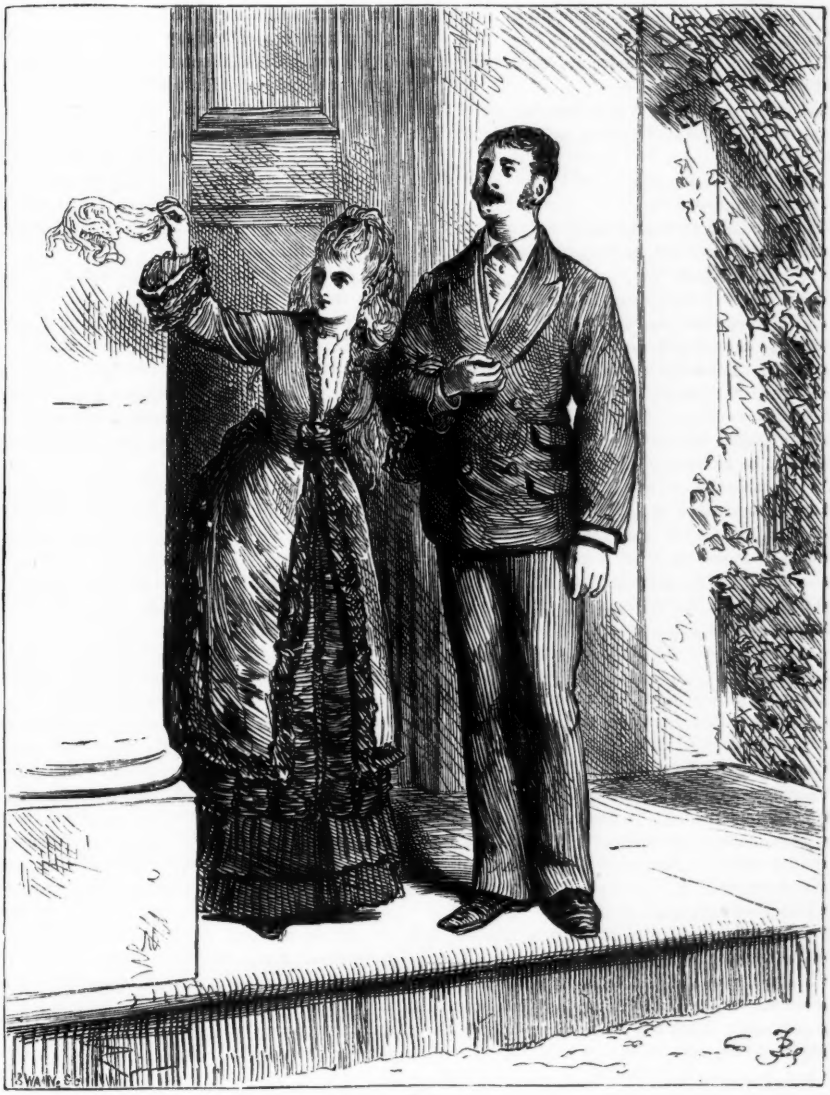
Eudora's head sank in her hands. "Don't speak as if you despised me, mamma! Yet do, if you will, for I deserve it! I never have been worthy of Eustace's love. He will see this now, and congratulate himself on his escape."

Lady Chessington was silent, and her daughter, after roaming about the apartment till her restless movements became almost more than her mother's excited nerves could bear, went and stood beside Eda at the window. From her she had been so accustomed to receive attention and sympathy, that she forgot how incensed she had been with her for bringing about this éclaircissement, and looked for a consoling glance or whisper. But Eda's thoughts were with her brother, although she was afraid to conjecture how he would behave. Which ever alternative he accepted entailed upon him a degradation that stung his more conscientious sister acutely; and when the door opened, and she heard the earl's returning footstep, she let her face droop on her bosom, as if she were to blame for what had happened.

Even Eudora felt chilled and guilty, and oppressed with a consciousness that all the devotion Mark could lavish upon her would not compensate for what she would have to renounce in wedding him; and, running to her mother, she kissed her fondly again and again. But when she raised herself, and saw that her father was gazing at her with unfeigned compassion, she tried to force a smile.

"It can't be helped, papa; when hearts are given away, there's no reclaiming them just because the gift was a rash one. In a few years, when Mark has fought his way to the van, you will be as proud of him as I am!"

"Proud of him, you poor mistaken child!" the earl ejaculated, so sorrowfully that Eudora retreated, and caught hold of Eda's arm to steady herself.



"You haven't parted us, papa!"

"I have done nothing more than I told you I would; set my intentions plainly and clearly before Mr. Granton."

"Go on, papa," she murmured, breathlessly. "Mark said——"

"That he considered you had deceived him, for you had led him to believe that my personal property was yours by inheritance, and that I could not deprive you of it."

She grew very pale, for there returned to her memory sundry questions put to her by Mark one day, which—little dreaming how much importance

(Drawn by F. Barnard.)

"Waving her an affectionate adieu."—p. 187.

he attached to them—she had answered at random; but she signed to the earl to proceed.

"Mr. Granton declines to be burdened with a wife whose income would be barely sufficient for her own private expenses. I am giving you his own words."

"Is this all, papa?"

"Yes, except that he has decided on leaving here within the hour."

The young girl looked incredulous. Alas! it is always so difficult to believe that we have trusted to a broken reed.

"But—but—he must have said more than this! Tell me all, papa—all!"

"He asked me to convey to you his regrets that circumstances have rendered this line of conduct inevitable on his part."

Eudora pressed her palms to her brows, and her anxious mother arose, and softly approached her.

"But the money you spoke of, papa—he did not accept that! Don't tell me that he gave me up for a bribe—a paltry bribe!"

The earl looked at Eda, and was silent; but Eudora stamped her foot in her impatience, crying—"I must be answered. Forgive me, papa; but I don't feel able to believe that he would do this! Perhaps you pleaded with him that you could not resolve to part with me; that it would grieve mamma; or that such a marriage would be lowering to me: and so, in his generosity, he set me free. Am I not right? Oh, sir, am I not right?"

The earl, all displeasure forgotten at the sight of the anguish depicted on her face, caught her to his bosom.

"My poor girl, I wish I could say that you are; but I cannot. I have written the cheque, and—Mr. Granton has accepted it."

"Let me hear it from his own lips!" she feverishly entreated. "I do not feel as if I could credit it till he himself tells me that he has renounced me. He must have some other reason for what he has done; he cannot mean to give me up for the sake of two thousand pounds! Let me hear his own account of your interview—oh, papa, pray do!"

The earl demurred a while, then rang the bell, and bade the servant who answered it tell Mr. Granton that Lady Eudora wished to have a few minutes' conversation with him. After an interval that seemed terribly long, the man came back with a note for her ladyship, which she tore open, devoured with her eyes, and then, dashing it on the floor in a frenzy of scornful rage, threw herself into her mother's arms. It was too true: her love had been less precious to Mark than the large sum of money with which the earl had dazzled him, and she was forsaken.

"We have been very foolish, dear little friend," Mark wrote, "to imagine that our pleasant intimacy could continue after Eda played the informer. Lord Chessington has offered me conditions which my gratitude for his great kindness ever since I have been an inmate of his house compels me to accept; but I cannot trust myself to the parting interview you demand. All that I dare say is—forget the unfortunate M. G., and be happy!"

Mark made no attempt to see his sister before his departure, but she crept down into the hall to say good-bye, and ask him whither he proposed going. His eyes gleamed angrily at her, but he made no comment on what had occurred, and talked loudly, as if to show that he was quite cool and comfortable.

"For the present I shall go to an hotel," he said, in answer to her inquiry; "so if you should have occasion to write, you had better address, 'Poste Restante, Strand.'"

"Try and think that I have acted for the best, dear Mark!" she whispered.

"Oh yes, yes! of course, one cannot doubt the goodness of your intentions; but just at present I don't feel at all grateful for your propensity to meddle with what doesn't concern you. There, don't detain me, for the fly is waiting, and I am too sick of this dull hole to care to stay in it a minute longer than I am obliged."

Eda would have entreated him to give back the earl's cheque, but at the first word on the subject he was gone; and she went back to try and gain admittance to Lady Eudora, who had locked herself in her own room, and was giving way to such transports of mingled anger and grief, that her mother was beginning to be seriously alarmed.

However, the impetuous girl neither pined herself into a decline, nor had an attack of brain fever; but she caught a violent cold through pacing the terrace bareheaded on the evening of Mark's departure, and it was attended with such severe rheumatic pains, that her bodily sufferings prevented her from dwelling as much as she might have done on the loss of her unworthy lover. It was some weeks before she was able to leave her bed, where she lay during the greater part of the time, crippled in every limb, and quite dependent on the loving ministrations of her mother and Eda. No sharper trial could have fallen on the active healthy girl than to be forced to lie there through the soft sweet autumn days, too ill to read, or work, or turn herself on her pillows without assistance; and yet in after life Eudora looked back on those hours of pain and helplessness with a thankful sense of the change they wrought in her. It was then she really learned to value the affection of her parents; to feel remorse for the anxiety she had cost them; to hide her burning face, and wonder at herself, when she remembered how readily she would have left them for the specious Mark Granton; and to frame good resolutions for the future, which, as they were made in deep abasement of spirit, she was enabled to keep.

As the family physician declared that neither the countess nor her daughter must risk the inclemency of an English winter, it was resolved that they should spend some months in the South of France; and as soon as Eudora was well enough to travel, the day was fixed for their journey. But now Eda sought an interview with Lady Chessington, and expressed her wish to remain in England. She knew that, kind as her friends were, they had only tolerated her since the discovery of Mark's treachery. Unpleasant recollections were revived by the very sound of her name; and though she had endured this as long as she was useful in the sick-room, she was eager to depart as soon as Lady Eudora was well enough to do without her.

Nor did the countess oppose her wish. "I think it will be better for all of us that the connection should cease," she said; "but you have served us so faithfully, and behaved so well under very trying circumstances, that I shall not let you go until I can hear of something for you."

She kept her word, and interested herself so much on Eda's behalf, that before she quitted England she was able to obtain a situation for her as governess to the two little daughters of a Mr. and Mrs. de Courcy, who were anxious to secure a superior and trustworthy young person, and were therefore glad to accept the services of one so highly recommended by the Countess of Chessington.

When the hour for parting came, every one at Chessington Hall was surprised to find how much they should miss the unobtrusive Eda. The earl ceased to remember that she was the sister of a young man he detested, and as he shook hands with her, bade her apply to him in any difficulty. Mr. St. Orme, with whom she had always been a favourite, insisted on her acceptance of a beautifully-bound edition of Milton; and the countess kissed and blessed her as if she had been a daughter; but the words that fell sweetest on her ears, and were remembered longest, were those spoken by Eudora.

"Dear Eda, I shall never forget what you have done for me—never. You not only saved my life, but ever since you have been at Chessington you have been, perhaps without knowing it, teaching me how I ought to use the life you preserved. Tell Mark, from me—you see I can speak his name now without a pang—that you were a better friend to both of us than we once thought you."

Eda rejoiced to hear her say this, and told her so.

"I shall write to you often," Eudora added; "and I hope to be able to send you word that I am emulating your steady adherence to duty. See here, dear; you must wear this ring for my sake. Eustace chose it, and to please me, he has had the words engraved inside which I mean to call your motto, 'Whatever betide, for the right!'"

And when Eda caught her last glimpse of Chessington House, Lady Eudora, leaning on the arm of Mr. St. Orme, was still standing under the portico, waving her an affectionate adieu.

CHAPTER XXIV.

EDA had stipulated for a few days' liberty before taking up her abode as governess at Mr. de Courcy's handsome residence at Tyburnia; and therefore it was to the house of the Ingles that she went on reaching London. Nothing was altered there, except that the father of the family was, if possible, more besotted, and his hard-worked spouse more worn and haggard with her labours, while the much-tried 'Ria had got a place, and resigned her home duties to a younger sister.

The little chamber that had once been Mark's was unoccupied; and from thence Eda wrote to her brother, acquainting him with her arrival in town, and begging him to come and see her. She was longing to know what he was doing; to learn whether his disappointment had had as wholesome an influence on his mind as on Lady Eudora's; and to hint her wish that he would let her share his fortunes, be they at ever so low an ebb. Her influence over him was very small, she knew; but if she were in a position to exercise it more frequently, it might sometimes induce him to renounce, or at least pursue less selfishly, the ambitious dreams of wealth and fame which had already led him astray.

He answered her note directly, and appointed a rendezvous in the Temple, excusing himself for giving her the trouble of coming so far by saying, "You know how much I dislike the people you are with; and so you cannot feel surprised that I do not choose to throw myself in their way."

Eda thought that his reluctance to come to Pimlico might be attributed less to a distaste to the Ingles than to an unwillingness to revisit the spot where their beloved mother had bidden them an eternal farewell. Had all her dying prayers for his well-doing been breathed in vain? Would he never begin to seek after the true riches of which she had tried to teach him the inestimable value? These were questions on which Eda could not dwell, though they were troubling her, as she walked across the park and up the noisy Strand to meet him.

He had forgiven all her offences, and greeted her so lovingly that her eyes filled with joyful tears. "And so you have left the Chessingtons?" he observed, as he drew her arm through his own, and they paced along one of the quiet courts. "And Eudora will marry her cousin the prig, after all, thanks to you, eh? Nay, don't look uneasy! I was very angry with you at the time, but I can see now that I am well out of a foolish affair. What are you going to do with yourself in London, Eda?"

She told him of the situation Lady Chessington had procured for her; but added that she would cheerfully resign it if he would accept her services as a housekeeper.

"Not yet, my dear; I am in chambers at present; but I am in treaty for a very pretty little house at Hampstead; if I secure it I shall be delighted to have you with me!"

"Then you are doing well, Mark?"

He smiled hopefully. "I think so. I have obtained an excellent berth as secretary to a new company, in which I have taken some shares, and expect to make an excellent thing of it."

"But these new companies sometimes fail," she reminded him.

"And sometimes prove splendid successes; so why should not ours? Don't croak, Eda; I should not have risked my cash if I had not convinced myself that there was every chance of trebling it in a very short time."

But the mere mention of the word failure had clouded his brow; and Eda's was shadowed too, for she was asking herself what good he could ever expect to do with money obtained as the sum had been to which Mark alluded so pompously. Perhaps the sigh she breathed gave him a shrewd guess at the current in which her thoughts were running, for he looked at his watch, and declared that he was due at the office, and must leave her.

"You must let me know how you like your new home. You are such a dear little contented thing that I don't think it troubles you to go among strangers, as it would some girls."

Eda could have contradicted this, but she did not, for Mark was in the habit of taking things for granted, and apt to be annoyed if an attempt was made to convince him that he was in error.

"If you should want anything, be sure you write to me," he added, as he bade her adieu. "I'm not very flush of cash just at present, and shall not be till some of our ventures turn in; but I'll contrive to find enough for a new dress or bonnet for my little sister."

"But you will come to Fitz William Square and see me, Mark? Don't let us drift apart again!"

"Only for a little while, my dear; do you forget the house at Hampstead? As for calling upon you, I think I had better wait till you have ascertained whether you can receive visitors. You wouldn't like me to ring the servant's bell, and wait in the kitchen till I was permitted to see my sister the governess, would you?"

Eda made no reply; and in this unsatisfactory manner they parted. After Mark had walked briskly away, she blamed herself for not having spoken more boldly the thoughts and wishes that were in her heart; and she was returning to Fleet Street grieving over a lost opportunity, when she ran against a gentleman, who answered her apology with a smiling inquiry—"Have you forgotten me, Miss Granton?" and she saw that it was Mr. Allonby.

(To be continued.)

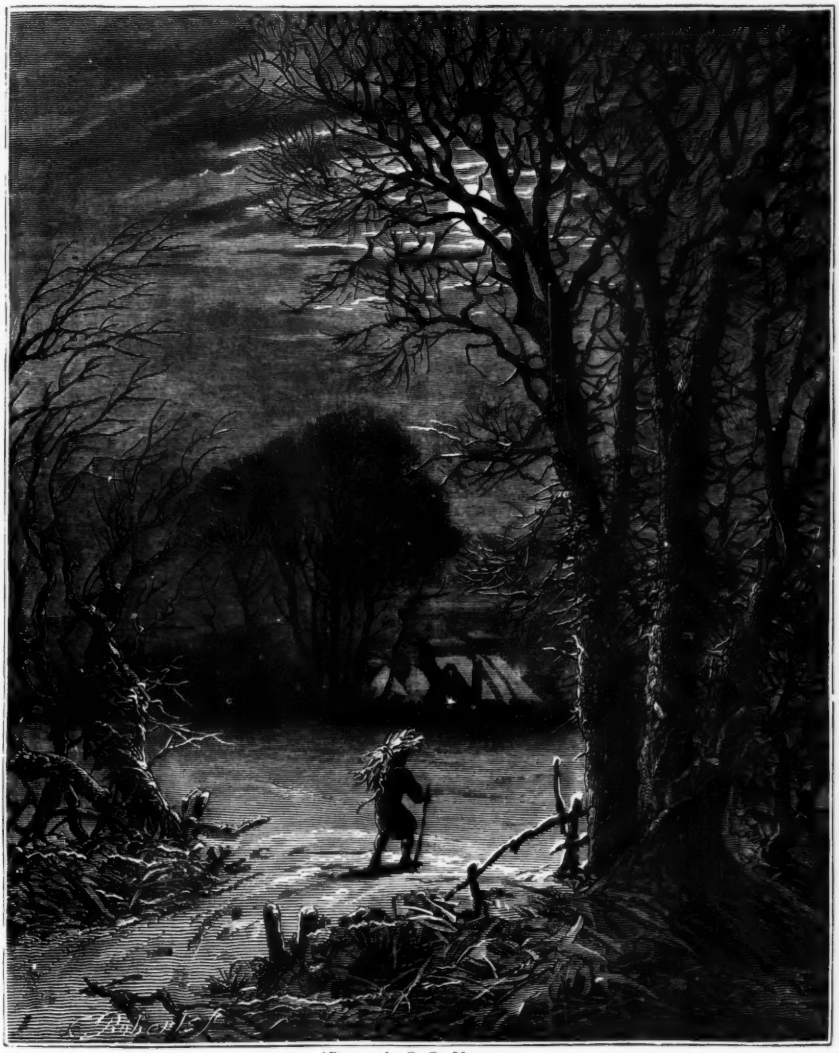
TO WINTER: A SONG IN SEASON.

HE comes when the flowers have gone to their rest,
When the earth is in tears and the trees are all bare,
And many a snug little tenantless nest
Stands revealed, tender record of instinct and care!
He comes to our shores with a laugh and a shout,
He gives the pale student a pat o' the cheek,
And, straight, health's bright roses are hurrying out,
And the muscle grows firm that was flaccid and weak.

Then join in my song,
With smiles let us meet him,
And cheerily greet him,
And lovingly treat him—
He will not stay long.



The husbandman marks his appearance with joy,
For he maketh secure with his strong iron hand,
From insects which fret and from damps that destroy,
The good grain of plenty which blesses our land,
Secure in his keeping the seed will remain;
He will nurture the sap in the roots of the trees,
Until warned to his old Arctic palace again
By the musical voice of the soft Western breeze.

Then join in my song,
With smiles let us meet him,
And cheerily greet him,
And lovingly treat him—
He will not stay long.

His touch may be known by the dainty device
Left wherever it falls, or on lattice or eaves;
It delights him to hang with his jewels of ice
Those branches that autumn hath stripped of their leaves.
'Neath the mantle of white he'll so lovingly spread,
Exhausted Dame Nature will find sweet repose,
Till spring shall a crocus-crown set on her head,
And bid her awake and new beauties disclose.

Then join in my song,
With smiles let us meet him,
And cheerily greet him,
And lovingly treat him—
He will not stay long.

JOHN G. WATTS.

(Drawn by C. O. MURRAY.)

"When the earth is in tears and the trees are all bare."

"TO WINTER: A SONG IN SEASON."—p. 188.

THE REDEEMER.

BY THE REV. E. K. KENDALL, M.A., VICAR OF ST. MARK'S, NOTTING HILL.

"Thou shalt know that I the Lord am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer."—ISAIAH lx. 16.

THE word Redemption is often used by the Apostles in the New Testament to denote the work of Christ in the salvation of men. Christ is not actually called by the name of Redeemer in the Epistles, yet perhaps He has no more familiar title, and certainly none which speaks more directly to the Christian's heart. It is a title to which we have become accustomed; it is one which, perhaps, we should not have invented.

When we say that God created us, or that God sanctifies us, we use plain words to describe the work of God the Father and God the Holy Spirit. But when we say that God the Son redeemed us, we use a figurative expression, which, however significant, is far less forcible and instructive to us than it was to a Jew of the days of St. Paul and St. Peter. We have read in history of ransoms paid for the restoration of captives. We speak of redeeming certain rights or charges by a present payment, and of recovering a pledge on repayment of the debt for which it was security; yet the notion of redemption which we thus derive falls far short of the religious idea, and teaches us but little about the doctrine of Jesus Christ as our Redeemer.

But to a Jew the notion of redemption was most familiar, and was full of doctrinal significance when he became a Christian. If the word Father naturally expressed the love and power of the Creator, the word Redeemer as naturally signified the love and power of the Saviour.

Every Jew had his redeemer. His next kinsman—his brother, or his uncle, or his uncle's son, or whoever was his next kinsman—was, by virtue of this relationship, invested with duties, privileges, responsibilities, and obligations. What, then, were the duties of the next kinsman?

1. In regard to a man's inheritance. Every family in Canaan held the land assigned to it as direct from God. It could not be alienated lawfully for ever. Yet, if a man were waxen poor, his land might be seized, or he be compelled to sell it, until the year of Jubilee, to satisfy his creditors. He might thus be destitute the remainder of his days, his inheritance having passed out of his hands.

Here, then, the redeemer stepped in. It was the duty—nay, the privilege of the redeemer to buy it back. No man could refuse to sell to the next kinsman, however unwilling he might be to part with that which he had acquired.

2. In regard to a man's liberty. An Israelite might, from stress of poverty, sell his strength to a stranger, and become a slave. Until the Jubilee came to set him free, he might be a hopeless, miserable bondman. Even if not treated with cruelty, his will was subject to the commands of his master, and he could earn no wages for himself. But he had a redeemer, and he was not without hope. If the kinsman were ready to pay the price, no man could pluck him out of his hand. Nor did the rescued bondman only change his master; he changed also the nature of his service. From henceforth he belonged to the redeemer, to whom he owed himself; but he served as a free man, not as a slave—as a hired servant, to whom wages were paid, not as one who was ruled with rigour—as a brother beloved, not as a stranger and an alien. The second duty, then, of the kinsman-redeemer was to purchase liberty for his brother, to restore him to his place among the people of God, to give him back himself.

3. The redeemer was the avenger of his brother's blood. "Blood for blood" is the common rule among all nations of rude and primitive habits, where law is weak and passion strong. The manslayer might wander from tent to tent over the desert, hide himself in the fastnesses of the rock, or take refuge in other lands—years might pass away, and the deed of violence seem almost to be forgotten—but the avenger was never satisfied until blood was rendered for blood.

The vindictive spirit which might relentlessly pursue one innocent of murderous intent was repressed by special ordinances, in the case of the Hebrew avenger. There were cities of refuge, by residence in which he who was not a murderer of malice and design could escape, until, by a legal and dispassionate inquiry, he were acquitted of deliberate crime. But the redeemer was still the guardian and avenger of his brother.

Such was the next kinsman, the goël—the redeemer of inheritance, of liberty, of life. He was the man's second self: if he were in need of his aid, he was one better than himself—one to whom he might owe all that he had; the guardian of his inheritance, of his liberty, and of his life; the husband of his wife, the father of his children, the avenger of his blood. These things were an allegory, even before the advent of the true Redeemer. Yet there might be no occasion for the service of the kinsman; or he might be poor, cold-hearted, or feeble, and unable or unwilling to perform his duties as such. Moreover, he was but God's agent, who, even in regard to a man's estate, was his true Redeemer.

Thus, then, was Messiah revealed before He came as the Redeemer. There were those, we read, who looked for "redemption:" they looked for Christ the Prophet, Priest, and King, but also the Deliverer, the Redeemer. They looked for one in the form and nature of man, their next kinsman of the seed of Abraham and the house of David; but yet—though this they seem to have overlooked—the same Scriptures which foretold the advent of the human Redeemer revealed as clearly that, whether collectively as a people, or individually as men, their true Redeemer was divine—our "Immanuel"—God with us. So truly did the law of redemption by the next kinsman shadow forth the redeeming love and restoring work of Jesus—so fully, though so briefly, did it announce that the Church of God should be purchased, as St. Paul expresses it, "with His own blood."

And now let us briefly trace the propriety of the figure as applied to the redemptive work of Jesus. First, He is our Kinsman—He took on Him the nature of man. "Forasmuch as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself took part of the same, that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil, and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage." His office, too, was threefold—shadowed forth not obscurely by the office of the Hebrew goël. He made the atonement; He restored to man the inheritance which by sin was forfeit, the liberty of those led captive by Satan, the life of those who were dead. He is our Substitute. By a bold figure He is spoken of as paying the price of man's redemption by His blood.

1. In regard to the inheritance. It is, perhaps, not possible for us rightly to estimate what we have forfeited by Adam's sin and by our own. We cannot conceive what the world would be if there were no sin, no pain, no death—if all were holy and happy.

The philosopher and the moralist in every age have deplored the present condition of man. How bitterly must we feel that the best of men are not so virtuous as they might be—that the happiest of men are not what their longings lead them to hope, and their knowledge of themselves and of their capacities for enjoyment lead them to think that they could attain, if only they could shake off the condition of imperfection, and make their own that which is too real to be a dream. And what shall we say of the foul crimes, of the abject misery, of the sensual, degraded habits, of the miserable selfishness, of many even among so-called Christians? Is it not enough to mako angels weep, to witness so hideous a perversion of that which was once innocent, loving, and noble—a man? And if such be the present unhappy results of sin, what shall be the eternal consequences? What a holy and blessed inheritance is forfeited by those who know nothing of spiritual joy and peace! Do we not need the "faithful saying," even while we admit that we do not enter into its depth of meaning?—"We trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe." The figure of the kinsman-redeemer, however significant, fails to shadow forth the almighty power, the abounding love of the true Saviour. He has obtained "eternal redemption" for us; the inheritance is purchased, and we may have it partly as present possession and partly as future heritage. Through the Spirit we are enabled to live holier, happier lives—lives of growing sanctity and increasing blessedness—lives of approach to the eternal light "which shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

2. With his inheritance of innocence and happiness, man's liberty is forfeit likewise. Not to quote the sayings of those who have but given expression to the experience of every intelligent man who has cared to look within his own soul, just consider that wonderful chapter (Romans vii.) which sets forth so vividly the workings of a heart in bondage, "carnal, sold under sin." "What I do" (is the bitter experience of the struggling sinner) "I allow not; for what I would, that do I not, but what I hate, that do I. I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin."

How real the conflict of mind, and how joyous the glorious conclusion! "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord." And so the Apostle leads up to the wondrous doctrine of the adoption, with its triumphant and glorious conclusion—the complete and final deliverance of those who are "more than conquerors."

3. But while we dwell on the love and pity of the Redeemer, there is yet another aspect under which He must be viewed. The next kinsman is also the goël-avenger. God hath "given Him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man." He himself has described the last dread assize—the grouping on either hand of the sheep and the goats; the loving invitation to the children of His Father to receive the inheritance reserved for them from the foundation of the world; the dismissal of the accursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. Those become the foes of the Redeemer who have been the enemies of His brethren. Satan, the great adversary, the great slayer of the souls of men, shall at last, though the time of vengeance seem to be delayed, be cast into the place reserved for him and his evil angels, who have conspired with him against the Most High. Others, too, will endure the wrath of the Atoning Lamb:—those who have not claimed their kindred with their great Redeemer, but have been adversaries to Him and to His brethren. In "that day" Christ's kinsmen—some of them, perhaps, knowing it not—listening to the voice of conscience within them, careful to walk by faith, even though their knowledge is small and their opportunities few, "minding not their own things, but the things of others"—ministering to the needy, the weak, and the prisoners—those shall be on the right hand, eleventh and first hour labourers, to whom the Judge will equally be good, of the fulness of His grace and lovingkindness; and on the other hand there will be ranged the adversaries—found liars in that day—those who would not that He should reign over them; those who prefer poverty to wealth, bondage to freedom; those who shut themselves up under a hard cover of selfishness which will never win souls.

He who is mighty to save is mighty also to avenge. But the kindred of the Redeemer, even very much people, join to ascribe "salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, unto the Lord our God, for true and righteous are His judgments . . . . He hath avenged the blood of His servants."*

FANNY FORREST; OR, EVIL COMMUNICATIONS.

CHAPTER II.

BUT something in the frizzled yellow locks and sunburnt face seemed to come back to Owen's mind, and after another look to make his suspicions more secure, he advanced still nearer to the hedge, and drawing the little boy from beneath it, he raised him in his arms, and tried to brush away the tangled hair from across his face.

The child seemed somehow to have yielded at once to a feeling of security when within those strong arms, for the cries ceased, and with fat, almost baby fingers, he too pushed away the curls, so as more clearly to view his new-found friend, trying to squeeze away at the same time the last remnants of the tears still standing in his eyes.

"Ah! I thought so," said Owen, somewhat to himself, as he now gained a good view of the queer little creature in his arms. "You are Robbie, are you not?—poor Robbie Leonard; and you live at Squire Taunton's gate-lodge, don't you, wee one?—far away down by the rookery there."

The little fellow turned half round, to make sure of the direction in which Owen's finger pointed, and then nodded confidently, although showing at the same time, by a kind of half sob, that he had not yet forgotten his recent trouble.

"And what brought you here, my man?" asked Owen, kindly, yet as if half afraid of raising the cry of alarm again by his question; "why are you not at home with your mother, instead of cutting about here this way, alone?"

"She brought me here," replied the child; "she took me to the post wi' her, for she's afraid to go alone. She said she wouldn't leave me, but she did; and when I cried she beat me, and she said if I cried again she'd beat me worse, and eat me up, too, she did."

The red mark on the chubby arm raised close to Owen's face, showed that this was no vain complaint, and with an angry voice he demanded to be shown where "she" had gone.

Robbie was almost in tears again, and could only point across the grass to a clump of poplar-trees whose stems, standing close together, would completely conceal any one who might be in hiding beyond. So, holding the child more closely in his grasp, Owen stepped across the path on to the soft grass, and with a couple of quick springing steps came suddenly and unexpectedly upon the person he was in search of.

Robbie would have returned to his former plaint at the first glimpse of Fanny if Owen had not hushed him summarily, as he watched with some curiosity the figure of the girl before him. She seemed to be of nearly the same age and height as Ruth, but instead of his sister's fair glossy hair, masses of short black curls hung, in rather corkscrew fashion, beneath a hat adorned with more than one tawdry artificial flower, while a coloured veil, rent and torn almost to ribbons, floated behind her in the wind. The greasy, sun-brown velveteen jacket, and the flounced and flimsy gown below it, finished the costume—intended, evidently, to produce a great effect; yet now, as Owen watched her, it was not of this effect that she was thinking: all her interest seemed to be centred on something which she held between her fingers, turning it over and over with a restless and prying gaze.

One step nearer, and Owen could see a yellow envelope, with printed letters on it, such as had more than once brought tidings of importance to his master in Bentham. He could also see the annoyance it caused the girl that the covering was too thick to betray any inkling of its contents, even when held up longingly to the sun; he could see that the furtive fingers had now even crept searchingly round the fastening of the letter, when, turning a stealthy glance to the direction where Robbie had been left forsaken, the girl suddenly discovered Owen's tall figure, with Robbie in his arms, his countenance expressing undisguisedly his contempt at the dishonourable act he had detected her in.

* The reader is recommended to use a concordance and a reference Bible, and to compare the texts in which the word Redeemer occurs, or the office is alluded to, in the Old Testament.

In an instant the swarthy cheeks had flushed up crimson, as, with a hasty gesture, the letter was crumpled up, and thrust into the depths of her pocket. For a moment she hesitated what course to pursue so as best to cover her discomfiture, and then, without apparently a twinge of anxiety as to what Robbie's fate might be, she sprang over a low wooden paling close beside her, down into a field of furze and purple heath, and in less than a moment the tawdry hat and flimsy gown were out of sight.

Owen could easily have pursued her, if he had been unfettered by the child within his arms; but, much perplexed at Fanny's strange conduct, Robbie, at the first attempt on Owen's part to put him down, began to utter such piteous cries, and clung to his neck with such a tenacious grip, that at last, with a half sigh of resignation, the lad took him up once again to his old position, and tried with gentle words to quiet his alarms.

"Hush, Robbie! There, there, that's a good man! Loosen your hand a bit, my boy, and I'll not try to put you down again. I'll leave you safe at home at Squire Taunton's gate, if you'll be good."

Much comforted and consoled by Owen's voice and words, Robbie loosened his fingers somewhat, though still keeping his arm confidingly round Owen's neck, and the two went on their way together, Robbie pouring all his confidences into his companion's ear, till the lodge at Squire Taunton's gate was reached, and Owen had placed the boy in safety within his mother's arms.

"She's a bad lot, she is!" replied the good woman, in answer to Owen's account of the manner of his finding the child—"a bad lot every inch, she is, from top to toe; I may say it without blame, to whom she is neither kith nor kin. But if I had had my way Fanny Forrest would never have darkened these doors of mine."

"Who is she, then?" asked Owen, more to gratify Mrs. Leonard, who evidently expected the question, than from any ardent curiosity on his own part.

"She's Fanny Forrest, a daughter to a cousin of my husband's; and as the poor woman her mother, a quiet, kind creature herself, has been in trouble this good bit back, and her eldest boy gone off to sea, why, my husband would have it to get the girl down here, to lighten the load in her home a bit. But it's the last time he'll ever get me to do it—the very last!" And Mrs. Leonard, with renewed thanks for Owen's timely aid, carried off the now sleepy Robert within the lodge.

Owen continued his walk alone, and gave but little further thought to the episode just past.

The road seemed to have grown dustier, and the air more oppressive, as he turned round the corner of the lane, and saw before him the brown wooden palings so familiar, and the bright scarlet flowers within. But as he came in sight of these Owen could not but start, for there, at the low wooden gate, with her arms crossed upon it, and her head stretched peeringly in front of her, stood Fanny Forrest—he could not be mistaken in either face or figure—while just within the gate stood Ruth, holding within her hands the letter he had previously seen in Fanny's possession, while, with bent head and half-averted face, she listened to her companion's words.

Owen could not hear what these words were, but in that moment's glance he felt sure that no good advice was being given by that voluble tongue—no honest design was portrayed in those glittering black eyes.

He felt more than ever convinced of this when, at the first signal of his approach, the swarthy face flushed up as it had done once before that afternoon, and waiting only for a moment's hurried whisper to her friend, Fanny's flimsy gown whisked out of view beyond a sheltering hedge, and Ruth, as though ignorant of her brother's approach, folded the letter absently within its cover, and turned away in the direction of the house.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

69. Give some passage showing that "sheepskins and goatskins" were used as clothing.

70. What character is given by St. Paul of the people of Crete?

71. What judgment fell upon the two eldest sons of Aaron, and why?

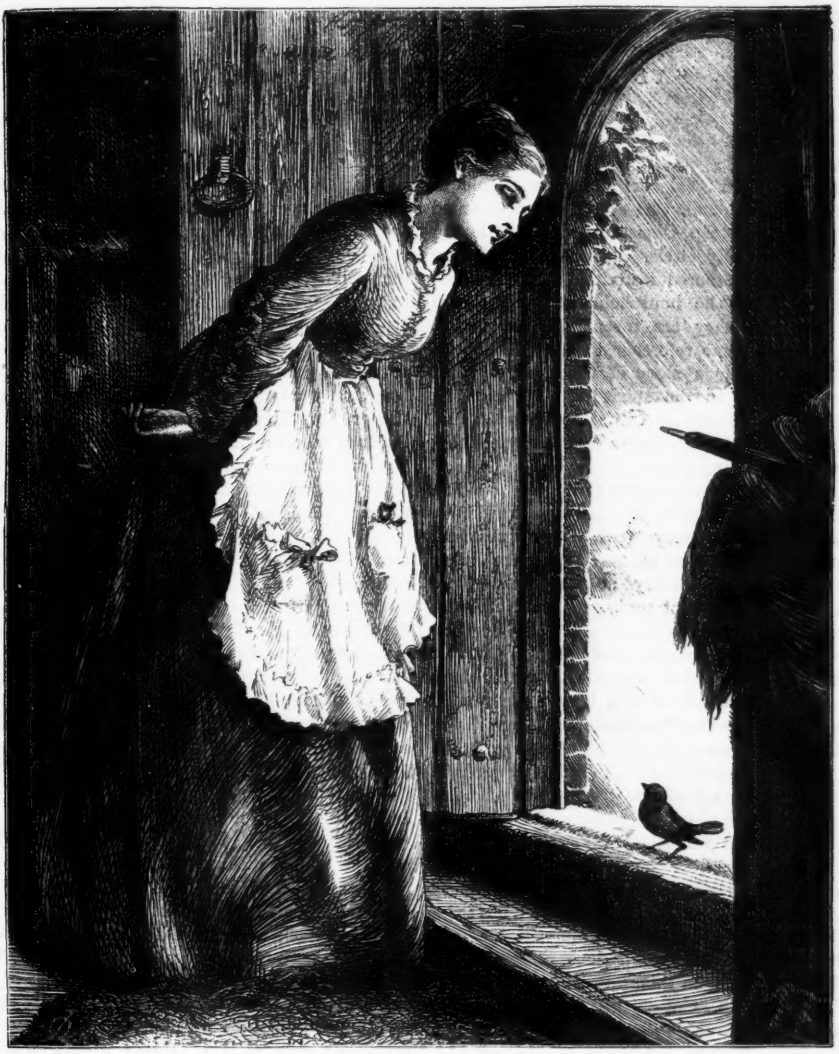
72. The word reverend is used only once in the Bible. Give the passage.

73. Mention any verse from which it would seem to have been customary to track people by "footprints."

74. Where in the New Testament is it stated that "a thousand years in God's sight are as one day?"

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 160.

55. On the "Day of Atonement" (Lev. xvi. 4, 32).



56. Doeg the Edomite (1 Sam. xxii. 19).

57. "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (James ii. 8).

58. At Lystra—by the people when they saw St. Paul heal the "impotent man" (Acts xiv. 12).

59. From Hobab the father-in-law of Moses—at the defeat of Sisera by Deborah and Barak (Judges iv. 11, 21).

60. The descendants of Korah are mentioned as "keepers of the gates of the Tabernacle" (1 Chron. ix. 19).

(Drawn by M. Ellen Edwards.)

THE ROBIN.

A STARVING robin sang to me,
With round black eyes, with bosom red,
With plaintive grace of restless head,
Still peering here and there to see,
The white, expected crumbs of bread.

And these, in sport, I still withheld:
So sweet it was to hear it sing,
So sweet to watch the hopping thing,
With those quick eager eyes compelled
To looks of curious questioning.

But is it wise to make pretence?
The seeming false is often fair;
For love is love, tho' love should wear
The mask of feigned indifference:
But what of unforeseen despair?

O cruel heart that could withhold
The crumbs on such a bitter day!
For still the bird was fain to stay,
Half perished with the freezing cold:
A moment more—it flew away!

J. R. E.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

"WITH THE HALT AND THE LAME."

I SUPPOSE there are few people in England, who are at all accustomed to keep Christmas amidst a loving family circle, who have not during the sacred festivities of the season, and all the household sentiments with which they are inseparably associated, made some reference to the "Christmas Carol," that famous story of the great novelist whose presence in the spirit of his books has brightened so many a Christmas hearth, and moved so many gentle hearts to kindly thoughts and words of loving cheer.

Amongst all the well-known characters to which Mr. Dickens introduced thousands of readers—characters who, to many of us, became realities, and were spoken of as though they were living and among our ordinary acquaintances—there have been none, except perhaps little Nell, who have evoked more sympathetic recognition than Tiny Tim, the poor crippled child of Bob Cratchit—the child, the sound of whose little crutch upon the stair was listened for with loving expectation—the shadow of whose vacant chair in the "Vision of Christmas," gave to the humbled usurer as keen a pang as any sight that he saw afterwards in that strange dream of what might come to pass. So completely do we share the anxiety of Scrooge in this respect, that we can all remember giving a sigh of relief when, at the end of the story, we learn that the poor crippled boy remains to bless the fireside where even his afflictions were felt to be a hallowing influence to soften animosities, and to draw close the bonds of family love.

"Somehow he gets thoughtful, sitting by himself" (says Bob Cratchit), "and thinks the strangest things you ever heard. He told me, coming home, that he hoped the people saw him in the church, because he was a cripple, and it might be pleasant to them to remember upon Christmas Day who made lame beggars walk and blind men see."

If I needed an excuse for so long an allusion to that pathetic story, which has stirred so many hearts throughout England, I might find it in the passage I have just quoted; but I seek none. I refer to the "Christmas Carol," because in it the figure of the crippled boy, occupying so small a space, yet is such a living, touching influence as to be one of the household fancies that associate themselves with our thoughts of Christmas-tide in poor homes; because there are so many little crutches the sounds of which are heard—though fewer than there used to be before orthopædic surgery became a special branch of study, and hospitals were founded for its practice; because, though Tiny Tim may represent so many crippled children who are the helpless members of poor families, where they are tended with as kindly care as working fathers and mothers can find time for—there are hundreds of other deformed or maimed lads whose lot is made the harder because of the want of sympathy and ready aid that would lift them out of utter helplessness, or give them such light labour to perform as would diminish their sense of dependence. Finally, because I desire you to bear me company to one place in London where this last need is recognised, and where forty crippled boys, suffering from various incurable deformities, which yet have left them the use of their hands, are not only taught a trade, but are encouraged, fed, and nurtured for the three years during which they are inmates of the home—"The National Industrial Home for Crippled Boys."

Alighting from the railway carriage which conveys us from Mansion House Station to the pleasant old High Street of Kensington, we are close to the place that we have come to see, for the building, itself a quaint old house, with a central doorway between two projecting deep bay-windowed fronts, and built of the reddest of red brick, stands at the end of Wright's Lane, looking us full in the face as we approach it to read the style and title plainly painted across its upper storey.

The house has good reason for looking the world thus bluffly in the face, for it is an independent building, bought and paid for; hearth-stone, roof, tree, and chimney, freehold, and without debt or mortgage. Till this was done all thought of considerable extension was put aside. The question was how to provide, out of voluntary subscriptions and contributions, for the fifty inmates who could be admitted within those sheltering walls. It must be premised, however, that ten pounds a year has to be paid for each boy who is accepted, during the three years that he remains there, to be taught in the evening school and in the workshop, not only how to read and write and cipher, but to become a good workman at tailoring, carpentering, or die-engraving and colour-stamping. These are at present the only three trades taught in this truly industrial home, but they appear to be very admirably suited to the cases of those who are deformed or crippled in various ways; and they are taught well, as an inspection of the work accomplished will prove. For the workshops are real workshops, where the boys do not play at work, but are taught their trades in a way that will enable them when they leave the institution to gain a decent livelihood, or even, if they can save a little money, to go into business for themselves. This has been lately done, in fact, by two youths, who, having thoroughly learnt the relief-stamping process, have contrived to buy a press and the materials for their trade, and are now in partnership in a country town, and earning a respectable maintenance. Of sixteen lads who left during the last year, twelve were doing well as journeymen at the industries they had learnt; one had set up in business for himself (the relief-stamping gives the greatest facility for this); and two had returned to their friends because of ill health, while one had not reported himself. But during the same period forty of the former inmates had been to visit the old home, and gave a very encouraging account of themselves. Let us add, in a whisper, that amongst these visitors were a "team" of old boys, who had come to accept the challenge of a "team" of the new boys, to play a match at cricket. Yes, and that these teams of cripples have, over and over again, carried off their bats against opponents who, if they expected an easy victory, found themselves to have been most amazingly mistaken. I don't think this is mentioned in the Report, but it is well to know it, because it serves to prove how truly beneficent a work is being done here, in removing boys from a too often almost "hopeless" condition to one of useful, intelligent, skilled labour, and to healthy self-forgetfulness and association in the ordinary duties and recreations of their fellows. It must be remembered that every boy there is, in a certain sense, incurable. After having been nominated by the person willing to contribute the annual payment of £10, the medical officers of the institution (or if in the country, some qualified practitioner) examine the candidate, who must be above twelve and less than eighteen years of age, and neither blind, deaf and dumb, nor without the use of his hands. The name of the candidate is then added to the list of those waiting for admission—of whom there are now, unfortunately, above seventy—and when there is a vacancy, and funds are sufficient to maintain the full number of inmates, these candidates are taken in succession, without voting, by order of the Committee of Management, of whom the President is the Earl of Shaftesbury, and the Honorary Secretary Mr. S. H. Bibby, of Green Street, Grosvenor Square. There is also an efficient Ladies' Committee for the household management and for advising as to the education of the boys, the visits of the friends of the inmates, and the domestic affairs of the Home generally. There are some severe cases of deformity here—club-foot, spinal curvature, and various distortions of the legs—and in many cases instruments are worn, but the Institution does not profess to provide these. Frequently they are procured by special contributions, and among the latest gifts of this kind is a serviceable wooden leg or two, which have had the happy effect of relieving their recipients from the necessity of using crutches; but it is distinctly insisted on that the Home is not a hospital, and is only curative in the sense of improving the condition of those who, having been pronounced incurable, are yet capable of greatly increased activity and strength by means of nourishing and regular food, interesting occupation, and healthy exercise with companions who themselves are to be numbered among the halt and the lame, and yet are, in a very certain sense, made to walk and to leap and to praise God. For see, at the very moment that I am speaking, a little figure darts out of the passage yonder and scampers across the large open green space at the back of the house on his way to the new range of workshops that are now nearly completed, and are also paid for. Is it possible to apply the term cripple to such an elf, who is out of reach before one can ask his name? Yes; that very elf-like look is the result of a deformity which stops growth, though it leaves the limbs as active as you see them. But come up-stairs to the first of the present workshops, and you may note among the colour-stampers, sitting on their high stools before the dies and presses, cases of more decided deformity or of crippling by accident. These boys follow an artistic, pretty business, and visitors may do worse than give a small or a large order for note-paper and envelopes, stamped with crest, motto, or quaint design. So well is the work executed, that the Home has orders constantly in hand for the trade, and some of the dies are really beautiful examples of engraving. I think that in this long pleasant upper room, with its high bench running along the window, fitted with the presses and implements for the work, there are more severe cases of deformity than will be seen either in the tailors' department on the same floor, or in the carpenters' shop below. One reflects on the numerous accidents to which the children of the poor are liable, such as falls down flights of stairs; to the inhuman neglect of old women who are paid as "minders" by mothers compelled to go out to work in neighbourhoods where no infant crèche, no babies' cradle home, has yet been established, or in country towns where such institutions have scarcely been heard of. One remembers with pity the scores of poor little creatures who have to nurse and tend children almost as big as themselves, so that they and their charges too often become deformed together, the nurse with lateral curvature of the spine, and the baby with vertical curvature or with deformities of the feet or legs. One thinks, in short, of the many perils to healthy life and well-formed limb that beset the children of the poor, and then coming back to the figures of this National Home, which yet, with careful management and due economy, can only receive forty or fifty crippled boys—wonders how long it is to be before the ruddy old house in Wright's Lane will expand its broad bosom and stretch out long arms on either side to embrace three-score more lads, taken from present neglect and want and probable ill-usage, to be fed and taught and nurtured for three years, during which the whole future will be changed for them, and their lives redeemed from the degradation that had threatened them just as their bodies expand with renewed health and strange developments of unsuspected strength, and their souls are lighted with hope and the sympathy of loving words and hearty manly encouragement.

A beginning has been made already; for that munificent anonymous benefactor, whose thousand-pound cheques have helped so many of our deserving charities, has shown his or her usual nice discrimination by taking a walk in the direction of Wright's Lane. The result of this has been the erection of these long workshops which extend across one side of the wide green area, with its ornamental trees, at the back of the building—an area which is a good part of the acre on which the property stands, and forms a capital recreation-ground, without quite leaving out of sight the pleasant kitchen-garden beyond, or the little building in the further corner, which is intended as a cottage-infirmary in cases of sickness. There are the workshops, quite ready for another contingent of lads, such as are now busily at work in the tailoring department, where they are sitting on the board in the proper tailor-fashion, sewing away at one or other of the many private orders for gentlemen's clothes, or "juvenile suits," which are the better appreciated because they are hand-sewn, instead of being made with that machine, at the end of the room, to learn the working of which is, however, a necessary part of the modern tailor's trade. Quite ready, also, for our friends the relief-stampers, and for an additional crew of young carpenters to join those who are now busy below amidst a fine odour of fresh deal and the cheery sound of hammer, chisel, and plane. One of our young friends of the wooden legs—a strapping fellow of seventeen—is just deftly finishing off a very attractive chest of drawers, which will only need to be taken to the painting and varnishing rooms that are to form a part of the new building to be a very capital example of the workmanship of the establishment. For it cannot be too strongly insisted on that the customers of the Industrial Cripples get value for their money, whether it be in ornamental stationery, in plain furniture, packing cases, boxes, and general carpentry, or in "superfine suits" to order, or "own materials made up and repairs neatly executed." It is no sham industrial school, but a real practical working establishment, and when the new buildings are quite completed, and the dwelling-house has that other wing added to it, in order to provide proper dormitories and a school-room, dining-room, and lavatory, at all in proportion to the number of boys who are waiting anxiously for admission——

Ah! but the question is, When shall this be? Not till another £5,000 is added to the funds, I am told—about as much money as is sometimes spent in some public display which lasts three or four hours, and going to look at which probably half a dozen men, women, or children are lamed and crippled in the crowd. Judging from the present arrangements, with very little room to spare, and a not very conveniently-adaptable space, the money would be carefully spent; for there is no tendency to undue luxury, and the present household staff would still be sufficient for providing meals and looking after the family needs of these robust and independent young cripples. That it would be a work all the more beneficial, because of this very independence with which it is associated, it needs few arguments to prove; but, should reasons be asked for, let us take the three last cases for which the benefits of the Home are earnestly sought, and they will speak in suggestive accents of the need of that extension for which an appeal is being made. I need not tell you the names either of those who nominate the cases or the boys themselves; but be assured that the former would be sufficient guarantee of the need which it is sought to relieve:—

No. 1.—"The father is paralysed, and can do no work. The mother is not a very satisfactory person. Family consists of—

1. The eldest, a boy of twenty, who does odd jobs.
2. The cripple.
3. Boy, works, and gets 5s.
4. Boy, sells lights in the City.

There are four little girls at home besides.

The cripple is in a very wretched state from want of food, but he has the use of his hands."

No. 2 (EDINBURGH).—"Was never at school more than a year in his life, and never attended regularly two months together. He can neither read nor write, and has been neglected and often half-starved by his dissipated parents. His mother pawns everything she can get to buy drink, and the boy has little benefit from the wages he makes, which are about 5s. per week. Their house is miserably dirty, Mrs. —— (the mother) being always drunk or incapable on the Saturday and Sunday. The boy works at Mr. B——'s Pottery, P——. He is honest and industrious. He is more miserable at home of late since he is left alone with his mother. It would be a great advantage to the boy if he could be admitted to the Industrial Home at Kensington, where he would be well trained, and where he would be quite beyond his mother's reach."

No. 3 (recommended by a Clergyman).—"Has been very regular at our school, and has been attentive and got on very well. His mother, a widow, lives with her sons, all of whom she has brought up well. She is an industrious, honest woman, and receives no help from the Board of Guardians excepting an allowance made for the maintenance of the cripple, and which, in case of his being accepted at the Home, they have promised to continue to pay for his maintenance. I may add that the Board, when he was called before them the other day, gave great praise to his mother for the cleanliness and respectability of his appearance."

Poor, depressed, starved, neglected, hopeless, crippled boys, how long will it be before they come here for shelter, for hope, and renewal of life? I should ask the question—though the answer could only be a guess—but I am suddenly diverted by the tremendous ringing of a hand-bell, on which one vigorous young cripple is ringing a peal, which is almost loud enough to announce to all Kensington that it is "tea-time." The sound has the effect of bringing all the forty from their work—a contingent of young carpenters staying behind for a little while to dispose of some waste shavings which have been swept out of some corner where they may have been in the way. Then they come trooping into the big room, where they present so strange a variety of height and appearance, and also so remarkable a diversity of twist and lameness and distortion, that we are impressed at once with the melancholy fact that every boy there is in reality a cripple, and yet with the cheering reflection, inspired by some of the lively smiling faces, that there are vast mitigations of such afflictions—mitigations that come so near to cures as to make our neglect of them a very serious evil, when the means lie near at hand.

In this big room, which is neither dining-room, nor kitchen, nor refectory, but a homely combination of all three, there is no ornament, no sign of luxury, or of unnecessary expenditure—plain deal forms or stools at plain deal tables, on which are arranged a regiment of full-sized mugs of good sound tea, and plates, each containing a substantial half-pound slice of bread from a homely two-pound loaf, spread with butter or dripping. For breakfast the same quantity is provided, with the substitution of coffee for tea; and dinner consists of a half-pound of roast or boiled meat, with plenty of vegetables, and dumplings, pies, or puddings; while bread and cheese, or bread and butter, is served for supper. For it must be remembered that these are working lads, and that they require to be substantially, and, from the nature of their bodily affliction, even generously fed, so that these supplies of pure plain diet are not by any means excessive; and they are such as one very ordinary kitchen can supply—a kitchen, by-the-bye, which will probably be superseded by a more convenient one when the new wing shall be built. Yet there is something in these unadorned, bare, almost too plainly appointed places, which brings with it a reassuring conviction that the institution has never been pampered. The dining-room, which has to do duty for a school-room also—the play-room, which is a rather dim kind of retreat on this November evening—and the plain, rather bare, but still clean and airy dormitories (especially those in the big bay-windowed front rooms of the old red brick house), are evidences that the place does not belie its name; that it is really a home, but essentially an industrial home, where work goes on as a part of each day's blessing, and the title to play freely and with a light heart is thereby ensured.

COMFORTABLE WORDS.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"I am Thine: save me."—PSALM CXX. 94.

"THINE by creation; though that is not much; for evil angels and bad men—fallen and perverted as they are now—came forth from the creative hand of God. Thine by redemption, too; though that is not enough—for the sacrifice of Christ reaches over many who live in neglect or in defiance of it. But Thine in a higher sense, by a truer and more tender tie; Thine by adoption and grace; Thine by Thy loving acceptance of love, and by my glad surrender to Thy will and service." Such is the meaning of the former part of the text. The soul is conscious that an actual personal transaction of a spiritual nature has taken place between itself and Christ. There has been a transfer, an exchange, a passing into the region of the ownership of Christ; and to this the man makes his appeal.

That this is true of every Christian need scarcely be said. There are many gradations of spiritual attainment, many stages or levels of the spiritual life, some higher, some lower; but in one point all Christians are alike, in the fact of having quitted self — self-trust, self-dependence, self-love — for Christ. "Once I was my own, or at least, I thought so," the Christian may say: "now I am Thine;" and that he is such, is a cause of the deepest and most adoring gratitude.

On this relation the Christian builds that plea which is the second part of the text; not, be it remarked, that he puts forward the fact that he has accepted Christ. No! that would be too much like making a claim on the ground of his own merit. The sisters do not say, "Lord! he who loves Thee is sick," but they say, "Lord! he whom Thou lovest is sick." There you have the delicacy of the Christian instinct. There the true position is taken. Not the fact that Lazarus loves Christ (though that would be true), but the fact that Christ first loved Lazarus, and so drew forth his love, is the foundation of the earnest sisterly appeal. So, in our text: "I am Thine. Thou hast made me such. Thou hast drawn me by Thy Spirit; won me by Thy love; united me to Thyself by a faith which is Thine own gift: therefore, save me." It is an appeal to the Saviour not to forsake the work of His own hands—not to leave incomplete what He has Himself begun.

Now as to the words "save me." What do they mean? Certainly they do not refer to saving from perdition. That kind of salvation is already secured. "There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus;" and one who can truly say, "I am Thine"—is in no danger of the frightful penalty which will be exacted from impenitent Christless sinners. But the Christian desires to be saved from the power, from the influence of sin; and it is to this that the prayer is directed. A lady of whom we have heard was attacked with acute and agonising disease. When almost worn-out with incessant and protracted suffering, her chief anxiety was that she might not be tempted at any time to murmur against the will of her Heavenly Father. Probably enough she may have prayed for the removal, or at least for the mitigation of her anguish. It would have been unnatural not to have done so. But still, what she desired most was to be kept from the rebellion of impatience; to be preserved from the risk of dishonouring her Lord by complaining of the lot which He had appointed for her. What she said was, in effect, this—"I am Thine: save me from the sin of rebelling against Thee."

It may be well, perhaps, for us to attempt to conceive distinctly how it is that Christ saves us. Let us take a simple illustration for the purpose. We are deeply in debt. We owe thousands, which never, by any possibility, we can hope to pay. Our condition is desperate. Then a wealthy and compassionate friend steps forward to our relief. He pays our debts: he pays them down to the uttermost farthing, we contributing absolutely nothing to the liquidation—and we are free. Feeling the relief, now that the burden is gone, we pluck up courage, and fancy that we can get along for the future ourselves, with perhaps a little occasional help from our generous benefactor. But he says, "No; that cannot be. You must look to me for ready money to pay your way henceforward, just as you looked to me in the first instance for money for the liquidation of your debts. And you must look to me only. I do not consent to share with any one, not even with yourself, in meeting your daily expenses. Draw upon me to what extent you please; but only on condition that you draw upon no one else." You will easily see how this applies to spiritual things. In our prayers for help in the conflict with sin, we frequently ask—do we not?—as if we expected the Lord Jesus to add His strength to our strength, that we might accomplish the work conjointly with Him. But surely this is a mistake. There is something erroneous in supposing that we have an independent supply of strength of our own. We have really nothing apart from Christ. "Without Me," He says, "ye can do nothing." And our business is just to acknowledge and realise our own strengthlessness, and to leave ourselves without reserve in the hands of Christ, that He may work in us and through us in the conflict with indwelling sin.

But—are we not to look into ourselves, that we may watch against sin, detect its first risings, and crush them? Well, perhaps; but more, far more, to look out from self to Christ, and certainly not to try to crush sin ourselves, but to leave it to Christ to do the thing for us. There is a close resemblance, as we have already hinted, between the manner of salvation from the penalty of sin, and the manner of salvation from the power of sin. In the former case we are taught by the Spirit to resist our natural tendency to try to do something for ourselves. We just lie back in the Saviour's hands; we just rest upon His work; not a single jot or tittle of our own do we dream of adding to it. It is complete in itself. We are only too thankful to have such a perfect dependence to cast ourselves upon.

And in the latter case the Spirit teaches us to leave ourselves with a similarly entire and unreserving trust in the Saviour's hands. The struggle spoken of in Scripture is a struggle with our own Christ-resisting tendencies; with our own self-will; with our desire to contribute our own share to the victory. But we really win the victory when we leave it to Christ to win it for us.

Saved from that hell which is the separation of the soul from the living God, we have yet much else to be saved from—from pride, for instance; from self-seeking and self-exaltation; from impatience; from discontent; from irreverence; from worldliness; from unbelief; from the power of old habit: aye, and from many other outbreakings of that "old man," which is crucified, but not yet dead. And who is to save us? Jesus alone—Jesus allowed to work in us alone, without the obstruction of the help which we officiously offer Him. We look to Him to do it; we expect Him to do it. And thus looking and expecting, He will give us the victory.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 12. Enemies and Friends.

Chapters to be read—Acts xi., xii., xiii. (parts of.)

AN Enemy's Death. (Read xii. 19—25.) Our last lesson ended with the release of St. Peter from prison. From xii. 19 show how enraged Herod was with his escape, and how he vented his fury on the prison warders. He would feel completely beaten and humbled by the failure of his attempt. Cannot endure to remain in Jerusalem; where does he go? Remind the children how the same Herod Antipas (son of Herod the Great) had kept a "set" day once before. When was it? (Matt. xiv. 6.) What had happened there? His enemy beheaded, and he exultant. Now another similar day kept; probably many of the same people there—lords, captains, &c., of Galilee (Mark vi. 21). What does Herod do? and how do the people receive his speech? Does he stop them or reprove them? Contrast with conduct of Paul and Barnabas on similar occasion (Acts xiv. 13, 14). Describe the dreadful scene. The king in royal robes on his throne; courtiers, attendants, soldiers around; the hushed silence; the king's speech, the shout of applause; the king's sudden illness, doctors hastily summoned; the king carried out; the awe of the multitude; the speedy death. What effect would it have on the people? Who now were triumphant, the Christians or their enemies? So the Word of God grew, i.e., numbers were added to the Church. Now two apostles return. Where had they been? Must turn back and see.

Practical Lesson. God's power over His enemies. May perhaps be disposed to ask, Why was John Baptist beheaded, and Peter delivered from this same Herod? God's ways not as our ways. Can see, at any rate, how Herod was storing up vengeance for himself, and now God's power triumphantly shown in his destruction. So will finally all God's enemies be destroyed. May hold up heads and prosper now, must finally be punished. Let children put question, Am I God's friend or enemy? working for God or against Him? No middle course.

II. A Mission of Succour. (Read xi. 27—30.) Show Antioch on the map, as the headquarters for the present of the Church. Why had they left Jerusalem? Now receive a visit from some prophets, or teachers (xiii. 1). Who predicts the famine, and how could he? Remind how often we read of famine especially severe in Palestine. Thus Abraham avoided one by going into Egypt (Gen. xxii. 1, xxvi. 10). What was the first thought of disciples? to store up grain in case their supplies fell short? No; at once to send relief. Point out how evidently now the plan of having all goods in common had been abandoned, and each sent according to his ability and willingness. Who were selected to take the alms? These two, still friends, living and working together. How welcome they would be in Judea! how warmly received by brethren there as showing that they and their wants were not forgotten! This help would bind Christians together more closely. Pity not expended in mere words. For rules as to almsgiving see Matt. vi. 3, 2 Cor. ix. 7, James ii. 16. To whose house in Jerusalem would they probably go? (Acts xii. 12.) From this house they gain a new and active worker. Who is he, and what relative to Barnabas? (ver. 25; Col. iv. 10.) So the three—uncle, nephew, and friend—return to Antioch.

Practical Lesson. The unselfishness of religion. What is the Gospel rule as to our love to our fellowman? (Rom. xiii. 8, 9.) Therefore must have same care and regard for them as for ourselves, only it must proceed from love and not compulsion, or is worthless (1 Cor. xiii. 3).

III. A Mission of Enterprise. (Read xiii. 1.) The Church now well established, large number of Jews converted, a proselyte baptised. Who was he? A Gentile centurion and his company instructed and baptised. Enemies for the time put down, and rest in the Church. The time come for extending their work. All nations are to be taught (Mark xvi. 16). Still, no impatience; quietly wait for instructions, like Noah when world was dry, Abraham in Canaan before birth of son, Moses in Midian before sent to Pharaoh. God's time for work always best. At last summons came. Notice (1) The Call. Who gave instructions? Evidently Holy Spirit spoken of as a person. His great work in the salvation of the world, convincing of sin, &c., now begun. Comparing "I have called" (ver. 2) with ix. 15, where Christ is speaking, will be strong proof of His equality with the Son of God. (2) The preparation. Such very solemn and important work as of going to unknown lands, preaching to heathen, needed special preparation. Taught this by Christ (Matt. xvii. 21). (3) The ordination. As Christ laid hands on apostles (Luke xxiv. 50), so they on these two missionaries. A solemn and touching scene. Barnabas and Saul probably elected apostles in place of James and some other who was dead, so as to keep up the original number, twelve. Picture the two friends, with John as their servant (ver. 5), embarking at the port of Antioch, called Seleucia (ver. 4), the "prophets and teachers" (ver. 1) seeing them safe on board, the farewell greetings and good wishes expressed, the mission party full of eager hopes of the triumphs they should win.

PRACTICAL LESSON. Obedience to God's call. Though not given directly now, still His call often unmistakable. If we were called for such a work should we be ready? But are called to daily work for God to those around us. How are we doing it?

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the death of Herod.
2. What practical lesson does it teach?
3. On what mission did Barnabas and Saul first go?
4. Lay down some clear rules for almsgiving.
5. Describe their second mission.
6. What practical lesson does it teach us?

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXV.

EDA permitted herself to be led back to the quiet precincts of the Temple, that she might answer the artist's inquiries for the Chessingtons more at her ease than in the roar of the busy street; and she contrived to steer clear of any mention of her brother while she answered his questions respecting the countess's health, and her own reasons for being in London.

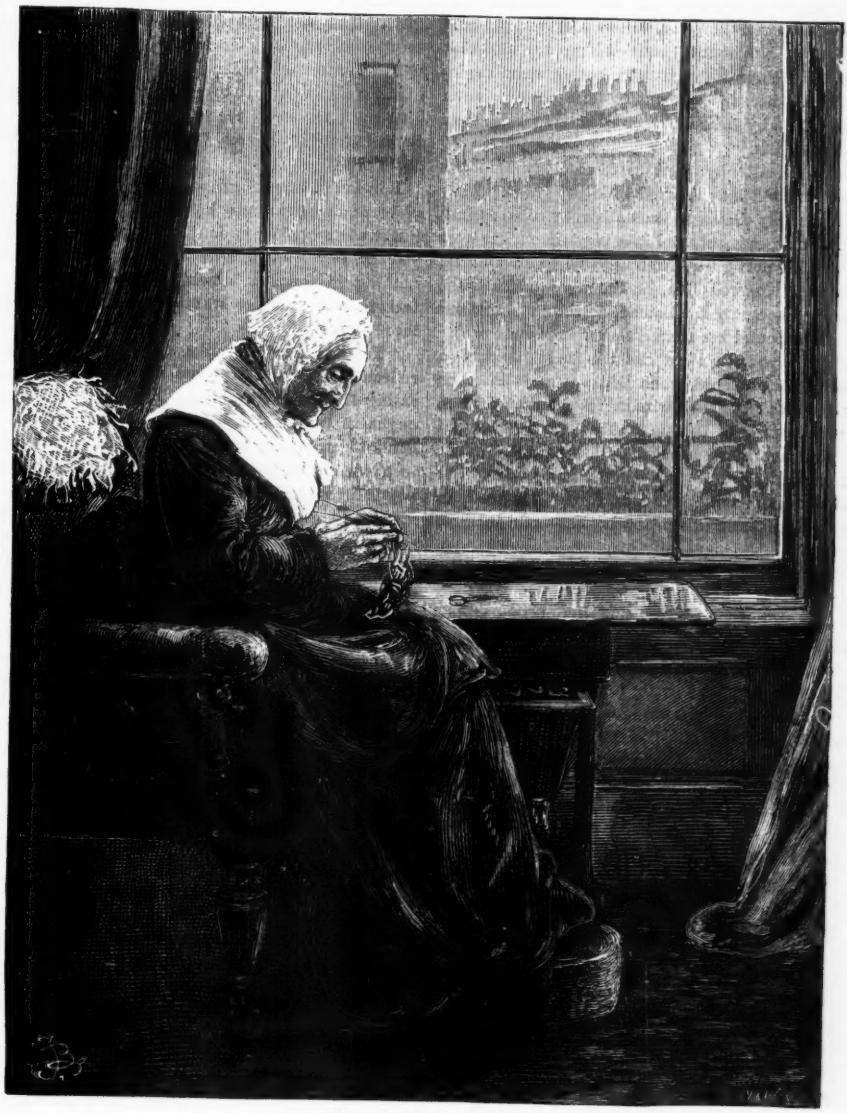
"I am sorry to hear that Lady Eudora has been ill; though I could fancy that such a trial of temper and patience would prove beneficial to her," Mr. Allonby observed. "She only wanted a little softening—toning down, to speak technically—to make her a very charming woman."

"You are right, Mr. Allonby," was the warm response, "she was always very lovable, in spite of her impetuosity, but she is doubly so now a touch of sorrow has passed over her head."

"Did you know that I succeeded in finishing my sketch of her ladyship while I was at the Hall?" he said, presently, "and have worked it up into a portrait, of which I should much like to hear your opinion. Will you let me have the pleasure of introducing you to my womankind? We live in one of the streets turning from the Strand towards the river; and I have talked of you so often to Doris and Gran, that they will not look upon you as a stranger."

Eda hesitated a minute, then accepted his offered arm, and walked with him to the street he indicated. It was a very quiet but respectable one, and she could not help being struck with the spotless hue of the blinds and curtains at the windows of that part of the house in Mr. Allonby's occupation. The sitting-room into which he led her was very small, but equally bright; and though the furniture was scanty and common, the exquisite neatness with which it was arranged, and the beauty of the ferns that filled the windows, gave it a very pleasant aspect.

A handsome but precise-looking woman, about thirty, who bore a strong resemblance to Mr. Allonby, started up as he opened the door, and ran to meet him; but instead of throwing herself into his arms, as Eda thought she intended doing, she stooped down to remove, with a duster she held in her hand, the dust his boots had gathered during his walk.



"Now you'll do, Fritz," she said, with a smile, as she arose; "only don't drop that glove you are holding, nor bring your hat into the room, please! But you are not alone!"

"No, Doris; this is Miss Granton. Is Gran in the humour for company to-day?"

"Gran's always pleased to see any one who doesn't talk rubbish and stuff," said a quavering voice from within, "so bring in your visitor, and let's see what she's like."

"Don't let Gran's plain speaking frighten you," said Mr. Allonby, laughing at Eda's doubtful look. "The truth is that some of my brother painters, who give me a call now and then, shock the dear old lady by discussing the heathen gods and goddesses in her presence, and going into raptures over the Venus de Medici and Apollo Belvidere. It so scandalises Gran that Christian men and women, instead of painting historical subjects or saints and martyrs, will perpetuate the old superstitions, that she has forbidden me to bring her such guests."

He led Eda forward to where, by the sunniest window, a very old lady, dressed with Quaker-like simplicity, was reclining in a well-stuffed arm-chair. She was knitting—or rather trying to knit, for her palsied hands frequently dropped stitches undetected by the eyes that age and tears had dimmed. But Doris Allonby was always ready to rectify this, and no one would have liked to disturb Gran's pleasant fancy that she was still of some use to those she loved.

(Drawn by F. Barnard.)

"She was knitting—or rather trying to knit."—p. 200.

When Mr. Allonby brought Eda towards her, she leaned forward doubtfully, in a listening attitude, and wrinkled her brows till the soft voice of the visitor fell upon her ear, when she nodded and smiled, as if the sound gratified her; for now that all Gran's senses but that of hearing were beginning to fail her, she was apt to form her opinion of strangers less by their looks or what they said, than how they said it.

While Mr. Allonby went to fetch Lady Eudora's portrait the old lady chatted with her guest. They were insensibly drawn to each other by some assimilation of temperament, and in a very short time were talking with a freedom from reserve quite unusual in the shy reserved Eda, or the aged woman who was more frequently the listener to the conversations carried on around her than a sharer in them.

"Fritz says you have no relatives left but a brother," she observed, when Eda was established on the ottoman at her feet, winding some yarn for her. "Is this brother in London? Then it's just as well that you have come here too. Young men always want a home; or if they cannot have that," she added, fancying she heard Eda sigh, "it's good for them to have some one near who has their interest at heart."

"But unless a brother and sister are actually living together, what can they do to prove that they have that interest in each other?" and Eda sighed again, for she could not help thinking how small a part she had in Mark's life.

"I am not sure that living together is always best for young people," Gran responded, after duly considering the subject. "When they grow up, they are apt to get in each other's way."

"Gran means that their tastes and wishes often clash," Doris Allonby explained; and she nodded assent.

"Yes, that is it, and it leads to their bickering and worrying each other over what really isn't any one's fault. Fritz and I saw this with our boys; and we let them all take wing as soon as the nest grew too small for them. Yes, one after another went their way, and we never had reason to think that it was a mistake."

"I was not aware that Mr. Allonby is the head of so large a family," Eda remarked.

"There are ten of us," said Doris, who was trying to efface a spot she had found on a sideboard. "I have a goodly flock of brothers and sisters."

"Yes, and they have all left home but Doris herself," Gran went on; "but we don't let them forget us, or think that we forget them because they are not just at one's elbow."

"Tell me how you contrive this," said Eda, eagerly. "I do not ask it out of idle curiosity, I assure you."

"Nay, dear, it's simple enough. Just a little letter—postage is cheap now, thank goodness—or a loving message, or even a newspaper or a cutting from one that treats of some subject that interests them, will do it as well, perhaps better, than costly gifts. They can't get either of these without saying to themselves, 'Ah! Gran has been thinking about us,' or 'Fritz has recollected what we said about that affair, and sends this to show that we were right.' Just such trifles as these, and a hearty prayer for them every night, keeps them together, God bless them all!"

Eda found herself struggling to keep back a burst of tears, and her tones betrayed this as she asked, "But what would you do if he—if one of them kept you at bay, not unkindly, but as if there were nothing in common betwixt you, and so made you feel that he neither wanted your help nor—your love?"

"Tom Allonby was like that once," said Gran, reflectively; "and I proposed to give him a good rating for it, and ask him if this was the way he ought to behave to the brother who had kept the home together, and toiled night and day to make up to them all for what they had lost. But my dear boy Fritz was wiser than I; he bade me let the lad alone, and give him a double share of love and pity, as he was doing; and so I held my tongue, even when I was sorely vexed—held it till one night I came in here rather suddenly, and found Tom with his head on his brother's shoulder, telling his troubles. I never asked what had been amiss; I was satisfied to see that the lad was himself again, and all the stronger for having overcome temptation. But, bless me! how I am talking. You should have stopped me, Doris, my dear."

"There's a window open somewhere," Doris rather irrelevantly answered. "The house is full of dust. I can see it settling on yonder table."

She scarcely spoke again while Eda was there; she was too fully engaged in rectifying the mistakes of her brother, who now entered with the picture. He had neglected to wipe the frame, which had to be carefully rubbed before he was permitted to bring it beyond the threshold; then a sheet of thick paper must be laid on the table before it was set down, lest a scratch should be made on the highly-polished mahogany; and then Fritz contrived to kick up a corner of the crumb-cloth so often, that Doris ran away for hammer and tacks; and by the time she came back he had, in resting his arm on the mantelpiece, deranged so many of the old-fashioned ornaments, that their mistress was in despair till he moved, and she was able to restore them to order.

Eda could scarcely attend to what Mr. Allonby was saying while his sister fidgeted round in this manner; and she drank the wine and ate the slice of cake so hospitably pressed upon her, in fear and trembling, lest she should let fall any crumbs on the well-brushed carpet. Gran, despite the dimness of her eyes, suspected this, for she laid her hand on her guest's, and said, a little quaintly—

"Don't mind Doris's ways, my dear; she's over-careful, but I tell her she had better be too precise than a sloven; and we all reaped the advantage of her neatness when there were six great boys at home, and each with a hobby that would have made us no end of mess if she hadn't been at hand to help them clear up."

Doris smiled good-humouredly when she discovered that her own precision was on the tapis. "My brother should have told you, Miss Granton, that I am sadly old-maidish. It's foolish, I know; but I cannot help being on thorns when I see anything out of place. However, Gran and Fritz are very patient with me."

"But I'm afraid," said Mr. Allonby, snatching up a pamphlet he had drawn out of his pocket with his handkerchief—"I am afraid I do not keep my part of our compact as faithfully as Doris fulfils hers. You must know, Miss Granton, that I pledged myself never to interfere with her arrangements, on condition that she allows me to be as untidy as I please in my studio. There disorder reigns—doesn't it, Doris?—to such an extent that I think it advisable to carry the key in my pocket, lest my sister should peep in when I am absent, and not be able to resist a soap-and-water frolic at the expense of my comfort."

"You'll come again?" said Gran, as Eda rose to bid her adieu. "You've neither told us any scandal, nor talked about the last new fashions, so I shall be glad to see you."

"Gran's invitation is not very elegantly worded," Mr. Allonby remarked; "but she will be sorry if you do not accept it, and so shall I. Will you pay us another visit, Miss Granton, and soon?"

Eda was just thanking him, when impatient fingers beat a tattoo on the door, and then opened it a little way, that a soft pleading voice might say, "It's only poor little me! Are all my faults forgiven, and may I come in? Gran won't stick her knitting-needles into me for behaving so badly the other night, will she?"

"Come in, Flossy, and don't be so childish!" said Doris. "Are you alone?"

"Am I ever alone?" and the speaker permitted a very pretty face to be seen, surmounted with extravagantly large coils of reddish-brown hair, and an Alpine hat. "Don't you know that I am such a coward I daren't walk along the streets without some one to protect me?"

"But who is with you?" asked Doris again; and the new-comer laughed coquettishly.

"Oh, somebody; and I've left him in the hall hunting for my glove. Who's this young lady? Aren't you going to introduce me?"

The owner of the pretty face tripped into the room, shaking into place the frills and trimmings of her dress, and laid a hand on the artist's arm with a very bewitching gesture, that expressed a little bashfulness, a little innocent helplessness, and an appeal to him for his care and kindness, that Eda thought very charming; and when she learned that this pretty dressy little creature was a cousin of Mr. Allonby's, she decided in her own mind that she was something nearer and dearer still than even a cousin to the young man to whose side she was nestling.

"Gran, dear, may I come and kiss you?" asked Miss Flossy Devon, when she had made two or three civil little speeches to Eda. "May I, Gran? Say yes! I have been on my best behaviour for these three days."

"Only because it suited you," Gran answered, sharply, but permitting and even returning the caress. "You're a selfish little thing, and never do right without a reason for it."

"But I'm very good-tempered, am I not? Every one scolds me, and I always forgive them. Don't I, Fritz, dear?"

He smiled down into the soft eyes that were raised to his own, but it was rather gravely.

"Don't appeal to me, Flossy; I gave you over to your own devices long ago."

She began to pout, looking still prettier in her wilful mood than before. "If you talk of me in that strain before Miss Granton, she will think—there, I don't know what she will think of me! and only because I cannot be as sober and precise as dear old Doris there. But here comes somebody. Has he been searching all this while for my glove? I forgot to tell him that it was in my own pocket."

"I hope you have not brought a stranger with you," whispered Doris, twitching the brown-holland cover off a cushion.

"No, indeed; I daren't go to such lengths as that, dare I, papa Fritz? You are only tolerant of my old admirers, are'nt you? while as for Gran——" a saucy laugh pointed the sentence. "No, Doris, it's only Richie—Mr. Atwood, I mean;" and she tripped to the door, to mock him with the sight of the glove she had duped him into searching for.

CHAPTER XXVI.

INVOLUNTARILY Eda's lips had repeated the words "only Richie," and then she shrank behind Doris to conceal her agitation. She had been secretly wishing to see the young man, but not with other eyes taking note of their meeting; not with the gay thoughtless girl standing by with whom he seemed on such familiar terms.

But she had scarcely time to think these thoughts, for already Richie was in the room, playfully reproaching Flossy for her treachery. He broke off, however, in the midst of a sentence, for his quick, bright glance had swept round the room, and Eda was recognised.

One moment of embarrassment, so transient as to be scarcely perceptible, and then he was clasping her hand, and inquiring after her health and welfare with such tenderness, that Mr. Allonby slipped his hands into his pockets and walked away to the furthest window, while his fair cousin's brow wrinkled, first with surprise, and then into something very like a frown.

A little constraint began to steal over every one, and Richie, perceiving this, offered his arm to Eda.

"You were just going away when I came in? Then you must let me walk with you, that I may ask all the questions that are on the tip of my tongue without boring our kind friends here."

"But Miss Granton," interposed Flossy, demurely, "are you quite sure that you shall not bore her?"

"She will forgive me if I do," he replied. "She knows that I am anxious to know all the latest news from the old home. I do not see one of my boyhood's friends every day."

But although he said this, he had no sooner led Eda away from Mr. Allonby's door than he sank into silence, replying to the few remarks she forced herself to make with a brevity oddly at variance with his general manner.

"Let us go through the enclosure," he said, when they had entered St. James's Park; "it is pleasanter there."

She consented, and they paced along one of the most secluded paths, still silent, till suddenly, pressing her arm closer to his side, Richie exclaimed, "Dear Eda, we love each other dearly. If we have never said this in words, it is none the less true. When, then, are we to be married? No, don't shrink from me—don't look as if you thought me too hasty; you don't know how badly I want you! If I had such a dear, sensible, prudent little girl as you are always near me, I should be as steady as old Time himself! I don't drift into folly because I like it—I don't, indeed!—but for want of some one to help me to do better. You shall be my teacher, my guide, Eda, and make me as good and religious as yourself."

"You are bewildering me," she stammered, when she could collect herself to reply to the ardent entreaties for her consent to their immediate union that he kept pouring out. "I did not expect——"

"I know what you are about to say," he interrupted; "that of late I have been neglectful. I have written less frequently, I confess it; but my heart has never wavered. I have always felt that if there was one woman in the world who could not only make me happy, but arouse whatever good there is in me, it was Eda Granton. Without you I shall never be anything but an indolent, careless fellow, floating wherever the current carries me."

"But this is not right, Richie."

"Don't I know it, my dear? Isn't it for that very reason that I am so anxious to win the wise little woman who would stand between me and my evil impulses? As for your going into another situation, it is all nonsense! I want you worse than any one else can do—worse than you think."

She began to regard him anxiously. "You frighten me, Richie. What could I do for you that you cannot do for yourself? You overrate my influence. Mark's example," she added, sorrowfully, "ought to have shown you how little I really possess."

"Very little with him, I dare say, for he is too self-absorbed to care for any one but himself. Forgive me, dear—I did not mean to speak unkindly of him; but you must not gauge me by Mark. Let us talk only of ourselves. You will be my wife, Eda, and at once—will you not?"

She hesitated a while, and then answered him with a very gentle and yet decided "No, Richie, I cannot. You have taken me by surprise, and—and I must have time to think over what you have said before I can give you any answer at all."

"Yes, and then you will consult Mark, who, with all his faculties bent on making money, never has time to be as weak and foolish as other young men; and he will tell you that I am careless and dissipated. He will; I know it. He has gone the length of accusing me of selfishness, at the very time he was stepping on my shoulders to climb into the better position that ought to have been mine."

"Have you quarrelled with Mark?" she asked, with much anxiety.

"Quarrelled? no, no, dear—only told each other a few wholesome truths. We are civil when we meet. But here we are, at the gate, and you have not given me my answer."

"I have none ready for you, Richie. Do not distress me by urging your wishes in this way!"

"And yet, Eda——" he began; but she checked him. She had had time now to compose herself a little, and draw a few deductions from his speeches,—deductions which were certainly not those he had intended her to make.

"Stay, Richie; before you attempt to say any more, let me ask what you would think of me if I consented to marry a young man of whom I know so little as I know of you?"

"My dear girl, we have been friends from our childhood!" he expostulated.

It was an unfortunate reminder, for it recalled to her recollection that her mother had distrusted him; and she resolutely withdrew her hand. Her heart—or it might be more correct to say her girlish romance—pleaded for him as forcibly as his own impassioned entreaties; but Eda—would that it were so with all of us!—had learned to carry all difficulties to her chamber, and there pray to be directed how to act.

"It is not generous to strive to induce me to make so rash a promise," she told him.

"But if we love each other better than the whole world?"

"But do we?" Eda interrogated, in her turn; and Richie's handsome face crimsoned with mortification.

"You doubt me because I have suffered myself to be beguiled into dancing attendance on that arrant little flirt, Flossy Devon. But if you knew how she twists and turns a fellow——"

Again Eda stopped him, and this time with real displeasure in her tones. "I had rather not hear any more, Richie. I have made no charges, so you need not defend yourself. I am nearly home, so I will bid you adieu."

"But you do not forbid me to write to you? You will think over what I said? Dear Eda, if you could but understand how thoroughly all my hopes are centred in you, I don't think you would refuse me the boon I crave."

She broke from him more agitated than he imagined; nor was it till in solitude she sat recalling all he had said that she could think of his pleadings calmly. It was then she sought in vain to find amongst them one expression of the protecting love every woman hopes to receive from her husband. She was to be his guide, his guardian angel, to lead him aright and help him to conquer all evil inclinations; but what was he to be to her? Apparently Richie had not taken the marital obligations into account at all.

(To be continued.)

FANNY FORREST; OR, EVIL COMMUNICATIONS.

CHAPTER III.

OWEN could not but feel perplexed, and more than a little annoyed, at this strange conduct on his sister's part. That Ruth had seen him he felt no doubt, from the sudden start with which she had turned her head in his direction at Fanny's evident confusion; and yet she seemed no way inclined to rush upon him, half strangling him in her delight, as he had, perhaps foolishly, pictured that she would do; nay, it was not till he was quite within the gate, and had given his peculiar whistle—a well-known signal retained from the old pleasuring days together—that Ruth at last turned round and advanced to meet him.

"Why, Ruth, old girl," he said, as he threw his arm round her after the first greeting, "have you no sort of a heartier welcome to give a fellow than this?"

"I'm sure I don't know what you mean!" replied Ruth. "Of course I'm delighted to see you! I never knew any one talk such nonsense as you do sometimes! Only, as I had not the slightest idea you were coming, of course I could not be on the watch for you." And Ruth suddenly stopped, as she felt Owen's eyes were scanning her face closely.

"No, of course you could not," said Owen, in so cordial a voice that she felt, somehow, wonderfully relieved. "It's all right, and I was only joking; only, now that I am here, old girl, clear off that thundery look, and let us be merry together: and when I've just gone in to see father for a moment, I will come out to you again, and you must tell me all the news."

"Father!" echoed Ruth, her brow clouding over again; "why, father's not come back—nor isn't likely to do so for some time, to judge by that," and she tossed the envelope in her hand across the flowerbed at her feet to the place where her brother stood.

For a moment Owen trembled. Could there be any bad news in concealment for him to hear? could this be the cause of Ruth's strange manner? and could the paper in his hand contain intelligence to darken this bright summer day, and turn his pleasure into grief?

He must have asked the question pretty plainly by both eye and cheek, for Ruth seemed touched, and quickly answered, with a laugh, "Why, it is all right, you goose! I thought I had written to tell you—only I believe, after all, I forgot to do so—that the squire, who went up to London last week, took father with him, that he might see some wonderful flower-show or other there was going to be held this week."

"Did he, really?" answered Owen. "Poor father! so he has got the desire of his heart at last, and is glorying, no doubt, in roses and carnations to his heart's content. I say, Ruth, why did you never tell me this before?"

"I said just a minute ago I intended to tell you, only I forgot," answered Ruth, sharply. "Of course, it's all very delightful for father, I've no doubt," she continued; "but I think you might look at both sides of the question, and consider that it's not quite so agreeable for me to sit shut up here the whole day long, with not a soul to speak to but old Hannah."

Ruth spoke very quickly, and although Owen caught her by the hand, and tried to draw her down beside him, she pulled herself away, and went on, as quickly as before—

"And there, that is a telegram which has just come to say he is going to stay another week, so as not to lose some other show of some kind; and not even a word to say he is sorry for me, or anything like it even. I must say I think it is a little hard—I do, indeed!" and Ruth turned away her head, that Owen might not see the tears that were in her eyes.

"By the way, Ruth," he broke in, suddenly, "who was that girl I saw you talking to at the gate just now, as I was coming up? I don't much fancy her appearance, somehow, and I think the less she has to say to you, or you to her, the better it will be."

"Why?" asked Ruth, stopping suddenly short. "What do you know about her? I should like to hear. I scarcely thought the stories they have got up against her had travelled as far as Bentham yet."

"No stories about her have reached Bentham yet—at least, as far as I can tell," replied Owen, in some amazement at his sister's vehemence. "All I know about her I learnt this afternoon, on my way here; and I cannot help saying again that I do not think you will gain any advantage from her companionship." And Owen in a few words related his meeting with Robbie, and consequent search for Fanny.

Ruth listened with unwilling ears; and at the conclusion of the story, although her heart told her Owen was not altogether wrong in his judgment, the strong feelings within broke out without control.

"I don't care!" she cried, angrily; "even if there is some truth in what you say, it would not have signified a pin if she had seen what was in the telegram, every word of it. She only fetched it for me from the post to save the boy the trouble of coming out here with it. It is very easy to make up a story about a person, once there's a prejudice against her. Besides, it is always the same way; it was just the very same with father. No one ever thinks how lonely I am here; and just because I made friends with her a little when she came, and once or twice when father came back in the evening and found her here, he was quite furious, and when she had gone he scolded at me more than he had ever done before!"

Owen would fain have taken an opportunity of putting in a word now to soothe his sister, but she would not allow him.

"Yes," she continued, while the tears dropped thickly down upon the frills of her black lustre apron—"yes, I should not have minded anything but that. He might have had some confidence in me, I think; but before he went away he talked to me as much about leaving me alone as if he thought I had no sense at all, and ended up by telling me he forbade me while he was away—yes, forbade me! to ask Fanny inside the house till he came back, and even said he wished me to be content with Hannah's company, and not to walk about with her at all."

"Come along, old girl," Owen said, at last, with rather a heavy sigh; "you must give me a bit of supper, and then I must turn my steps to Bentham again. I don't want to say anything to vex you, dear," he continued; "but don't you think that father is more often right than wrong in what he thinks? and even if it seemed a bit hard to have to give up your new friend for a while, you may be quite sure in the long run you'd find he was right. I thought, once upon a time, when first I went away from here, that most of the advice he gave me was, to say the least, unnecessary, and that I knew the ways of the world quite well enough, without so many sage directions; but the days have come, and temptations have come, which I could never have pulled through, if it had not been for these very words of help. And somehow I think, if you had only just the heart to try, you'd find it the same with you."

But Ruth had not the heart—at least, she would not show it, if she had. She walked on into the house, and prepared the meal, as Owen had asked her to do, but she vouchsafed no bright smiles or cheery words with it. Indeed, it was not till Owen rose again from the table, and took up his hat from the seat beside him, that, with a pouting look, she asked him what chance there was that he would come again, to while away only one evening until her father's return.

"None, Ruthie—none, I am afraid," he said, as he kissed her and said good-night. "We have a lot of very hard work coming on next week, and I could not ask for another holiday till it is over. But cheer up, old girl, and let me have a line sometimes, to tell me how you are getting on." And with as bright a smile as he could muster, Owen left the cottage.

The stars were shining clear and bright above him, and as he turned into the meadows the smell of the new-cut hay came sweetly upon the air, but although everything looked, if possible, lovelier now than when he had gone along the same road before, to-day there was no sound of cheery whistling in the air, no bright light of hope accomplished in his eye. No, as he walked along, his thoughts lingered in the home he had just left, and the troubled face of the sister he loved still kept before his eyes, till he found himself again within the little town of Bentham, and the holiday so long anticipated was over.

The two or three days which passed after Owen's visit were dull enough, it must be confessed, for Ruth. Hannah, the only servant, who tyrannised over the household generally, was even more than usually captious, and, as Ruth expressed it, in a word of her own coining, did nothing but "barge" at her the whole day long. The hours seemed to pass very wearily without her father's visits to and fro to look forward to, and many an hour was spent by Ruth leaning idly out of the window of the little sitting-room, her eyes wandering aimlessly over the garden hedge, to the road beyond, her spirit chafing inwardly more than a little at the interdict laid upon her friendship with Fanny Forrest.

That Owen had sided with her father did not change Ruth's mind a bit. She was determined that in this case her judgment should be proved to be the correct one, and each and every day she whispered to herself that her father would yet be sorry for the injury he had done her friend. She did not dare to disobey him by inviting the girl within the house, much as she longed to do so. No, she would keep to the letter of the law, hard as it seemed to her; but with a longing gaze she used to watch for the first glimpse of the straw hat, and the dark face beneath it, as each evening it came sloping along under the garden hedge. Then, when Hannah's portly frame had been seen wandering off towards the extensive poultry-yard placed by the squire's wife beneath her care, the garden gate would be pushed softly open, and the intruder, as she somehow felt herself to be, would come along the garden walk, with the same sly, cat-like motion, till she reached the window where she knew Ruth was certain to be found in patient, or rather impatient, waiting: and as they talked together, and Fanny, with insatiable curiosity, drew from her companion all the minutiæ of her daily life, the glittering eyes were all the time taking in the scope of every article within the room, and measuring with curious accuracy their value.

Mrs. Leonard had not been very far wrong in her judgment when she described Fanny as a bad lot. Bad, in so far as being wild, daring, and utterly unscrupulous, she certainly was; and with these characteristics it was not strange that her advent generally brought confusion in its train wherever she went. Now, in her evening conferences with Ruth, she seemed to revel in giving free vent to her imagination; and plots and plans for excitement and amusement came ripely from her lips, joined with commiseration for Ruth's quiet pent-up life, and temptations to break through all rules and regulations—so wild and impossible that it was only the look, almost of terror, in Ruth's sober eyes, that checked her companion's speech.

It seemed to her an incredible thing that such a holiday-time as Ruth was having now—so free from authority and control, with every hour of the day to be spent exactly as she pleased—should be allowed to pass without some adventure to mark it out from other times; and over and over again, with every wile that she was mistress of, had Fanny petitioned the girl to throw decorum to the winds, and join with her in striking out some plan by which her love of adventure could be carried out.

And Ruth listened and laughed, and hushed the voice of conscience by saying to herself that it was all a joke—that Fanny did not really wish her to do anything wrong; and yet, while she laughed, she sometimes almost trembled as she felt how great an influence, almost a power, her friend had gained upon her. As far as gratifying her curiosity went, it had amused Ruth not a little to spread out before her on the window-sill each pretty little trophy or ornament with which the sitting-room was adorned, listening with some pride to Fanny's admiration—which, whether genuine or not, was at least loudly expressed.

"I cannot show you anything more now, Fanny—I cannot, indeed!" said Ruth, at length, one evening when, with even more than ordinary boldness, Fanny had succeeded in getting the contents of a certain old-fashioned cabinet brought out to view. It had not been done without some trouble and much persuasion, and Ruth had flushed and fidgeted with her keys for long before she consented to her friend's request. "Father would not like it—I know he would not. And there is nothing more that you would care to see—there is not, indeed." The scruples of conscience she had been feeling all the evening were now asserting themselves loudly, and the inward misery growing stronger as she spoke, Ruth's voice grew more in earnest.

"Nay, then I'm sure there is not, if you say so; and I'm sure you've been awfully good to show me what you have," replied Fanny, in a wheedling tone. "But just stop for a second—do, there's a dear; just let me have another peep. What's hidden there—in there—right away back in the corner yonder?—that queer little leather case, I mean, with the scrap of crackly paper sticking out. That might be something worth one's while to see. Don't put it away, then, Ruth, for a moment; 'twill do no harm to take a spy at it."

"That? There's nothing in that, I assure you, Fanny, that you would care for one pin; nothing but some old things—old treasures of father's; and I know he would not have us touch them—I know he would not." And Ruth withdrew the pocket-book beyond her companion's reach, grasping it firmly in her hand.

"Oh, very well!" retorted Fanny, with well-assumed anger, drawing herself away from the window-sill, across which more than half her body had been stretched; "put it away, of course—put it away. I understand you very well; there's nothing in it, as you say, but treasures—money, I suppose; and when it comes to that, I am not to be trusted. I thank you for the good opinion you possess of my honesty—very much indeed!"

"What do you mean, Fanny?" asked Ruth, in bewilderment at this sudden attack. "I never said anything about money, did I? That was not what I meant at all. Indeed, you are unkind; you could not tell what I was thinking of!" and Ruth stretched out her hand and plucked at Fanny's sleeve to draw her back into her old position again.

"I don't know what you mean? Well, perhaps I don't; but this I know, that though I never have had the handling of many a bank-note in my life—and more's the pity!—if that's not the corner of one that's sticking out there, my name's not Fanny Forrest! And when you'll show me everything else but this, why, it is not very hard to put two and two together, and guess the reason why."

"That—that," said Ruth, looking down, and now perceiving Fanny's drift—"that is a note, of course; I never said it wasn't, did I? I know father told me he put it in here in case I wanted it while he was away; but I never thought of it again. That was not what I meant when I told you I could not show you what was here."

"Then what did you mean?" asked Fanny, her curiosity inflamed by words conjuring up she knew not what visions of what might possibly be concealed within the case. "I like plain speaking, girl, I tell you; and if you don't trust me, just say it out, and that's all about it. I am more than ready to take the hint."

"I do trust you. Oh, Fanny! why are you so unkind?" cried Ruth, in anguish at the implied unfaithfulness to her friend, and yet held back by some inward force from a greater unfaithfulness still. "There is nothing in it but a few old keepsakes—nothing. But there," she cried, in despair at the unmoved expression upon Fanny's face—"there, you may look yourself: it does not make much matter, after all; and you shall never say again I doubted you." And the yellow pocket-book was yielded from the steady grasp in which it had been held.

Fanny's greedy fingers quickly seized upon it, her greedier eyes gloated over the expected treat, while Ruth could only cover up her face in her hands that she might not see the act of sacrilege.

The black eyes twinkled with a strange delight as, first of all, she drew the crisp note from its hiding, and lovingly she fingered it, and smoothed its creases out upon her knee, before she dived a second time to try what there was further to disclose. Not much, certainly, to judge by the exclamation of disgust and disappointment as, deliberately turning the leathern envelope inside out, its contents fluttered to the ground at Ruth's feet. Not much, indeed—nothing more than a few tokens of a love of long ago: lost, it might be, but not forgotten; treasure, indeed, but only the token of a treasure not now on earth, but stored in safer keeping yet—a few withered flowers, bound together with a scrap of faded ribbon; a fold of hair, still soft and fair as when it had been laid away; and this was all.

A mocking laugh, followed by mocking words, echoed through the room, as Fanny tossed the shabby-looking cover back within the cabinet.

There was a longer silence than usual before Fanny, with a long-drawn sigh, began again: "Oh, golly! I say, Ruth, if only I were you, and you was me, and this here note were mine, instead of yourn, we'd have a spree, we would. I'd treat you to it, fine and handsome, so I would, and no mistake! Oh dear! oh dear!" and another long sigh brought the sentence to a close.

But no answer being made to this speech either, Fanny shifted her position just a little, and continued: "I say, Ruth, what's wrong? You've gone to sleep, I think. Just hearken for a moment, till I tell you what I'd do if, as I said before, the tables were turned, and you were me, and I were you. Well, let me see; this is Wednesday—Wednesday evening; and your father don't come home till Saturday, eh? and Friday afternoon old Hannah, bless her, goes to meeting—don't she—and takes a cup o' tea after, with a friend, don't she, eh? Well, then, on that very Friday afternoon I'd dress myself up as smart as smart could be, I'd take this money in my hand, I'd walk to Bentham, and I'd take the train from there to Upton, where all the shows are being held this week; and if I wouldn't see the tents and the fireworks, and listen to the band to my heart's content, why, my name isn't Fanny, as I said before!"

"And what about treating me if I were you?" asked Ruth, who, against her will though it were, could not but realise the picture thus imagined.

"Why, that's of course," replied Fanny, now taking up the wheedling tone again. "And you'd do the same, wouldn't you? you wouldn't leave poor Fanny from the fun, would you, supposing you went to it yourself?"

"Of course not," answered Ruth, absently. "But there's not much good in supposing anything about it. I never got the chance of seeing such a thing in all my life, and I don't suppose I ever shall: and besides—— Here, give me that, Fanny; it is time to put it all away and say good-night. I only wish we had not touched the cabinet at all. Father would never forgive me if he knew," and Ruth sighed disconsolately.

"Do you just think it over, and I'll call to-morrow, Ruth, early—so be on the watch; and we can finish our chat out then." And in another minute the garden gate had closed upon her retreating figure, and Ruth was left alone.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

75. Of whom is it recorded that "he went down and slew a lion in a pit on a snowy day?"

76. Give two passages where mulberry-trees are mentioned.

77. What present did Saul purpose to make to Samuel when he went to inquire concerning his father's asses?

78. Who was the father of St. Peter?

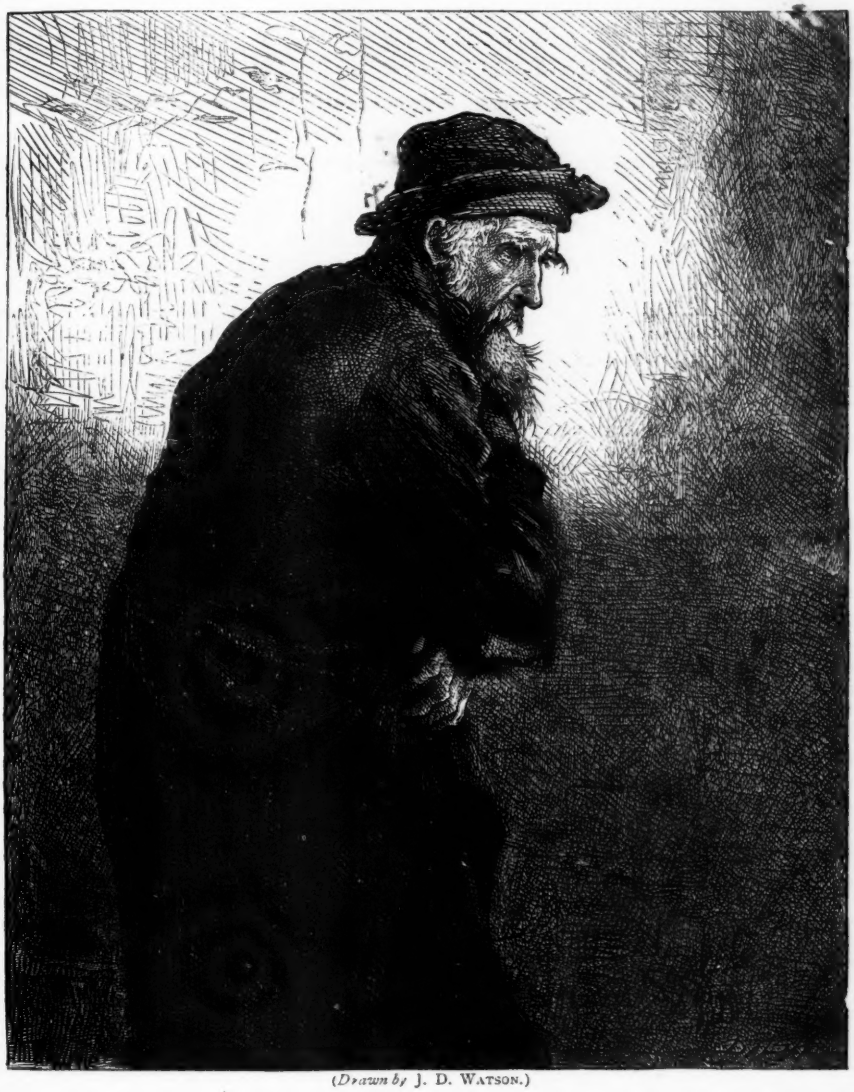
79. What place is said to have been a "Sabbath day's" journey from Jerusalem?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 176.

61. Of seven hundred of the tribe of Benjamin (Judges xx. 16).

62. By Hiel the Bethelite, fulfilling the prophecy of Joshua (Joshua vi. 26; 1 Kings xvi. 34).

63. "See ye how this son of a murderer hath sent to take away mine head" (2 Kings vi. 32).



64. St. Peter (1 Peter ii. 25).

65. To Philemon (Phil. xxii).

66. The mighty men who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 1, 2).

67. Numbers xii. 3.

68. Forty-eight (Josh. xxi. 41).

(Drawn by J. D. WATSON.)

THE OUTCAST: A PORTRAIT.

A PAIR of earnest piercing eyes,
A grandly-outlined face,
And noble brow, whereon there lies
Stern thought's deep-furrowed trace,

Yet more—for ever and anon,
A restless look of care
Flits o'er to tell that hope has gone,
And left but grim despair.

With not a single earthly friend
To offer kindly love,
Scant faith in life that has its end
In happiness above;

He shudders as his locks grow grey,
Scarce knowing what he fears,
And thus, without one cheering ray
He stumbles through the years.

G. W.

THE TRIPLETS OF THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, AUTHOR OF "THE FURNACE," "THE FACE OF THE KING," ETC.

II.—THE THREE HEBREW MARTYRS.

"And these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace."—DANIEL iii. 23.

THE arbitrary King Nebuchadnezzar conceived the project of erecting a gigantic figure as a new deity. The image, which was outwardly covered with gold, and which, inclusive of the pedestal, stood ninety feet high, was erected in the plains of Dura, in the province of Babylon. A day was specified for its dedication, and an imperial mandate was dispatched to the influential men throughout the province, summoning them to attend the ceremony of dedication—a ceremony in which a new god was to be sanctioned and established. Forthwith from their various districts these representatives of the people gathered. With great rejoicing the idolaters inaugurated the proceeding, and we can believe there was not a scruple in the breast of one of them. They were accustomed to worship idols; and to bow heart and head before a new god was a gratification in no sense opposed to their creed and practice. But there were three men among the numbers assembled who acknowledged but One God—and who, loving and trusting that One, felt it would be a violation of the fundamental principles of their holy religion if they consented in any form to render homage to another. They had assembled with the rest at the dedication of the golden image, because they felt it to be their duty. They heard a higher mandate than that of Nebuchadnezzar. They felt within the summons of a nobler Being than any earthly monarch. They could not allow the imposing ceremony to pass off quietly and triumphantly without a word being spoken, or an act performed on behalf of the Supreme God. They were Hebrews—children of the men who had witnessed the omnipotent power, unerring wisdom, and matchless sympathy of God, again and again—and could they now, though in captivity, allow judgment to go against the Hebrew faith by default? No! The light of Heaven had been deposited with them, and they felt responsible for its diffusion and defence. Their obligations to the Eternal were not changed because they were in a minority. Though seemingly powerless among a multitude of opponents, yet their conviction of duty was irresistible. Doubtless they called to remembrance the command of God given to Moses on Sinai, and the wondrous vindication of the claims of Jehovah made by the Prophet of Horeb before the priests of Baal; and, with a burning zeal for the glory of the Lord of Hosts, these three men obeyed the call of Nebuchadnezzar that they might have an opportunity of protesting publicly against idolatry, and exalting the Infinite One.

The whole company being assembled, the herald, with a loud voice, read the proclamation, "That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king hath set up: and whoso falleth not down and worshippeth shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace." Now had arrived that moment of trial which must call into play all the power of principle, all the strength of character, all the vigour of faith—a moment that must leave these three Hebrews either stronger or weaker, either honoured of God or wholly unworthy of Divine favour—a moment that should print itself upon the world's history—a moment pregnant with vital consequences and far-reaching influences. What a crucial moment was that when life and death hung in the balance! Such seasons occur sometimes in our career when our decision must tinge not only our future, but the future of multitudes closely identified with us. How important, therefore, that we should seek the constant and unerring guidance of Heaven!

Soon the music sounded, and prostrate fell the great men and wise men of the empire. All—all were in the dust, doing homage, except three men who still retained their standing attitude—these three were Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. They were quickly observed. Keen suspicious jealous eyes noted all their ways, and nimble steps conveyed the accusation to the king. The accusers, with malicious cunning, stated the case in such a manner as to stir most deeply the feelings of the monarch. The impiety of these Jews was not so prominently placed in consideration as their disloyalty. The king was reminded of his royal favours towards them, and plainly told that by their conduct these men did not regard him. This was enough. Naturally of most violent passions, Nebuchadnezzar was excited to rage at the thought of this positive disobedience and palpable ingratitude. He commanded that the three men should be brought into his presence. Whether it was out of respect to the trio themselves, or to Daniel, at whose request they had been first placed in office, we cannot say; but from some reason the king did not order these Hebrews to be immediately slain, as he did the magicians who could not interpret his dream. He signified his wish to overlook the past, if they would consent for the future to bow down to the god he set up. There was the possibility of saving their lives if they would conform. They might retain their offices in Babylon, and enjoy the favour of the monarch, if they would sacrifice principle and stultify conscience. But if not, then the decree of royalty must be enforced, and "Who?" asked the monarch, with an air of haughty independence and vain-glory—"who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?" Then out spoke the heroic Hebrews. They conferred not with flesh and blood. They feared not one who could kill the body, but, after that, had no more that he could do; they feared Him who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell. There was no necessity for delay. They needed not to deliberate.

> "On each glance of thought
> Decision follow'd, as the thunderbolt
> Pursues the flash."

Their purposes were fixed. There was no vacillation. Come life or death, they were resolved not to bow before any other than the living Lord. Doubtless there was a natural clinging to life in the breast of each, but there was no change in the countenance, no tear dimming the fire of the eye, no tremulousness in the tones of the voice indicating emotion of heart. With an unimpassioned, collected, and undaunted air, they spake before the royal patron of idolatry: "If it be so, our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and He will deliver us out of thy hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." Unprepared for such a bold and determinate stand, and for their direct refusal to re-consider their position—interpreting their adherence to principle as none other than obstinacy—the king grew furious, and gave orders for the furnace to be made as hot as possible. He might have thought that men so resolute, so passive, so willing to suffer for conscience' sake, would offer no resistance to the servants commissioned to execute the king's decree. But he ordered them to be bound just as they were, and the sentence to be executed forthwith. "And these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace." It is impossible for us to dissect or describe the feelings of those servants of God at that moment of their fall. The surprise, the joy, the gratitude, the triumph which filled their hearts, when they found themselves surrounded by a devouring element, and yet unhurt, baffles all attempt at description. We can better read the feelings of the great men of the empire, because we can interpret them by the feelings and actions of men since. Some, unquestionably, expressed their surprise that the three Hebrews should be willing to sacrifice so much for what they deemed principle. Others laughed at the folly of three men setting themselves against the decree of the king and the legislature of the State; whilst, probably, some rejoiced that the nation was rid now of such fanatics. But Nebuchadnezzar was not easy. That "tremendous power," which is > "A master-self that loves to domineer,

> And treats the monarch frankly as the slave," was at work within him. He had banished the three Hebrews from his court, but could not from his conscience. Restlessly he approached the furnace, and there, to his utter amazement, beheld the three men, unbound, walking in the company of a fourth—none other than the Angel of the Covenant. Instantly he bade them come forth. Though they were in company far superior to any they could enjoy in the Babylonish palace, they obeyed the call, and were presented to the princes and governors without the slightest indication of contact with the flames. The very smell of fire had not clung to their garments. They had been miraculously preserved. Providence had clothed them as in an asbestos robe. Then Nebuchadnezzar "blessed and adored" the God whom they worshipped, promoted the three heroes to positions of influence and honour, and made a decree that none should utter a word against the God of gods—the God of Israel.

Now, looking at this deeply-interesting and impressive narrative, a host of lessons crowd upon the mind. But there are two or three thoughts in particular which we shall do well in these days seriously to consider.

1. In the conduct of these three Hebrews we have an illustration of the power of true religion. Here were three comparatively young and inexperienced men, captives in a strange land, with no powerful friends to plead their cause, called by their monarch to the performance of an act of worship of which their consciences disapproved, threatened with a terrible death if they refused to comply, standing firm to their principles and professions—honouring God in spite of opposition; and, like Moses, choosing rather to suffer affliction than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. How calmly they stood in the presence of the wrathful Nebuchadnezzar!—the king and his attendants agitated by a thousand emotions, but they self-reliant, patient, brave!—the accusers, maddened with malice, the princes and governors wild with surprise, the monarch's brow darkened by an ominous frown, but Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego peaceful and unmoved! Whence came such marked quietude of spirit? How was it they were so self-possessed? What occult gift so marvellously sustained them? I answer—they had faith in God. They had learned to leave consequences in the hand of Him who called them to duty. They were not influenced by caprice. Theirs was not the sensitiveness of an effeminate and uninformed conscience. Sterling principle guided them—a principle by which they were prepared to sacrifice all rather than sin against God. They recognised the sovereign authority of the Eternal Spirit. They felt that He neither could nor would act inconsistently with his absolute perfections. They believed that though clouds and darkness may overshadow His dealings, they had no title to question Him concerning His ways. The conviction that Jehovah never forgets His word, never fails to watch over His children, never ceases in His sympathetic care, was a source of strength. They possessed a piety of the noblest and most royal order—a religion of principle and not of mere impulse—a religion that would weather the bitter storm, and not simply flourish in the calm sunshine.

Theirs was a religion based on the Divine word, and marked by an intelligent view of duty, and a resolution to pursue the path of duty at all hazards.

Such, dear reader, is wanted now. Wanted now, do I say? Yes, wanted always, but needed now in an especial manner. Do you remember the words of John Bunyan, when describing the army of Diabolus just prior to the final triumph of Immanuel? Surely the spirit of prophecy seized his mind and guided his pen! Surely he was privileged with visions of the future when he says there were "Ten thousand Doubters and fifteen thousand Bloodmen, and Old Incredulity was again made general of the army." Such is the aspect of the present age. Practical evil, with its brazen brow, stalks abroad in multifarious robes. The hydra-headed monster forces his way into every circle. The sinfulness of sin is toned down to the minimum, whilst the advantages of sin are magnified to the maximum. That which in its true character is revolting is gilded over and rendered seductive. Theoretical evil is poisoning the minds of multitudes. Romanism still nurses the same spirit of bitter hatred to Protestant truth. Our Bible Societies it proclaims to be a "pest." The right of private judgment it condemns; whilst the chief representative of the Pope in this country says to his co-workers, "It is yours, right reverend fathers, to subjugate and to subdue, to bend and to break the will of an imperial race." Formalism is crying "Peace, peace," to thousands whose consciences are chloroformed into quietude by mere letter and rule. Rationalism is banishing fear from men's eyes, and obligations from their hearts, by its dismal iconoclasm. Everywhere men seem restlessly ready to accept "some new thing." It needs vital godliness—godliness after the order of that possessed by these three Hebrews—to keep to the old paths and walk therein. Oh, brother, there is no safeguard like that of true religion; from practical and theoretical error it will preserve you.

The grace of God reigning in the heart will hold both your mind and body, both your will and emotions with a giant grip, and exercise upon your whole being a blessed talismanic influence.

2. In the miraculous interference of God we see the deep and constant interest Jehovah takes in all that passes on in the experience of His saints. He witnessed the fidelity of the three Hebrews, noted the strength and firmness of their faith, weighed all the circumstances of anxiety in which they were placed, bestowed upon them the needed confidence and hope, and ultimately delivered them.

Thus His merciful favour and mighty interposition are extended to the righteous in every age. The experience of His children under all its countless forms is most intimately known to Him. There is not a care, however lightly it presses upon the mind, but He feels it. Let the lot be ever so varied, complex, or evanescent, it comes within the range of His loving observation. There is nothing, whenever or wherever it transpires, His omniscient tenderness does not embrace. This He has taught us not only by the experience of the saints of the Old Testament economy, but by the exceedingly great and precious promises recorded by the Holy Spirit—promises which have encouraged His followers in all ages. They were men like us, those patriarchs and prophets and apostles, who cast their care upon the Lord, and committed their way to Him with serene contentment. They were men like us, those brave spirits who, when the clouds gathered and the thunder pealed, could calmly sing, "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations;" "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty;" "I will both lay me down in peace and sleep, for Thou only makest me dwell in safety." The interposition of God on behalf of His faithful ones is sure; it may not be of a miraculous nature; it may not be signal; but it will be certain. The Lord can and does influence the minds of men so as to accomplish the deliverance of His own. The Lord's arm is not shortened. Still He watches over us, as tenderly as a mother over her babe, and delights to help and comfort His own. Aye, and before deliverance is wrought out, even when the furnace flames play about us, and sorrow's chains severely gall us, there is for us the companionship of Jesus. Yes, we may draw as freely on the consolation afforded by the covenant of God in our pains and perplexities as did the martyrs when imprisoned and impaled. We sustain the same relationship to the Almighty that they did; and God has the same grand purpose in view in our afflictions that He had in their persecutions. The suffering in its source, its nature, and its extent, may be changed, but the Divine support is the same. All the consolation and strength the three Hebrews derived from the promise and presence of the Infinite One we can claim in Christ Jesus.

3. In the subsequent conduct of the king and nobles toward these three Hebrews, we see the blessed influence of fidelity and consistency. These men were promoted to worldly honour, and far wider influence than any of the nobles possessed; whilst—which to them was their greatest joy—that God whom they loved and served, obtained glory at the hands and from the lips of those who formerly hated and denied Him. It is a matter for deepest joy that there have trod this earth men of colossal faith and unflinching adherence to the right, men who could rise superior to all earthly considerations, men who would rather die than deny Christ, rather burn than turn from the path of honour! On the lives of such men the most vile cannot fail to look with pleasure. Even the scoffing world is impressed by an unmoved adherence to principle. For a little season a course of deceit, stratagem, cunning, change, may be a prosperous path, but it will not long continue so. Nothing endures like integrity, consistency, truthfulness, and transparency. The man who, like the chess-board bishop, always moves obliquely, needs to be narrowly watched, and is seldom trusted or loved. He may evince great skill, but that will not conceal his immoral stains. But he who moves straight forward, whose first aim is to please God, who is "constant as the northern star," who will not swerve from truth for the purpose of gain, soon wins the approbation of Heaven and earth. Such a man's strength is as the strength of ten men, because his heart is pure. Such men are always welcome, and welcome to all like the flowers of your garden, because, like those flowers, the colour and fragrance of their lives are life-long. Thus was it with the apostles. Thus has it been with a noble army of men since. Polycarp of Smyrna, Irenæus of Lyons, Wycliffe, Huss, Jerome of Prague, Luther, Melancthon, Zuinglius, Knox, Latimer, Ridley, Bunyan, Baxter, Howe, the Waldenses, Albigenses, Huguenots, Lollards, Covenanters, and many more, braved the gnashing teeth and imprecating voices of enraged multitudes, and endured untold privation and pain for conscience' sake. These are luminous examples, upon which our children's children will look with deepest admiration, and most fervent gratitude. Ah! many a Cardinal Wolsey has asked, "What is expedient?"—has been influenced by passion, and hence died a melancholy man, to sink into deserved contempt. But others, like the men just mentioned, have simply asked, "What is right?"—have been guided by principle, have passed away triumphantly to an eternal reward, and are now honoured by countless thousands. Thus shall it ever be. Let this be our first work—to seek, find, love, and serve God. Let Jesus be all our trust and plea. And, having found life in Christ, let us unhesitatingly cleave to the right. Banish all thoughts of departure from the line of duty. Expunge the word vacillation from your vocabulary. Let your course be ever upward and onward, in the strength of God.

> "Nay, never falter; no great deed is done
> By falterers who ask for certainty.
> No good is certain; but the steadfast mind,
> The undivided will to seek the good,
> 'Tis that compels the elements, and wrings
> A human music from the indifferent air.
> The greatest gift the hero leaves his race
> Is to have been a hero. Say we fail!
> We feed the high traditions of the world."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 13. Mission Work.

Chapter to be read—Acts xiii., 4—49.

To the Teacher. It is not intended in these lessons to go through the whole of St. Paul's missionary journeys connectedly, but rather to pick out certain interesting portions, which may seem suitable for lessons.

I. The Visit to Cyprus. (Read 4—12.) Ask a few questions upon the last lesson, to see if children thoroughly understand the starting-point. Who formed the missionary party? What have we heard before of Barnabas? (iv. 36.) Of what place was he a native? So proposes should first visit Cyprus. Notice how, his name coming first (vers. 2—7), seems to indicate that he took the lead. Still, under whose direction were they starting? (ver. 2.) A work so well begun must surely prosper. Now ask the nature of their work—to preach the Gospel, i.e., message of salvation to every creature. No more exclusiveness; no more shutting out of the Gentiles; the time come for all to hear, obey, and be saved. How they would stand on the deck of the little coasting vessel during the few hours' passage, and while watching the approaching shores of Cyprus, discuss how the missionary work should be begun. Where did they begin? (ver. 5.) Show position of Cyprus on the map, and explain how from its position it was likely to be frequented by Jews as well as Europeans; so, as always, these Jews begin with their own countrymen. Are they to stop there? No, must push on across the island. Whom do they find at Paphos? Let the teacher draw a contrast. (1) The Believing Governor. What is the Roman governor called? and what description is given of him? Evidently was seeking after truth; must have heard of God from numerous Jews. Wants to hear more of Him. Sends first for Elymas. Could he help him? Then hears of strange Jews. Sends for them; they come; preach to the Governor. Who stands by? What does Elymas do, and how is he punished? What effect had this on the deputy? Notice that he was persuaded both by the works and by the doctrine of the apostles. Remind how often this was the case with Christ. All the apostles believed in Him after seeing the first miracle—what was that? (John ii. 42)—while Samaritans believed after hearing His words (John iv. 42). This Governor, like merchant seeking goodly pearls, found pearl of great price (Matt. xiii. 46), and was satisfied. (2) The Unbelieving Sorcerer. What did he do? Not only would not believe himself, but tried to prevent deputy. What could be worse? Had some knowledge of God; used it for bad purpose. How was he punished? What a convincing proof of reality of Saul's doctrine. See how his unbelief overruled for good. The conversion of Governor sure to have good result.

Practical Lessons. (1) Mission work begins at home. Children wanting to work for God should begin with brothers and sisters, schoolfellows, &c., then may extend work. (2) Opposition over-ruled. What weapons did they take for their work? (Eph. vi. 13, &c.) Same weapons ours still, and equally powerful. Learn to use them more.

II. Visit to Antioch. (Read 13—16; 42, 43.) The first Sabbath. Where did they go from Paphos? (13). Asia Minor, a directly heathen country; still, many Jews there. Travel on to Antioch, in Pisidia, will spend Sabbath there. Would be much fatigued by journey, glad to enjoy the Sabbath of rest. What trouble of mind have they had? Count the party now; who has left, and why? Must have joined too hastily, out of mere attachment to his uncle. But now Mark shrinks from the work. Do they detain him unwillingly? No; must be a cheerful giving of self as well as of money, or else gift valueless. So he returns to his mother at Jerusalem. Will Paul and Barnabas keep quite quiet this Sabbath? Copy their Master, work while it is day. So, like Christ in synagogue of Nazareth (Luke iv. 16), stand up to expound. Notice the change of Saul's name, perhaps out of compliment to Sergius Paulus, perhaps to mark the commencement of new life and work, like Abram became Abraham when son promised. The sermon itself need not be read; the children can be told the outline, viz., the settlement of their ancestors in Canaan, according to promise made to them; their request for a king; who was granted? The new line of kings. Who was descended from David? How was He to be king? to deliver from Romans? No; from sin. For this He died and rose again, and so all the promises fulfilled, only in much better way. Notice the application. Salvation is offered, but if despised will cause them to perish. Picture the breaking up of the congregation. Some at once offended; seed of Word caught up and produces no fruit (Matt. xiii. 19). Others, both Jews and proselytes, hear eagerly, and are cautioned to continue in grace of God. Now the news of the strange sermon by these foreigners is spread. Who want to hear the tidings? (ver. 42). Here is an opportunity! are invited to come on next Sabbath. (2) The second Sabbath. (Read vers. 44—49.) Would apostles be idle during week? Went about visiting everywhere. With what result? Synagogue crowded, many scarcely get in. What effect has this on the Jews? like elder brother in parable (Luke xv. 28), jealousy leads to anger, that to perverse disputings. Would rather none were converted than that Gentiles should be. This rouses indignation of apostles. What do they say? (ver. 46.) See how eagerly Gentiles, heathens hitherto, receive message. Not had half opportunities of Jews, but make right use of them. So the word sinks into heart, grows and expands; "published through all that region."

Practical Lessons.—(1) The danger of envy. Hardly any sin so common or so dangerous. Remind of Cain, Joseph's brothers, &c. Ask for large heart to rejoice in good of all. (2) The importance of decision for Christ. Same message preached. Jews refused, Gentiles accepted. Which are we doing? How does it appear in our lives at school, &c.? For Christ or against? Now is accepted time.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe missionary party and their first start.
2. What can you say about Sergius Paulus?
3. Describe sin of Elymas, and how was he punished?
4. Who deserted the party, and why?
5. Describe the first Sabbath spent at Antioch.
6. Name any practical lessons taught by the story.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXVII.

EDA could scarcely have decided whether she was sorry or glad when three or four days passed away after her interview with Richie, without ever hearing from him. She divined, correctly, that some motives or impulses, to which she had not the clue, had hurried him into the course he had taken; and if she could have forgotten how earnestly he declared that by becoming his she would enable him to lead a better life, she would have been both hurt and angry that he attempted to woo her so cavalierly. But the spirit of self-sacrifice was strong in Eda's nature, and she found herself often debating whether she had done right in sending him away. If he drifted into evil, would she not be to blame for it?

The thought was such a harassing one, that she was glad to put it aside, and busy herself with preparations for her removal to Mr. de Courcy's. These preparations involved a few purchases, and one morning, as she came out of a shop on the Queen's Terrace, she encountered Mr. Allonby.

He looked rather confused when she expressed her surprise at the rencontre, but was too honest to leave her in error.

"I had business in Pimlico, Miss Granton, but I promised Gran and myself that I would contrive to see you before I left the neighbourhood. These people to whom you are going are strangers, are they not? and you told Gran that you have no relatives in London."

"Only my brother."

"Then there may be times when you will feel depressed and lonely. Gran was speaking of this last night, and I was to ask you to try and remember always that you will be a welcome visitor at our house, whenever you feel disposed to come; and then the dear old lady thinks she could send you away cheered and comforted with her old-fashioned sayings."

"I will go to her gladly, thankfully," said Eda, with quivering lip.

When Mr. Allonby left her at Mrs. Ingle's door, she found herself looking after him, with the thought, "He is a better man than Richie Atwood; he can stand alone and do right—not because another prompts him to it, but just for the right's sake!"

The next minute, however, she was accusing herself of injustice. Mr. Allonby had no such temptations as beset Richie: he had a happy home, instead of London lodgings, and was not courted and flattered for his pleasant looks and social qualities. Had Richie appeared just then, and urged his suit, it is a chance if Eda's remorse had not stood his friend, and won him the wife he sought.

But a hurried note, complaining of her unkindness, and pleading business as an excuse for not writing earlier, was all she had heard of him when she once more bade adieu to the Ingles, to take up her abode as governess in the palatial mansion of Mr. and Mrs. de Courcy.

She had scarcely entered it before she was made to feel the difference between the quiet well-ordered household of the Earl of Chessington and the more pretentious but less carefully regulated one of her new employers. A very smart housekeeper came forward to receive her, but it was ungraciously, and she was kept standing in the hall while the woman commented on her arrival.

"The governess, I suppose? Dear me, you're very young!—no offence, miss," she added, as she saw Eda's colour rise. "It's high time those children were taught behaviour; but I thought Mrs. de Courcy would have looked out for some one they would be obliged to mind—some one, you know, much older, and more stricter than you're likely to be!"

"But I hope to make my pupils obey me," was the good-humoured reply. "Will you let a servant show me my room?"

"Well, that's just what puzzles me," the woman acknowledged, wiping her heated brow. "Mrs. de Courcy forgot to tell me you were coming till half an hour ago; and where I am to put you, with a house full of company and a dinner-party on, I'm sure I don't know! It's all very fine to be told, 'We leave everything to you, Mrs. Wells—we leave everything in your hands;' but one pair of hands cannot do everything, as well I know it."

Eda waited till this harangue was ended, and a footman, who came to ask for some directions, had been snappishly rated for stupidity, and sent away; then, pointing to her luggage, she reminded the harassed Mrs. Wells that it could not be left in the centre of the hall.

"No, of course not, miss; something must be done. There's the nursery—but I suppose you would not like to be put there for a night or two?"

"I should certainly prefer a room of my own."

"Then I suppose you must have one somehow," said the housekeeper, not very civilly; "but you really must wait till I have arranged the dessert."

"Wait here?" asked Eda, finding that she was bustling away.

"Lor', no, miss; if you'll come into my parlour, one of the maids shall get you some tea. I'm sure it's my wish to make every one comfortable; but when there's so much to do, and not a creature but one's self to do it, it's dreadfully trying. Mr. de Courcy makes nothing of saying, before he goes away in the morning, 'Mrs. Wells, there will be eight or nine gentlemen to dinner to-day; make your arrangements accordingly;' and he doesn't forget to look as black as thunder if there's the least thing amiss, though he gives one no more time than I have just told you. It's rush here, and rush there, and hurry and drive, till it's quite a job to get a decent steady servant to stay in the house, and I'm almost worried off my legs."

"Perhaps I can give you a little assistance in arranging your dessert-dishes," said Eda.

Mrs. Wells's heavy face brightened. "Will you now, miss? Then I'm sure I shall be for ever thankful! and here's the épergne—if you could put a few flowers into that it would help me wonderfully, for it's a task always gets over me. Some ladies like to do these little things themselves, but Mrs. de Courcy isn't one of that sort. Now, Miss Rose, I cannot and will not have you here!" she cried, sharply, to a pretty child who had stolen in at the door, and was standing on tiptoe admiring some beautiful peaches. "Go back to the nursery directly!"

"No—shan't!" said the little girl. "Rose don't like to stay there by herself."

"Then that tiresome Manon is in the kitchen gossiping, as usual!" muttered Mrs. Wells. "Where's Miss Violet?"

"In papa's room, cutting pictures out of a book."

"There's mischief!" groaned the housekeeper. "A house full of servants, and a French bonne paid on purpose, and yet no one to keep these unruly children out of harm. Go, there's a darling, and tell your sister she must not spoil papa's books."

But Miss Rose positively declined to go, unless the housekeeper filled her lap with peaches; and the fruit being too rare just then to be bestowed upon her at all, there were symptoms of a tempest impending, when Eda interfered.

"Rose is not to have any of the peaches, for Mrs. Wells cannot spare them; but if she likes to sit quietly here beside me, and hand me those leaves as I want them, I will tell her a story."

"A true one?" queried the child; "I don't like to hear about ghosts; they frighten me."

"That's Manon's doings," Mrs. Wells explained, in a whisper. "I know she tells the poor little things all sorts of horrors when she wants them to lie still at night."

Eda readily promised that there should be nothing frightful in her narration; and the child sat a quiet listener while with deft fingers she piled the fruit on the silver dishes and converted the basket of greenhouse flowers beside her into a tasteful centre ornament for the dinner-table. She had just finished her task, and was enjoying the housekeeper's thanks and some tea, when a loud-voiced Frenchwoman flounced into the room, dragging with her Eda's other pupil, whose depredations in the library she had but just discovered.

Violet de Courcy, a tall handsome child about seven years of age, stoutly resisted her bonne's endeavours to force her into the presence of her new governess; and little Rose, who was wont to join forces with her sister in all affrays, slipped away from Eda to pinch and kick Manon, who slapped both her charges in return with right good will. Mrs. Wells shrugged her shoulders, and went away, telling Eda that she would soon grow used to these scenes, and the only plan was to let them fight it out; while no one else appeared disturbed by the noise, although the two children shrieked, and their nurse scolded, at the top of their voices.

It was a promising commencement of Eda's first essay as a governess, and for a while she stood by, dismayed and doubtful; but when the coarse language of the woman grew coarser, and little Rose began to gasp and grow purple with fury, she summoned courage to interfere.

"Stay!" she said, laying her hand on Manon's upraised arm. "Does your mistress give you authority to strike her little daughters?"

"They are not children—they are demons!" stormed Manon, in her native language, displaying the marks of Violet's nails in her flesh. "Some night they will be flown away with in a shower of fire and brimstone, wicked ones that they are!"

"Give me that jug of cold water," said Eda, imperatively. "Miss Rose is going to have a fit, and I must throw it over her!"

Violet ceased stamping and shrieking, to witness the operation, and her sister hid her face on Eda's dress, crying "No, no!"

"But I certainly shall, unless you leave off screaming in that violent manner. You can go away, Manon. When the children are ready to be undressed, I will recall you."

The woman, awed a little by the sharp tone in which she was addressed, hesitated a moment, then thought it best to obey; and the younger child, exhausted with passion, suffered herself to be lifted on to Eda's knee; but Violet stood sullenly aloof, eyeing the governess, with whom she had been threatened every time she did wrong, until led to regard her as a bête noire who must be defied and resisted as obstinately as Manon. But when Eda, eschewing all comment on the scene she had just witnessed, began to tell simple tales and verses to the little one on her lap, the other gradually edged nearer, till, finding a hand extended towards her, she too ventured into her new friend's embrace.

Mrs. Wells bustled in and out without disturbing the group, though she sometimes raised her hands in astonishment at the cordiality that reigned there, until little Rose's eyelids began to grow heavy, and Eda brought her last story to a close.

LINES ON A CAGED LARK.

POOR little thing!
Whose straining neck and bosom quivering
With meaning eloquent,
Mourn the imprisonment,
That stays thy ardent wing:
How earnestly does thy sweet throat impeach
Thy gaolers, for the breach
Of courtesy and gentleness,
That works thee such distress.
Poor little thing!
Thank God, I pity thee thy fettered wing;
Thank God, for that compassion in my heart,
That bleeds for every smart;
Thank God, I am not hardened yet
To see without regret,
Even a grief like thine:
For if we shut our eyes,
To gentle sympathies,
And lowly sufferings remain unfelt,
The heart will by-and-by refuse to melt,
For any sorrow, human or Divine.

ALEXANDER HUME.

"It is time you went to bed," she said. "We will ring for Manon. Are you going to ask her pardon, Violet, for your behaviour?"

"No! She slapped and shook me first!" And Violet began to look rebellious again.

"She found you doing what you are quite old enough to know that you should not do. What will your papa say when he finds that you have spoiled some of his books?"

"He can buy more," the child carelessly replied.

"Does that excuse your naughtiness? I dare say he will be vexed when he sees such mischief. Surely you love papa too well to wish to vex him?"

"I love him when he gives me anything," said Violet. "It doesn't hurt Manon if I cut up the books; she should mind me better. If papa says anything, I shall tell him she went away to gossip, and I had nothing else to do; and then mamma will laugh, and say 'What a spirit the child has!'—that's all."

How Eda was to enforce the obedience of the Misses de Courcy, if this was the manner in which they were reared, she could not imagine; but she waived all further discussion of the topic, and raising the sleepy Rose in her arms, asked Violet to show her the way to the nursery. The little girl obeyed, piloting her through the busy servants, and past the open door of the handsome dining-room, with great dexterity; but as soon as they reached the nursery, where Manon, with sullen looks, was awaiting them, she began to evince a disposition to be restless and tiresome.

"Mamma receives after the dinner. I will be dressed, and go down," she cried.

Eda looked at Manon, who said, promptly, "Madame gave orders that les petites should not appear in the drawing-room to-night."

"I don't believe it; I will go and ask her," Violet exclaimed; but her nurse stepped nimbly to the door, locked it, and put the key in her pocket, as if she were accustomed to enforce her authority in this manner when arguments proved unavailing.

There would have been a repetition of the struggle that had taken place below; for Violet flew at her nurse, who was not slow to repay the kicks and pinches showered upon her; but Eda promptly interfered, and insisted that Manon should leave the room.

"If you cannot control these children without violence," she said to her, firmly, in her native language, "your presence here is worse than useless. I will myself put Violet to bed."

When the nurse had disappeared she seated herself by the fire, and steadily, sorrowfully eyed the passionate child, who, finding her rage elicited no comment from her quiet governess, gradually subsided, and began to look ruefully at the knuckles that were swollen and bruised with beating against the locked door.

"It was only out of spite that Manon said that I must not go down-stairs," she declared. "I shall tell mamma in the morning; and I shall tell her how you helped the nasty wretch to keep me shut up here!"

Eda made no reply to this speech; but her silent gravity exercised more influence over the child than any remonstrance she could have uttered; and presently Violet sidled nearer, to display her bruised hand.

"Look there! It was all Manon's fault; if it had not been for her I should not have done it. It was her fault, wasn't it?"

"No, I do not think it was," said Eda, quietly.

"If you take Manon's part I'll hate you! She is a wretch, a nasty wretch!" and Violet stamped on the floor to give emphasis to the epithets she was employing.

"If you are going to say such rude things I shall leave you to undress yourself," she was told.

"Then I'll get into bed with my clothes on, and that will make me ill."

"Very well," said Eda, coolly; "if you do not mind being ill, Violet, I have not the slightest objection. The doctor shall be sent for, and a few doses of his nasty medicine may cure you of your silly fits of temper."

"I don't like to be called silly," pouted Violet.

"Nor do I like to see you scream and fight like an overgrown baby. You are an unhappy little girl, and I feel very sorry for you."

Violet hung her head, and permitted her clothes to be unfastened; nor did she offer any resistance when Eda, kneeling down, gently forced the child on to her knees beside her, and, in the simplest words she could use, put up an earnest petition for Divine pity and forgiveness.

"We never say our prayers to Manon," Violet observed, as she nestled down beside her sleeping sister.

"Do you not say them to your mamma?"

"No; she is too busy to hear us. You haven't seen mamma, have you? Oh, she does wear such pretty dresses! I mean to have some just like hers as soon as I am old enough."

As this was not a profitable topic, Eda dropped the curtain between herself and the little chatterer, and, promising to stay till she was asleep, took up a book and tried to read.

But her thoughts were too busy for the volume of childish stories to interest her. She saw before her a difficult task, involving great responsibilities, and was more than half inclined to renounce it at once. What good could she hope to effect with these wayward children if Manon counteracted it, and their mother neither seconded her efforts nor upheld her authority? Eda was diffident of her own powers. With docile children she believed that she could get on fairly enough, but with these little girls more tact and firmness would be required than she ventured to think that she possessed.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Discouraged by the events of the evening, unwilling to turn back from the work set before her, yet fearful of disgracing Lady Chessington's recommendation by proving herself incompetent, she was still sitting dejectedly at the nursery fire, when the door softly opened, and a lady, elegantly attired in a demi-toilette, stepped into the room, and announced herself as Mrs. de Courcy.

"So sorry that I have not been able to come and see you sooner!" she graciously said, as she held out her jewelled fingers, and just touched Eda's. "I came at the very first moment I could leave my visitors.

"And so my precious darlings are both asleep," she murmured, stealing on tiptoe to the bed. "Dear little things! how I love to see them so peaceful and happy! You mustn't be too severe with them at first, Miss Granton, for they are spirited little creatures, and not accustomed to be checked. Indeed, I am afraid that they have been rather neglected, for my health is so delicate that I cannot have them with me as much as I could wish."

Eda soon made the discovery that Mrs. de Courcy's health never interfered with her acceptance of the invitations showered upon her. If a complaint were brought to her of some mischievous trick perpetrated in the house or garden by the little girls, she was too ill or nervous to listen to it; but she could make elaborate toilettes, receive visitors all the morning, and at night fulfil engagements to concerts, balls, &c., seldom returning home till daybreak, without evincing any great degree of fatigue.

However, she stayed by the bed for two or three minutes, softly dropping kisses on the rosy faces of the sleepers, and asking if Miss Granton did not think that Violet would grow up extremely good-looking. She shrugged her shoulders, and smiled deprecatingly, when Eda ventured to hint that the child's violence of temper needed subduing, but neither seemed anxious nor offended.

"Ah, yes, she is a naughty little high-spirited darling; but then she has so much originality of character! In fact, she only wants managing, my dear Miss Granton. One cannot expect one's children to be perfect, can we?"

Eda was silent, but Mrs. de Courcy, satisfied with her own arguments, stroked the hair that lay on Violet's forehead, and then came back to the fire, saying, very civilly, "I hope Mrs. Wells has done her best to make you comfortable; and you must let Manon unpack your trunks. You will find Manon a most useful creature."

"I cannot say that I like her manner with my pupils," Eda frankly replied; but Mrs. de Courcy only smiled, and gave her white shoulders another shrug.

"She is rather brusque sometimes; but then it is so difficult to get a servant who suits in every particular; and Manon's French is unusually pure. Besides, her taste is excellent. She makes the children's dresses so well that I would not part with her on any account!"

Eda longed to ask if Manon's attainments could possibly atone for her alternate neglect and severity; but Mrs. de Courcy was now in haste to be gone, and begging Eda to ask for anything she required, she glided back to her guests, who were quite touched when they learned, from their beautiful hostess's apologies for her absence, that she had been unable to resist stealing away to have a peep at her sleeping darlings.

After Mrs. de Courcy left the nursery Eda resumed her seat, feeling, if possible, more depressed than before. It was the first time she had come in contact with a fashionable mother, and her heart ached for the little ones, whose faults she could now trace to their true source.

But now another visitor broke in upon her meditations. It was the housekeeper, who, when her cares for the day were over, had recollected the stranger, and come in search of her.

"Now, really, this is too bad!" she exclaimed, when she caught sight of Eda's unsnuffed candle and despondent attitude. "That heedless Manon should not have left you here alone. Do come to my room, Miss Granton, and let me get you some supper. You've had but a poor reception," she added, fancying that she could see traces of tears on Eda's cheek; "but I hope you'll excuse it. I should be very sorry if anything happened to drive a young lady away that's shown us already how clever she can be."

"Am I to believe this flattering speech, Mrs. Wells?" she was smilingly asked.

"Indeed, miss, you may; and Maria, the upper-housemaid, will tell you how I said, as soon as you sat down in my room with those children, "Miss Granton knows her business; and, please God, she'll make the poor little spoiled things as good as they're pretty, which it will be a blessed thing for every one in the house if she does!"

In spite of the leaven of selfishness lurking in the housekeeper's words, Eda felt cheered, and after a night's rest, she arose, ashamed of her faint-heartedness, and ready to meet with forbearance and patience all the annoyances—and they were many—of the coming day. She knew that even if success ultimately crowned her efforts, and the children became docile and obedient, it would not be till after many battles had been fought both with Manon and her charges; but she called up all her courage, and found her first reward in the pleasure the little girls testified at seeing her again.

(To be continued.)

A TOKEN FOR "LUCK."

I AM not of a sanguine temperament, but inclined rather to chronic apprehensiveness. My very nature is to anticipate failure; and at one period of my life this nasty morbid feeling had got such hold of me, that I really began to regard myself as the settled victim of ill-luck. I was a young man at the time, and if I had not been led to master this constitutional defect then, there is no telling how dismal and unsuccessful my career had been. And as I believe there are many like myself, of a naturally desponding cast of mind, I am going to relate the rather singular circumstance that gave me such a view of life as enabled me to overcome my infirmity. We cannot alter our physical composition, but we can control its injurious tendencies by good wholesome principle.

Several things had happened that disappointed and disheartened me, when I went off one summer, in most unenviable and snappish mood, to spend a fortnight's holiday, all alone, at the dreary sea-side place called Moulder-on-Lees. Its dreariness was its attraction; for there I should have no chance of meeting any one I knew, and so could brood over my ill-fortune without interruption.

Were I poetical I might say a great many pretty things about the harmony I there realised between my feelings and the various objects I saw around me. The restless ripple of the sea; the stern rocks, dashing aside, like inevitable destiny, the aspiring waves; the fisher-boats that brought so often back the tale of toiling in vain; the distant sail on its voyage of hope, too often to end in wreck; the sand that seemed so firm, yet for ever shifting. But I am not poetical, so forbear.

One day I took a long walk inland. As I was crossing a field that was being ploughed, I thought I saw in one of the newly-made furrows a small coin. It proved to be so—a thin bronze-looking shabby sort of halfpenny. Being fond of collecting such things, I put it in my pocket, and continued my gloomy walk homeward. That evening I was more than usually melancholy. I sat after dinner in a tolerably comfortable easy-chair in the little private room of the inn, and pondered over my bad luck till I was perfectly miserable. I put my hand in my pocket to pull forth my toothpick—for that truly aristocratic implement is friendly to bitter reflections; you can dig away furiously with it, as if finding out your enemies—when out fell the coin!

It diverted my attention, and I began to examine it. On one side was the rough impression of a head; on the reverse, a device like a ball with a cross on it. There were two inscriptions, which were not so defaced but that I could decipher them after a little puzzling. One was, "Hans Schultes zu Nureb." "Oh, I see," was my soliloquy, "one of the old tokens, and a foreign one, too. Nureb.! why that must be an abbreviation for Nuremberg, and Hans Schultes must have been one of the old merchant princes of that most ancient and enterprising city. Hans Schultes of Nuremberg; and there's his likeness, with that wonderful head-piece like the turban of a Turk. But how came it here? Very likely brought with the mud which they dredge out of the river and lay upon the land." Then, after thinking what a tale that coin could tell if it might but speak, I turned it over to make out the other inscription. "Glick kumpt von Got ist war." "Why, that must be very old German," I said to myself. "It must be the old way of spelling, 'Glück kommt von Gott ist wahr'—'Luck comes from God is true.'"

As I repeated the words to myself, I was struck with their singular appropriateness to my feelings at that time. It was as if some one spoke to me. I fell into a profound reverie.

"So that was the old fellow's motto, was it? He believed in luck, as I do, only he believed in something else too. I dare say he was a fat, sturdy, bandy-legged German burgher, who, do what he might, always came down safely on those same bow-legs of his. So it was easy for him to put down all his success in the world to heaven's special favour."

I was almost angry with the man, yet I kept on thinking about him, and couldn't get him out of my mind. I pictured to myself his home at Nuremberg, his comely family, his quaint costume. I seemed to know Hans Schultes and all his belongings. The great staring spots on the carpet of the room turned, each in succession, into a portrait of Hans Schultes. And when, at last, I looked up and saw Hans Schultes, just as I had imagined him, sitting as large as life in the chair opposite, I was not in the least surprised.

"I have been thinking of you, Herr Schultes," I said, in quite a familiar sort of way, as to an old friend unexpectedly turned up.

He smiled benevolently.

"I want a commentary on your text here!" and I held up the old token.

The old gentleman grinned, and slowly nodded.

"You have been a lucky man in your time, eh?"

"Ya!" And the grin was repeated on a more extensive scale.

"Born with a silver spoon in your mouth?"

"Nein!" he said, gravely. "When I was young, I did never have but wooden spoons in my mouth My father was very poor."

"Ah, but what I mean is, that luck was always on your side from your earliest days."

"What is luck?" said Hans, fixing on me his tranquil blue eyes with a steadiness of gaze that made me think a moment before replying.

"Well, I suppose it is having things turn out just as you want; never hardly meeting with disappointment; getting on in the world first-rate, with the least amount of trouble"——

Here I was interrupted by such a burst of guttural sounds—which I suppose were laughter,—that I stopped, rather angry. "Nein, nein, nein!" he cried at length. "That is not luck, that is not what I call luck." And my definition seemed to amuse him so much, that he went off into another fit of gutturals.

"Then, pray, what is it?" said I, sulkily.

"Glück kommt von Gott," was his answer.

"Well, I suppose so; but that doesn't explain what luck is."

His only reply was a most extraordinary ventriloqual sound—possibly a sixteenth-century expletive—but the tone of it was incredulous and pitying.

It was certainly not pleasant, so I looked at him somewhat sternly.

And as I did so, a dream seemed to come over me, and all around began to change like a dissolving view, though without occasioning me the least surprise. Hans Schultes was still there, only he looked much younger, and wore a peasant's dress. He was kneeling reverently before an ancient dame, whose hands were laid upon his head. The room was bare and gloomy, and I fancied I could hear the rustle of the forest trees whose foliage darkened it. As the young man rose, and took his leave with many an embrace, the dame kept pointing upwards with her finger, and said, with an emphasis of loving admonition I shall never forget, the simple words—"von Gott."

Then, with that remarkable ease with which circumstances shift in a dream, all blended instantaneously into another and widely different scene. The room expanded into a magnificent hall, brilliantly lighted by innumerable candles, and filled with gallant company. A banquet was going on in what I at once, by some mysterious intuition, recognised as the town-hall of Nuremberg. The crash of instruments of music was heard—for Germans always were given to noise in that matter—and when it ceased I saw Hans Schultes on his legs, going to make a speech. He was evidently the burgh-master elect, and looked a portly middle-aged man. "Why, there's my lucky friend Herr Schultes again!" I caught myself exclaiming.

Upon this, some one said in my ear—I don't in the least remember seeing who the speaker was, but the words dropped gently, like the dew—"Lucky! yes, if luck is hard work, patient application, determination to master difficulties, making good use of your brains, being devoted to duty, never whining under disappointment, conquering self, and while persevering in doing your best, to put your trust in God."

"That's a new sort of luck!" said I, sarcastically.

"It's the only luck Hans Schultes has known," was the reply.

"Anybody can have that luck," I urged.

"Anybody who tries," said the voice.

"But people don't get all they want, with all their trying," persisted I, with great bitterness.

"So much the better for them, if only they try their best; for—'Glück kommt von Gott,' and He knows what's good for us."

And as these now familiar words fell again on my ear, the light faded, the room contracted, the company passed away, and I seemed to be in the cabin of a ship. It appeared perfectly natural, and I took to the situation with all the unquestioning confidence of one who dreams. It was one of Hans Schultes' trading vessels, I knew. But how the cabin did go up and down! The ship must be in a gale. The swaying and plunging were fearful. Hark! there goes the mast with a mighty crack, and the whole ship trembled. The water comes pouring into the cabin. I shout for Hans Schultes, "Hans, Hans! where are you? the ship cannot sink with lucky Hans Schultes on board!"

A mariner, pale and fearful, looked in at the door, and said, "Peace, master, Hans Schultes is too lucky to be aboard. He was disappointed in coming with us at the last moment, and now your last moment has come."

As he spoke, I felt myself engulfed. The sea hissed around me. I struggled. I was laid hold of. I clung to somebody!

I awoke, and found myself struggling with the landlord of the inn at Moulder-on-Lees, who was trying to keep me in the arm-chair, and who was confirmed in the opinion that he had got a raving madman to deal with, by my staring wildly at him with open mouth, and saying, with tremendous prolongation of emphasis on the last word—"Glück kommt von Gott ist wahr—r—r."

It was a long time before I could make them feel at all comfortable about me. The landlord kept near, ready for a spring at the first symptom of another outbreak. There was the waiter casting furtive glances at every movement I made. And there, outside the open door, glimmered the hostler, with (I verily believe) a halter in his hand.

"I've been asleep, and had some extraordinary dreams," I meekly said, at length.

"Very extraordinary, sir," replied the landlord.

"What makes you all stare at me? Can't a man have an extraordinary dream without being watched like a wild beast?"

"The gentleman doesn't know how queer he looked," remarked the waiter; "I really thought you were a lunatic, sir."

I burst into a laugh, which seemed some evidence of sanity in their eyes, for they laughed too.

"Oh, but you did indeed look dreadful, sir!" continued the waiter. "I came into the room to bring you your coffee, and you were twitching in your chair, and making such faces, and then you cried out all at once, with such a screech, 'Hands, Hands!' Says I to myself, 'Hands indeed, that's just what you want.' So off I ran for master, and quick enough he came; but no sooner did he lay hold of your arms than you gripped him like a drowning man."

"Like a vice," said the landlord; "I shall be black and blue with it to-morrow."

"I'm very sorry," said I; "pray put it down in the bill." And I have reason to believe he did—not as one item, but as a small perturbation of all the items.

The next day I was off. I was not going to mope any more at Moulder-on-Lees or anywhere else. You may laugh, and say it was only a dream, and that my dinner had disagreed with me, as perhaps it had; but I don't care what anybody says. That dream put some new ideas into my head; and since they were good and sensible ideas, I made up my mind to keep them there, and what is more, act them out. So away I started for a more lively place, and finished my holidays merrily.

Then I returned to business, having first recorded the vow, that henceforth Hans Schultes' "token" should be a token indeed to me, that true luck is only to be found in steady work, and that no one need distress himself about success who is doing his very best to secure it, since luck comes from God.

FANNY FORREST; OR, EVIL COMMUNICATIONS.

CHAPTER IV.

FAITHFUL to her promise, it was still quite early on the next day when Fanny's figure might be seen peeping cautiously within the garden gate, too much in awe of Hannah's possible presence to venture further within the precincts of the place. Ruth was standing idly in the doorway when she first appeared, but no smile of welcome came as usual to her lips; on the contrary, she could not have accounted to herself for the panic of coming trouble which fell upon her, as, in obedience to Fanny's beckoning summons, she drew her broad-brimmed hat down, far down, over her face, and strolled with lingering footsteps to the gate.

But there was no panic to be detected in Fanny's voice, or fear of any trouble, save detection by Hannah's unfavouring eyes, as she took Ruth's hand within hers, and led her on a few steps to where, under the shelter of a high privet hedge, they could sit in safety from curious eyes, and talk together out of reach of curious ears.

Fanny found it harder work than she had at all expected to overcome the scruples of her friend, for Ruth at first would only reply with the one determined negative—that a trip to Upton such as Fanny would fain have arranged about could never, never be—no, never! Again and again she uttered the same words, each time with as firm an outward appearance as before, yet each time with a shaken confidence in herself, till, as the morning wore on, and still she lingered in dangerous dalliance, listening to the voice of the tempter, Fanny seemed to prove in some mysterious manner that all her scruples were nothing more than phantoms raised by her timidity. The money, as far as that went, she argued, had certainly been left to her disposal, to be used as she found occasion. If her father had been at home, there was every chance he would have taken her himself to see the fête which had thrown the little town of Upton into such a hubbub; and as to the scruples about going without him, or being recognised when there by any of the neighbours, why, Fanny only hooted at these fears. They would not be away, after all, really any time, and they could go round by the lanes to Bentham, and thus avoid the high road; and once at Upton, every one there would be far too much taken up with their own affairs to pay them any attention.

And thus the morning passed away; and when Fanny separated from her friend, she could scarcely guess how far her insinuations had been successful, for Ruth said never a word, but only turned in at the garden gate with an expression on her face which Fanny found it impossible to decipher.

But when the cool twilight came again, and Fanny crept to her old corner by the window-sill, and found Ruth there as usual, the darkness which to one gave concealment to the trembling lips and painfully flushed cheeks, gave to the other the boldness and audacity which had been wanting in the morning; and so it came to pass that, before the moon had risen above the trees to shed its calm influence over Ruth's troubled heart, the words of consent, however reluctantly uttered, had been spoken; and in her triumph Fanny had thrown her arms round Ruth and kissed her.

It was intended as a seal to the compact, and yet it had nearly destroyed the work of the whole day; for at Fanny's kiss Ruth started back within the room, and covered up her face with her hands with an action of despair. Her father's face—grave, almost stern—rose up before her; Owen's, too—more gentle, but full of sad reproach—seemed to float before her very eyes; and it was only in a dream that she listened to all Fanny's concluding arrangements and last injunctions; nor did she stir or change her attitude one inch till long after the last good-night had been said, and Fanny, full of her triumphant hopes, had left the cottage far behind.

Poor Ruth! what amount of pleasure in the day to come could in any degree compensate for what she was suffering now? It seemed unendurable—the thought of all the love and confidence she was forfeiting for this one gratification. No; as she sat there till the room was fairly flooded with the bright light of the summer moon, she came back to the old determination that it could never, never be, and went up to bed with the resolution firmly taken, that when Fanny appeared the next morning she would tell her plainly, and once for all, that it was changed, and the carefully-planned expedition was at an end.

But Fanny was much too wary to run the chance of such a falling back. It was in vain that Ruth spent the whole morning straining her eyes—how fruitlessly!—for the face and figure of her friend to glide along, according to her habit, in front of the little wooden gate. No use for her to stand out in the glaring sun till she was faint and giddy, looking down the long perspective of the road leading to Squire Taunton's lodge; not even a flutter of the tawdry gown came to reward her; and with a moan of remorseful pain Ruth turned dejectedly to the house again. It would be too late to speak of change at the last moment, when Fanny appeared in full array, and in all the excitement of the expedition which to her seemed only full of the purest enjoyment. Why, oh, why! did nothing happen to take the matter out of Ruth's hands before it was too late?

With the vain hope that Hannah, in some strange freak of fancy, might have changed her mind concerning her meeting and subsequent tea-drinking, Ruth next turned towards the kitchen, and lingered hesitatingly on the threshold; but already the Sunday gown, and the bonnet with the prim white cap within it, were laid out upon the table, and the boots, and the prayer-book, and even the huge cotton umbrella, were set in order close at hand. That chance was gone, then, too. And with one final and forlorn hope that some unlooked-for chance might bring her father home one day earlier than she expected, Ruth seized on her hat again, and turning her eyes in the opposite direction to that in which she had looked for Fanny, she scanned with even a more fervent longing the road where, if her father were coming, she would soonest catch a glimpse of his approach. But in vain: the old-fashioned coach, by which she had almost made herself believe he would appear, rolled on relentlessly past the turning to their home, and Ruth felt that her last resource was gone. Owen had told her plainly he could not come: there was no chance now of a rescuing hand. She must give in to adverse circumstances, and try, with whatever effort it might cost her, to make the best of matters as they were.

And yet, when the glare of the mid-day sun was past, and the tall trees had begun to cast their welcome shadows, with lengthening stretches, over the fields, when Hannah had nodded a good-bye to her young mistress, and set out on her pilgrimage, while the dead calm of the summer afternoon was only broken by the lazy humming of the bees among the fragrant beds of mignonette, or by the trickling of the little stream among its pebbles, Ruth still sat on, with her face buried in her hands, and no further adornment than the cotton frock she had worn all day.

It was not till a figure standing in the window threw a shadow across the spot where she was seated that she sprang up, with a little scream, to meet Fanny Forrest, arrayed in an assortment of finery which fairly took away her breath, but yet with an ominous and angry glitter in her eyes.

"Not ready yet? nor no signs of it either! What do you mean, Ruth?" she asked, with a harsh sound in her voice which set Ruth's heart beating. "You don't mean you're a-going to break faith—do you?—after all?" and Fanny fixed her eyes on Ruth's trembling countenance with a most contemptuous stare.

"No, no, Fanny—of course not. But I was only waiting to see you, because—I thought—perhaps—I didn't know whether, after all—suppose we waited——" stumbled out poor Ruth, with fiery cheeks and choking voice. "Don't look like that, Fanny! don't! You are too unkind; I only wanted to know what you thought——"

Not one assisting word had come from Fanny's lips to help her friend out of her difficulty. She waited, without even shifting her searching eyes for a second, till Ruth had stopped, when, with a volume of suppressed anger, she began:—"You want to know what I think? Then I'll just tell you that I think you are the stupidest girl I ever met with in my whole life. You are more than that too, if you will have my opinion, for you're a cheat, to fix upon a thing, and lead me on, and then back out of the affair like this!"

Ruth raised her hands in a sort of despair. "Oh, don't say that!" she cried; "it is not true; I never said I would not go—I only said——"

"I don't want to hear what you said," broke in Fanny, angrily; "I only want to know one thing: are you coming, or are you not? If you are, by the time you are ready we shall have to run for it to catch the train at Bentham. If you are not——" and Fanny stopped, with a menacing hesitation.

"I am, I am!" moaned Ruth. "I will do anything you like, if only you won't look like that, or speak to me as if you hated me. I will not be a moment getting ready, if you will wait for me."

"Look sharp then!" answered Fanny, not even yet vouchsafing to look pleased. "If you are more than ten minutes or a quarter tittivating of yourself, we shall find ourselves in the wrong box when we get to Bentham, and see the train whizzing out of sight. And, I say," she called out, as Ruth was flying out of the room, "have you got the money ready? for that is more than half the bargain, and 'twouldn't do to start without it, would it?"

"Yes, yes—it is all right; it's in the same place where you saw it before," replied Ruth, pausing with her hand upon the handle of the door. "I can get it on my way down."

"You'll never have the time to do it all!" urged Fanny, petulantly. "Here, chuck your keys over to me; I can climb in quite easily, and have it ready when you come down."

Ruth hesitated still, but Fanny was already half in across the window, and was holding out her hand imperiously. The heavy brow had knit the instant she perceived Ruth's indecision, and the bitter words were rising again to her tongue, when the keys were flung across the room, and fell rattling together at her feet.

"That's the way to do it!" she called out, exultingly, as she dropped her feet upon the floor within the room. "I'll find where it is right enough. Do you go along and hurry now, or after all we'll lose our sport."

"Yes, yes—I'm going. But oh, Fanny! do take care, and don't let anything get knocked about within the cabinet. Remember, all father's most precious things are there, and he would never forgive me, never——"

"Did I ever hear such a girl as you are?" answered Fanny. "Why, if every finger on my hands were thumbs you could not look more frightened! But see: when you come down, if I am not here, you'll know I'm waiting just outside there, in the lane. It's safer for me there than here; and you follow me, and look sharp about it, too, will you?"

"Yes, yes—I will; but wait for me, please—please do! You are quite safe here, Fanny; and I don't think I could ever start alone."

"You are an idiot ten times over, Ruth! Of course I'll wait for you; I shall not be a stone's throw from the gate. But you go and get ready, and don't drive me wild dawdling any longer!" And Fanny opened the door herself, and pushed Ruth out into the passage.

There was no help for it now, and up the narrow staircase, taking two, three steps at a time, Ruth flew. Her wardrobe was not large enough for her to waste much time in deliberating over it. The pretty pale-blue Sunday frock Owen was so fond of, the gloves and tie, and the hat—a present from her father not so long ago—these were all dragged out with trembling hands, and laid upon the bed. Nothing could stop it now, and she must only hurry, or Fanny would be in a rage again, and say more dreadful things, to haunt her for ever after. But the blue dress was only half on when Ruth stopped short, while her heart beat so wildly that she had to cling to the table at her side to steady herself: for softly through the air a sound had reached her, so like the signal-whistle always given by Owen at his approach, that it made her tremble with a new alarm; for now, even if Owen were to come, it would be too late. There could be no concealment—the story must be told; and what, what would he say?

Ruth waited and watched to hear the sound again, but in vain. Then it surely was not Owen, she whispered, with a sigh of strange relief. The secret was still her own. It must have been only some passer-by whistling to himself who had startled her so much; and yet, before she could be happy, she must, in spite of her hurry, stop again to listen for a moment, and stretch her head out of the wide-open window, and strain her ears to catch that sound again. But all she could hear was the sudden clapping of the door below, and hasty footsteps running through the garden; and Ruth knew that Fanny must already have left the house to wait for her without; and now, with fresh energy and despair, the rest of the holiday garments were donned, and Ruth, with only half a glance into the empty room below, rushed out through the garden, and turned quickly into the lane. (To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

80. What passage in the Bible shows the reverence due to the house of God?

81. Mention the passage which shows the birthplace of the prophet Elisha.

82. What prophet is stated to have been a gatherer of "sycamore fruit?"

83. State what relationship existed between St. Barnabas and the Evangelist St. Mark.

84. Where in the Bible is the constellation Orion mentioned beside the Book of Job?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 192.

69. "They wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins" (Heb. xi. 37).

70. "The Cretians are alway liars, evil beasts, slow bellies" (Titus i. 12, 13).

71. They were devoured by fire from the Lord, because they offered strange fire (Lev. x. 1; 2).

72. "Holy and reverend is His name" (Ps. cxi. 9).

73. "Thou . . lookest narrowly unto all my paths; thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet" (Job. xiii. 27).

74. 2 Pet. iii. 8.

(Drawn by J. N. Lee.)

"FOR ME TO LIVE IS CHRIST, TO DIE IS GAIN."

THE faltering fingers touch uncertain strings:
Of love, of earthly love, the poet sings—
Of love, when doubt assails, so quickly slain;
O words of love which speak diviner things!
"For me to live is Christ, to die is gain."

The gold of autumn turns to ashen grey;
The dirge of hope remains from day to day
The burden of our songs, the sad refrain;
Till smiling lips at last have learnt to say,
"For me to live is Christ, to die is gain."

487

John, leaning on the bosom of the Lord,
And ever listening for the whispered word,
  Found rest and peace in weariness and pain;
Love is its own exceeding great reward;
  "For me to live is Christ, to die is gain."

In Jesus the Divine and human meet,
The harmonies of life are made complete,
  The wailing minors cease to vex the strain,
The varying chords awake in music sweet—
  "For me to live is Christ, to die is gain."

When shadows deepen in the dying light,
When sunset glory fades in gloomy night,
  His shining stars shall make my pathway plain,
His hand in mine shall guide my steps aright,
  "For me to live is Christ, to die is gain."

J. R. E.

EDWARD TURNER, CARPENTER AND BUILDER.

BY AGNES MACDONELL, AUTHOR OF "MARTIN'S VINEYARD."

CHAPTER XII.

BARBARA ON THE HEARTH.

"Like the fair sunshine when clouds clear away
Is love, thrice crowned, that wins through long delay."

MR. BRERETON, who had come up with Charlie when he sailed, stayed a few days afterwards to see Mr. Smith, and to talk over the plan of my joining him at Birchfield. It was finally agreed that I should remain at Smith and Horrocks' till Christmas, when I should leave for good and all, as they say, and go down into Kent. Mr. Smith and I parted very good friends. He had always behaved very just and honourable to me, and I felt very sorry to leave the workshop in Blackfriars, even though it was to begin an independent and much better business than I could have hoped to have for many a year in the ordinary course of things. I was very anxious to leave all my work at Smith and Horrocks' straight and smooth for the man who followed me as foreman, and I wrote home to my mother two or three days before Christmas, saying I should not be down at Birchfield till after the Christmas week, when I was to enter on my work at Brereton's shop. But on Christmas Eve I found that I had nearly wound up everything, and there was nothing more to be done than I could finish in one day.

I could scarcely understand the change that had come over everything; indeed, those busy days before I left London seem, even now, like a dream, in looking back. My life, that had seemed so dark and monotonous, had suddenly been broken up, and the brightest hope seemed to be poured upon it. I made all my arrangements for leaving quietly enough, I dare say, to the eyes of others, but every hour increased the longing to go to Birchfield once more, and to see Barbara. For with the fresh hope that Charlie Brereton's words had given me, had sprung up all the old thoughts and feelings about her that I had so long suppressed, stronger than ever. I determined to go down and spend the Christmas Day at home, and return to town for a day or two in the Christmas week, so as to close up my work and say "Good-bye" to Mr. Smith and the men. I took the train down to Birchfield that afternoon. Barbara was not at the station, another young woman was there, who said she had taken her place for the afternoon, and Barbara was to do her work on New Year's Day. I felt almost glad she was not there, for I knew she must be up at the cottage.

It was a clear still evening, about half-past four, as I walked up the lane, and across the bit of common to the house. There was a light in the window as I turned in at the gate. I stood for a moment, and looked in. Barbara was there, and quite alone; she was standing with her back half-turned towards the window; she held her apron, which was full of holly and green boughs, with one hand, and was reaching up to put a bit of ivy behind the glass above the chimney-piece with the other. I thought her face looked sad and sweet, and, somehow, older, as she stood with the firelight shining on her; and a great love came into my heart towards her, like a sea.

I lifted the latch, and went in. She spoke without turning round. "Don't the berries catch the firelight prettily here, Robert!" she said. "We shall have it all done before your mother and Ann come in."

I took a step into the room, and spoke her name. She gave a little cry, and turned; I think she must have read it in my face, before I found the words to speak, and while I held her two hands in mine, and looked into her dear face, which was as the sight of the blue sky to my heart after a life of November days, though it was so pale.

"I was so startled!" she said, as if she wanted to excuse the blushes that were rising on her cheeks. "You said you would not come to-day; we had no hope—we had no thought——"

She kept on smiling; but suddenly, a great sob choked her as she spoke, and she tried to hide her face.

I took her to my heart then, for something spoke strong within me that the hour had come, and I told her how I loved her, and had loved her many a year.

And so I found the day had come; and Barbara said she loved me, and that it gave her joy to be my wife.

CHAPTER XIII.

CHRISTMAS EVE, AND A LETTER.

The very graves appeared to smile,
So fresh they rose in shadowed swells;
"Dark porch," I said, "and silent aisle,
There comes a sound of marriage bells."

THAT was a happy Christmas, when God gave me the blessing of my life in Barbara; but each year, I think, has blessed me deeper in our life together.

We live in the house at the end of the wood-yard, for Mr. Brereton has grown infirm of late years, and the management of the business falls almost entirely to me, and I have to live near the shop. My mother and Robert and Ann still live in the cottage on the common. Robert keeps his situation as gardener. Ann still takes in needlework, and is almost always busy, working for the ladies in the neighbourhood; but she is ever ready to do a kindness for any of the neighbours; and in times of sickness or trouble they often send for Ann, for she has a quiet way and a firm mind, which make people cling to her when they are distressed, or burdened with cares and sorrow.

Tom Milton now works as one of my men, and lives with us in the house near the workshop. Tom has grown into a fine strapping lad, and promises to be a first-rate carpenter; but he has a mighty fancy for emigrating, and some of these days, I suppose, he will go and join Charlie Brereton in that distant place on the borders of the States and Canada, where he is living. Charlie is thriving in his new home, and seems quite restored in health. We have not heard very often from him; but a few days before this Christmas just past we received a big box from him. It happened to come the day before Christmas Day. My mother and Robert and Ann ate their Christmas dinner with us; and when we were all sitting round the fire, in the afternoon, Robert and I opened the box from America, and took out the things it contained. It was filled with presents for us all. There was a fox-fur muff for my mother, and curious Indian shoes and caps, worked with bright-coloured quills, and a roll of Canada cloth for Barbara, for her to make her baby a cloak of, as it said on a slip of paper fastened to it.

The women drew round the table to see and admire the things; and then Barbara took out a parcel directed to Ann, which lay by itself. They opened it together, and drew out a white shawl, of some fine silky material, within it was laid a white fan made of feathers, in the centre of which was set a stuffed bird no bigger than a butterfly. Barbara gave me the baby to hold while she shook out the shawl and laid it over Ann's shoulders, and put the fan in her hand, and then she, the silly little woman, gave a sob, and folded her arms about her, and kissed her, and when she turned again towards me, I saw, though she was smiling, there were tears upon her cheeks. Robert said Ann looked like a grand lady, with that long white shawl on. But she only stood a moment to be looked at, and then slipped it from her shoulders, and folded it again, and put the fan in its case.

Then we sat down by the fire, and I took out this letter and read it to them, and parts of it I copy here.

"Conshohocks Falls, Cookaville, County Maine,
"November 18, 18—.

"MY DEAR NED—Many a time have I thought of writing these last six months, since I got your letter; but somehow the time has slipped on and on, and it's nearly twelve months since I took up my pen to wish you all well at Birchfield, for many and many a time I think of dear old England, and the old days. As the song says, 'Absence makes the heart grow fonder,' and it is true in my case, at any rate.

"The speculation in the timber cutting, which I told you of in my last letter, turned out very well. We made two hundred dollars on the last lot sent down that autumn; and last spring I joined partnership with Abner Kimble, the Vermont man whom I told you about. We get on very well together. He is a middle-aged man, and very shrewd and clever about business.

"The frost lasted very late this year, and for three weeks our mill stood still for want of timber. In the idle days, I took a journey up country, quite into the wilds, to see after our spring rafts; and a fine journey I had, partly going on sledge up the river, and partly through the woods on snow-shoes. I took my gun with me, and managed to get a couple of black foxes, and a fine loon-bird. Tell your mother I had the fox-skins made into the muff I sent her in the box; Kimble dressed and sewed the skins, and a woman down at the station lined the muff.

"Our mill has a fine situation just above the falls, and in summer the woods all round look beautiful. I think you would say my house was as pretty and comfortable a home as a man need desire. I have done a great deal at it myself, and trimmed up our bit of clearing, and made it look something like a little English garden. But sometimes, of an evening, when Kimble sits reading his newspaper or his Bible by the fire, or of a Sunday, when he has gone, fourteen miles down the river, to the nearest meeting-house, I sit by the fire alone, and my mind always goes back to Birchfield, and I think of my friends there, wondering if they still remember me. It is near three years since I went away, and it seems like more to me, too. And now, Ned, I think I've made up my mind not to let any more years run on, but to go to England for a visit, and see my uncle and you all again. I have saved a little money, and our business is doing very well, and in another year's time it will be harder to leave than it is now. Kimble does not much like the idea of my going, but he will come round to it in the end. He said, last night, after we had been talking about it, 'Well, I guess you'll have to go, as you've got such a hankering after it; hankering is like nature, and you can't argue a man out of it, no more than you can stroke a bear into being civil, or talk a hop-toad out of jumping.'"

When mother and Robert and Ann had gone that night, Barbara and I stood listening to the Christmas bells, which had just began to ring, and my wife looked so musing and still, that for a while I said nothing; but at last I lifted her chin on my hand, and began to twit her a bit, and offered her a penny for her thoughts, saying I knew what they were, and that she was planning to steal Ann's white shawl. She laughed, and called me "Stupid."

"But not so stupid, either, Ned," she said; "for after all, I was thinking of the white shawl." Then, in a low voice, "I was thinking how Ann would wear it when Charlie Brereton came back—on her wedding-day."

And then she kissed me.

THE END.

"NO TEMPLE THEREIN."

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC. ETC.

"And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it."—REV. xxi. 22.

IN the chapter where these words occur we have portrayed to us the happy and triumphant state of the redeemed Church when all its conflicts shall have ended, and all its enemies shall have been overcome. That state is depicted under the image of a beautiful city, of which Jerusalem was the emblem, and it was disclosed to St. John by a vision of that city, the new Jerusalem, descending from heaven. Jerusalem was regarded as the peculiar dwelling-place of God on earth, and to the Jews it thus became the natural emblem or symbol of the heavenly state. The carrying out of the image is in perfect keeping with the conception. It is a city of glorious structure and magnitude, with beautiful walls and gates and streets, built of most costly and precious materials—a city filled with fountains and streams, with the love of life on either side of the river of life and its twelve kinds of fruit, but a city which has no temple—a city where there is no night, and into which no sin or impurity can ever enter; where the inhabitants never are sick, and where death has no dominion.

The Temple is contemplated here, of course, after its specific Old Testament character and design. "Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them," was the command of God to Moses (Ex. xxv. 8); and the very name "tabernacle" or "tent of meeting" characterises it as the places where God, in visible symbol, condescended to meet with His people. It was set up first at Sinai in the wilderness, and on the entrance of the Israelites into the promised land it found a resting-place for a time successively at Gilgal, Shiloh, Nob, and finally at Gibeon, five or six miles north of Jerusalem. As a stable and permanent building, the Temple took the place of this movable tabernacle. It was a most magnificent edifice, erected by Solomon; was seven years in building; and, when solemnly dedicated to God, was filled with a cloud of Divine glory. It was the grandest object in the historical Jerusalem, and the brightest ornament of the city, typically considered. To abide in its courts, to dwell under its shadow, was deemed by the devout and pious Jews their highest privilege, the greatest boon, spiritually considered, which they could enjoy in life. "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to enquire in His temple" (Psalm xxvii. 4).

The Temple, then, was the appointed dwelling-place of God, the house of sacrifice, and the house of prayer. What is intended by this privature representation of Heaven, this absence of a temple? It cannot, of course, mean that there is no devotion, no worship there. Heaven is the house of perfect worship and of the very highest devotion, where untiring service, ceaseless adoration, and abounding praise, are ever going on. With the presence of a temple certain ideas are associated, both in the Old and in the New Testaments, in the mind of the Christian as well as of the Jew; and if we examine them we may find out more clearly and definitely the rich meaning of the assertion that there is no temple in heaven.

I. The Temple was the appointed dwelling-place of God, where He condescended to manifest His presence and reveal His glory to men. "Concerning this house which thou art in building," God said to Solomon, "I will dwell among the children of Israel, and I will not forsake my people Israel" (1 Kings vi. 12, 13). The pious Jew repaired to the ancient temple, and the devout worshipper now repairs to the earthly sanctuary to meet with God, to obtain some glimpses of His beauty, some new discoveries of His excellence, some fresh manifestations of His glory. In heaven there will be no intervening temple, no walls, so to speak, between us and God, no shrine where only or specially He unveils His Glory. There will be the fullest disclosures of Deity, with nothing between us and the glory of His presence. What this will be to the intellects and hearts of redeemed men we cannot say; for to behold the unveiled glory of God in Christ surpasses all our thought and conception now. Here the tabernacle of God is with men, symbolised by places which we designate the "house of God," but in heaven the tabernacle or dwelling of men will be with God for ever. There will be immediate fellowship with Him. On this earth outward means and ordinances help us to this communion; even the walls and pews, the windows and pillars of a material sanctuary may, by endeared association, become a means of grace to the people of God. But in heaven "the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it," and our communion will be perfect, our fellowship immediate and uninterrupted for ever.

To enjoy God's presence expresses the fruition of all hope and the realisation of the highest desire in connection with the courts of the Lord's house on earth. The holy in every age, and under all dispensations, have loved the sanctuary, because it helped them to a consciousness and a joy which nothing earthly could give. In heaven God himself will be the temple, and the enjoyment in Him, realised by the saints in glory, will be perfect and without cessation for ever. Here His courts help us to raise our thoughts to Him, that we may draw our highest blessedness from Him; then He himself will be our perfect and perennial joy. The force of His love will fill us with all the elements of purity and felicity, and the beams of His glory will encompass us and make us resplendent for ever. Our worship of God and our communion with the highest will not be a thing of buildings in heaven, for there is no temple therein.

II. The temple of old was appointed as the house of sacrifice. "I have chosen this place to myself for an house of sacrifice" (2 Chron. vii. 12.) It was the grand central spot for the ritualistic and sacrificial service of the deistical economy. But in Christ all this came to an end. Burnt-offering and sin-offering have ceased; for it was "not possible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins." Now, once, in the end of the world, hath the "Son of God appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself." All type and symbol met their fulfilment in Him as the great antitype, and "by one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." Yet, under the Christian dispensation, the believer is required to offer sacrifice. The saints constitute "an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." These sacrifices, according to the New Testament, were of three kinds—the living sacrifice, the living surrender of self to God as a reasonable service, the holy consecration of all our powers to God (Rom. xii. 1); then the sacrifice of praise; and the sacrifice of self-denying benevolence for the good of others (Philipp. iv. 1, Heb. xiii. 15, 16). The bleeding victim has no more to be offered in atonement for sin; the shedding of blood on the altar has for ever ceased. The word sacrifice, therefore, when applied to the spiritual offerings of Christians, is used metaphorically, and suggests the idea of something devoted, lost, or surrendered, for the sake of something higher to be obtained. In the sacrifice of self with all our powers to God there is the conquest of selfishness: in the benevolent action and beneficent communications required of all Christians for the good of others, there is the surrender of that which, in human thought, belongs to themselves. In all sacrifices something has to be overcome in us, something to be denied in ourselves, something to be given up for the attainment of higher good, and the realisation of greater blessing. Now, in heaven there will be no temple, and there will be no sacrifice. Nothing will have to be denied, nothing overcome in us. All action will be spontaneous, all consecration natural, all offering free. The doing good and the being good, in all their perfection, will be the native outcome and expression of the life "within the vail." There will be no element of selfishness as a drawback to be conquered and cast out. All service will be perfect, all devotion pure and free, and all action the expression of praise. No offering will be of the nature of sacrifice. No loss will be experienced or risk incurred in the attainment of that which is higher or more glorious. Here, amid the imperfections of this life, such sacrifices are often made—ease for advancement, worldly interest for righteousness, personal comfort for public good, pleasure for duty; but in heaven such sacrifices will not be required, and life will then be perfect, with nothing to hinder its progress or hamper its natural development, every element of it enriched and elevated by the combined and unbounded joy of all. The rose makes no sacrifice in sending forth its beauty and fragrance; the tree makes no sacrifice in bearing for us its luscious fruit; the valleys make no sacrifice when laden with the golden grain for the food of man; and the sun yields no sacrifice in the warmth and light which he diffuses throughout the universe. In this way these seriously answer the very design of their existence. But here it is not man's way supremely to serve his God, lovingly to care for his neighbour as himself, or devotedly to seek the good of all. It is only by the conquest of self through the grace of Christ that he brings forth fruit thus to glorify his Father in heaven, and this fruit is therefore recognised as a spiritual sacrifice, acceptable to God. But in heaven all that is beautiful and perfect in holiness and love will find its climax and consummation in the service and enjoyment of Christ, and in likeness to Him, without sacrifice, for ever.

III. The Temple was specially designated "a house of prayer." When the Lord Jesus went into it on one occasion, and cast out those who sold and bought in it, He said, "My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves" (Matt. xxi. 13). It was appointed as a place for the worship of the Most High. This brings to our minds not only the place, but times and special forms of worship. These ideas are also associated with our words "church," "chapel," or "sanctuary," wherever men meet together to worship God; but in these respects there is no temple in heaven. There will be no special or appointed place for worship in heaven. This much we have already said. It is true that the dispensation of grace and truth by Jesus Christ introduced a new state of things in the worship of God, and was a great advance upon Judaism. Thus, the Temple of Jerusalem was the grand central place of worship: now the spiritual worshipper everywhere is accepted of God. But man here is a weak and imperfect creature, and as a means of spiritual help and a matter of convenience, sanctuaries and special places of worship are necessary. Nothing of this kind will be required in heaven; hence there is no temple therein. The worshippers will have no occasion to repair to any particular place for the offering of worship and the acts of devotion. Heaven will be illuminated by the glory of God and the Lamb "that was slain;" and everywhere the Divine presence will be diffused; everywhere will worship be joyously offered, and homage heartily rendered. Every act will be devotion, and every utterance praise. Then throughout the realms of the blessed

> Will every heart exult with joy,
> And every voice be song.

Nor will there be special times for worship in heaven, for there is "no temple therein." The temple of old had its regular sacred season, when the tribes of Israel repaired to it, to appear before God. Three times a year were all males throughout the land required to present themselves in Jerusalem, and besides these great annual festivals, there were special monthly and weekly celebrations. We, too, under the Christian economy, have our Sundays and sacred seasons for public worship, but in heaven there will be no distinction of times and seasons; stated and regular occasions for worship will not be needed, nor outward summons to call the worshippers to assemble. Here the devout look forward to the day of weekly rest, when they may specially meet with God, to enquire in His temple, and so find help in the sanctuary. Were it not for special times and places of worship here on earth, the duty would be neglected and the privilege disregarded, but in heaven such opportunities will not be required. There will be no fixing of "the hour of prayer," as in the temple at Jerusalem and in our Christian churches, for the "praises of eternity" will be uninterrupted and constant, and in the celestial city every life will be an expression of perfect worship, and "every voice a song."

Not that there will be no prayer in heaven, but its practice and power will be so natural, beautiful, and glorious, that special places and seasons for it will not be required, for there is "no temple therein."

Nor does it appear that special acts and forms of worship will be needed. All service will be worship. In our earthly sanctuaries certain distinctive parts of Divine service alone are deemed appropriate parts of worship, but in heaven there may be no such speciality or distinctiveness. It will be worship to praise, worship to serve, worship to "stand and wait." Here we have two worlds to deal with: our places of worship on earth are especially for the concerns of the soul, and not certainly for our bodily exercise; but in heaven only one world will be our concern, and one state will occupy our thought and fire our emotion without conflict or compromise, so that all acts will be triumphant worship, and all service acceptable devotion. In this sense, as unrequired, there will be no temple in heaven. How free and glorious then will be the celestial life! how perfect the worship, how firm the communion, how ecstatic the devotion! Blessed truly, and blessed only, are they who, under the infirmities of the flesh and amid the entanglements of the world, are here preparing, through the grace of God, for this condition of eternal life and glory! The new song—the song of redemption—must be learned by us on earth if we would join hereafter in singing it in heaven and help to swell the mighty chorus there of "Salvation to our God and unto the Lamb!"

This theme suggests to us the great importance of places of worship here. Their necessity and appropriateness to our condition and circumstances on earth are implied in the very fact that they are not in heaven. The contrast is suggested: Here, as has been said, we have two worlds to deal with and live for. Sanctuaries are appointed by God to help us in our spiritual life here, and so prepare us for the future glory. Hence, they ought to be prized, and "the means of grace" which they supply, diligently improved. Some theoretically disparage or despise the house of God; in so doing they make themselves wiser than God, who, knowing our frailty and our proneness to "neglect the great salvation," has graciously met our need by the institution of public worship, and the ordinances of His Church. There is in truth an important connection between "the means of grace" and "the hope of glory;" and, without having any theory of disrespect, multitudes practically neglect the house of God, and are satisfied with a very occasional attendance on its services. Many, indeed, born in our favoured land, are never seen within the walls of any place of worship, because they have no consideration for the concerns of their souls. The right use of the house of prayer is to lift our thoughts heavenward, and to prepare us for that land of glory where there is no temple to meeten the soul for the pure and perfect worship of the celestial city, where the formal and thoughtless worshipper will be unknown. All who can, ought to by devout and regular attendance in God's earthly temples, to grow in meetness for the services and the joys of the heavenly Jerusalem. Love to the house of the Lord has characterised devout and holy men everywhere, and in every age of the world.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 14. Mission Work, No. 2.

Chapters to be read—Acts xiii., xiv. (parts of.)

INTRODUCTION. Remind of last lesson. Two Sabbaths spent at Antioch in Pisidia. Who believed, and who did not? Yet the effect of the preaching was great, all in the district heard the Word, and the seed was widely sown. Will the apostles stay and gather in the fruit? The question is decided for them. What did the Jews do? Moved by envy, as before, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, they raise persecution. Whom do they stir up? (xiii. 50.) These women, though devout, i.e., God-fearing Jewesses, unlike Martha and Mary, not yet learned the love of Christ. They and the chief of the city, i.e., magistrates, being stirred up against the apostles, what can they do? How had Christ provided for such a case? (Luke x. 11.) Picture the apostles slowly and sadly leaving the city—sad, not for themselves, but for the honour of Christ, that He should be despised, stopping at the gate to shake off the dust from their sandals, and utter a last warning against them. Then, persecuted in one city, moving to another (Matt. x. 23).

I. Visit to Iconium. (Read xiv. 1—7). Ask the children who had persecuted the apostles in Antioch, therefore might think they would avoid Jewish towns for the present, or at any rate the synagogues. Did they? No, went straight into synagogue at Iconium. What did this show? Not mere rashness, but bold confidence in protecting power of God. What was the result? boldness in speaking, and a multitude of converts. How did God help them? Remind of the signs given to Moses when sent to unbelieving Pharaoh. Of the signs promised to those that believe (Mark xvi. 17). So now great signs and wonders, i.e., miracles done as testimony to the truth of God's Word. But persecution again comes, not only from the Jews, but also from Gentiles this time. The city divided; half, persuaded by unbelieving Jews, take part against, and half, having learnt the truth in Jesus, take side of the apostles. Being men of peace, they will leave the truth to work, and move on elsewhere.

II. Visit to Lystra. (Read 6—18.) (1) The cripple. So far have been more or less amongst Jews, who had knowledge of God. Now go to a district wholly heathen. What will they do here? Can no longer preach in synagogues. No longer appeal to knowledge of God and Old Testament prophecies, must now preach in streets, on village green, in market, wherever groups are assembled. Message, one of glad tidings, love of Christ to bodies in healing, to souls in forgiving. What kind of people would listen most eagerly? Surely those who most felt need. Not far to look. Where was the cripple lying? Probably at gate, to excite compassion of all entering. He heard the news, drank it in, believed. St. Paul seeing earnestness, suddenly tries his faith. It is not found wanting. What does the man do? Fancy his joy at being able to walk. A cripple from birth. Alas! no temple here in which, like the lame man healed by St. Peter, may praise God. (2) The sacrifice. Describe the news of the miracle spreading. Commotion in the village, people running from house to house, tidings reaches the ears of the priest. What do the people think was the matter? Can be but one thing. The gods come to visit us. What must they do? The priest at once catches up the idea, and wishing to do honour brings oxen for sacrifice, garlands hurriedly tied on horns in honour of this festal day. Now the apostles hear of it, what will they do? Shall they, like Herod, receive divine honour? No; rend their clothes as token of mourning at such an idea, and running in hurriedly, can scarce restrain the people from sacrificing to them. (3) The sermon. The apostles seize the opportunity of declaring God; they themselves are men, but are servants of God, and sent by Him. He did leave men for a time to their own ways, yet even then His gift of rain and fruits spoke of Him, now has sent His messengers. (4) The persecution. Surely the Jews will leave the apostles alone here. No; they follow them from Iconium, and now set them against the apostles. They stone St. Paul, the chief speaker, so violently, as nearly to kill him. What a contrast to the day before! What does it remind of? Who cried "Hosannah to the King of Israel!" one day, and four days after "Crucify?" But some must have listened and believed, for the disciples stand round Paul, evidently in prayer, i.e., those who have been taught by him and received the Word. See, he is not dead! Their prayers have saved him, and he revives.

III. Return Home. (Read 21—28.) Their journey from Lystra back to Antioch may be traced. Passed through Iconium again, where persecuted before, at each place confirming the souls of the disciples, and showing they must count the cost, as tribulation is lot of all in Christ's Church. Notice also how provide for carrying on the good work; ordain elders in all churches. At last return home. What a tale of adventure have to tell! Been away two years, one of the party left them, another nearly killed, both stoned twice, converts in every city; elders ordained, work prospering, God evidently given His blessing. So (ver. 27) they call a missionary meeting, tell all this, then stay quietly at home till fresh call comes.

Practical Lessons. (1) Perseverance. Apostles had a work to do which must be done. No persecution, difficulty, desertion, stopped them, went straight on, obeying God's command. What an example to the young, starting in life. If God be for us none can really be against. (2) Patience. Mark afraid, turned back. Paul and Barnabas patiently trusting, endured to end. Which got greatest blessing? When work seemed in vain in one place, went to another. Knew the result was sure. So, if way seems dark to us, difficulties arise, &c., in patience possess souls. All must be well.

Questions to be answered.

1. What commands had Christ given in cases where His message was rejected?
2. Describe the visit to Iconium.
3. What outward signs did the apostles use?
4. Describe the healing of the cripple. What other miracle does it resemble?
5. Contrast the conduct of the apostles at Lystra with that of Herod.
6. What two practical lessons may we learn?

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXIX.

SOME months glided by, and Eda, absorbed in her new difficulties and duties, endured with tolerable patience the comparative neglect with which she found herself treated both by Richie and her brother. The former wrote as affectionately as of old; but he had fallen back into the old friendly style she preferred, and seemed to have quite forgotten his eagerness to make her his wife; while Mark was so engrossed in business that he could rarely spare an hour for his sister; and the little house at Hampstead was still in perspective.

Eda would have felt sadly isolated but for the kindness of the Allonbys. At their house she was always welcome; and some of the pleasantest hours she had ever known were spent beside the arm-chair of Gran. Richie she never encountered there again; a chance word or two told her what she had already guessed from Mr. Allonby's manner—that he was but a casual acquaintance, with whom neither the artist nor his sister was so favourably impressed as to wish to know him better.

Flossy Devon she often met, for that young lady was in the habit of flying in and out of the dwellings of her friends at all hours. At first Eda had felt inclined to dislike her, but she soon yielded to the fascination the pretty little creature exercised over every one who came in contact with her. Coquette she was by nature; and if she had a heart, it was so filled with herself that she had no real affection to bestow upon others. She would commit the most unkind acts imaginable, yet with such dulcet words, and such an innocent air of unconsciousness, that her victims generally endured the sting, and forgave her. If she had been ugly or rude she would have been judged less leniently; but who could be harsh to the sweet-faced, caressing Flossy Devon?

It was both rest and refreshment when Eda could exchange the handsome house of the De Courcys for Doris's neat sitting-room. It saddened her to see that the wealth so profusely spent brought neither comfort nor real enjoyment to the parents of her pupils. Mr. de Courcy was a weary dissatisfied man, always seeking for new excitements; and his lady hid under her suave manner a selfishness which she had no inducements to overcome. The servants were over-worked, and only prevailed upon to remain by increased salaries and a degree of license in their scanty leisure that unfitted them for other situations. Scarcely a day went by without some wrangle that disturbed the whole household; and Manon, who knew that she was valued by her mistress, contrived to inflict so many petty annoyances on Eda, that it was only a conviction that the children were really improving under her care that enabled her to endure them.

Sunday at Mr. de Courcy's was the most miserable day of all—every one was dull and peevish; and when her pupils went into the drawing-room to help their father to while away an hour or two with their frolics, Eda gladly fled to a holier atmosphere. But for these opportunities, and her visits to the Allonbys, she would not have been able to contend with the discomforts around her; but Gran unconsciously read her many a lesson of patience. The aged woman, who sat all day in her arm-chair, too feeble to leave it unassisted, was always cheerful, always grateful for any little attention, and could still take real pleasure in the society of those she liked.

Yet what a troubled harassed life hers had been! Partly from her own reminiscences, and partly from the lips of Mr. Allonby, Eda learned that Gran was in no degree related to the young people who called her by that affectionate appellation. A workhouse foundling, she had been buffeted about the world till she became a nursemaid in the house of Mr. Allonby's parents. By them she had been treated with such kindness and consideration that, when misfortunes overtook her generous friends, the faithful creature clung to them with the most touching devotion. After much sickness and sorrow, they both died, and Gran transferred her love to their orphan children, for whom she toiled unceasingly, till the bowed frame and the nerveless hands failed her.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"Then she seated herself beside Eda, whose reserve she seemed determined to overcome."—p. 235.

"Fritz was but a boy when his parents died," Gran said on one occasion; "but he had a brave heart—braver than mine; for many a time when I thought no one could see me, I have wrapped my apron round my head and cried my eyes sore. But I prayed as well as cried," she added, quaintly, "and so I used to get off my knees feeling quite fresh again."

"But Mr. Allonby found friends, did he not?"

"No, my dear; he made them. When people saw that he was too proud to be idle, they put work in his way; and though it was ill-paid at first, it helped to keep the home together. A wandering home it was in those days; for when we couldn't afford a house, we managed with lodgings; and when the rent of a second-floor was too much for our pockets, we went up to the attics, and what we lost in gentility we gained in fresh air."

"Perhaps Mr. Allonby will not like you to tell me all this?" Eda gently hinted.

"Nay, dear; one of the first lessons I taught my boys and girls—and though it was a hard one, they learned it—was not to be ashamed of anything but sin. When they sit round the fire sometimes, laughing over Gran's old expedients, and I remember how they kept their integrity through poverty and temptation, I feel as if I should like to get away into a corner and thank God for His goodness, and most of all for keeping them all humble."

The Allonbys insisted that Eda should eat her Christmas dinner with them; and as Violet and Rose would spend the evening in the drawing-room, whither she was never invited to accompany them, she was glad to exchange the lonely school-room for a merry family circle. Besides, she felt no little curiosity to see Gran's boys and girls all together—a curiosity that suffered some disappointment, for, after all, they were precisely like any other family. That they were all warm-hearted and hospitable was evidenced by her own reception—that she was an orphan and a stranger being sufficient recommendation to make them vie with each other in kindly attentions.

Eda saw Gran lean back in her chair, with her eyes closed and a look of ineffable content stealing over her features; and she guessed what thankful words the moving lips of the aged woman were breathing. If a more sober mood fell upon them all after this little scene, it was still a happy one; and when they gathered round the fire and talked of old times and struggles, not a word of repining mingled with those recollections to embitter them; and perhaps every one was sorry when Flossy Devon danced in, crowned with holly-berries, and put all serious thoughts to flight with her light laughter. Nor did her chance avowal that Richie Atwood was amongst the guests she had left playing Pope Joan at her father's house render her presence more acceptable to Eda. If Richie felt that he was doing wrong in dancing attendance upon this gay girl, why did he continue to visit at the residence of her parents?

For some time after this family reunion at Mr. Allonby's it dwelt so much on Eda's mind that, chancing to obtain an interview with Mark at his lodgings, she could not resist speaking of it to him, and endeavouring to make him comprehend how much these brothers and sisters clung to each other.

"I wish you could have been with me," she added. "The Allonbys have had a harder struggle than you and I, and yet, Mark, they have kept together."

"Yes, and the consequence is that Allonby himself is still vegetating in the upper part of a dingy house in the Strand. I hope before long to provide you with a better home than that."

"I could be quite content with just such another. My sitting-room at Mr. de Courcy's is not half so cheerful as Mr. Allonby's. Go with me to see my friends, and you will be forced to acknowledge that they are very happy, although they have but few luxuries."

"But your friend, as you call him, is not an artist of any note, Eda. Now, don't take up the cudgels in his defence: I know he is a clever painter, and a rising one; but he has never made any great hit, and it may be years before he does. I am beginning to get acquainted with men much better worth knowing than Allonby. I had the honour of dining yesterday with Bullion the banker."

"In what way can he be better worth knowing than Mr. Allonby? Simply because he happens to be immensely rich?"

"Of course not. But Bullion was once as poor as I am; and when one thinks of the energy, the talents, the aptitude to see and seize every advantage as it offered, that he must have exerted, one cannot but admire as well as envy him."

"Is he a benevolent Christian? Does he make a thoroughly good use of his wealth?"

"No doubt he does," Mark answered, promptly. "His name often heads subscription-lists."

"Is it, then, the power of giving that you envy him? It isn't always the richest men who contrive to do most for their fellow-creatures."

Mark "hemmed." He was always displeased when Eda approached such subjects, and he looked positively cross when she added, earnestly—"Oh, Mark! it troubles me to see all your thoughts and hopes centred on getting money. I do not blame you for being eager to improve your position. I suppose every one likes to be in easy circumstances, and able to indulge their tastes; but to spend every hour in scheming and planning to be rich cannot be right."

He seemed inclined to return a tart answer; but her arms were around him, her tearful face full of affectionate anxiety; and he smoothed his brow.

"You are a dear good little thing, Eda; but you don't understand me: you never did. Men and women cannot be expected to think alike on such subjects. You have not told me how you like my new lodgings."

He had removed lately to a pleasantly situated house in Brompton—for the sake, he told Eda, of being nearer to her; although she certainly saw no more of him than when his abode was at a much greater distance.

"You find them expensive, I fear," she said, as she glanced at the handsome furniture.

"Well, yes," he answered, carelessly, as he looked at his watch; "but we must sacrifice to appearances. And—I must send you away, little sis, for I have an appointment."

As Mark led her down-stairs, a door on the floor below suddenly opened, giving Eda a glimpse of an interior so bright with flowers, gay hangings, and looking-glasses, that she made an involuntary pause; and ere her brother could lead her on, a lady appeared, whose glance of inquiry was so sharp, so full of suspicion, that she shrank closer to her brother, and looked at him for an explanation.

CHAPTER XX...

Mark Granton saw the glance levelled at Eda, and hastened to introduce her. "Mrs. Lavalle, this is the dear little sister of whom you may have heard me speak as the only relation I have in the world. Eda love, I have had the pleasure of being of some little use to this lady, who is a stranger in England, and when I came to lodge here was being sadly imposed upon by the people about her."

With this introduction, or explanation, he was leading Eda on; but Mrs. Lavalle, the doubtful expression her face had worn vanishing, held out her hands to the brother and sister, and insisted on being allowed to have a little conversation with Miss Granton. Mark appeared to have forgotten his appointment, for he yielded, after a faint show of reluctance, and Eda was compelled, somewhat against her will, to enter the handsomely furnished apartment, and accept the refreshments her hostess pressed upon her.

After a walk across the dusty park, Mrs. Lavalle was sure that she must be both hungry and thirsty; and certainly nothing could be more delicious than the lemonade and delicate biscuits she brought her guests. Then she seated herself beside Eda, whose reserve she seemed determined to overcome, and talked to her in low caressing tones that had an inexplicable charm in them. Without appearing too communicative, she contrived to make it known that she was the widow of a West Indian planter, and had voyaged to England to settle the affairs of a relative, by whose decease she came into possession of a considerable sum of money. She was neither young nor handsome; perhaps she really had not passed her thirtieth year, but an enervating climate had told upon her, and a naturally sallow skin and long thin face, made her look like a middle-aged woman ere she had reached her prime. Her large black eyes did not prepossess Eda in her favour; for there were ominous gleams in them ever and anon, that presaged an uncurbed and violent temper. Her redeeming feature was her mouth—when closed, it was firm to obstinacy; but when anything was said that pleased her, the full red lips parted into the softest, sweetest of smiles.

She disliked London, she said, and longed for the moment when the lawyers released her, and she could either return to Jamaica or seek some pleasanter spot than the suburbs of the metropolis.

"Yet this room is very charming," said Eda, glancing at the tropical birds and flowers and ferns that gave it such an uncommon and cheerful aspect.

Mrs. Lavalle looked at Mark with one of the rare and lovely smiles that made her plain face almost beautiful. "Do you think so? I owe everything to Mr. Granton. It was he who suggested it all. He found me pining in my close dull room, utterly tired of the faded moreen hangings, horsehair chairs, and shabby carpet, and longing for something better, but too languid to attempt a removal. He saw what ailed me, and in two or three hours transformed my prison into what you behold it; and yet he persists in saying that I owe him no gratitude!"

"And I say it again," laughed Mark. "It was the pleasantest task I ever was deputed to perform. Only fancy, Eda! Mrs. Lavalle gave me her chequebook, and carte blanche, and for the first time in my life I was able to furnish a room according to my own ideas of comfort and prettiness. I shall always feel that I was the obliged party in the transaction."

"You should tell your sister that it is not for this only that I have to thank you," Mrs. Lavalle interposed. "You have had compassion on the lonely stranger in a thousand ways. Remember how many of your evenings you devoted to searching with me through huge packets of dusty faded receipts, ere we found the one that freed me from an unjust and extravagant claim. I might—nay, I should—have been cruelly wronged, but for you, Mr. Granton; and you will not let me testify my sense of your goodness even in words!"

"Eda would tell you that it is one of the chief articles of her creed to make oneself useful," was Mark's reply; "and she likes me to take lessons from her book; don't you, my grave little sis?"

"If all Miss Granton's teachings bear such good fruit, I should like to enrol myself amongst her pupils," said Mrs. Lavalle. "Will you take pity upon me, my dear, and come to see me sometimes? I have made no friends in London but your brother; for my legal advisers are elderly bachelors, and I am too indolent to hunt up the few persons who knew me before my marriage."

"Eda would be delighted to accept your invitation," Mark answered, for her; "but she is seldom able to leave her pupils; we must not hope to see her again for another month."

This was not quite true, for Mrs. de Courcy frequently took her little daughters to spend a long day with their grandparents, and Eda's time in their absence was at her own disposal; but she felt in her heart that her brother did not wish her to contradict him, and therefore kept silence.

"Not for a month!" Mrs. Lavalle answered, with a disappointed air; "that is such a long time to look forward to!"

"You flatter my little sister when you express so much anxiety to see her again," said Mark.

"I did not intend to do so. Indeed, I know I am selfish in wishing for her society; but you will try and come sooner, my dear, will you not?"

"Eda shall ask for a day purposely to spend it with you," Mark assured Mrs. Lavalle; and with this promise she was forced to be satisfied.

"Don't come here again till you hear from me," the young man said, when once more alone with his sister. "I should not like Mrs. Lavalle to imagine that we wish to force ourselves upon her."

"How could she think such a thing, when she acknowledges that her motives for inviting me are partly selfish ones?"

"But she is inclined to be inquisitive, and might ask you questions about my early life which you would be simple enough to answer; and I do not wish every mere acquaintance to hear the history of Lady Eudora, and so on."

"You might feel sure that I should not care to reveal an episode that reflects so little credit upon you," Eda retorted, sharply; for he had vexed her. "However, I have no desire to see this lady again, so you can excuse me, if she repeats her invitation."

"Very well; I believe it will be better to do so; for Mrs. Lavalle, although very nice in her way, is scarcely the kind of person I should choose as a companion for my sister. These colonial women have too little energy and too much temper to be always agreeable society. I should not be surprised if her fancy for you dies out as suddenly as it arose."

In this, however, he was mistaken; for the month had scarcely expired when Mrs. Lavalle wrote to remind Eda of her promised visit. She felt half-disposed to act independently, accept the widow's invitation, and form her own opinions as to the wisdom of continuing the acquaintance; but she did not wish to offend Mark, and finally enclosed to him the note she had received, endorsed with the question, "Shall I accept?"

Much to her surprise the answer was, "By all means. I am much engaged, but will contrive to be at home in time to escort you across the park in the evening."

Never had Eda felt more glad to escape from her duties than she did on the day in question. Manon, who was becoming more and more aggressive, had so rudely interfered between the governess and her pupils that it was impossible to overlook her conduct; and feeling that the time was come to assert or resign her authority, Eda requested the presence of Mrs. de Courcy in the school-room, and laid the case before her. Manon's insolence had been so flagrant, that her mistress felt compelled to rebuke her, but she was so vexed at this necessity being forced upon her that, like many another weak-minded and selfish person, she talked at Eda until she contrived to make her thoroughly uncomfortable.

"Oh yes, Miss Granton; of course you are in the right—I don't deny that; but it is so very odd that you cannot get on with Manon!—I mean very provoking that there should be all this unpleasantness. It quite destroys my comfort. She will be sulky and contrary for days; and though I particularly wished those polonaises nicely made, I know she will spoil them, just to be revenged upon me. You must acknowledge that it is dreadfully annoying!"

"That Manon should so forget herself? Yes, madam!"

"Oh, but Manon is well enough when she is not interfered with; and when one pays such excellent salaries it is very strange that there should be such disturbances in the house."

"No salary will induce me to submit to a repetition of her rudeness," said Eda, firmly. "I cannot expect my pupils to respect or obey me if their attendant is permitted to encourage them to set my commands at defiance."

"Oh, pray, my dear Miss Granton, let us hear no more about this foolish affair!" Mrs. de Courcy exclaimed, with impatience. "Perhaps Manon meant no harm; as she has been accustomed to have the management of the children herself, I dare say she feels hurt when you interfere with her. I shall have to soothe her wounded dignity with a new dress, before she will condescend to forget her grievances."

And so Eda saw that her own just indignation at the insolence she had complained of was considered uncalled for, and seriously annoying, as it threatened to throw the French soubrette into a fit of sulks, and deprive her mistress of her valuable services. No word of regret that the young lady, who was labouring so earnestly to overcome the bad habits Rose and Violet had acquired, should be treated rudely, escaped Mrs. de Courcy's lips; and the sense of injury rankling in Eda's heart made Mrs. Lavalle's caressing greeting doubly agreeable.

(To be continued.)

COMFORTABLE WORDS.

SHORT READINGS FOR THE SICK ROOM. BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A., VICAR OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S, HIGHBURY; AND SELECT PREACHER TO THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

"That I may know Him."—PHIL. iii. 10.

To many persons the apostle Paul must have seemed a very egotistical man. He was always speaking about himself. But the fact was that he was obliged to do so; he had no choice in the matter. His pretensions to the apostolate were continually called in question, and it was necessary for him continually to defend himself, for the truth's sake—for the Church's sake. And, then, his conversion was one of the standing evidences of the truth of Christianity. In many cases he could not hope to produce so much good effect upon his hearers as by just simply narrating the events which befell him on that famous journey to Damascus.

It occurs here to inquire whether Christians might not—within proper limitations, of course, and with becoming modesty—imitate in this respect the example of the apostle; whether they might not speak occasionally about themselves. We incline to think that they might. It would be a great comfort to some persons to know that they did not stand alone in their experience when in sorrow. We are apt to think that our case is an exceptional one, and that never were troubles so great, or so complicated as our own; but if a man could take us by the hand, and say, "I, too, have felt as you feel. Once the visitation of God was heavy upon me, and I hardly knew how to bear up against it. Dark, rebellious, impatient thoughts crowded in upon my mind, and the stream of them well-nigh overwhelmed me. But out of the depth I cried unto God, and He heard me. He enabled me to carry the load. He brought me through the trial. Be comforted; so it will be with you." Or if one should say to us, "I was greatly dismayed once by finding myself fall back into the sins which I thought I had clean escaped. I began to believe that I might as well give up altogether the attempt to serve God. I was beginning to despair. But light broke in upon my darkness. I was enabled to hold fast my hope, and to persevere. I did not do it myself; that I know; had I been left to myself at that moment I should have drifted back into worldliness, perhaps into open apostacy; but my God did not desert me. Neither will He desert you. Believe this." If a friend were to address such words to us out of his own experience, in a time of deep trouble, what a source of strength and of comfort it would be to us! "They looked unto Him and were lightened, and their faces were not ashamed," because "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles." Yes! we venture to think that it would be well if Christian people spoke sometimes to one another about their Christian experience a little more freely than they are accustomed to do.

This, however, by the way. Let us turn now to the text.

St. Paul has been describing his past life. Modestly, yet without hesitation, he tells us that if it had been possible to win heaven as the reward of human merit, he at least, whatever might have been the case with others, should have accomplished the feat. Every qualification centred in him. His spiritual descent was perfect. He was a Hebrew of the Hebrews. A man of outwardly irreproachable life, he had devoted himself from his earliest days to the service of God. He had been punctilious, rigid, undeviating, in the fulfilment of every known duty. Touching the righteousness which was in the law, he was blameless. "What more could a man want"—some people would ask—"to equip him for heaven?" But Paul turned his back upon it. The slow accumulation of years; the structure of human excellences, and outward observance, and acts of self-denial, which he had been laboriously piling up for so long—he left it all behind him without a single murmur, without a single sigh of regret. And why? Because he got something better by leaving it. All seemed worthless, utterly worthless, in comparison with the prize which the forsaking of his own righteousness enabled him to grasp.

That prize was the knowledge of Jesus Christ—"That I may know Him."

Let us consider, then, what this knowledge is.

Clearly it is not mere head-knowledge. St. Paul was essentially an intellectual man, and knowledge of all kinds would be welcome to him, more especially knowledge about the matters of salvation, and about the person and work of Jesus Christ. We can imagine him gathering together with the utmost avidity, and treasuring up with the most jealous care, any fragments of information about our blessed Lord that might come in his way. And St. Paul was well aware, too, that there is an intimate connection between light and life; that progress in practical Christianity goes step for step with advance in Divine knowledge. But when he speaks here about knowing Christ, he means something more than knowing about Christ. How many there are who have the latter kind of knowledge, but do not possess the former! They could give a fair account of the Saviour's history, repeat some of His discourses, recount His miracles, explain His doctrines, but as to a personal acquaintance and friendship with Himself, to this they are quite strangers. Now, it was this personal acquaintance, this friendly intercourse with the Saviour, this realisation of His existence and His presence, this intimate communication with Him, which the Apostle desired, and for which he was willing to submit to the sacrifice and loss of the dearest possession he could call his own. Let us mark this. The Christian desires to "know about Christ." Yes! but much more, to "know Christ." He cannot rest satisfied without a personal acquaintance with his Divine Master, and communion with Him. When he has this, all is transfigured. Prayer is no longer a matter of form, but a speaking to a real person, and his answering you. The Holy Communion is not a mere solemn transaction gone through; Christ makes Himself known to His people in the breaking of bread. The Scripture is a letter addressed to us, throbbing throughout with the pulsations of a living and a loving heart. Jesus becomes a real presence—a personal, well known friend; no abstraction, but one ever near and ever accessible. No wonder Paul desired to "know Him."

The last thought suggested by our subject is that of the condition on which this "knowledge" may be acquired. With us, as with the Apostle, there must be an entire separation from all self-dependence. What St. Paul did, he did right out. There were in him no half measures—no turning back to and hankering after that which was forsaken. Said a good man on his deathbed, when asked by a friend how he had been engaged since they met last—"I have been gathering all my good deeds, so-called, into one heap, and all my sins into another, and I have fled from them both to Jesus Christ."

So with us—when we turn our backs resolutely upon all, taking the apostle's estimate, and counting everything but dross and refuse in comparison with the personal acquaintance with our Divine Lord, then, like St. Paul, we come, through the Spirit, "to know Christ"—"to know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable unto His death."

FANNY FORREST; OR, EVIL COMMUNICATIONS.

CHAPTER V.

"NOW, Fanny! here I am!" cried Ruth, before she had well-nigh reached the leafy shelter of the lane. But there she stopped in blank bewilderment; no Fanny was to be seen. The lane stretched out, white and dusty, before her; the sun struggling in here and there through the hedge beside her formed strange patterns on the pathway; but there was no Fanny—no sound even of life, except the ceaseless song of the larks in the sky above her. What did it mean? What was she to do? For a moment the horrible suspicion flashed across her mind that this had been a deep-laid scheme of Fanny's all along, to obtain the money for herself, and leave her to her fate, to which plan she had fallen an easy dupe; but, again, banishing this thought, with a blush of shame at having harboured such a suspicion even for a moment, Ruth, remembering Fanny's oft-repeated injunctions to her to make no delay, supposed that, in impatience at her non-appearance, her friend had started in advance; and poor Ruth, with a groan at this first misadventure, prepared to follow in her steps.

Just once she paused to think was it, could it be, that, with a recklessness of detection, Fanny had taken the shorter high road to the town? If this were so, she might be already safe within the station, the tickets taken, only waiting for her own approach to take their places in the train; and spurred on by this thought to fresh exertions, poor Ruth, with flying steps, and heedless now of either sun or shade, gained at last the stile which led to the short piece of road lying between her and the town.

For one second she stopped to pull her hat down over her eyes, and wipe the grimy lines of dust from off her burning cheeks; but in the distance—yes!—just turning to the station, she could see a phantom hat, with a speck of bright flowers in it, and a gaudy parasol; and with a bound of hope she jumped into the road. More than one passer-by stopped and turned to look after the girl, attracted by her eager and unhappy countenance and hurried gait; but who would not hurry, when the railway is the goal to be attained? and, with only a smile of pity, the passers-by turned their curious eyes away again.

At last—at long last—the goal was reached, and with knees trembling and knocking together, Ruth ran down the steep flight of steps leading to the platform, in sure confidence that here at last her troubles would be at an end. Here she would meet Fanny, and as they bowled along together in the train she would pour into her sympathising ear the unfortunate beginning to her evening's pleasure.

And now, with another snort and another groan, a final clapping of doors, and the short shrill whistle from the guard, the long train was set a-going, and panted slowly out of sight. Ruth had taken one final skirmish down the platform, and peered into every window as she went, but no Fanny was there to be seen; and, sick at heart, wearied and bewildered, she turned away, and, forgetful of everything beyond her own forlorn condition, she sat down upon the lowest of the broad flight of steps, and cried as she had not done for many a long day before.

Bitter, bitter tears they were, surely, and bitter thoughts came with them too—fed from the stores of self-reproach and remorse, which had been gathering in her heart for long. The old porter came and stood before her musingly for some time, as she sobbed out loud in her trouble, till at length, quite satisfied that he had divined her grief, he laid his hand upon her shoulder, and bade her to cheer up, if she were a-fretting for the sports at Upton. There'd be another train a-startin' in an hour. Maybe her friend would come ere then, and she would still ha' time to see a sight o' fun and fireworks; yes, sure! But Ruth only wriggled from his hand, and, with her face still covered up, she fled like lightning up the steps, and away out into the road again. It was well for her now that the train had carried off to Upton the swarms of people who had thronged it but an hour before, or she could not have escaped without remark; but Ruth sped past the few loiterers who were hanging about still too quickly for them to remark her tear-stained face. It was only when she reached the lane again that she threw herself upon the ground, and, heedless of the grimy dust upon her Sunday frock and cape, she buried her face down among the cool green ferns and glossy briony leaves, to give full vent to all her disappointment.

It might have been an hour that she lay there—or two, perhaps, for all she knew—her heart full to the brim with angry passion at her faithless friend—full, too, of anxiety to know the real meaning of it all—full, most of all, with apprehension of the confession which might have to come if Fanny in the end had played her false. It was all a horrible confusion in her mind, and if it had not been for the terror of rousing Hannah's suspicions at her late absence, Ruth would have liked to lie there yet another hour, to try and cool her crimson cheeks, and ravel out her thoughts a little more; but if she dallied longer now, she could not hope to escape from those searching eyes she stood so much in fear of. And thus, with weary and dejected steps, Ruth once again pursued her way.

The lane seemed to have doubled and trebled in its turnings since she had been there before. The dust rose in puffs at every step, and seemed to choke her; and now, to add to her discomfiture, while still a long way from her home, she could hear loud voices, and rough noisy jokes from parties of navvies, who, in twos and threes, began to throng the path, on their way from the neighbouring quarry to the town. As each fresh group passed, and Ruth could feel them staring at her strange appearance, and could hear their muttered jokes as they passed on, she could not keep the colour from rising up even more painfully than before, as she tried to shrink herself away almost within the hedge, brushing, as she did so, the dusty branches with her face.

But the longest lane comes to an end some time or other; and as Ruth, with her last grain of strength, pushed open the little garden gate, and walked up the narrow pathway to the house, the first ray of pleasure she had felt that day stole into her wearied mind. She was at home again, that was the great relief; and who could tell but, after all, the whole thing might turn out to have been only a practical joke of Fanny's? who could tell but that when she went into the sitting-room now she might find the keys still lying where she had thrown them, and the cabinet still unrifled of its contents? With almost a buoyant step at such a hope, she entered the house, and turned the loose ill-fitting handle of the door. But there she stopped: it was not, however, from Hannah's peering eyes she shrank so guiltily back; no—worse, far worse, than anything she had pictured to herself—there, by the table in the window, where papers and odds and ends of every kind lay littered about in confusion, stood Owen, well nigh as flushed and heated as herself, with the yellow pocket-book within his hands.

It was the last straw—the last item in the day's misfortunes—the one jot to make the trouble insupportable; and with a cry of indescribable pain, Ruth slammed the door again, and rushing up the stairs, she threw herself upon the little sofa in her room, covering her face completely with her folded arms, while her whole body shook with the sobs which seemed to choke her.

It was not long—scarcely a moment—before Owen had followed her up the stairs, and was kneeling beside her, trying to soothe her grief; but it was long, very long, before, with even his most gentle words, his tenderest care, he could raise the swollen face, or catch the broken words of sorrow and self-reproach with which Ruth first tried to tell her story. It was not till he chid her, at last, for making him miserable with her sobs, and that he assured her again and again he knew it all already—he guessed it all, at least—that he could get her to listen to him as he related his portion of the tale: how some most unexpected chance had given him another evening to himself; how, as he came whistling under the window, expecting to see Ruth's face joyfully appear within, he had caught sight, instead, of Fanny's gaudily-attired figure bending with eager curiosity over the table; how, while he had vaulted in at the open window to surprise her at whatever she might be about, she had taken quick alarm, and had darted out through the door away from him, across the garden and down the road with lightning speed, stopping him in his pursuit by flinging across the hedge the pocket-book, which, until now, she had held within her hand. Owen had stayed to pick it up and find the note which he had seen fluttering out, and then he had given chase again, and at last had come up with Fanny at the lodge—and then?

Then she had given herself up, and with an impudent voice had told him all the story, in answer to his questioning, and asked him what he wanted with her now. Owen was too angry to trust himself with either words or deeds; he merely satisfied himself that she had not carried off anything with her except the pocket-book, which he had regained; he checked with one glance the words with which she tried to implicate Ruth in all her own misdoings, and then, holding her firmly by the arm, he had half led, half dragged her into the lodge, where, explaining the facts with a few brief words, he had yielded her up to the tender mercies of her uncle, and, judging by the storm which had fallen upon her before he could even escape into the road again, he could not but feel satisfied she had received her punishment in full.

So Owen's story ended, and Ruth filled in the rest with still choking voice, and with no attempt to shield herself in any particular. And Owen, when he had heard it all, while he did not hide his sorrow at her conduct, still tried to raise her heart to the full and truthful confession with which he thought she ought to meet her father on his return.

But who can describe the ten times added bitterness with which she reproached herself, and shrank withal from such a confession, when, later in the evening, with Owen still beside her, she drew the old-fashioned little chest before her, to restore its contents to their usual order! Oh! who could tell the grief, the dismay, the misery, she felt when, in the yellow pocket-book, she found the note, indeed, safe and crisp as ever, but nothing else—no faded flowers, no fold of hair, no relic of the love so strong, so tenderly cherished still!

Owen could not help her now: no one could comfort her now in her distress, as for hours, regardless of her previous fatigue, she paced the road where Fanny had thrown the case aside in her flight. The moon was glittering brightly over everything around, as they searched and rooted in the long damp grass and deep-leaved ferns for that which, if lost now, could never be restored; but without avail, no trace of what they sought for could be found.

And then, at length, Owen had to say good-night and leave her too, and had to deny, with a heart as sad well-nigh as her own, her piteous request to return again the morrow evening, and help her to pour out her trouble into her father's ear, for to-morrow he had business that would take him to a town miles away at the further side of Bentham.

And so poor Ruth was alone—alone through all that long night, when she knelt in the moonlight, craving for the strength and courage to do that which she knew she ought to do—praying humbly for grace to support her in the struggle—that she might not fail.

How it was done at last Ruth scarcely knew herself; for, ever after, that scene, that one hour, which seemed to her at the time to stretch to a hundred hours' length, remained as a nightmare on her mind—a dark corner never to be visited in memory, or drawn to the light again—the hour when she had had to listen to words of righteous anger, such as she had never heard before—to witness, as she had never thought to witness, the strong man's grief over the lost tokens of the love he yearned for still.

It was a sad, a heartbreaking sight, and we will not linger over it now, but rather turn our gaze onwards, towards the days, which came at last, when all these things were past and gone, when Fanny Forrest's hated name had sunk into oblivion, when Owen's brightest days were those he spent in the sweet atmosphere of peace within his home, and when Ruth was once again restored to the place she had held before within her father's heart, and to the enjoyment of his perfect confidence and love.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

85. What prophet used the girdle of another when foretelling his death?

86. Of whom is it stated that he was "a Syrian ready to perish?"

87. Quote the only passage in the Bible where the sycamine tree is mentioned.

88. Where did the apostle dwell of whom our Lord stated that he was "an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile"?

89. Quote a passage from which it would appear that in olden time "beacons" were used on the tops of hills as signals or land-marks.

90. Where is it stated, in reference to a sacrifice being offered to God, that a "burning lamp" passed between the pieces of the sacrifice?

91. Give the passage where an Evangelist speaks of writing with "paper and ink."

92. Where is the word "shoelatchet" first used in the Bible?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 208.

75. Benaiah the son of Jehoiada (1 Chron. xi. 22).

76. "Come upon them over against the mulberry-trees." "When thou shalt hear a sound of going in the tops of the mulberry-trees" (2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chron. xiv. 14, 15).

77. "The fourth part of a shekel of silver" (1 Sam. ix. 8).

78. Jonas (John i. 42; xxi. 15, 16, 17).

79. Mount Olivet (Acts i. 12).

(Drawn by HERBERT JOHNSTON.)

THE SINGER.

A LARK rose, rustling through the corn,
With small dusk pinions wet with dew;
The pale pearl light of early morn
In skies above was peering thro'
The lattice bars of gold and blue.

It seemed as tho' the conscious air
Was charmed to silence with the song;
I saw the brown breast-feathers stir
With that full music, soft and strong:
I stood and looked and listened long.

And all the waking earth was sweet:
The brook was whispering with the breeze,
That danced away across the wheat,
To chase the leaves, and join with these
At hide-and-seek among the trees.

O clear sweet singer of the skies,
Teach us the worth of common things,
Seen when the world of beauty lies
Broadcast around the soul that sings,
Borne up aloft on eager wings!

We choose the darkness and the ground;
We build low down beneath the corn;
And eat and live, while, all around,
In skies above, the light is born;
We fold our wings and live forlorn.

J. R. E.

THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

III.—THE WORD OF FILIAL AFFECTION.

"When Jesus therefore saw His mother, and the disciple standing by, whom He loved, He saith unto His mother, Woman, behold thy son! Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home."—JOHN xix. 26, 27.

THE three Marys—the three Marys at the cross—is the picture with which we are here presented—a picture which has been preserved for us only in this Evangel of John.

Seven times does our suffering Lord break silence while hanging upon the cross; and the dying Saviour speaks in tones so thrilling, in language so significant, that we feel it is for us to treasure up every word He uttered on this memorable occasion. These seven final words of the Lord Jesus are evidently divisible into two classes, the first three, spoken before the darkness, having reference to others, the last four having reference to Himself alone.

The first word is spoken with a sublime and absolute forgetfulness of self. In contemplation of the great sin and need of man, His all-embracing love can only find expression in the words, "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." He does not even add, "What they do to Me."

To the utterance of the second word of grace, which actually effects the forgiveness of sins in one who is the pattern and first-fruits of sinners, He is invoked by the malefactor himself, and the gates of Paradise are at once thrown wide open by Him who has never been appealed to by penitent sinner in vain.

And now, reminded by that word Paradise, of the state into which He is about to enter, and of those whom He shall leave behind, He utters this third word, of filial affection, which so distinctly reveals the deep, true, human sympathy of our Saviour. As High Priest He supplicates for all—makes intercession even for the transgressors; as King He dispenses, with royal hand, grace and salvation to the suppliant. In this third word we see Him display that tender sympathetic care which forgets not, even in the moment of greatest distraction and suffering, the interests and need of those who are dependent upon it.

In the first two words Christ speaks as the Divine Saviour; in this third utterance we hear Him speaking as the Son of Man—as one who, though He was Lord of All, condescended to assume our nature, and who is not ashamed to call us brethren. Precious are all these dying words of Christ, but with strong tenacity do we cling to these so distinctly expressive of the kinship subsisting between Christ and us. These are words which seem to bring Christ very close to the heart of our common humanity: they are tremulous with human affection; they are expressive of the profoundest and most tender sympathy; we are sure, as we listen to them, that we hear the voice of the Son of Man—One whom we can not only trust as a Saviour and worship as a King, but One unto whom, in all our weakness and weariness, we can go as to that true and loving Friend who sticketh closer than a brother.

We rejoice in the thought of the Divinity of our Lord. We love to think of those seasons when the glory of the Godhead gleamed forth upon the astonished eyes of those who could not penetrate the walls of the fleshly tabernacle in which it, for a while, was shrined. But we must be also mindful that Christ was as truly human as we are; that He assumed our nature, and was the subject of all human feelings, while He continued free from all human frailty. The power of our religion consists largely in this: that in Christ we have a personal revelation of God, affording us a definite and intelligible centre around which our human affections may cluster, and in which our human confidence may repose. Let us, then, be careful to apprehend distinctly both sides of our Saviour's character, and rejoice to know that He whom angels worship, and by whom the worlds were made, is not far removed from us, but One who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, being our Brother and our Friend as well as our God and our Saviour.

But we must now look a little more intently and carefully at the picture with which we are here presented. It is a little group standing now very near the cross, and standing there in still, speechless agony—hoping, perchance, that some dying look, expressive of recognition, may even yet be directed to them, though hardly expecting to be addressed at such a time by any special word. And who are these that venture thus near to the dying Saviour? During the previous tumult, that seems now in some degree to have subsided, the acquaintance of Jesus, and the women, stood afar off; but after a while those who are here referred to venture to take their station near the cross. And have we not here, it may be asked, just those whom we might expect to draw near?

Of all the apostles and disciples there is John only; he who records these words was the only one who heard them; John, the youngest of the twelve, whom we always picture as a mild, gentle, meditative man, was the one who, with the women, ventured nearest to the cross. And this is not so strange as it seems: he who has the gentlest spirit in times of peace and security will often be found to display the truest courage in seasons of real danger; and besides this, John's was a love which swallowed up fear, and was stronger than death.

And so of the women; we see here only what has been often seen elsewhere. At times when the hearts of strong men have failed, and have been dismayed, weak women, with brave and resolute hearts, have stepped forth to do and dare in such a way as to shame the shrinking cowardice of men.

The one of all that little group of women who mostly claims our attention is not Mary Magdalene, nor that other Mary, but Mary the mother of Jesus. What her feelings were, as she stood beholding the dying agony of her Son, no tongue can tell. Her heart was being pierced and riven by that sword of which old Simeon, thirty-three years before, had forewarned her in the Temple. All the keenness of that sword-thrust is she now feeling as she stands near the cross. There is no demonstration of grief so terrible to witness as that which she probably manifested—the pained stricken look of mute agony which cannot even find relief in tears.

> "See her standing by the cross,
> In her untold grief so lone;
> Ah, she mourns the double loss
> Of a Saviour and a Son!
> Who her weary woe can see,
> And not weep in sympathy?"

In order to understand her woe we must look back for a little. If we would understand the sorrow of any parting, we must remember the nature of the tie which is severed.

One of the most touching incidents in our Saviour's public ministry is where He meets the funeral procession at the gate of Nain, in which we see a sorrow-stricken woman following to the grave the remains of her only son, and she was a widow; all the remaining light of her lonely life had gone out in darkness. But her grief was not like unto this grief. Mary was related to Jesus as no mother ever was to son, and yet between them there was a strange and ever-broadening interval, the sense of which pierced her mother's heart like a sword.

We would like to know more about those thirty years which Jesus spent almost entirely in Nazareth with His mother—for a while, at least—supporting her by His humble industry as a carpenter. This was the time of Mary's earthly blessedness, when she had her Son all to herself. So soon as His public ministry commenced, the relationship began to alter, and the sword began to pierce. She who has had Him to herself so long has to learn the bitter lesson that He is to be peculiarly hers no longer. He henceforth belongs to the world, and He must seem to slight His earthly mother's love in doing His Heavenly Father's business. We lose sight of Mary almost entirely during the period of Christ's public life; but we meet her here again beneath the cross. Yes, through those weary hours of painfulness and humiliation we see her looking with sorrowful surprise upon Him who, without sin, was made a sin-offering. Perhaps no human heart has ever been riven as hers was then. The silence has been broken twice, but as yet there has been no word specially for her. Will He, who seems so lifted above humanity, forget, ignore His earthly relationship? No. He in this third utterance declares His filial love—shows that He who can forgive and save as a God can feel as a son. He bends His eyes, full of filial love, upon her, who has so often looked down with eyes of motherly love and tenderness upon Him; and, in departing from her, He provides for her. He is to cease from being her Son. Henceforth she is to know Him no more after the flesh, as her Son, that she may know Him more fully after the spirit, as her Saviour. But He will not leave her without a son; there shall be one to comfort and support her in her declining life—one, of all men, likest to Himself. He looks down from the cross and says—and He needs say no more—"Woman behold thy son;" and then, glancing from her to the disciple who was standing by, He said, "Behold thy mother!" And from that hour that disciple took her into his own home. The sword of which old Simeon spake has pierced her indeed:

> "And yet what mourning matron here
> Would deem thy sorrows bought too dear,

By all on this side heaven?
A Son that never did amiss—
That never shamed His mother's kiss,
Nor crossed her fondest prayer;
E'en from the tree He deigned to bow
For her His agonised brow—
Her, His sole earthly care."

Having thus glanced at the scene, let us more particularly consider the words uttered by our Saviour on this occasion—words so distinctly expressive of His filial affection.

I. The words which Christ addressed to His mother: "Woman, behold thy son!" There are several ideas of interest and importance suggested by these words which throw light upon the character of Christ, and the relation in which He stood to His mother.

The words strike us as peculiar. Christ in addressing Mary does not say, "Mother, behold thy son!" but "Woman, behold thy son!" And we may safely conclude that this mode of address was intentional, and some of the reasons for the adoption of it are not difficult to discern.

This mode of address was, not improbably, chosen with the view of mitigating the great distress of Mary. Hers was a grief which derived much of its poignancy from the fact that the sufferer whose agony she witnessed was her Son. Christ did not wish to render her sense of that relationship more vivid, but rather, as we shall presently see, to have her earthly affection assume a more spiritual and heavenly character.

Another probable reason may be found in this fact—that she was then surrounded by those who were regarding Christ with the intensest hatred; which hatred would have declared itself against her, with the view of augmenting His sufferings, had she been known to be His mother. That she might not be exposed to the brutal indignities of the crowd, He addressed her in such a way and in such terms that attention should not be directed to their relationship.

This mode of address was adopted, we may suppose, with the design of teaching Mary that there was now the dissolution of all ties of merely earthly kinship. This she has been gradually learning for three years past; now she is being painfully perfected in that lesson. She loses her Son; she finds her Saviour. He will be her Son still in the sweet and tender memories of the past; but from this time forward He will be chiefly regarded as her Redeemer, her Lord, the very Christ of God.

As we consider this mode of address, we can scarcely fail to discern another reason for its selection. The silence of Christ is not less significant than His speech. The reserve which characterises this mode of address, the evident avoidance of the use of the word mother, the ignoring of the earthly relationship, is not without intention. We seem warned beforehand against yielding to that tendency which has developed into the Mariolatry of the Church of Rome. We know how in that Church the Virgin is made to take the place of the Divine Son, and how the worship and service of the Virgin are substituted for the worship and service of Christ. To such an extent is this carried, that we may say that in the religion of Rome the central figure is rather that of the Virgin than that of the Lord Jesus Christ. How sad is it that millions of our fellow-creatures should be taught to regard the Virgin as elected to be the mother of God, and the co-redeemer of the world; and that sinners' prayers are more sure to be heard by her than by the Son, for the Virgin is all mercy, while the Son is both mercy and justice. How sad is it that any should think of offering such a prayer as this—"O Mary, the most sweet patron of the distressed, the most learned advocate of the guilty, and the only hope of those who despair, the illustrious saviour of sinners! hear and assist me, most benignant mother of God and mercy!" This Mariolatry—this Virgin-worship—was never more rampant in the Church of Rome than now.

Is it not worthy of notice that the New Testament is distinguished by the conspicuous absence of everything which can even seem to countenance the worship of the Virgin? She is, indeed, to be accounted as highly-favoured among women; but she is not to be regarded as miraculously separated from the sisterhood into which she was born. The allusions to her are brief and few, and all of such a kind that we can scarcely do otherwise than regard them as being designed to warn men, by anticipation, against those errors into which so many who call themselves Christians have been betrayed. If we limit our attention to the mode of address adopted by Christ on the cross, do we not see this? Does it not teach us—does it not seem designed to teach us—that no creature, not even the earthly mother of Jesus, must be allowed to stand between the sinner and the Saviour?

We see Christ here providing for His mother, and providing for her in a peculiar way: the word is, "Woman, behold thy son!" On the cross she sees her Lord and Saviour; by her side, in the person of the beloved disciple, she sees one who henceforth will be to her as a son. We may not unreasonably conclude, from this consignment of her to the care of John, that Mary was at this time a childless widow. He who has been a Son and more than a Son to her, is now about to take His departure. He can never be as a Son to her again. Henceforth she will know Him no more after the flesh. But he leaves her not desolate and unprovided for. The old relationship is dissolved, and henceforth is only to be remembered as that which has been. A new relationship is formed.

"When Jesus therefore saw His mother, and the disciple standing by whom He loved, He saith unto His mother, Woman, behold thy son!"

We cannot but admire the affectionate and provident regard which Christ displayed towards His earthly mother; and we cannot but rejoice that He regards with an equally tender and provident care all those who are bound to Him by the relationship of faith. There is no relationship so close, so dear, so enduring as this. On one occasion, when some one came to Jesus and said, "Thy mother and thy brethren are without, desiring to speak with Thee," we know what was Christ's reply—"He who doeth the will of My Father, the same is My mother, and sister, and brother." All who belong to this great spiritual family Christ loves with an unchanging love, and provides for with a tender and untiring carefulness.

II. But we must not pass over without notice the word which Christ addresses to the beloved disciple—"Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother! And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home."

St. John was selected by Christ, we may be sure, as the one who was in every way best fitted to make up to Mary for the loss which would appear to her at first as so sad and irreparable a one. All that could be done to secure for her a peaceful and happy old age we may be certain St. John did—loving her alike for her own and for Jesus' sake. Mary would never tire of talking of Him who was both her Son and her Saviour; and St. John would be readier to listen than even Mary was to speak. Honour had been put upon John before, during the public ministry of Christ. He appears as the beloved disciple—the one who was admitted to closest intimacy with the Master; and he is singled out by the dying Saviour as the one to whom this sacred trust is to be confided. We know not how long they lived together, nor where they lived, but we are sure that their communion was sweet; and we can scarcely do otherwise than believe that this close and possibly lengthened intercourse with the mother of Jesus was the means of enabling him to do what we all feel that he does—bring the living, loving, personal Christ nearer to us than any other New Testament writer. The other Evangelists tell us more minutely what Christ did; John treasures up the most precious words of Jesus, and presents to our wondering and admiring eyes in His divine and human personality the very Christ of God.

Here we see Him having regard to one of the precepts of the old moral law—"Honour thy father and thy mother." Let children remember that, do what they will, they can never repay their parents for what they have done for them. They cannot be too thankful for a father's considerate care and wise control; but how much more do they owe to a mother's love! One of the marvels of nature is a mother's love for her children. What can there be more seemly and befitting, then, than the consistent and uniform display of filial affection? Not only should children honour and obey their parents while the state of childhood continues, but in after life, when they have passed beyond their immediate control, and are no longer dependent on their care, they should display to them that considerate and respectful regard which, whatever their age and position, it will be always their duty and honour to render.

And if, when the children are strong and vigorous, the parents have become old and decrepid, it should be accounted not a duty to be grudgingly discharged, but an honour and a privilege to minister to their comfort or their need. Those who are called thus to act should look forward to the time when, in the infirmity and perhaps the dependence of their own old age, the love, care, considerate regard of their own children will be their greatest earthly solace. We should be thankful that the precept of Sinai is sustained by the sanction of Calvary, and that, while dying for our sins, Christ left us this example of filial affection, that we in this, as in all other respects, might follow in His steps.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

WITH THEM WHO HAVE NOT WHERE TO LAY THEIR HEADS.

THERE is a degree of poverty which, while it is not absolute pauperism, often has deeper needs than those which are alleviated by parochial relief—a destitution which is none the less bitter because those who suffer it cannot stoop to actual mendicancy, and shrink from the degradation of the casual ward and its contaminating influences.

Those of us who at this season of the year are surrounded with comforts, and can meet together to enjoy them, should feel that there is no sadder phase of the life of this great city than that to which our attention is called by the statistics of those same casual wards, and the accompanying certainty that every night there are men, women, and children who, amidst surrounding luxury and splendour, have not where to lay their heads, and for whom the repellent door of the nearest union workhouse is closed, even if they could summon such courage as comes of desperation, and dared to enter.

Happily, the numbers of those who seek what is called casual relief have diminished in proportion to the general abatement of pauperism; and it is perhaps encouraging to know that the applicants for nightly shelter at Refuges for the homeless and destitute are fewer than they were three or four years ago. This is a fact which should be made public, because some of these Refuges have been accused of offering inducements to casual paupers to seek food and shelter provided by charitable subscriptions, instead of betaking themselves to the night-wards provided for them at metropolitan workhouses. The complaint was made on altogether insufficient grounds, at a time when, during a hard winter, and with a fearful amount of distress among the poorest class of the community, the workhouse night-wards themselves were frequently inadequate to the demands made upon them; while, apart from the persons who were known as casual paupers, there were hundreds of unfortunates suffering from temporary starvation and the want of a place in which to find a night's lodging, who yet were altogether removed from what is known as pauperism, and dreaded the abject hopelessness which they associated with "the Union."

It should not be forgotten, either, that the task which is, and was then, imposed upon the pauper on the morning following his night's lodging and its previous dole of gruel and bread, renders it almost impossible for the recipient to obtain work. Before his job of stone-breaking or oakum-picking is accomplished, the hour for commencing ordinary labour outside the workhouse walls has passed, and his hope of resuming independent employment, and the wages that will provide food and lodging for the next four-and-twenty hours, has passed also. This alone is always sufficient to make a very marked distinction between the regular casual pauper and the temporarily unfortunate man or woman who, having failed to get work, and seeking only the aid that may give rest and strength for a renewed effort, might look in vain for succour but for the existence of places like that admirable Institution to which I wish to take you to-night.

The shameful spectacle of groups, and, in many instances, of crowds, of houseless, starving, and half-naked creatures huddled about the doors of casual wards, to which they had been refused admission in direct defiance of legislation, led to the establishment of night Refuges. There was then no time to dispute. While boards and committees were squabbling and vilifying each other, the poor were perishing. But even now that a better system prevails, and pauperism has so considerably diminished, there is much necessity for the continuance of these institutions and their adaptation to the relief of that kind of distress which is all the more poignant because it is at present only temporary, but would receive the brand and stamp of permanence if it could find no other mitigation than that secured by an appeal to workhouse officials, the shelter of the casual shed, the union dole, and the daily task required in return.

At the time that night Refuges were first founded, in consequence of the failure of the Houseless Poor Act, there were one or two Institutions which went on the plan of offering no inducement whatever to those who sought shelter within their walls. The provisions were barer, the beds harder, the reception little less cold and unsympathetic than they would receive at any metropolitan union.

Those of my readers who remember the Refuge for the Houseless Poor which once stood in Playhouse Yard, close to that foul tangle of courts that still exists between Barbican and St. Luke's, and is known as "the Chequers," will understand me when I say that there were no alluring inducements for the houseless and the destitute to seek its aid.

I have seldom seen a more painfully suggestive crowd than that which waited outside the blank door of that hideous building on a cold drizzly evening when I paid the place a visit, only a short time before it was finally closed. I cannot deny, however, that the applicants for admission consisted of those persons for whom the institution seemed to be especially designed. The very lowest class of poverty, the representatives of sheer destitution, made up the 350 men and the 150 women who were to occupy the bare wooden bunks in the two departments of the building that night, and to accept, as a stay against starvation, the half-pound of dry bread and the drink of water. What I would call emphatic attention to is the fact that this place was filled nightly at that time, because the inmates could leave early in the morning to seek a day's work, and so rise out of that depth of destitution which was represented by the nightly return to the casual ward. But let us remember that, though this Institution could scarcely be characterised by the warm name of "charity," it received all applicants who were not suffering from infectious diseases, and therefore its policy was deterrent. In order to separate itself from the idle casual, it made its provisions little short of penal, and, indeed, very far short of those common comforts that are to be found in prison.

But the Refuge in Newport Market was one of those which had been founded on a different principle. It was never intended as a supplement to the casual ward, or as having any relation to poor-law relief; though, during the terrible distress that overtook the houseless in that severe winter when our poor-law arrangements broke down utterly, it was impossible for any place founded in the name of Christian love and charity to be very particular in excluding famishing and frozen men and women on the suspicion that they had already somehow obtained parochial relief the night before.

This "Refuge" was originally established by the influence and the personal exertions of Mrs. Gladstone, and a few ladies and gentlemen who, knowing of the extreme distress that prevailed in all that poverty-stricken neighbourhood about Seven Dials, around the alien-haunted district of Soho, and in the purlieus of Drury Lane, and the courts of Long Acre, set about providing some remedy for the misery that homeless destitute men, women, and children had to suffer during the bitter nights of winter. First, a regular mission was established in an ordinary room, and, after a time, space was secured to make a Refuge—first for six, then for ten, and afterwards for twenty of the most destitute cases which came under the notice of the mission-woman. This went on till the funds were sufficient to warrant a very earnest desire to obtain larger premises, and at last to make a bid for that queer ramshackle old slaughter-house which was the rather too indicative feature of the locality. The landlords of this place were fully alive to the value of any property rising in proportion to the anxiety of somebody to become its tenant, and they demanded a high rent accordingly. Still, the work had to be done, and the slaughter-house—cleansed, repaired, whitewashed, and divided into several queer, irregular-shaped wards and rooms, which were reached by strange flights of steps and zig-zag entries—was opened with cheerful confidence and hope, under the earnest superintendence of the Rev. J. Williams, who was at that time incumbent of the parish of St. Mary, Soho. It was at that period that I first made acquaintance with the Institution, and with the quiet, undemonstrative work of charity which was carried on there, and is continued to this day, though it is less arduous now that the neighbourhood itself has felt the influence of such an organisation—not so much in the diminution of actual poverty, as in the humanising and constantly suggestive presence of men and women who have brought a Gospel to those who were hopeless, and seemed to have none to care for them.

The need to receive numbers every night to the utmost limits of the Institution has passed now, except occasionally during very severe weather; and though the cases admitted are still those where deep, and sometimes apparently almost fatal misfortune is the claim, there is no longer the urgency which forbade a too discriminating selection, and the regular casual stands no chance under the quick and experienced eye of the superintendent, Major Ramsden, whose military tone and manner are, by the way, modulated so as to carry the sense of detection to the pretender, and to support and give courage to the weak and faint-hearted.

The same complete quiet method of receiving applicants who await admission enables me to repeat the impression which I received during the time that the demands upon the night Refuge were more urgent. The experienced visitor who stands at the gate of this rehabilitated building that was once the old slaughter-house, and who watches the people go in one by one, and listens to their low-voiced pleas for food and shelter, cannot mistake them for casual ward cases. Just as, in some other Institutions, the pain of the spectacle is the degraded poverty of those who seek aid, the most affecting element here is utter destitution, without that accustomed debasement which would find a fitting resource at the workhouse door, leading to the night shed.

These are broken-down men and women; old men beaten in the battle of life, and full of present sorrow; young men who have fought and failed, or who have eaten of the husks, and seek occasion to rise to a better mind; middle-aged men not altogether crushed or hopeless, but in sore want, and needing the sound of a kindly voice, the touch of a friendly hand; women who have lost youth and worldly hope together—women who, more weak than wicked, and without resource, need some stay alike for fainting bodies and for wandering souls; women worn and hungry, because of the lack even of ill-paid work, and asking for rest and food till they can seek employment: some who will go forth in the morning and set out afresh; others who, if they can secure two or three nights' lodging, with a mouthful of food and drink morning and evening, have a good hope of doing better in the future.

To those who know how the demand for certain kinds of labour varies, and frequently slackens towards the winter months, when need is sorest, this latter most merciful provision comes with a sense of truest charity. Tickets of admission are issued to friends and visitors of the Institution (and any one may be a visitor who chooses to ring at the bell of the old slaughter-house), entitling the holder to admission after the regular evening hour of half-past five to six, so that in bestowing one of these the judicious subscriber (not necessarily, but surely from sympathy a subscriber, can be a true benefactor. For these tickets will admit the really deserving nightly for a week, with supper of bread and coffee or cocoa, or occasional savoury soup, and breakfast of bread and coffee. And even this time is occasionally extended, if there be a reasonable prospect of obtaining work. Not only ticket-holders, but every applicant, may have the same privilege, if it can be shown that he or she is really likely to obtain employment. But there is more than this. There are men here—truest of gentlemen beyond that social stamp of rank which rightfully belongs to them—who, with a true manly instinct, know how to take poverty by the hand without offensive patronage or untimely preaching. There are ladies who, in their true womanhood, can see the contrition in faces bowed down—the shame that is caused, not by evil doings, but by the feeling of dismay which comes of having to ask for charity—can sympathise with broken fortunes, with gentle nurture—cast upon a hard relentless world with that poverty which is "above the common."

More still. Among the supporters and the constant visitors are those who can use special influence for cases that need it most, and obtain for them admission to hospitals and other asylums, or introduce to situations those who by sudden calamity have been deprived of the means of living.

Yes, even in their deepest need, poor wandering homeless women may come here and find help, for in that large, lofty, yet warm and well-lighted room, the women's dormitory—one side of which is composed of a series of niches where the comfortable beds are placed—there are to be seen a row of doors, which seem to belong to a series of cabins, as, indeed, they do. Each door opens into a small bed-room—small, but with room for a chair, a tiny table, and the neat bed. They are the lodgings set apart for women who, in the midst of their poverty and destitution, are looking forward fearfully to the time when children will be born to them, and so to a period of weakness, and of the sad mingling of maternal pity and desponding sorrow. Let me say, in one line from the Report, that last year eight young women were received into the Refuge some time before their confinement, were passed on to Queen Charlotte's Hospital, and were helped until such time as they were able to help themselves.

I think the knowledge of this is so cheerful an instance of the value of this most representative Refuge, that even the sight of the bright warm glowing kitchen, with its great boiler of hot coffee, and its noble kettle of soup occupying the jolly range, scarcely imparts an extra beam to the picture; while the long rows of white mugs, the pleasant, clean, fragrant loaves, the big milk-cans, the courteous chef, who has a true and pardonable pride in his surroundings—no, not even the cosy rug-covered berths and bunks in the dormitories, nor the quaint little corner room to which I have to climb a crooked staircase to shake hands with the sister who is in charge, nor the equally quaint and cornery, not to say inconvenient, sitting-room of Major and Mrs. Ramsden, who have left their tea unfinished to do the honours of the Institution—can suggest to me a better word to say than that which is suggested by the picture of the poor wandering, weary, fainting women, who, almost in despair, not only for a real, but for an expected life, come here to find rest and peace.

Stay; one word more. Who are the class of people for whom the Refuge doors are ordinarily open? Let us see what were the most numerous cases among the inmates who last year received 6,669 nights' lodgings and 16,889 suppers and breakfasts. Among the men, "labourers," of course, are most numerous; then discharged soldiers—poor fellows who have perhaps foolishly snatched at liberty when offered, and foregone the advantages of re-engagement and a pension; next in numerical order come clerks—a very painfully suggestive fact, especially when read by the light of the advertisement-columns of our newspapers, and the sad story of genteel poverty in that great suburban ring which encircles the wealthiest city in the world. Of house-painters there were 24, of servants 21, of tailors 13, of seamen 8; and other callings were represented in remarkable variety, including 1 actor, 6 cooks, 1 schoolmaster, 2 surveyors, and 1 tutor. Among the women 199 servants show sadly enough the truth of the old adage, "service is no inheritance;" while in numerieal succession there were, 55 charwomen, 41 laundresses, 37 needlewomen, 31 tailoresses, 27 dressmakers, 26 machinists (alas! how women still utterly depend on "the needle" for a subsistence!), 24 cooks, 20 ironers, 16 field-labourers. There were 4 governesses, 1 actress, 1 mission-woman, and 1 stay-maker, the rest being variously described.

From among these, 94 men and 193 women obtained employment, 77 women having been sent to Penitentiaries and Homes, while 18 were supported in the Refuge or elsewhere by needlework, 13 were sent to their friends, 69 obtained permanent work, and 14 girls of good character were sent to servants' Homes.

But I have left out one thing now. Among this great representative company of refugees were 60 children, of whom 37 were sent to nurse or to school, while those who were old enough—— Well just listen to that burst of military music in a distant upper room of the old slaughter-house. I must tell you something about the Newport Market boys another time.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"Throwing himself into a chair, covered his face with his hands."—p. 251.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXXI.

IT is always pleasant to the feminine mind to be "made much of," and especially so when unkindness or neglect has been one's portion; it was therefore quite exhilarating to Eda when she found herself treated as a guest whose coming confers honour; nor could she help feeling flattered by Mrs. Lavalle's unaffected eagerness to win her liking.

The afternoon passed swiftly away, for the West Indian lady's tables were covered with rare and costly articles that Eda was delighted to examine. From her wardrobe, too, she brought curious pieces of embroidery and bead-work, filmy lace, and shawls such as even the fastidious Mrs. de Courcy might have yearned to possess. One of the handsomest she folded round her visitor, and entreated her to accept.

"Why do you pain me with these refusals?" she said, when the gift was gratefully but positively declined. "It is so pleasant to give to those we love; and I mean to love you dearly, and be your best and truest friend."

It was an enthusiastic speech for a middle-aged lady to make to a young girl, whom she had seen but once before; and Eda half-laughingly replied, "Our friendship must be of longer growth before it will warrant my accepting such expensive tokens of it."

"But I have so many of these things," urged Mrs. Lavalle, with a sigh; "and of what use are they to me? Nothing I wear will make me fresh and fair like you. I never used to care about my looks, for I was scarcely more than a child when I married, and Mr. Lavalle was as indifferent to my appearance as he was to everything else but his gains. But now, when I look in my glass and see how sallow, how hideous I am, I long to be like other women—like you, for instance." And she gazed at Eda with eyes that were dim with tears.

"But you would not care to be loved solely for a fair face?" urged her embarrassed companion, who could not deny that Mrs. Lavalle did not possess the charm of a fine complexion and regular features.

"Solely for that—no; but does not every woman crave to be beautiful in the sight of those she loves?"

"Perhaps so; and yet I do not think that sincere affection pays much regard to outward appearance. Pretty women often marry plain men, and vice versâ, while mothers will lavish more tenderness on a sickly or deformed baby than a fine one."

"Mothers—yes; but I was not taking that view of the matter. I forgot, too, your brother says you are very religious; perhaps you think me wicked for repining over my ugliness."

"Do you repine? Oh, Mrs. Lavalle, surely no one has less cause!" And Eda glanced around her. "Why do you call yourself ugly? If you had looked in your glass when you so smilingly pressed your gift upon me, you would have thought differently."

Mrs. Lavalle kissed her, called her a little flatterer—although Eda persisted that she had only spoken the simple truth—and was comforted. But as the hour drew near which Mark had fixed for his return her spirits seemed to sink again, and drawing her visitor to an ottoman at her feet she said, agitatedly, "I have had something to confess ever since you have been here, but could not summon courage to tell you what may lower me in your estimation. But if I do not speak at once the opportunity will be lost. Do you like me, Eda? A little? A great deal? Well enough for a sister-in-law?"

The question was such a startling one that Eda was too confounded to reply; and Mrs. Lavalle went on, "Yes, I know what you think—that I am too old for Mark, although I really am not many years his senior. But there is no other objection, is there? He assures me that I am not homely in his eyes—that he shall never be ashamed of his ugly wife; and it was such exquisite happiness to be loved, that I could not resolve to renounce it."

Still Eda could not speak. The image of Lady Eudora, young, vivacious, and lovely, floated before her. Could Mark have so completely forgotten her already as to have made another choice, and such a choice as this?

"I see you are not only surprised, but sorry," Mrs. Lavalle exclaimed. "You think such a clever handsome young man ought to have done better. Although he is willing to overlook my want of youth and beauty, you are not. But I do not blame you for it. If I had such a brother I should think as you do—that no woman could be fair or good enough for him. Still, you will try to reconcile yourself to me, will you not?"

"It is so sudden—I was so unprepared for such news!" Eda faltered, recollecting as she spoke that not many weeks had gone by since Mark told her that Mrs. Lavalle was indolent and ill-tempered, and not the kind of person that he should care for her to associate with. "But if it is really decided, and you have seriously considered the step you are taking, I can only say that I hope Mark will try to make you happy."

"My dear, you should rather say that you hope I shall try to make him contented with me. Assured of such love as his I have nothing left to wish for; and if I had been talking in a murmuring strain, remember it is only for his sake that I have longed to be pretty. I cannot help wishing that he had more reason to be proud of his wife. But here he comes, to tell you the rest himself."

Brisk, smiling, and apparently on the best of terms with himself, Mark came in, and Mrs. Lavalle rose to meet him.

"Ah, Sophie! then you have your guest; and I suppose you have indulged in a famous feminine gossip. Well, Eda, dear, have you not a word left for me?"

As she stepped forward to receive his salute, Mrs. Lavalle said, "I shall leave you together for a few minutes," and quitted the room. Feeling that something was expected of him, Mark drew his chair nearer to his sister's, and passed his arm around her. "Aren't you going to congratulate me, little sis?" he asked. "Don't you think I shall be a happier man, now I have the prospect of a settled home, than while I was knocking about in lodgings, without a creature to care whether I was alive or dead?"

Eda's heart swelled. Was it her fault he had been so situated? But she would not speak of herself just now, and only replied to his first question. "I will gladly congratulate you, if you can assure me that it is out of pure love for herself that you are wedding this lady."

"Of course I am very fond of her. She is one of the best-hearted women I ever met with." And Mark held out his hand to display a splendid ring, saying, "Her gift, Eda. She would overload me with proofs of her generous affection, if I would permit it."

"But Mrs. Lavalle is some years your senior," his sister reminded him; and he perceptibly winced.

"One cannot have all one craves for, even in a wife; and Sophie's excellent qualities must atone for the rest," was all he said.

"But will they atone? Think, too, how short a time you have known her. By your love for our dear dead mother, oh do not repeat the crime you committed when you wooed the Lady Eudora!"

"Crime, Eda! This is strong language!" he exclaimed, angrily. "Crime, indeed!"

"Forgive me," said his sister, deprecating his wrath—"forgive me, if I seem harsh and over-officious; but I feel that I must—indeed, that I ought—to say what is in my mind."

"At the risk of seriously offending me?" he asked frowningly. "You are too fond of finding fault with everything I do."

"Only because I love you fondly, Mark, and want to see you just such a good conscientious man as the dear father must have been whom we can barely recollect."

"I suppose my conscience is as clear as that of most young fellows of my age. I have never been able to see that it would have been any crime to marry Lady Eudora. You take such extreme views of things that are done every day. No one but you will think any the worse of me for marrying a rich widow."

But Eda was not to be convinced by such logic as this, and she answered, decidedly, "Say what you will, you cannot deny that it is a sin, as well as an act of cruelty, to marry a woman whom you do not love sincerely."

Mark made her a warning gesture, for in her excitement she had raised her voice, and he did not know who might overhear her. "Every one is not as romantic as you are; and people often enter the holy state of matrimony without caring much about each other, yet jog on together very comfortably. You ought to have seen enough of the world by this time to know that."

"But what you say doesn't make it right," Eda persisted; "and marriage is too solemn to be entered upon without a deeper feeling than merely liking each other."

"Sophie is satisfied. She is not as silly and sentimental as you are," he hastily told her.

Eda shook her head. Sophie might not be given to sentiment, but she had made revelations this afternoon which proved that she had deep feelings, and a faith in Mark's affection as implicit as the Lady Eudora's had been, and perhaps as insecurely based.

"Mrs. Lavalle is content because she thinks that you love her for herself. But do you, Mark—do you?"

He was about to answer boldly in the affirmative, when his eyes met his sister's, and her anxious searching gaze embarrassed him. There were moments—and this was one of them—when Eda looked so like their dead mother that recollections were evoked he would fain forget.

"Don't torture me, there's a dear good girl! I don't think I'm capable of what the French call a grande passion, but I will make Sophie a good husband. She shall have everything she wishes for!"

Eda was not satisfied—how could she be, with such evasions? And at last he broke from her clinging arms, and, throwing himself into a chair, covered his face with his hand.

"It's no use preaching to me now, child; one can't always fight against circumstances. Perhaps this poor Sophie isn't—isn't quite the woman I should have chosen; but I was so situated that I could not help myself. There! you know all now, so tease me no more."

"Have you lost your secretaryship?" she could not resist asking.

"Lost it!" and he smiled bitterly; "I wish I had, months ago. Eda, I was gulled all along; the whole affair was a deception, although I, like many others, believed that everything was correct. Why, it was actually kept afloat with my own money, and I—fool that I was!—never knew it till the clever manager absconded, with my last hundred in his pocket to pay his travelling expenses."

And this was the end of the money with which the Earl of Chessington had released his daughter from her unworthy suitor! Was it not retribution? Eda could not profess to regret what had happened, nor did she testify any interest in the lengthy explanation her brother entered into, to prove that it was not through any want of sagacity on his own part that he had been so thoroughly duped.

"Are you in debt?" she asked, when he paused.

"Certainly not. A man is not his own master when he has a swarm of creditors at his back. No one can say that I am extravagant or unprincipled."

"But, Mark, what should the loss of your money have to do with your marrying Mrs. Lavalle?"

His face twitched convulsively. "Suppose you spare me any more cross-questioning. You may be brave enough to bear a heavy loss coolly, and not to mind finding yourself penniless just as you believed you were on the high road to fortune; but I cannot be so strong-minded. On the contrary, I felt very thankful that a kind-hearted, sensible woman is willing to give me another chance of making my way in the world."

"And you would marry Mrs. Lavalle that you may speculate with her money? Oh, Mark, don't—pray don't do this!"

He put his finger on his lips. "Hush! she is coming. She should have told you that it is no use to speak of these things now, for we were married the day before yesterday!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

Eda could not dissemble as cleverly as her brother, and when the bride came towards her, eagerly questioning her face, she could not deck it with smiles. Neither could she utter the looked-for congratulations; it would have been a mockery to felicitate the woman whose property had been her principal charm in the sight of the young man to whom she had rashly united herself. She could only express a faint hope that neither of them would ever have cause to regret what they had done; and Sophie looked quite disconcerted at the coldness of her manner, till Eda, saying, "You are my sister now—it is very pleasant to have a sister!" kissed her so affectionately, that her spirits revived.

Impulsive in all she did, Mrs. Granton repaid her kisses fourfold, insisted on selecting from her jewel-box her prettiest chain and locket for her new relative, and would not let her go away without the costly shawl she had already pressed her to accept.

"We have taken a charming little villa at Sydenham," she said, "and talk of removing there next week. You must arrange to leave Mrs. de Courcy at once, and go with us. Of course Eda goes with us, dearest Mark?" she added, as he made some gesture of dissent and drew her to his side.

"No, Sophie, I think not. We shall be delighted to have Eda, but not just yet. No third person must be admitted till our honeymoon is over."

A flush of gratified vanity overspread the bride's sallow face. "You hear him, Eda? He would have me believe that my society suffices for him. Is he not a flatterer?"

"I hope not," she was told, so gravely and earnestly that her own looks sobered. "I hope and pray that Mark will strive to prove himself worthy of the love you have given him."

"He is more than worthy; he ought to have married some one far superior to me," said Mrs. Granton, with such a look of adoration that her idol shrank from it, conscience-stricken and ashamed.

"If I am satisfied with my choice, you ought not to adopt such a disparaging tone," he said, lightly. "Aren't we keeping Eda too long?"

"I will send for a cab for her; but before she goes we had better fix the day for her to come to us. I cannot bear, dear Mark, to think that your sister is working for her bread while we have plenty."

"Eda is so independent that I doubt whether you will be able to prevail with her to give up her situation."

"But she is not comfortable at Mrs. de Courcy's," Mrs. Granton persisted; "she told me so this afternoon. You will come to us, Eda dear, will you not?"

There was a moment's pause, for Eda longed to hear her brother endorse the invitation; but he had stooped to play with a pet spaniel of his wife's, and she involuntarily said to herself, "He does not want me!"

And she was right. Mark always felt uneasy when his actions were viewed by the clear light of his sister's honesty. She knew but of one way of walking through life, and with her face set heavenwards went steadily on, gaining wisdom from every slip or stumble; while Mark had found out fifty crooked paths, each of which was to bring him to the summit of earthly felicity. When with his sister he was frequently seized with fits of remorseful affection, and while these lasted he was wont to acknowledge her worth, and promise himself what he would do for her as soon as he was in receipt of a good income. But these were indefinite resolutions, forgotten as soon as she had left him, and never likely to be fulfilled.

"I could not leave Mrs. de Courcy unless she were provided with some one to take my place," she said, in answer to Mrs. Granton's reiterated entreaties. "And my brother is quite right when he declares that a third person would be de trop just now. Presently, if you continue to wish it, and Mark also, I shall be happy to pay you a visit."

With this arrangement Mrs. Granton was obliged to be satisfied, although she tearfully complained to her husband that it was hard to find Eda determined to be so cold and distant, instead of responding to her advances.

XUM

And so Eda went back to the De Courcy mansion with an aching head and perturbed spirit. Unconsciously to herself she had built great hopes on Mark's marriage, often whiling away a dull hour in pleasant fancies of what might be if he made a prudent choice. The bride Eda pictured for him was to have a been a good, gentle woman, whose love was to exercise a wonderful influence over him. In the warmth of a happy home his good qualities were to expand, and those defects of character to which she could not blind herself were to be gradually eradicated. But the castle she thus built in the air had crumbled away, and he was actually united to a woman whom he had only known for a few weeks, or months at farthest.

It was some time before Eda could realise to herself that Mark was married—actually married; and when she received a letter commencing "My dearest sister," and ending with "Most affectionately yours, Sophie Granton," she asked herself again and again if it could be really true that this middle-aged widow was her brother's wife.

But she answered the note which was written to announce the removal of the newly-married couple to Sydenham as kindly and warmly as she could, promising to pay Sophie a visit in the new house the first time she had a day at her disposal. A foreboding that the poor bride would soon find out her mistake, and stand in need of all the sympathy she could give her, was upon Eda; and though she strove to banish it as an injustice to Mark, it would not be driven away.

A vague reluctance to tell the tale of her brother's marriage kept her away from the Allonbys so long, that Doris, who was sincerely attached to her, put aside her household cares for a whole afternoon, in order to walk to Mr. de Courcy's, and inquire the reason of her long absence. Fortunately, the little girls were just going out in the carriage with their mother, and Eda was at liberty to entertain her friend, and chat with her freely. Mrs. Wells, too, with a consideration she never testified to any one else, sent up some tea and two or three dainty little dishes, averring that such a young lady as Miss Granton deserved everything a body could do for her; and Doris, who rarely found time to enjoy herself, leaned back in the soft chair Eda brought her, and forgot for once to be particular about the crumbs or a crease in her bonnet-ribbon.

There were many questions asked and answered. Fritz was well, and busy; such lots of people had been to look at his new picture that it had been quite a task to keep the stair-carpets commonly decent; but they all predicted that it would be a success. Gran was well, and in high spirits at her boy's prospects: when would Eda come and talk them over with her? The rest were tolerable, except Harry; he had been ailing for some time; and Flossy—silly little Flossy!—her father was beginning to feel annoyed at Richard Atwood's attentions to her; not because he disliked the young man, but because he was not in a position to keep a wife, but spending all he earned as fast as it came. However, Flossy was fond of him, and had actually fretted herself ill, or fancied she was ill; and how it was to end she, Doris, did not know; as Richie no sooner found that he was likely to lose her than he grew furious, and positively refused to give her up. Eda busied herself for a few minutes at the tea-table before she commented on this last bit of news, which poor Doris had told without the slightest suspicion of the pain she was inflicting, and then looked up, very pale, certainly, but speaking in calm firm tones.

"Are you quite sure that Mr. Atwood has been actually paying his addresses to Flossy? Take time to consider before you answer, for I want to know the truth—the exact truth."

Doris began to flush and look uncomfortable. Eda's changed face was awakening her to the truth. "If I ought not to have mentioned this, I am very sorry. I cannot say what Mr. Atwood's intentions may have been; but—forgive me if I grieve you, dear Eda—I know that both Flossy and her parents have for some time believed him to be attached to her. Fritz says——"

"Go on," said Eda; "I have a great respect for Mr. Allonby's judgment."

"Oh, but this is only an opinion he expressed, and may be incorrect," Doris answered, dubiously.

"Unless you think he will be displeased with you for repeating it, I should like to know precisely what Mr. Allonby said," Eda persisted.

"No, I don't think he would be angry; it was only this—that he is afraid Richard Atwood is one of those young men who suffer themselves to drift into dilemmas through their own weakness. They like to hover about a pretty girl, and don't trouble themselves as to the consequences till it is too late to retreat with honour." Then Doris stopped suddenly, and put her hands together with a startled look. "Ah! I know now why he and Gran were so anxious for me to come to you. They thought you had heard this, and were stopping away from us because you are unhappy. But I would have stopped away if I had dreamed that I should make so much mischief!"

Eda kissed her cheek. "You have not made any mischief. It is only right that I should know this. Neither am I so unhappy as I should have thought such tidings would make me; but I am grieved deeply—grieved for Flossy; and for Richard too," she added, remembering that not a week had elapsed since she had received a letter from him couched in terms of the greatest affection.

When Doris, still looking concerned at the consequences of her revelations, had left her, Eda walked to a mirror, and stood for some time steadfastly regarding her own features. Beside the face there pictured she saw the fairer one of Flossy Devon, and comprehended why she was forsaken. Richie had been wavering in his allegiance when he so eagerly besought her to marry him. He had recognised her good qualities, and his own weakness, and perhaps this was the first and only struggle he had made to conquer it.

However, she had truly told Doris that the discovery cost her few pangs on her own account. Ever since her last interview with Richie she had been feeling more and more keenly that it was not to a man who had no stability that she could entrust her future life. It had been a pleasant dream, from which she awakened as soon as she saw him as he really was—neither the ideal lover of a girl's imagination, nor the brave good man whose calm earnest affection should be her stay and comfort through life. There was something like contempt mingling with her sorrow when she gathered his letters together and returned them to the writer, without the addition of one accusing word. Surely his own conscience must reproach him more sharply than anything that could be said by the young girl whom yesterday he wooed and to-day deserted!

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 15. An Important Question.

Chapter to be read—Acts xv.

INTRODUCTION. Have seen Paul and Barnabas finishing one missionary journey. Had gone through great deal. Long journeys, dangers, persecutions. Had met with cruel reception from Jews, but hearty welcome from Gentiles. Now take rest for a while with friends in Antioch (xiv. 28). But now a difficulty arises: Till now, all Gentiles who turned to God were admitted into Jewish Church. What was the outward rite for that? Remind how circumcision was instituted in Abraham's time (Gen. xv.), and how no uncircumcised person could partake of Jewish feasts, in temple (Ex. xii. 48). But now Gentiles are being converted in great numbers and in different parts of the world. Must they all be circumcised?

I. The Question Asked. (Read xv. 1—5.) Who were they who considered circumcision needful? What was Judea the head-quarters of? Would expect to find the strictest notions about the observance of the law, &c., in Jerusalem, the head-quarters of the doctors (Luke ii. 46), scribes, lawyers, &c. This, a most important matter, must be fully discussed. Who shall go up from Antioch? Surely those who have been doing the work among the Gentiles. A few others from Antioch had better go up too. So, now they start (ver. 3); the brethren accompany them a little way on their road, and then take leave of them. They pass on, telling the tale of their missionary success in all the towns as they go. The tidings received with joy in Samaria, where Philip had done so much. At last the deputation from Antioch reach Jerusalem, are cordially received by apostles and elders, i.e., heads of the Church, and their tale is told. Notice that they told not what they had done, but God by them. Success made them humble. Who were the rigid observers of the Jewish law? The Pharisees therefore insist on the observance of the Jewish law by the converts, but what law? The moral law, as taught in the Commandments, is binding on all, but Pharisees want converts also to keep the laws of ceremonies and sacrifices. So, a day appointed for the discussion.

II. The Question Discussed. (Read 6—18). This, the first meeting or Council to discuss Church questions. A good deal to be said on both sides of the question. God had chosen out Jews alone, required circumcision and observance of law, but, had there been no indications the other way, viz., that Gentiles might be received as such? Who took up the cause of the Gentiles? St. Peter had already been taken to task for preaching to them, now again declares what God had taught him. How had God plainly shown his wish for the Gentiles? (Acts x. 44.) If, then, the Holy Ghost given them upon their repentance and belief in Jesus Christ, what more could be necessary? This yoke of circumcision, therefore, not necessary. Who follows St. Peter in the debate? Picture first St. Paul, the chief speaker (xiv. 12), then St. Barnabas, standing up and making a speech, telling of the wonderful way they had been received by the Gentiles, when rejected by Jews. Describe the effect upon the meeting, the still silence. No more objections raised (ver. 12). Now the chairman speaks, to end the debate. Who is he? Called the Lord's brother (Gal. i. 19), was first Bishop of Jerusalem. He shows how a people was specially chosen from among the Gentiles at the call of Abraham (Gen. xii. 1), but that the tabernacle of David, i.e., the true people of God, being fallen down; the Jews having rejected Christ, must be re-built by admission of Gentiles. Explain that Gentiles, nations, and heathen, all are the same word, and turn to such passages as Is. xlix., 1, 12, &c., to show the promises to Gentiles in the Jewish Scriptures.

III. The Question Decided. (Read 19—33.) Ask of whom the council was composed. Apparently no vote taken, the whole meeting being of one mind, so St. James announces the decision. Let the children notice the three things to be abstained from. Remind how Gentiles were all idolators. Those who became Christians must therefore come out from them in every possible way; not even eat meat which had been offered in sacrifice, because would be dishonour to God (1 Cor. x. 28). These matters being decided, a deputation from Church at Jerusalem sent to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas. Who are they, and what do we know of them? Barnabas selected with Matthias (i. 23), and Silas, afterwards Paul's companion.

PRACTICAL LESSONS.—(1) The advantage of deliberation. Important matters not to be settled off-hand. Advice of Christian friends always to be sought, coupled with prayer for guidance of Holy Spirit. (2) The freedom of Christians. The Jewish ceremonial law passed away, have the liberty of the Gospel (Gal. v. 1), but liberty for what? to serve Christ with willing service, which is perfect freedom. (3) The purity of the body. Christians to be free from sin in eating, in marriage, in estimate of human life, i.e., to remember their bodies are God's, to be accounted for as much as minds and souls. Do we glorify God with our bodies?

Questions to be answered.

1. What was the important question, and who raised it?
2. Who formed the Council, and who presided?
3. Give the arguments for the circumcision of the Gentiles.
4. Give the arguments against it.
5. How was the question decided?
6. What practical lessons may be learned?

THE GIANT'S CRADLE.

PART I.

"COME, girls, the evening has grown cool; let us have a walk. I have not had a rise for the last half-hour, and am tired lashing the water."

Winding up his line, Gerald sauntered towards a green bank, where his cousins sat working.

"Oh yes! I'm so glad!" exclaimed Sylvia. "Do take us to some pretty place we've not seen before."

"I'll show you the Giant's Cradle; we'll just have time to go there and back before dark."

"Is it very far?" asked Clara; "for, you know, we oughtn't to keep Aunt Mary waiting tea."

"Oh, never mind; she's quite used to that."

Which indeed was true; but Sylvia and her sister had only lately come on a visit to the country, and had not yet found out that Gerald never thought of any one else when following the fancy of the moment. The evening was pleasant, and, chatting merrily, they followed the windings of the river through meadows and corn-fields, crossed the stream by a half-broken wooden bridge near a mill, heard the miller's great dog bark from the yard, hurried past the gate and were soon out of his reach, on a wild path which led across the hills. After following this rough track for some time, they came out close to another part of the river.

"Now, girls," said Gerald, "look up, and you shall see the Giant's Cradle."

A rocky bank rose abruptly to a considerable height above the stream, adorned with ferns, heaths, and small shrubs of various kinds, whilst large lichen-covered stones protruded here and there in every picturesque form. About half-way up this bank a narrow space of green mossy grass was surrounded by four large grey rocks, shaped like the sides of a huge cradle.

"What a beautiful place!" exclaimed Sylvia. "It was well worth coming all the way to see!"

"But won't you climb up and get into the cradle?"

"It looks very difficult," answered Clara; "my head gets dizzy on heights. Let Sylvia go first."

Assisted by her cousin, Sylvia gained the gigantic cradle in safety. "Oh, Clara!" she cried, "you must really come too; it is so lovely up here! With Gerald's hand I think you could manage."

Clara was tempted to try, and, with a good deal of help and encouragement, reached her sister.

"Now," said Gerald, as he climbed down, "'tis so jolly up there you won't mind staying for a while, for the breeze has got up well, and I see the fish rising by dozens. I'll just put up my flies and try a cast."

"Don't go far, Gerald, please, for we've a long way to go home, and it must be getting late."

"Time enough yet," he replied. "Never fear, I'll be back soon," and going up the river to a deeper part, he commenced fishing.

Depending on his word, the girls gave themselves up to the full enjoyment of the scene. Beneath flowed the stream, brawling over rocks and stones, and making a musical murmur which suited well with the stillness of the hour. The sun had just set, but a golden glow still remained in the sky; and as the sisters lay on their soft mossy bed, listening to the roar of the water and gazing at the bright sunset hues, they could imagine themselves suspended in mid-air far above this world, yet with an unclimbed height between them and the realms of sky. For some time they amused themselves with these pleasant fancies, and endeavoured to picture what the giant was like who, tradition said, had been cradled there, when the increasing shades of evening recalled their thoughts to the realities of life, and Sylvia began to fear Aunt Mary would be uneasy at their absence.

"I wonder," said Clara, "has Gerald forgotten us. It would not be pleasant to spend the night here, though it is such a nice bed."

"No, indeed!" replied her sister. "But I dare say he is having good sport, and does not remember the hour. Let us stand up and see if he is within sight."

But no living creature was to be seen, though from their lofty station they could command the windings of the river for a considerable distance.

"Hadn't we better call out?" said Clara.

They did so as loudly as possible, but echo only replied, as the last syllable of their cousin's name was reverberated from rock to rock. Again and again they strained their voices, but with the same result. However, their cries had not roused the echoes alone, for just as they were dying away a terrific roar sounded immediately overhead. Grasping each other's hands, and trembling violently, the sisters ventured to gaze upward, and saw on the very edge of the dizzy height the head and horns of an angry bull. Evidently the animal had caught sight of them in their rocky cradle, for he pawed the ground, and bellowed furiously.

"Oh, Sylvia dear! do you think he will jump down?"

"No, no, it is impossible! I believe we are quite safe here; just try and keep quiet."

But Clara could not be persuaded. "Oh, I wish we were out of this! It is very cruel and ill-natured of Gerald to desert us in this way."

"Oh no! something must have happened to delay him, or he never would have left us so long. It will be quite dark soon, and we shan't be able to find the path. I really think the only thing we can do is to try and climb down at once, and make the best of our way home."

"Oh, Sylvia! I never could get down without Gerald; besides, how could we walk all that lonely road by ourselves in the dark, and pass the mill, where the great dog would tear us to pieces?"

"God will take care of us, Clara, if we trust Him; and the sooner we set off the better, for the evening is falling very fast. I will climb down a little way first, and help you."

Slowly and cautiously Sylvia stepped over the side of the rocky cradle, and, by clinging with her hands to shrubs and projecting stones, managed to get a short way down, while Clara looked on in terror, begging of her to take care.

"Don't fear, dear; I shall soon have good footing, and be able to give you a hand."

At that moment both were startled by a prolonged bellow from the enraged bull, who seemed to understand they were escaping.

"Don't mind, Clara—he can't reach you," shouted Sylvia; but ere the sentence was finished her foot slipped from its precarious hold, and clutching desperately at the tough branches of a plant of heather, she struggled vainly to regain her footing, until at length the roots loosened gradually from the scanty earth in which they grew, and there was a heavy fall.

Poor Clara was so terrified that for several moments she could hardly understand what had happened, but as soon as her senses had sufficiently returned, she called out, "Sylvia! dear sister! speak to me, if you are not killed!" There was no reply.

The poor child never thought of her own desolate situation—she forgot the furious bull and the steep precipice. Her own desire was to reach Sylvia, and without hesitation she commenced descending the bank. Avoiding the dangerous and slippery rock where her sister had fallen, and creeping round each stone, taking advantage of every crevice and bush, she soon found herself standing safely on the green grass beside the little river; and so absorbed was her mind, that she never knew how she had accomplished the perilous descent. There lay Sylvia, pale and still; and though Clara raised her head, dipped her handkerchief in the stream and bathed her hands and temples, there was no sign of returning life. What was to be done now? and where was help to be found? The only house they had passed on the way was the miller's, and there Clara determined to go as fast as possible. It was hard indeed to leave her sister alone in such a state, but she could think of no other plan; and oh! how cruel Gerald's desertion seemed at that moment! There was no time for hesitation or delay, however, and, with one parting look at Sylvia, she was soon speeding over the moor.

(To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

93. What female ancestor of our Lord lived at Bethlehem?

94. What Apostle is it speaks of journeying into Spain? Quote passage.

95. Where does St. Paul make reference to Sodom and Gomorrah in his epistles?

96. What prophecy was delivered by Enoch, the "seventh from Adam?"

97. Who is the first archer mentioned in the Bible?

98. What lawyer is mentioned as being one of St. Paul's workers?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 224.

80. "Keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God" (Eccles. v. 1).

81. "Elisha the son of Shaphat of Abel-meholah" (1 Kings xix. 16).

82. Amos (chap. vii. 14).

83. St. Barnabas was uncle to St. Mark (Col. iv. 10).

84. In Amos v. 8.

(Drawn by M. FITZGERALD.)

AT THE WINDOW.

'TIS Spring-tide. The balm-breathing morning
Is filling with perfume the air;
And blossom and leaf are adorning
The shrubs and the trees in the square.

A fair maiden sits at her casement,
Thrown open to catch the fresh breeze;
Her glance wanders down to the basement:
I wonder what's there that she sees!

See, a youth has just come round the corner,
And wistfully looks at the door;
The throb of her heart seems to warn her
She's seen that young fellow before.

Her hand, that the needle was plying,
Is fixed, as it were, with a spell—
Well, well! There's no use in denying—
You're watching that youth, I can tell.

Ah, me! 'Tis the old-world story
Repeated again and again;
'Twill be told till the world shall grow hoary,
And while there are women and men.

Fair girl, in your face there is sadness,
The shadows of thought on your brow:
Your eye does not lighten with gladness;
Some sorrow is troubling you now.

Come, listen a while to the warning
Of one who is grown somewhat old,
Nor turn from my grave words with scorning:
My heart is not callous nor cold.

You love—so perhaps your heart tells you;
But what says your head in reply,
If that to which Fancy impels you
Your duty and reason deny?

Love well, but love wisely. In one sense,
'Tis wisdom; in one it is not.
For "love in a cot" is all nonsense,
And Love's flame will ne'er "boil the pot."

Our passions should ne'er be our masters:
The heart should the head still obey.
But our life will be filled with disasters,
If the head to the heart shall give way.

J. F. W.

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC.

"OUT OF DEBT OUT OF DANGER."

"DEATH" and "Debt" are two of the most important words in our language. They are important in themselves—they are doubly so when united; and they are thus united, and more than that, they are inseparably united, by the ordination of God. He hath joined them together, and no man can put them asunder.

This proverb is pre-eminently a double-edged one, as we shall see when we come to look at it in reference to the all-important matters of the soul.

But not going at present so far as these, let us look at it for a few moments as regards our ordinary life. Debt is a dreadful word as regards even our present life.

I know it is not a dreadful word to some. There are people who think nothing of debt—nothing of incurring it, of not being able to pay it—nothing of other people losing by them, or perhaps even being ruined by them; they would rather go into debt for the merest trifle than go without it; they do not care what wrong they do their neighbour while they gratify themselves.

It would be little use to remind such men of this proverb; their moral powers, their very consciences, are warped. The dishonesty of their character reaches farther than the mere fact of carelessness about debt. These men are a pest to society. These are they who make the honest man pay for the dishonest; and who, by so doing, have taken so much bread out of the mouth of the honest man and his children. These are they who have ruined many a tradesman, and who, in fact, are nothing but respectable thieves, quite as deserving of imprisonment as the man who picks a pocket or commits a forgery. I see very little difference between many a debtor and many a thief, and I believe that, if we got our choice to have the kingdom cleared by magic of all the dishonest debtors, or all the confirmed thieves, we should be vastly better off by keeping the thieves and getting rid of the debtors.

But now as to debt itself.

What is debt? No matter how it may have been incurred, it is ever the same thing—obligation—a claim to be satisfied; it is a demand, and one which we must acknowledge the justice of. Debt is something very stern, and the debtor is the man on whom its hand is laid, and its voice is, "You must!"

And next, as to what debt does. We are not speaking now of those spoken of above, who only make sport of liability of any kind.

It cramps a man, and disheartens him, and fills his mind with brooding thoughts, and it takes away his energy and life, and even what property he seems to have it takes away from him, for he knows that as long as another man has a claim upon his substance it is not really his own.

Men who are driven to their wit's end by debt, who feel that when they do earn something it is not their own; who feel that they are always the servants of other people, and are getting nothing for it, are always disheartened, and not half men for their work.

Perhaps you say, "But they have had the money." Very true, but Hope and Expectation are the two great sweeteners of labour, and what energises a man generally in his work, is not what he has had, but what he hopes to get. Eaten bread is soon forgotten. The borrower, as the Scripture says, is servant to the lender; and he feels—though not justly—as though he got nothing for his labour.

A curious instance of this may be seen on board ships going long voyages. The men consider that the first month they are working for nothing; and the reason is, because they have had a month's pay in advance. And so at the end of the first month, there is generally great rejoicing, for from that out pay seems to begin again.

The man in debt seems always to be working for somebody else, and not for himself, and so he has more or less of the downheartedness of a slave—very little "go" in himself or his work either.

This is some of what debt does; and now a word as to what it may do, and will do.

It may break a man up altogether; it may so dispirit him, as to prevent him working it off, and so escaping from its clutches; it has frequently done this. At any rate, it may keep a man from ever rising in the world. He cannot keep up with others with this pack upon his back. This old man of the sea wears a terrible pair of spurs, and entirely declines to get down from the poor debtor's shoulders; he keeps saying, "You go on, but I won't get off."

It is of the very nature and essence of a debt to exact a return-payment; sooner or later it will do that. The debtor has always this prospect before him, and if to the original debt be added interest, the matter is still worse. As the Hindoos say, "Interest never sleeps;" it lives step for step with ourselves. But under any circumstances, the man in debt has always something disagreeable before him; and it may be something very disagreeable indeed. He cannot tell, in many instances, when his creditor will come down upon him—he lives in danger always. He is ever at another man's mercy; the sword is always suspended by only a hair over his head; even though the calamity do not come, he lives in danger of its coming, and in all the misery of feeling that the demand which he cannot meet must come at last, and may come at any moment.

But now "Out of debt, out of danger." There is a sense of freedom and elasticity in being out of debt; we become our own masters again; we reap the fruit of our own labour; we are not afraid of writ, or bailiff, or broker, or auctioneer, or anybody, so far as this matter is concerned.

As to our old creditor, we are quite glad to see him. We used not to care particularly about a squeeze from his hand, never knowing exactly whether he might not give us another kind of squeeze before long. But now we not only let him give us a squeeze, but we give him a squeeze in turn—grip for grip. We don't squint, or turn our heads, or try to go down another street, or pretend not to see our old creditor; ever since he put that magic "paid," or "received," and ornamented the bottom of the paper with a portrait of the queen, we have felt quite warmly towards him, we quite laugh at the idea of being afraid of him.

So much then, although it be but very little, of the truth of that very common proverb, "Out of debt out of danger."

But like many other proverbs, it stretches itself away into the things of the other life. If it be true that in the matters of this life debt is danger, much more so is it of the life to come. Debt is, indeed, fearful danger in the all-important matters of the soul.

No doubt there are many who do not care about their spiritual debts. Some deny them altogether. Some seem to think that God will never exact them. Others suppose that things will come right somehow. And more, and these are not a few, are thinking that with their few farthings they can pay millions of pounds; and that when the day of reckoning comes, they will not come off so badly after all. They will either pay all up; or if they cannot do that, they will pay up all they can, and then Christ will do the rest.

The debt which man is under is the terrible Law debt. He is a debtor to keep the whole law—to love God with all his heart and soul and strength; and perfectly, without flaw or failure of any kind, to love his neighbour as himself. And these two commandments are exceeding broad, running out into the very possibilities of things, without any abatement of command, because of our weakness, or the warped condition of our minds, or anything else.

I expect that every reader of these lines has incurred a tremendous debt on both these scores—as regards God and man. The debt has grown with our daily lives, from our first infancy until now; and by this time it has reached a huge amount. Childhood, boy and girl-hood, man and womanhood, perhaps old age, have all added to it; and now the height of it, if seen aright, reaches as it were to the very heavens.

And all this debt is upon men without their knowing anything much about it, unless they be awakened to a knowledge of it by the Spirit of God. The devil keeps it out of sight. He never tells men of their danger, until it be to mock them with it, when it is too late, or to make them distrust the saving power of Christ, when they are about to come to Him for relief. And the occupations of life keep this out of view, and many men think they have no time to give to such things. And there is a secret but very practical unbelief, which makes men doubt whether they can be so bad after all. And so the debt sits lightly, until the time comes for it to be revealed in all its immensity, and all hope of its removal is gone.

Even one sin arms all the law of God against us, and brings us under all the power of its curse; and we have to do not with units, but with hundreds of thousands of sins.

Here then is the debt; and next let us consider the utter hopelessness of dealing with it. As the law is making continual demands upon us, even if we fulfil them, we are only unprofitable servants, we have merely done that which it was our duty to do. We have no overplus of merit—there is no thanks to us for doing our duty. So, as the demands are always upon us, from the moment we rise in the morning to when we lie down to sleep at night, and as the very utmost one could do would be to fulfil them—even supposing he could do that—there is no opportunity for getting anything together with which to pay off the old debt. The Romanists have invented a plan of their own, which is very profitable to their priests, but not worth much to those who pay them. They say that the saints were so good, that they left the balance of their merits to the Church, and the Pope sells them out to poor souls to get them out of purgatory.

The best way to deal with our debt is to look at it as it is; to be quite hopeless about paying it; not to try to make it smaller in the least degree. In a word, the best—indeed the only thing to do—is to become insolvent.

Things must come to a head sooner or later. This question of the debt must be settled; we shall be called upon to pay, or to take the consequences; and it is sheer madness not to get out of the difficulty in the one way in which we can.

And that way is, as I have said, by becoming insolvent. But it must be done now, at once. It will not do to declare ourselves insolvent for the first time before the Judge. It will be too late then. The appointed way is to come and say, "I have nothing to pay;" then Jesus says, "I will pay for you;" and at that moment all our debt is discharged. Then, so far as the east is from the west, so far are our transgressions put from us. Then all handwritings are blotted out against us—then there is no more any condemnation to him that believes.

"Nothing in my hand I bring,
Only to thy cross I cling."

This is the voice of the man who is to get out of debt in God's way. The one to whom you owe the debt will count it paid, and then there will be an end of it. For God will look at all the merits—at the death of Jesus as yours, and Jesus having paid for you, He will not exact it from you again.

And now, "Out of debt out of danger," indeed. In the blood of Christ upon your past, you carry with you a receipt in full for all that put you in danger, and that justly made you afraid.

You may be joyous, because you are safe—because none can bring any accusation against you. God is just, and yet the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. He has been satisfied in His own justice, and will Himself see to it that you shall not be condemned.

And so we may look our Great Creditor in the face with holy confidence, and meet Him with holy joy; and be light-hearted and free from care. Danger there can be none, for if God be for us who can be against us? Out of debt out of danger is as true of the other world as of this.

THE CATACOMBS, AND THEIR TESTIMONY TO THE FAITH.

BY THE REV. THOMAS JACKSON, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S, AND RECTOR OF STOKE NEWINGTON.

"Of whom the world was not worthy. They wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth." HEBREWS xi. 38.

THE sources from which evidence is derived as to the authenticity of the Holy Scriptures, the veracity and good faith of the inspired writers, have been recently at once deepened and enlarged—the researches of Layard, Botta, and Rich, and a host of minor explorers, into the sites of Babylon and Nineveh, the patient and precious work of the Palestine Exploration Fund, may be cited as illustrations of this remark. In fact, scarcely a year elapses without new facts being brought to light, which vindicate in some peculiar way the truth of our Inspired Record. Among such sources, the Roman catacombs are rich in evidences alike novel and interesting.

By catacombs we understand passages and chambers cut out of stone beneath the surface of the earth. Most likely they were at first mere quarries, formed in excavating the soft stone called tufa, which hardens when exposed to the action of the weather, and forms the material of the strongest and most permanent cement ever invented. Those of Naples are covered with Christian symbols. They contain chambers, vaulted, and of considerable extent. According to some dispassionate and fair writers, these chambers were used as churches in the times of persecution under the heathen emperors of Rome. They are enriched by paintings of religious subjects, which have wonderfully survived considering the dampness of their underground situation. As to the catacombs beneath the capital—Rome itself—they are specially interesting to the student of Christian antiquities, because they were evidently used, like those at Naples, as places of worship, and as cemeteries, in the first three centuries of the Christian era, before the recognition of the faith by Constantine the Great. Sometimes the heathen authorities of the city granted a transient truce to the believers at Rome, of which they availed themselves to cover the city with spacious churches. But to these followed days of reactionary tumult, when the sanctuaries were plundered and burnt, and the loud and bitter wail of Christian matrons and maidens arose as they were made the spoil of the lawless soldiery, and saw their husbands and fathers and brothers dragged to the amphitheatre to be torn to pieces by wild beasts.

It was then that the Christians fled by thousands to the catacombs. These had been already partially used by the heathen citizens for purposes of interment. Holes had been made in the wall, generally three, one above another, in a row, a little larger than the space required for an ordinary coffin, in which the dead were placed as on shelves. The front was then fastened up, and made air-tight by means of a thin layer of bricks cemented with stucco. It is quite an error to suppose that the practice of burning the dead was ever exclusively adopted by the Roman people. There were several entrances to these enormous excavations. In some quarters they extended into a volcanic stratum of porous marl, underneath the stratum where pozzuolana is found. The subterranean streets were sometimes excavated one under the other in several storeys, and were wide and lofty enough for a carriage to pass. The materials taken from the burrowings being composed of small chips of the marl, were raised by means of rope and basket through the look-out holes, and spread over the country above.*

A story is current at Rome that an Italian gentleman, exploring some intricate ruins in the suburbs, slipped down a ravine hidden in brushwood and climbing plants, and when he arrived at the bottom, saw that it was impossible for him to retrace his steps. Having a lantern or a candle with him, he struck a light, boldly followed the course of the narrow passage, and at length found himself before an ancient door, mildewed and rotten, from behind which came the sweet strains of a rich religious service. Having been in peril of his life only a few moments before, filled with fear lest he should wander into the intricate mazes around him, and perhaps be starved to death, or suffocated with poisonous gases—for the soil about Rome is volcanic—his joy now was intense; he had no difficulty in pushing down the door, and, after scrambling up a slimy staircase, he emerged safe and sound into the crypt of one of the Constantinian basilicas.

If we may believe the guides, these galleries run for twenty miles underground. Some say that they extend even as far as Albano, Ostia, and Civita Vecchia, a distance of sixteen miles, in one direction.

Instead of speculating further concerning the origin and extent of these mysterious excavations, it is proposed to weigh and illustrate their testimony to the evidences and doctrines of our holy religion. This testimony is of two kinds: first, that derived from the catacombs themselves; and secondly, from the manifold traditions handed down concerning them. The first is almost indisputable, for no one yet has had the hardihood to contend that the early Christians chose to live days and weeks in subterranean galleries in order to forge inscriptions. The second sort of testimony is more open to question, because all traditions, unless they are reduced in a formal way to writing, are apt to be exaggerated, sometimes by the fanaticism, sometimes by the carelessness, and sometimes by the bad faith, of those who hand them down.

In order to understand the subsequent argument, let us suppose ourselves residents at Rome about the time of the Emperor Nero. The city is one of the most splendid that was ever reared by human hands. Its nucleus stands upon seven slight eminences on the banks of the Tiber—these eminences being, in point of fact, nothing more than projections of the table-land through which the yellow stream has gnawed its way. But Rome, like London in modern times, has enormously outgrown these limits. To this day ruins of homesteads, temples, villas, and aqueducts, stretch for twenty or thirty miles round. It is said of the Emperor Augustus, that he found Rome of brick and left it of marble. It was shortly afterwards enriched by enormous buildings—temples, market-places, amphitheatres holding from fifty to a hundred thousand spectators, race-courses placed not upon some breezy down but surrounded by buildings rich alike in material and design palaces of emperors, some of them constructing their houses on the roofs of those of

* Mr. Francis Wey, whose most interesting work upon Rome has supplied the materials for this geological sketch of the catacombs, supposes that six millions of men, women, and children, were interred in them, and that they measured, including the various bye-lanes and cross passages, altogether a length of three or four hundred miles.

their predecessors, baths of great splendour and extent, in which every appliance of luxurious ablution was provided—all these visible symbols denoting the power and grandeur of Imperial Rome. Just as the capital was about to culminate in architectural dignity, the military power of Rome being as it were crystallised in the buildings of the city, an event took place which was to make the Romans conquer themselves, and eventually break up the empire. At Bethlehem-ephrata of Judea there was born a child. An old Roman tradition says that about the hour the Saviour came into the world, the Emperor Augustus woke in the night troubled by a strange dream, the point of which was that there had been born in Syria at that moment a little child that was eventually to be acknowledged, throughout the universal world, King of kings and Lord of lords. For years there had been a strange floating idea that out of the East would come a Supreme Ruler. That prevalent idea gave Vespasian, the son of a second-rate Swiss banker, the imperial purple. At any rate, shortly after the great Feast of Pentecost, Christianity had penetrated to the capital. Whether any apostle before St. Paul preached the Gospel at Rome is doubtful; but among those who witnessed the outpouring of the Holy Spirit are mentioned "strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes." That is, Jews by ancestry, and Jews by the adoption of that faith, who usually lived at Rome, but who had patiently traversed many lands that they might worship in the central shrine on Mount Moriah. These men, on returning to their families, proclaimed the tidings of the new salvation. But by whatever instrumentalities the Gospel had been introduced into Rome, a flourishing Church had been founded there. St. Paul's words, in addressing the disciples in his Epistle, express strongly his confidence in their numbers, goodness, and purity. He addresses "All that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints: Grace to you and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. First, I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world. For God is my witness, whom I serve with my spirit in the Gospel of His Son, that without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers; making request, if by any means now at length I might have a prosperous journey by the will of God to come unto you. For I long to see you, that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, to the end ye may be established; that is, that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you and me."

(To be concluded.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 16. New Mission Work.

Chapter to be read—Acts xv. xvi. (parts of.)

INTRODUCTION. Ask a few questions on St. Paul's first missionary journey. Where he started from; where he went; who went with him; what results there were; what important question arose and how it was settled. Now, a year or two having elapsed, time to re-visit the Churches, and see how they are getting on.

I. A Dispute. (Read Acts xv. 36—41.) Where did St. Paul propose to go, and for what purpose? (ver. 36.) Whom would he naturally wish to accompany him? but whom did Barnabas wish to take also? Remind of the relationship between Mark and Barnabas. Why was not St. Paul willing to take him? But two years had elapsed since he left the work, surely he had time to change and regret his departure. His willingness to go now a good sign of renewed earnestness. Still, Paul unwilling. What trials and persecution had accompanied their first journey? probably more in store for them. Mark had been tried and found wanting; might do well at home, but lacking in the perseverance needed for missionary work. Should Paul have yielded and taken him? Which should come first—feeling for a young minister or the interests of the mission? So he decides against taking him. Whom did he choose instead? See past account of Silas. Sent by the Church at Jerusalem with Judas to confirm the decree about circumcision (ver. 22). When Judas returned, Silas, evidently so attached to Paul, remained with him (ver. 34), so now is honoured by being chosen his companion. Which party receives the commendation of the Church? (ver. 40.) So Paul and Silas depart on their journey.

Practical Lesson. Let the children see how in important matters public good must be preferred to private affection. Duty must always come before pleasure; this may apply in many ways, e.g., in choosing a companion for some work entrusted to us; think of our duty to our employer before the kindness to the friend, &c., not what we wish, but what is right, should be our motto.

II. A New Convert. (Read xvi. 1—8.) Once more come to Derbe. Who was found there? What did Paul do to him? His mother being a Jewess, he was circumcised as a Jew. What character did Timothy bear? From 2 Tim. i. 5, iii. 15, see the early training he had had from mother and grandmother, who had taught him the Scriptures. So now the party of three move on—Paul, with his two young friends. What pleasant talks they would have after the day's work; what profitable reading of the Scriptures, and united prayer. "A threefold cord not quickly broken." They go through most of the country where had been before, but where may they not go? (vers. 6, 7.) How the Spirit stopped them we know not—perhaps by direct voice, as to Peter, when sent to Cornelius (Acts x. 19); perhaps by message of an angel, as to Paul afterwards (xxvii. 23); perhaps by some hindrance put in the way. A wider field going to open to them.

III. A NEW COUNTRY. (Read xvi. 9—15.) Ask had God in those days often manifested His will, and recall some of the dreams spoken of in the Bible. Point out how God's own servants always understood the meaning of their dreams, e.g., Joseph, Daniel, Paul, while others had to seek interpreters, e.g., Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, &c. Now, at Troas, Paul has a dream. What was it?—a man of strange appearance, speaking a different language, but show from xxi. 27 that St. Paul understood Greek, this man's language. What did he ask? and what help did he want? Next morning Paul tells his dream, and the friends talk it over. No doubt as to meaning. Immediately decide as to the call, and now they see why they were not allowed to go elsewhere. Ask the name of the writer of the Acts, and point out from the word "we" in ver. 10 that Luke had now joined them. Now another voyage commenced. The party of four friends sail direct across the Ægean Sea to Neapolis, the port of Philippi. What new country was this? Had now left the tribes of the East to visit those of the West. What is the first place in Europe they come to—a very important place for trade, and a Roman colony? Now picture the little party beginning their work in Europe, as yet altogether heathen. Whom do they find? Picture the friends sitting on the grass by the riverside, the water sparkling in the sun, the flowers and birds, &c., talking to the women in groups. Point out the contrast to the East, where the women were shut up. Have not as yet heard of one woman converted. Now the first in Europe to receive apostles is a woman. What was her name and occupation? Who opened her heart? She, already in some way a worshipper of God, more disposed to hear of Jesus Christ. She attended, was baptised, brought her household, showed her love to God by love to man, and exercised Christian hospitality. No slight matter to receive four strangers into her house, but notice her invitation, and see its warmth. They are constrained to come in and abide, i.e., make her house their home for the present. So here the party stay while preaching at Philippi.

PRACTICAL LESSONS.—(1) To obey God's voice. We no longer spoken to in dreams, but many indications of God's will by unexpected openings, strong wish of parents, &c. Way may be dark and unknown. (2) To make most of what means of grace we have. Lydia worshipping God to the best of her ability was further instructed. So the wise men, seeking a king, found a Saviour. Paul's zeal for God directed aright. So will be always. We shall know if follow on to know. They who seek shall find.

Questions to be answered.

1. What disagreement arose between Paul and Barnabas, and what lesson does it teach?
2. What new converts were made, and where?
3. Say all you can about them.
4. Describe the visit to Philippi.
5. What practical lessons may we learn?

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE ordeal Eda dreaded had to be met but too quickly. As soon as Richie received her packet he came to Mr. de Courcy's, obtained admittance by representing that he was the bearer of a message from Miss Granton's brother, and was shown into the morning-room, to which she was summoned to receive him.

It was a trying interview, for Richie met her with all those tender looks, those soft caressing words, she had once thought irresistible, and yet made but the feeblest efforts to exonerate his conduct. In fact he did not appear able to see how much he had been to blame. He certainly had idled a deal of time with Flossy Devon—"a fellow must have somewhere to spend his evenings, you know, Eda dear"—and she was such a vain little puss that a man could not say a civil word but she fancied him in love with her; and now her parents had taken it up, and he was—yes, he certainly was—awkwardly situated; but if Eda would be patient he would set it all right in a little while.

It was difficult to make him comprehend that Eda was shocked at his flippancy, and positively refused to regard him in any other character than that of Flossy's affianced husband.

"If you loved me you could not talk so coolly of giving me up," he told her.

"I do not love you, Richie," she answered, frankly. "It has been a mistake on both sides. I erred when I thought I could be contented with such affection as you proffer, and you wronged me when you imagined that I could be content to spend my life with one who is false to his word, and who glibly talks of making it all right when he is meditating a most dishonourable action."

"Had you consented to be mine when I asked you, Eda, all this bother would have been avoided." And as Richie reproachfully told her this, he would have taken her hand, but she immediately withdrew it, and seating herself at a little distance, endeavoured, with gentle earnestness, to awaken him to a sense of his unworthy conduct.

"I know that if I lose you I shall lose the best, the sweetest of wives, and only have instead a dressy silly doll, of whom I can never make a companion!" was his reply. "I was mad when I gave Flossy reason to think I cared for her; but I have been a weak fool all my life, losing golden opportunities through acts as rash and as bitterly rued as this will always be."

Eda thought of the words she had once heard her mother apply to him—"Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel"—and her eyes filled with tears as she bade him adieu. He was reluctant to let her go until he had extorted a promise from her to give him time—to wait and see how things turned out; but she was firm. Pity him she did, with her whole heart—so handsome, so lovable, and yet so utterly devoid of principle; pray for him she would, earnestly, but with her prayers would mingle a thanksgiving that she had been saved from marrying a man whom she could not have respected.

When she went again to the Allonbys she knew that Gran listened for a sorrowful intonation in her voice, and that the artist furtively watched her with much anxiety. So she nerved herself to tell the story of her intercourse with Richie curtly, but faithfully. If Flossy ever suspected or learned that she had not been first in the affections of her betrothed, it might be a relief to her to know that there never had been a positive engagement between him and Eda, who was careful to make her hearers understand that she acquitted him of any deliberate treachery to herself. Friends from their childhood, Richie had fancied he loved her till a fairer face came in his way. She could not trust herself to say more, for she was but a weak woman, after all, and it stung her to be obliged to feel that she had been forgotten for such a butterfly as Flossy Devon.

"God help them both!" said Gran, with a sigh. "They neither of them know what is before them. They'll marry, as lots of young couples do, thinking more of themselves than what they are taking on their shoulders."

Mr. Allonby said little, yet in the clasp of his hand at parting there was such a depth of sympathy, that after one quick glance Eda could not trust herself to meet his eyes again. He insisted on being permitted to escort her across the park, but there were few words spoken between them until he was leaving her at Mr. de Courcy's door, when Eda contrived to say, "I am not unhappy about this affair. Pray make Gran understand this."

"She does already. She was the first to assure me that you were too sensible to grieve for the loss of a friend who has proved so unworthy."

"But don't be too hard upon Richie," she pleaded. "Your cousin is a charming little creature, and I trust he will do his best to make her happy."

"If you can forgive him," Mr. Allonby replied, "it will be easy for me to do so—for me, who have never been able to think with patience of you as the wife of Richard Atwood."

With these words he left her, and from that time the one disturbing element passed out of Eda's life. She heard of Richie occasionally, for Doris could not refrain from giving her details of the wedding—the pretty little bride's first "at home," &c. But in a short time any mention of Flossy or her husband was always accompanied with a sigh and shake of the head; and Eda divined that the spoilt, dressy girl had developed into a slatternly wife, and the wavering man who had married her into a selfish, careless husband. Gran might well say "God help them!" when they made such a mockery of wedlock—that truest and holiest of all bonds—as this.

To turn from one unblessed marriage to another—Mark Granton and his Sophie had been settled at Sydenham for some weeks before Eda was able to pay them her promised visit. To her regular duties as governess she was now supplementing those of housekeeper, for Mrs. Wells had grown weary of her toils, and accepted a less onerous situation. To his lady's astonishment and disgust Mr. de Courcy refused to have her place filled up, sharply telling his wife it was high time she managed her household herself, and tried to find out how it was that their domestic affairs were so frightfully mismanaged.

After two or three squabbles, Mrs. de Courcy consented to accept the keys of office, and promised to do her best; but she was too indolent to attend to the duties that devolved upon her, and by a little dexterous management she contrived to impose them upon Eda—effecting this so indirectly that it was difficult to avoid compliance.

"Do come to my help for half an hour, will you, dear Miss Granton?" she would say; "I'll not detain you longer: but there are so many orders to give and accounts to look over that I am quite bewildered." And when she had fairly set her obliging helper down in the midst of the confusion she had assisted to create, she would remember some note that must be written, or some engagement that must be fulfilled, and slip away to return no more.

"Really, housekeeping was not half as unpleasant

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"Leaving her at Mr. de Courcy's door."—p. 264.

a task as she had anticipated!" Mrs. de Courcy would tell her visitors, with beaming smiles. "And they must all see that her servants were kept in better order, and her domestic affairs worked more smoothly, than when poor Wells was at the head of them." But not a word did she say of the labours of Eda, who from the first was overwhelmed at the waste, the extravagance, and dishonesty, she kept discovering. She laid these sad revelations before Mrs. de Courcy, but without arousing that lady from her languid indifference.

"Yes, it's very sad, Miss Granton—very; but it is no use worrying oneself about things one cannot alter. Tradesmen and servants always do cheat their employers; every one knows it."

"Is not that a very sweeping assertion?" asked Eda; "and is there not a remedy for it in the hands of those who are defrauded? If ladies made it their rule to pay all bills regularly, and overlook the household expenditure with more care and punctuality, such things could not be, could they?"

"I'm sure I don't know!" Mrs. de Courcy answered, helplessly. "I have always found so much to do since I have been a wife that I had no time to spare for housekeeping; and if one pays a person to attend to it, why should one be worried about how many pounds of butter are used in the kitchen, and so on?"

"There is an immense number of unpaid bills," Eda reminded her. "What is to be done about them?"

But the lady only gave her shoulders an impatient shrug. "Good gracious, the people can surely wait! I cannot tease Mr. de Courcy for money just as he has lost so heavily in various ways. He says that if we go on at the present rate we shall soon be ruined."

How glibly the words fell from her lips! How little she seemed to think that they might speedily be realised! When, at the cost of more than one severe headache, Eda had contrived to glean the sum total of the heedless lady's liabilities, she stood aghast. Mrs. Wells had considered herself an excellent servant; but it had never entered into her head that she was helping to drag her employers downwards when she put aside long-standing accounts, and sent creditors away with civil but false excuses, rather than risk displeasing Mr. or Mrs. de Courcy by recalling to their minds some folly or wanton piece of extravagance.

But there would have to be a day of reckoning; and Manon had coarsely hinted on more than one occasion that before long her master and mistress would have to reduce their expenditure. This was so true, that when Eda had done her best she saw that she was only stemming a torrent that must presently overwhelm the thoughtless couple, whom she knew not whether to pity or censure.

She was not sorry to shake herself free of these anxieties for a few hours, though Mrs. de Courcy audibly murmured at Miss Granton being so inconsiderate as to wish to go out for a whole day; especially as she knew that Mr. de Courcy talked of bringing friends home with him, and no one else could arrange the table for a dinner à la Russe so prettily. But for once Eda was firm; she was yearning to see her brother, and would not any longer deprive herself of that pleasure for the convenience of her selfish and exacting employers.

Rose and Violet, who were to spend the term of her absence with their indulgent grandparents, went away in high glee at the prospect of a happy holiday free from Manon's snubs and scoldings; and scarcely less exhilarated at her escape from the school-room and the countless appeals to Miss Granton that came from up-stairs, down-stairs, and my lady's chamber, Eda took the omnibus to town.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

When she reached Sydenham such an affectionate reception awaited her that it was like exchanging the frigid zone for a warmer climate. Mark and his wife vied with each other in kindly attentions to their guest, whose unaffected admiration of the villa and its tasteful surroundings flattered and pleased them. Luncheon was served before she had half finished inspecting the improvements the always busy Mark had made or projected. Surely he must be content now! What more could the most ambitious desire than such an adoring wife and such a home as this?

And Sophie—had he studied her happiness as faithfully as he had promised to do? Eda gazed at her as she sat presiding over the tray—the most hospitable of hostesses—and felt tolerably satisfied that so far all had gone well. The fastidious Mark had evidently dictated sundry improvements in his wife's toilet, for her hair was now dressed in a manner more becoming to her strongly-marked features, which were also softened by a head-dress of lace. Her costume, too, was of a tint that harmonised with her muddy complexion, instead of rendering it more prominent; and altogether she looked very different to the West Indian lady whose bright draperies had rather shocked the quieter tastes of the young Englishwoman.

When they rose from table Mark looked at his watch, and his wife's brow clouded; but instead of directly noticing the action, she asked Eda if she would like a drive through some of the beautiful scenery in the neighbourhood. When she responded in the affirmative, Mrs. Granton turned quickly to her husband.

"You will drive us towards Beckenham and Bromley, will you not, Mark? I am sure Eda will be pleased with that road."

"Drive her there, then, yourself, my dear; you know the pony-phæton will not hold three of us comfortably," he answered.

"Say at once that you intend to keep that appointment, although I asked you not to do so," Mrs. Granton retorted, with the gleam in her eyes which Eda did not like to see.

"Ladies have queer notions of business," said Mark, good-humouredly. "They think engagements can be made and set aside just as the fit takes one."

"Men should not make engagements so foolishly," Mrs. Granton told him. "The fellow you are going to meet is, by your own showing, a notorious speculator, who wants to practise on your credulity for his own benefit. My agent, Mr. Edwards, said so only the other day.

Mark bit his lip. "Mr. Edwards is excessively kind to interest himself in my affairs; but you may tell him, with my compliments, that I am capable of managing them without his assistance."

"But are you obliged to leave us?" Eda interposed. "It is so long since I saw you that I shall feel very sorry if you run away before I have had half an hour's chat with you."

Mark declared that he too was sorry, but business must be attended to; and he was sure that she and Sophie would be able to entertain each other better without than with a cynical member of the other sex. He would return as early as he could. "At midnight?" Mrs. Granton queried. "As soon as he could;" and in the meantime his dear little sis was to enjoy herself, and tell Sophie if there was anything she wanted that they could supply.

Kissing his hand to his wife, who looked vexed and sullen, he went away; and Eda, affecting more cheerfulness than she felt, proposed that they should set off for their drive at once. Mrs. Granton, who had thrown herself on a sofa, and was gnawing the lace of her pocket-handkerchief like a pettish child, shook off her ill-humour, and ringing for the pretty little basket-carriage her indolent habits rendered almost a necessity, drove through several of the charming lanes in the vicinity, smiling and wondering at the beauties Eda discerned on every bank and hedgerow.

"I wish you were going to stay with me!" she exclaimed. "I should often drive out if I had such a pleasant companion."

"But do you not go out every day?"

Mrs. Granton sighed. "It is so dull to drive about the country alone. I sometimes wish I had stayed nearer town. I would sooner live in the heart of the City than spend so many solitary hours. Mark is seldom at home."

Eda said something vague about men being so wedded to the activity and bustle of a business life that they could not resist revisiting their old haunts.

"But my income is large enough to keep us without anything else; why then should Mark enter upon schemes for making money that he really does not require?"

"It may vex him to feel that he is entirely dependent upon his wife," said Eda, after a little pause. "He may wish to increase your income by his own exertions."

"But it is with my money he speculates, and against my will. I do not care how many cheques I draw for his own use; but when I see him eager to take shares in new companies which a man more experienced than himself assures me cannot stand, how can I help being vexed with him?"

"Quietly and kindly tell him this, and ask him to go abroad with you. Perhaps a few months spent in France or Switzerland would wean him off these fancies."

"It would be very nice to go abroad," mused Sophie. "I should like to see Paris. Yes, it is a good thought; I will mention it to him. If he will consent, how delightful it will be! You ought to go with us, dear Eda. I often reproach myself about you. It does not seem right that you should be working while we are living in ease and comfort; but Mark says you always were so independent."

This remark was heard in silence, and neither of the young women spoke again till they drew near the villa, when Eda exclaimed at the beauty of its situation.

"Yes, it is very pretty; but I never could enjoy anything by myself. I spend a great many dull hours in the house you call so charming."

"Why not fill up some of your leisure with gardening? My little pupils and I have converted the leads outside the school-room window into a fernery, and it often affords us an hour's amusement. Or botanising would be delightful in these lanes."

"Alone?" asked Mrs. Granton, rather bitterly.

"Well then why not go to town with Mark sometimes, and while he transacts his business make some for yourself? You draw beautifully; copy some of the landscapes at Kensington or the National Gallery for the walls of your own drawing-room. You would find it a most engrossing occupation."

"No," said Sophie, abruptly; "occupying myself might sometimes banish ennui, but it would not uproot my troubles. Besides, Mark would not like me to go to London with him. He does not care to be seen with his ugly wife."

"Nay, dear sister," cried Eda, ashamed and sorry; "I am sure you are doing him injustice!"

"Am I? Then how was it that he did not introduce me to the gentleman who accosted him at the Crystal Palace on the only occasion that he took me there? He said that the stranger was merely a casual acquaintance, but I afterwards learned that his name was Atwood, and that Mark has known him for years."

"I can quite understand his not wishing to make you known to such an unscrupulous person as Richie Atwood."

"But he let him stand and gape at me rudely, and I know that when he whispered the inquiry 'who is your companion?' Mark must have answered it with an equivocation, for there was quite an impertinent smile on his face when he nodded and walked away. If Mark had boldly said, 'This lady is my wife,' his friend would have behaved respectfully. I tell you, Eda, he is ashamed of my ordinary appearance. Indeed, I sometimes suspect——"

But Eda's finger was on her lip. "Dear Sophie, don't say any more, but strive to think the best of your husband. If you are gentle and patient with him he must learn to appreciate you."

Mrs. Granton smiled faintly. "Excellent advice this; but my West Indian blood catches fire so quickly when I am vexed or ill-used that I cannot help saying what I think and feel."

"You have not been married three months yet," her sister-in-law reminded her. "Has there been time to accommodate yourselves to each other's whims and tempers and prejudices?"

"I suppose not; and it is a shame to entertain you with complaints of fancied neglect," cried Sophie, more cheerfully. "And, after all, Mark is very good to me. If I am pettish he always bears my ill-humour without murmuring; or if he stays away from me more than I like, he often brings me some token that I have been affectionately remembered during his absence. Remind me to show you the French bon-bon box he bought me yesterday. It is the prettiest thing of the kind I have ever seen."

Did Mark think he should always be able to still his wife's reproaches with soft words and sweetmeats? She was beginning to distrust him already; to consider herself neglected, and to feel dissatisfied at his demands for money to be applied to purposes of which she disapproved. Eda congratulated herself—rather sorrowfully, it is true—that her brother had been tacitly opposed to the plan of her taking up an abode with him; for she began to comprehend how difficult a position she would have held when both husband and wife made calls upon her sympathy.

Mark was still absent when Eda, who had protracted her stay as long as she could, very reluctantly left Sophie to her loneliness, and returned to Mr. de Courcy's. She would have liked to see her brother again, to hint to him that his repeated absences were scarcely kind, and pray him to be more considerate to his wife. But he did not give her the opportunity, and she knew not where to find him in town, even if she resolved to brave his displeasure, and seek him there. Her vague fears that his domestic happiness was already tottering made her so restless and uneasy, that a few days after this visit to Sydenham she took advantage of having a commission to execute at a jeweller's for Mrs. de Courcy, and went to see Gran, whose sympathy always sent her back to her duties cheered and comforted.

(To be continued.)

ENGLISH SACRED POETRY.—II.

PERIOD OF THE PLANTAGENETS.

IN our last paper we gave a sketch of the history of sacred poetry in the times of our Saxon forefathers; we now propose to continue our retrospect through the reigns of the Plantagenets, that is to say, from 1066 to 1485. During this long period we shall find very few poets who confined themselves strictly to sacred poetry, and who could be called sacred poets in the sense in which we speak of Cædmon or of George Herbert, but we shall find many writers who, like Chaucer and Lydgate, have interspersed the general body of their writings with verses dedicated to religious subjects. These passages we shall endeavour to point out; and we doubt not that a brief inquiry will be of real service to those who care to know something of early religious poetry. For, in the first place, these writings are not easily accessible to most readers; and in the second place, many of these old poets are very voluminous, and, on the whole, very uninteresting.

The Norman conquest completely changed the face of our country: it introduced a new phase of civilisation, and if it created a new life, it entirely destroyed the old. Its effect on literature was singular. For a time it seems to have completely crushed that fresh and vigorous genius of which we have such remarkable specimens in Cædmon and Alfred. It introduced a heavy pedantic school of writings, remarkable only for their learning, and valuable only for their historical interest. What poetry has come down to us of that epoch is for the most part in Latin, and in very bad Latin too. It is not till we come to the reign of Henry II. that any native poetry worthy of the name makes its appearance; and the first poems we can mention are certain metrical lives of the saints, which exist in MSS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. They were most probably composed by the monks to amuse, no doubt, their cloistral leisure, and possibly to edify their less-gifted brethren, who, unable to employ themselves by writing, were fain to amuse themselves by reading. These MSS. give an account of the various Roman Catholic saints, such as St. Swithin, St. Wolstan, and St. Christopher, and are almost ludicrous in their bald precision of detail. With one specimen we shall pass these worthies by, and turn to their more interesting successors. Here is a specimen of the life of Saint Christopher :—

"Seynt Cristofre was a Sarazin in the londe of Canaan,
In no slud by him daye mi fond non so strong a man:
Ffour and twenti feete he was longe and thikk and brod inough.
Such a mon but he weore stronge methinketh hit weore wough.
A la cuntre where he was for him wolde fleo,
Therfore him ythoughte that no man ageynst him sculde beo;
He seide he wolde with no man beo but with on that were Hext lord of all men and undir him non othir were."

About this time, too, appeared a series of poetical, or, to speak more properly, rhythmical versions of Genesis, Exodus, and the Psalms, executed in pretty much the same style as the verses we have cited. Contemporaneous with these productions—though it is difficult, by the way, to settle with any accuracy the chronology of this kind of literature, much of it still existing only in MSS.—we have a few hymns, some of which are very touching in their simple beauty, as, for instance, this stanza in an elegy on our Saviour's death :—

"I syke when y singe for sorrow that yse,
When y with wypinge bihold upon the tree,
Ant se Jesu the suete
Is hert-blood for lete
For the love of me."

The following stanza, too, on His passion and death is worthy of quotation :—

"Jesu for thi muchele might
Thou ȝef us of thi grace,
That we maue day and night
Thenken of thy face
In myn herte it doth me good
When y thinke on Jhesu blod
That ran down by his syde;
From is harte doune to ys fote.
For us he spradde is harte blode
His wondes were so wyde."

We now pass on to a very remarkable production—a sacred poem, in the French language, by the celebrated Robert Grosthead, or as it is now spelt, Grostête, bishop of Lincoln. It is an attempt to adopt the measure and style of the Troubadours—a race of minstrels who sprang up about the twelfth century in the South of France, and wrote love-lyrics—to the purposes of religious song. This piece, according to Warton, professes to treat of the creation, the redemption, the day of judgment, the happiness of heaven, and the torments of hell, and is a religious allegory. This poem, which is written in Norman-French, was translated into English verse, possibly by the celebrated Robert de Brunne, about the reign of Edward I. It is interesting, but heavy, and will scarcely bear quoting. The next poet of any consequence is Adam Davie, who flourished about the year 1312, that is to say, in the reign of Edward II., an important period in English literature. This poet is, perhaps, the most really poetical of any who appeared before Chaucer. His work consists of Visions: "The Battle of Jerusalem;" "The Legend of St. Alexius;" "Scripture Histories of Fifteen Tokens before the Day of Judgment;" "Lamentations of Souls;" and a secular poem entitled "The Life of Alexander." Of his life nothing is known except that he held the office of Marshal of Stratford-le-Bow, near London. There is a MS. of these poems—which, as far as we know, has never been printed—in the Bodleian Library; it is unfortunately much damaged, and parts of it are, as Warton laments, illegible. Though an account of the old English Mystery Plays does not strictly fall within our province, it is difficult, in treating of English sacred poetry, to pass them by without notice. Most of our readers probably are aware that our first scenical representations were dedicated to Scriptural legends. Many of these plays have come down to us; the most interesting are those known as the "Coventry" and the "Chester Mysteries." The latter are twenty-five in number, and were performed by the trading companies of the city. Though to our more refined tastes the composition of these dramas is often rough and uncouth, the dramatic incidents ludicrous and even profane, they were doubtless received with profound reverence by our ancestors. A good deal of buffoonery was expected, and introduced, but in spite of this it is easy to see that the general tone of these works was intended to be grave and pious, and was received as such by those present at their representation. It is dreary work to read through any of them continuously, and not the sort of study we could recommend as a pleasant pastime to anybody. Still, the adventurous reader will every now and then stumble on passages of singular beauty, both of sentiment and expression. Could anything be more touching in its simplicity, for instance, than the following?—

"That Lorde that is ever omnipotent
To govern you in goodness, as he best may
In hevyn we may hym se.
Now God, that is hevyn kynge
Send us all hese der' blyssynge
And to His tower He mote us brynge,
Amen, for charyte."

We have now arrived at Chaucer, but before proceeding at once to the poems and verses he has dedicated to the sacred muse, let us briefly sum up the characteristics of the Anglo-Norman poetry. What we admired in the Anglo-Saxon genius, we find in the Anglo-Norman, though we find it with modifications. That vivid abandon has now become toned down. Sacred poetry has lost in intensity and spirit, but it has gained in learning and form; it has become more solid and sententious, and more a work of art in the modern acceptation of the term. The Saxon and the Norman were essentially distinct, and their national characteristics are naturally reflected in their poetry. There is a coldness and want of fervour about the Norman; he is dry and bald, and realistic. The Saxon, on the other hand, though too often dull and lethargic, has imagination about him—has deep feeling. A large mass of Norman poetry has come down to us, a considerable portion, too, of Saxon poetry; and it is curious to see how the Saxon always tends to the religious, the Norman to the secular. The one is pious, grateful, contemplative; the other brilliant, superficial, worldly. It was not till there was an incorporation of the Saxon with the Norman elements—and this is very noteworthy—that our poetry again assumed a definite religious tone. English sacred poetry is the expression of the complete amalgamation of the two nationalities. Without the Saxon, poetry would probably not have become religious; without the Norman it could scarcely have become bright and buoyant. Chaucer represents this amalgamation.

Geoffrey Chaucer, the father of English poets, was born, according to the inscription on his monument in Westminster Abbey, in 1328. Into his secular poetry, and into the events of his life, it is obviously not necessary to enter here. A great deal has been written about this great poet, but there is one feature that has not received half the attention it deserves, that is to say, his eloquence, his fervour, his genius as a sacred poet. There are most delightful passages dedicated to the glory of God scattered throughout his works. His most beautiful sacred poem—for there can be little doubt that this work belongs to him—is "The Lamentation of Mary Magdalene." She is represented as bewailing the empty sepulchre of our Saviour:—

"My Lord is gone that here in death was laied
After his great passion and death cruell.
Who hath him thus again betraied?
Or what man here about can me tell
Where He is become, the Prince of Israel,
Jesus of Nazareth, my ghostly succour,
My parfite love and hope of all honour?"

She concludes that the Jews have stolen him away, and blames herself for not having sate and guarded his sepulchre:—

"Since all my joy that I call His presence
Is thus removed, now I am full of mone.
* * * * *
Alone here I stand, full sorry and full sad,
Which hoped to have seene my Lord and King."

She hopes that her bones at least may rest on the blessed spot where His rested. Returning then to the cruel Jews, she draws a terrible picture of the evils and cruelties they heaped on our blessed Lord, and then goes on to describe the crucifixion: how He was crowned with thorns and given vinegar to drink, while she knelt down at the cross witnessing His sufferings, but unable to relieve them—

"Then kneeled I doune in paine's outrage,
Clipping the cross within mine armes twain.
His blood distilled doune in my visage,
My clothes eke the droppes did distain.
To have died for Him, I would full fain;
But what should it avail if I did so?
* * * * *
I wept, I bledde, and with myselfe I fared
As one that for his life nothing had cared.
I, looking up to that rueful roode,
Saw first the visage pale of that figure.
But so piteous a sight, spotted with bloode,
Saw never yet no living creature,
So it exceeded the bonds of measure.
Then 'gan I there mine armes to unbrace,
Up liftyng my handes full mourningly,
I sighed and sorē sobbèd in that place,
Both heaven and earthe might have heard me cry."

She declaims against the wicked Jews, and mourns that she could not have borne some of the woes of her blessed One. With Him she has lost everything. She will not rest till she has found Him; she will go through "hote Inde" and the farthest parts of Egypt, even into the wilderness; she will care not for food or raiment—

"I am best content
His crosse with nailes and scourges withall
Shall be my thought and painē speciall."

She will go to His mother, and mingle griefs with her. Yet no; she will not go to her, for the Virgin does not as yet know of His disappearance. She then passionately calls on her Lord to appear. He will not answer, and she must die of grief. The poem concludes by her farewell address to her loved Saviour:—

"Adiew my Lord, my love so faire of face;
Adiew my turtle dove, so fresh of hew;
Adiew my mirth, adiew all my sollace;
Adiew, alas! my Saviour Lord Jesu.
* * * * *
Adiew the fairest that ever was bore,
Alas! I may not see your blessed face!
Now welaway that I shall see no more
Thy blessed visage so replete with grace,
Wherein is printed my perfite sollace.
Adiew mine heart's root and all for ever;
Now farwel, I must from thee disever."

Such is this beautiful poem, of which we have given large extracts, because we are not aware that it has been noticed before, and will probably be new to most of our readers. Another of this poet's works, too, merits especial attention. No one can ever realise the profound pathos and tenderness of dear old Chaucer till they have read that most touching of all legends, the "Prioress's Tale," which has been modernised by Wordsworth. Nor in an account of early English sacred poetry must we pass by Chaucer's glorious picture of the country parson in the Prologue to the "Canterbury Tales," which has been so vigorously modernised by Dryden. The thorough piety and cheerfulness of this true poet, his gratitude to God for all the blessings which surrounded him, both in the world of men and in the works of Nature, are always finding their expression in some form or other.

But we must pass on to John Lydgate. Lydgate is in many respects one of the most remarkable of our early poets; certainly he is one of the most voluminous. He was born about 1370, was educated at Oxford, Paris, and Padua, finally became a monk at Bury St. Edmunds, and wrote about two hundred and fifty-one works, or, as Warton puts it, was the author of a small library. Perhaps the most beautiful, certainly the most earnest, of his religious poems, is his "John Lydgate's Testament," from which the following verses are extracted:—

"Tary no longer, toward thy herytage
Haste on thy way, and be of right good cheere;
Go eche day onward on thy pylgremage,
Thynke howe short time thou shalt abidë here.

"Thy place is byld above the sterrës clere,
None erthly palace wrought so stately wyse;
Come on my frende, my brother moost enteere,
For the I offred my blode in sacrifyce."

There are many beautiful little passages scattered up and down his miscellaneous hymns and poems, written in that simple quaint style which makes the perusal of these ancient bards so fascinating, and relieves the monotony of their general tediousness. Lydgate died about the year 1461, and with him died the school of Chaucer's immediate followers, and the poetry of mediæval chivalry.

These names close a period somewhat uninteresting in the history of sacred poetry; our next period will be more fruitful in interesting names and in interesting matter.

THE GIANT'S CRADLE.

PART II.

THE darkness was rapidly increasing as timid little Clara sped over the rugged path which led to the old mill. She, who had hardly ever walked alone before in this wild and desolate scene, and at the solemn twilight hour, forgot to think of real or imaginary dangers, and was only anxious to reach her destination as quickly as possible. Several times she mistook the way, but at length, after many turnings and windings, the mill appeared in sight, with its great ghostly-looking wheel revolving slowly in the water. Clara directed her steps towards the miller's house; a walled yard was before the door, and as she laid her hand on the latch of the little gate a deep bark startled her and made her tremble. Looking through the bars she beheld the dreaded dog standing near the house, as if to guard the entrance. How was she to pass the angry animal? and yet Sylvia's life might depend on obtaining speedy assistance. Nerved by this thought, she resolutely raised the latch, and entered the yard. Immediately the dog made a violent rush, and Clara, not perceiving that he was chained, uttered a piercing shriek, attempted to retreat, but in the confusion of the moment stumbled over a heap of stones. It seemed ages to the terrified child until she saw the door of the house open, and the miller—who had been startled from his supper by her loud scream—cross the yard. The dog retired to his kennel, growling ferociously, and Clara remembered no more until she found herself lying on a bed, with a kind-looking woman leaning over her. As soon as she was sufficiently recovered to speak she told her story, and, tired as she was, insisted on accompanying the miller to the Giant's Cradle. But on arriving at the place, what was her astonishment to find no Sylvia there! After the first surprise was over, she concluded that Gerald must have returned and taken her away. The miller, however, had his own fears—that the little girl, in attempting to raise herself, might have rolled into the river and been carried down the stream by the current. He therefore hurried back to his house, carrying the exhausted Clara, and leaving her there, promised, when he had made some further search for her sister, to take her home early in the morning. The poor child was much in need of rest, and when the miller's wife placed her in bed, over-fatigued in mind and body, she sobbed herself to sleep, and for a while forgot all grief and anxiety.

When Gerald left his cousins, with a promise to return soon, he threw his flies several times on the water without success.

"I can't understand why the fish won't take, such a splendid evening," thought he. "There's a fine breeze; and if I went a bit further up, to the deep holes, I'd be sure to get a good dish."

On the way he met a boy with whom he was acquainted, fishing also, and inquired if he had caught anything.

"I never had a better evening's sport," he replied, opening his basket, and displaying to the astonished eyes of his friend several fine trout. Immediately there followed an animated description of where they were caught, and on what flies; and together they proceeded a considerable distance up the stream, till the approaching darkness reminded Gerald that it was time to look after his cousins: not that he had forgotten them, for now and then it had occurred to him that he was acting selfishly in staying so long away; but it was such a pity to leave off fishing when the trout were taking so well, and each one he caught encouraged him to try for another. Now, however, becoming suddenly conscious that it was really getting very late, he bade adieu to his friend, and hurried back to the Giant's Cradle, wondering were the girls very tired of it by this time, and would they reproach him with breaking his word. But what was his astonishment and consternation to find Sylvia lying insensible at the foot of the rocky bank and Clara nowhere to be seen. He called and searched, but it was of no use; and, shocked at the consequences of his inconsiderate selfishness, Gerald tried to think what was best to do under the circumstances, and determined to go to the house of a farmer who lived at the other side of the hill, and ask assistance to carry his cousin there. Climbing a gate at the end of the glen, in order to take a short cut across the field, he was running along at full speed, when suddenly from behind the hill a low threatening roar was heard, and, looking round, he beheld a huge bull following at no great distance. The only chance of escape was by flight; and as the gate was now a long way off, Gerald turned quickly, and, closely pursued by the infuriated animal to the very verge of the precipice, managed to save himself by dropping to a shelving rock, from which with some difficulty he descended to the ground, and once more stood close to the spot where Sylvia had fallen. But where was she now? Had the earth opened and swallowed her up during his short absence? for he could not imagine any other way by which she could have disappeared so suddenly. It was needless now to make another attempt to reach the farmer's house—he must first find Sylvia; and after spending more than an hour in searching behind each rock and shrub, and following the stream as far as the wooden bridge, he thought it best to take the homeward path, hoping that Clara, at least, when tired of waiting for him, might have tried to find her way alone. On he went, slowly and carefully, calling his cousin's name every now and then, through the thickening darkness, until at length, reaching home, he rushed in, and anxiously inquired if they had yet returned. Alas, no! Gerald's mother had already passed some hours of watching and waiting, and now his return with such tidings redoubled her anxiety.

Wearily and painfully the hours of darkness passed, and when the dawn of morning enabled the search to be renewed, Gerald set off again to go over the same ground. Near the mill, to his great delight, he met Clara on her way home, conducted by the miller. She looked pale and ill, but, rushing up to him, inquired eagerly for Sylvia. Alas! Gerald knew less than herself; and her account of the fall and strange disappearance of her sister only increased his apprehensions. Clara's safe return was, of course, a relief to her aunt's mind, but the terrible suspense about Sylvia still continued. And yet it was all very simple, and the mystery easily explained. The farmer who lived behind the hill had been surveying his crops on that evening, and while sauntering along the river-bank on his way home saw a little girl lying, as he supposed, in a faint, and carried her to his cottage. All his efforts failed to restore consciousness, and gladly would he have sent a message to her friends, had he known to whom she belonged; but Sylvia and her sister were as yet strangers in the country. The miller it was who, having discovered where the child had been taken, brought the information about the middle of the day, and Clara and her aunt hurried back with him, in the utmost anxiety, to the cottage. A doctor was at once called in, who spoke of a hurt in the head, and gave but small hopes of recovery. Immediately her mother was summoned, and as soon as possible took her place by Sylvia's bed-side, at the farmer's house. But it was many days before she recognised any one, although consciousness in a degree returned. These were sad times for poor Gerald, and in the bitterness of his sorrow and self-reproach he prayed earnestly that God would spare his cousin's life, and enable him to act differently for the future.

And his prayer was answered; for, notwithstanding the doctor's opinion, Sylvia began to show signs of amendment. It was a happy day when she was able to be moved to her aunt's house, and still happier when Gerald was allowed to see her for the first time. Gradually she recovered entirely from the effects of the fall; but Gerald has never forgotten what he then felt, and when tempted, as of old, to please himself without considering the feelings of others, he has only to call to mind that memorable evening's expedition to the Giant's Cradle.

S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

99. When our Saviour first saw Nathaniel, reference was made to his praying under a fig-tree. Give a passage to show that trees or groves were planted for that purpose in very early ages.

100. Of what was the "red pottage" made for which Esau sold his birthright to Jacob?

101. Where is an unfaithful friend said to be like a "broken tooth, and a foot out of joint?"

102. Quote a passage in which one of our Lord's followers calls Jesus by the title of "Son of Man."

103. What present did Abraham give to Abimelech as a witness of his having dug the Well of Beer-sheba?

104. What prophet is recorded as having visited the town of Beer-sheba in after years?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 240.

85. Agabus (Acts xxi. 10, 11).

86. Jacob (Deut. xxvi. 5).

87. "If ye had faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye might say to this sycamine tree" (Luke xvii. 6).

88. Cana in Galilee (compare John i. 45 and xxi. 2).

89. "Till ye be left as a beacon upon the top of a mountain" (Isaiah xxx. 17).

90. Gen. xv. 17.

91. "Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink" (2 John ii. 12).

92. Gen. xiv. 23.

(Drawn by CAROLINE SLADER.)

FIRST FLOWERS.

BY ANNE BEALE.

DELICATE Margaret, sweet and fair,
Tenderly culls in her small parterre
Earliest flowers that blossom there,
Lily and white pink, with dew-tears wet,
Primula, hyacinth, violet,
Snowdrop, and others her hand hath set.

Pausing she severs her first-blown rose—
Smiles in the sunbeam, for well she knows
Whither her daintiest floweret goes.

Pipes the sweet thrush to the morning hours,
Threads she the maze of her garden bowers,
Slowly arranging her choicest flowers.

Through the low porch with its leafy screen,
Past the old cedar so darkly green,
Into the grass lane the hills between.

Humble the cottage the maiden seeks,
Tender the greeting she gently speaks,
Lovely the flush that o'erspreads her cheeks.

"Flowers, sweet flowers—a rose once more!"
Cries, as she passes the open door,
One young as she, but sorrowing sore.

Fragrance and colour the room invade,
Happy the nosegay and blest the maid,
Thus to enliven affliction's shade.

THE UNSPEAKABLE GIFT.

BY THE REV. W. COVINGTON, M.A., VICAR OF ST. LUKE'S, SHEPHERD'S BUSH.

WE now invite our readers to enter upon the consideration of a very solemn subject, the gift of God's Spirit—a gift which, if it be a fact, is one of the most momentous facts in the history of the Christian life—a gift which, if it be not a fact, leaves Christianity shorn of one of its most essential blessings. For, consider for a moment how much rests upon the fulfilment of the Redeemer's promise. If it be not true, then hath Christ come upon the earth and lived and died and passed away leaving behind him no abiding presence to testify of Him. If it be not true, then were his last and dearest words of promise left unfulfilled. If it be not true, then are the hearts of his disciples desolate, and all those pleadings, those sacred pleadings, which they have felt within them; all those voices, warning against evil and leading on to good; all those holy influences by which alone they have felt themselves maintained in their up-hill walk through life—all these have their origin only in the excited fancy of a too vivid imagination—all these are but the product of some undefined quality resident in their heart. If, on the other hand, it be true that the promise of Christ has been fulfilled, that God does send his Spirit to dwell within a man, then, indeed, there is no more momentous question for each soul to ask itself than this—What is my part or share in this most precious gift?

It is in the earnest desire that I may, by God's blessing, enable you to answer in your own heart such a question as this that I venture now to write upon this subject.

Ideas and theories there are, of course, many, varying, and confused. I mention one or two false ones, to clear away the ground ready for the true. Some men think that the presence of God's Spirit is a thing to be apprehended by the senses, and utterly refuse to believe that he acts, unless they are sensible of his action. As well might they try to see the wind, or to feel a sound. As well might they expect to measure with the eye the pressure of the atmosphere, or to grasp with the hand a musical chord. Every part and portion of God's creation makes itself felt in that special department of being to which it is addressed, and in no other—the hand, the eye, the ear, each in its own province, experiencing those sensations which it has been created to grasp. Not otherwise in the spirit world must the things of the spirit be grasped by the spirit, and by the spirit alone. Hand and eye and ear must alike pass away with the body of earth—ashes to ashes, and dust to dust. Out of them shall arise the Resurrection body, with naught of fleshly taint, with naught of earthly stain—a fitter habitation for the ransomed soul. Not, therefore, to the senses of this frail tenement of clay will the Spirit of God address itself; only in that inner sanctuary of being, which is God's own temple, will its pleading voice be heard. And some men think that the in-dwelling of God's Spirit is to be a kind of magical power, to influence for good and to debar from evil; that henceforth, from and after the date of his first dwelling in their heart, it shall be impossible for them to sin, impossible to do wrong; and when they behold, as they will constantly, those whom they have been taught to consider as the truest Christians following a course of action which is manifestly an error, they say that such men cannot be led by the Spirit of God, and that consequently his indwelling is a myth. My readers, if his indwelling were a magical possession of this kind, God's whole purpose in the education of man would be upset. If the Spirit dwelling within a man took away from him his liberty of action, instantly man becomes a slave, no longer a free agent.

You say, perhaps, better to be a slave of good than a free agent in evil, but God says differently. God says, I want a free agent in good—want a man near me, who can, of his own account, deliberately reject the evil, and deliberately choose the good. I do not want a man who is only good because he is possessed by a power which compels him to be so. Near my throne I want the man who has come through great tribulation, through the great testing time; who has washed his robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; who has hungered, and thirsted, and striven to overcome the evil and to grasp the good, and at last has won the crown. I will not leave him comfortless; I will come to him, and help him, and guide him into truth; but my guiding will not be the guiding of force, nor my influence a power irresistible, but only a gentle leading on, such as may help the man to choose or to reject for himself.

What, then, is it, some one will say, this indwelling of the Holy Spirit? If it be not sensible, and if it be not magical, surely it is nothing at all. My readers, this is one of the most sacred subjects upon which one man can speak to another; and I cannot but answer that he would be guilty of the most arrant presumption who should dare to say that he can define accurately, and decide exactly, how the Spirit of God is or is not to work. The words of the Saviour himself must surely be our guide in this—"The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth; even so is every one that is born of the Spirit." In the visible world you cannot measure out the coming and the going of the breath of heaven; you can only stand by and watch a while. Now it is whispering softly through the summer breeze, and now is driving in wildest fury through the winter storm. "Thou canst not tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth." It is an influence before which the reed must bend, and the oak break; yet an influence intangible and unseen.

Even so, saith our Lord, is the Spirit, is the coming and the going of the Divine influence. The human heart is like the chaos of the waters, rent and torn and troubled by the conflicting forces of creation, that are struggling to work out the second birth; and over the face of the deep there is brooding, as of old, the Spirit of God, working in us both to will and to do of His good pleasure. It is true that we cannot see him; it is true that our senses cannot feel Him; but, nevertheless, we know that He is there by the wondrous power which He exerts upon the life, and the wondrous help which He is ever ready to give. But how, you will say, is this consistent with that other assertion, that the influence of the Spirit is not to be apprehended by the senses? The answer is simple enough: that that which is intangible in its operation may be very tangible indeed in its results. You cannot see the storm pass by you, but you know that it has passed where the oak lies prostrate. You cannot see God's Spirit succouring a man who is struggling and well-nigh falling before the attack of some fearful temptation, but you know that it has succoured him, when you see the temptation overcome. And you know that it was not in his own strength that he overcame when you see, next day, his brother, like him in all but his possession of God's Spirit, weakly yielding to the attack of something infinitely less formidable. The work of the Spirit is indeed to be known by its fruits—love, joy, peace, longsuffering, patience, meekness, temperance. These things are not innate in fallen human nature; but these are the things which God's spirit will, if unresisted, pour richly into every heart, and by their presence there you shall know that it is His home.

One other question men sometimes ask: "How shall I get possession of this Spirit of God?" Reader, I think that that is a mistaken question. I think it is put altogether the wrong way. If our God whom we worship were a distant Being, one who had to be sought after by long searching in order to be found; if he were a hard being, who denied himself, and concealed himself from all but the most pressing, then that question might well be asked. But such, blessed be His holy Name, is not at all His character. If there be any truth in the words of the Bible, if there be any truth in the Revelation of Jesus Christ, then our God is not a distant God, not a hard God, loving to hide Himself, but rather a loving God longing to reveal Himself, and the question which we must ask is not so much, How shall I gain possession of Him? but, How shall I let Him take possession of me? Ah! it will not do for us to think of God's Spirit as something far away from us, which we have to go long distances to fetch, which we have to struggle to gain. The presence of God's Spirit is all around us, like the very atmosphere which we breathe, like our native air. It is only when we close the windows and bar the doors, it is only when we insist upon breathing the tainted atmosphere of our own creation, that we keep Him out of the habitation of our heart. Only unbar the doors, and throw wide open the casements, and you will not need to ask, How shall I gain God's Spirit? for his Presence will come in, like a fertilising flood, and fill you full of God. Do you ask what difference will it make? What difference does it make when you open the doors and windows of some long-closed house, and let in the glorious air of heaven? For the moment, perhaps, you see no change. But presently there comes an alteration. You begin to breathe more freely; you feel that you are stronger, healthier than before. Life that was sinking and dying in the vitiated atmosphere begins to brighten and to revive, and soon, though it is hard to describe the difference, yet you are a changed man. Even so, my readers, will God's Spirit flood your heart, if you will but let Him. It is not that you must reach Him, but that you must let him reach you. Only so many of us will not; we will keep him out; we will follow the guidance of our own hearts, sometimes even wilfully mistaking that for His guidance. May He help us all to get rid of our self-deceit, and just simply to give up ourselves, without one single reservation, wholly unto Himself.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

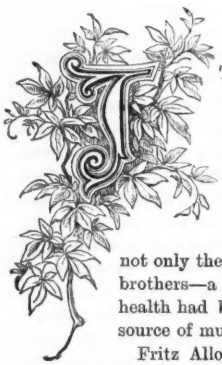
CONTRADICTORINESS.

A VERY tame world it would be, you say, if everybody agreed with everybody: for your part, you prefer lemonade to still water, and would give it a little fizz up with your finger, when the effervescence subsided, rather than take it quiescent and flat!

But you must remember, my dear fellow, that we are not talking about the tameness of mental agreement! Of course, we all admit that variety of opinion produces quickened interest, and lends a charm to conversation. I do not in the least want to secure an Act of Uniformity in the intellectual world. It is amusing enough to see what were virtually Acts of Uniformity for trees and hedges, as in Queen Anne's time, when men shaped trees into the rude images of things! No, once and for all, let it be understood that the objection I took just now to your friend Mr. Frettall is that he does not agree with anybody, and not even with himself! If you happen to express as your opinion to-day what he himself said yesterday to somebody else, he will differ from it in some quick quaint way or other at once! Some "facet" or other of the opinion will now evoke a contrary opinion on his part, and he will unwittingly slay his former self. The fact of the case is, that in England conversation is like steam, it takes some considerable time to get up! And after all you must commence some way or other. Perhaps, for instance, you venture the harmless remark to Mr. F., that it is rather cool. "Cool, sir! He says, Cool! I've had all the windows opened at the top, and tried to get a breath or two of air in. Cool! Why, Jane, he says it's cool! Have you seen the weather-glass, sir? Robert, fetch me the Negretti. Cool!" Now, the last thing on earth you intended to do, when you tried to open up a pleasant little pathway of conversation by saying it was cool, was to lead to a contest of opinion! If you are a stranger you are surprised, and if you are not a stranger you will know what to expect. As the old song says, he does it, "acos it is his habit." It would have been just the same, for instance, if you had started on another track. If you had ventured a remark, say on distance, and had, unluckily for yourself, suggested that the cab distance was a good three miles! Instantly Mr. F. would have been down upon you, with distance-books and maps, and corroborations from Jane and Charlotte, and the boot-boy, and anybody.—"Three miles? How absurd! It is really wonderful that you've come across so often and then committed yourself to so foolish a statement! Three miles! Why it's not more than two miles and five-eighths and a sixteenth of the rest!" Perhaps it isn't. But you could have assured Mr. F. that it really didn't matter a button to you what the exact distance was, and that during the elaborate proof, which he would not stop or postpone, you would much rather have had a look at his Times, or taken a stroll into his conservatory. Of course, those who live with such people become accustomed to their contradictory peculiarities, and tread as gingerly as possible over all debatable ground. But it is fine fun, if you are in the secret, to see how eagerly the Mr. F's of the universe lie in wait like pointers to scent a good bit of contradiction! Perhaps game is scarce, and a real downright good bold assertion has not been made for some time; but presently one comes, which is like the starting up of a brace of pheasants, with a beautiful "whirr!" Pop, pop, pop, goes Mr. F., and his eye brightens with excitement, for has he not been waiting the best part of thirty minutes to have a good shot at somebody? The worst of such a contradictory spirit is, that it makes those around and about the F's of society speak with "bated breath and whispering humbleness;" they get so tired of the "superior person's" dogmatism and defiance, and proof-sheets, and general ammunition, that they draw back humbly, and say, "Oh! now I come to think of it, it cannot be three miles; no, certainly not quite three!" This rather enrages than satisfies Mr. F., who sees the target dropped down just as he was going to fire at it, and all he can do then is to utter some profound and searching remarks upon carelessly expressed opinions.

And now that your remark upon agreeing with everybody has fairly started me, mon cher frère, upon this Private and Confidential, just let me say that I have noticed in your children something of the same spirit. Indeed, when I was last at your most hospitable house, their mamma said, "Don't contradict, Edith." "Don't contradict, Arthur!"

at least three or four times. Of course, I should not have said it more than once, and so cured the disease immediately, for if a child wilfully contradicts a parent, the best receipe that I know is to suggest that "Bed is good for Bobby;" and although he may differ in opinion, it is probable that Bobby will not contradict again. The danger, however, is in the spread of the disease. For contradictoriness of spirit makes everybody uncomfortable all round; it promotes flushed faces, indigestion, spleen, naughty temper, turmoils about trifles, upsetting of gravy dishes, and what the advertisements on the pill-boxes call "general uneasiness of the system." Some people, do what they will, seem to be slaves to the spirit of contradiction. A kind of morbid fear of agreement—or perhaps I should say of agreeableness—seems to take possession of them, and they are, without intending harm by it, not only disagreers, but often very disagreeable. I have long thought that the somewhat vulgar game of "Aunt Sally" might be refined and popularised; and that in the back regions of the house, yard, or garden, Aunt S. might be fixed on the stick and flung at on the Greenwich-fair system of three shies for a penny. I am sure that contradictoriness and all latent budginess (and they are all forms of mental gout) might be somewhat successfully worked off in such a way. Aunt S. need not be so ugly as at the fairs, nor need the sticks be so heavy; and yet there might be room for active muscular exercise in flinging away at her head. How many homes might be restored to the restfulness of a beautiful tranquillity!



Well, you say, you've listened to my long expostulation against the contradictors in society, and you are still of much the same opinion as before, at least in one respect, viz., that the people who give in to everything, and almost fall to sleep when you are talking to them, are amongst the worst bores in society; their yea is not yea, and their nay is not nay! All they mean is, "Let me go my ways in peace—give me ease, give me ease!" Conscience and opinion seem alike to be sound asleep in them, and you think their state is dangerous!

Very likely, my dear fellow; but surely we have no need to point always to opposites as excuses for not removing "ills that be!" The free play of intelligent thought, the necessity of earnest inquiry, the delight of quick appreciation of argument, these are all possible without the presence of the ugly spirit of contradictoriness, which is much more a matter of temper than opinion! Of all tempers, the hot one that hastily boils over is not to be compared in unpleasantness to the one that keeps simmering and simmering, and letting little fizzings off in constant contradictoriness! We sometimes see small men try to be big ones by a spirit which keeps their dependents in awe of them, and we ourselves wince when we meet them: all thanks to those who now and then have pluck enough to have it really out with such people, and who prove indisputably that the distance was really three miles! In such cases, Mr. Frettall will probably say, "It was a pity that you lost your temper over it." But this is far too hard work to be undertaken often. Wars about trifles are too costly in time and spirit too. We ought surely to be able to suggest that it is hot or cold without the danger of a warmly-contested argument, and to predicate this or that in relation to trivial matters without a conflict of statistics! But it is the spirit beneath the contradictoriness that needs the first correction! Let the sweetening rod be cast into the bitter waters of the heart. And here let me suggest that whatever specific views people may take about Christian dogma, all must be at one in the conviction that a morally and a spiritually educated sensibility must be the result of true oneness with Christ. The much-abused word, "gentleman," has, after all, a beautiful idea at the heart of it. Men and women are contradictory because they are not gentlemen and gentlewomen. Probably they regard gentleness as weakness, fit only for invalids, who cannot fight. The rough force which can "put down" people is a brute force after all. Contradictoriness is generally loud; and as it cannot bear to be beaten, it rises higher in the gamut of sound as its own arguments get weaker and weaker. It is always a sign of a weak nature as well as of a proud nature. Alexander Smith speaks in one of his essays of people who, "break all the shocks of life on the buffers of their own vanity;" and so it is with contradictory people, for if some valiant opponent proves incontestably that they are wrong, instantly they take up the conversation to the lofty ground, that their view of the case, if not the correct one, ought to be right. We demur to these people chiefly when they spoil cosy little gatherings, and lord it over the so-called weaker vessels of home, which vessels, if smaller and less pretentious, often hold a much better qualitative amount of wisdom than the great contradictors of society. I believe the habit is almost incurable, save by the best of all remedies —a diviner life—one that is much in communion with Him who was meek and lowly in heart. Nothing is more beautiful than genuine gentlemanliness; nothing is more detestable than bumptiousness and overbearingness! I have often wished that this latter sort of character could go to "a man's school" for a few months. You remember, my friend, school-days, and how the pert cocky sort of fellows were tamed down after a while, till even their own mothers, who, by-the-bye, they had begun to domineer over at home, scarcely knew them, so improved was the condition of their offspring. Alas! this remedy is unavailable for the bigger bullies of manhood's days. Life is made up of "dispositions," and the best presentation some people could give to others would be that of new Christian manners. A true Christian must often be reminded of "the gentleness of Christ," and he must often think of the beautiful prophecy concerning Him—"He shall not strive nor cry." Calmly patient, yet He never compromised with evil, and though "He opened not His mouth," His character ever witnessed to the truth! How much need we all have "to learn of Him who was meek and lowly of heart, that we may find rest for our souls." My dear friend, we agree in the main, though we seemed to differ at the commencement. The true gentleman is a Christian, and the snappish spirit of CONTRADICTORINESS, which makes all men and women and children uncomfortable, is alien to the genius of the Gospel of Christ.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXXV.

It was a rare occurrence to find Mr. Allonby in Doris's sitting-room during the hours he had set aside for work, and Eda had frequently called again and again without seeing him; but this morning she found not only the artist there, but one of his brothers—a young man whose precarious health had been for some months past a source of much anxiety to his friends.

Fritz Allonby was looking unusually grave, and after shaking hands with his guest, and putting a chair for her near Gran's, he resumed his position beside the fireplace, where he could shade his face from observation.

Harry Allonby had been talking eagerly when Eda entered, and, undeterred by the presence of one who was no longer regarded as a stranger, he drew nearer to his brother, and resumed the discussion. "I have seen my doctor, and told him that I have a fair prospect of doing well in New Zealand if I go out there at once, and he says 'Go, by all means!' He seems to think that a sea voyage may set me up; besides, the climate is good; and that is a great inducement, isn't it?"

"Yes," said Fritz, thoughtfully, "it certainly is."

"Well, then, you advise me to accept Morison's offer, and go out with him?"

"Not advise; no, Harry, I cannot take upon myself that responsibility. Your doctor deals too much in doubtful replies to your questions. The sea voyage may strengthen you, and the climate may agree with you. He does not say positively that it will, but speaks as if he were borne down by your eagerness."

"Anyhow, I feel disposed to try the experiment," Harry answered, impatient at these objections; "and I would close with Morison at once, only I cannot go without more money than I shall be able to raise unaided. There will be the expenses of my outfit and the voyage; and I must have a few pounds in my pocket for emergencies——"

He paused, and anxiously regarded his elder brother, who did not make any direct answer, but addressed himself to the old woman, who had laid her knitting in her lap, and was letting her dim eyes travel slowly from one to the other of the faces so dear to her.

"We have not heard Gran's opinion yet. What should you say, Gran, if one of your nestlings flew so far away?"

"But distance is nothing in these days of rapid travelling," interposed Harry. "And if I did well, who knows but I might persuade some of you to join me? It's the money that is the obstacle. If I had that I should be all right."

"So would a good many of us," the artist rather sharply retorted; and quitted the room, leaving his brother half inclined to be cross at the tone he had taken.

"What ails Fritz?" he demanded. "He knows that I would have tried to content myself here, though I always detested the drudgery of the desk, if I had felt well: I thought he would agree with us that this New Zealand opening is just the thing for me! However, if he is determined not to help me, I must give up the idea."

"It may not be in his power to do so," said Doris, looking up from her needlework.

"But it is," the young man persisted. "I happen to know that he has not touched the cheque he received from that Manchester man for whom he painted a pair of landscapes. Can't you talk to him for me, Gran?"

"There 's no occasion for it," she answered, quietly. "I never knew Fritz hold back when either of ye wanted help, unless he had a good, a very good, reason for it."

"But it's awfully disappointing!" Harry urged. "I came here so sure of his help—so positive that he would enter into my plans, and do his utmost to further them; instead of which he has scarcely spoken, and what little he has said conveyed a hint that I must stand on my own legs—he could do nothing for me."

"Have patience, lad," said Gran. "If you are to go, there'll be ways and means found for ye; if not, just remember that what we plan in our own strength isn't always best for us; and that we ought to be thankful if our Father in heaven takes the matter out of our hands into His."

"Of course you're right, Gran," was the half-laughing answer; "that's the aggravating part of it—that I can never say you're not; so I'll tell Morison he must let me have a little more time for consideration; and you'll ask Fritz to give me a decisive answer shortly, won't you? And now I'll run away, or Miss Granton will have no chance of a dish of gossip, and then Doris will be disappointed."

But Eda, having already outstayed the time she allotted to herself, said her adieux, and left Harry chafing under the hands of his sister, who had discovered a loose button on one of his wristbands, and would insist upon being allowed to sew it on tighter before he went away.

To her surprise she found Mr. Allonby in the street below, waiting for her.

"Did you say that you are going back to the jeweller's? May I walk with you?" And without waiting for her hesitating reply he drew her arm through his, and led her towards the Strand.

"Are you in a hurry?" he asked, when her commission had been executed. "Will you walk through the Temple with me?" And seeing that he had an anxious careworn look on his face, she assented.

As they paced up and down one of the solitary courts to which the sound of the noisy City rarely penetrates, Fritz laid his hand on his companion's. "Eda, dear little friend, I am in trouble; can you comfort and counsel me?"

She looked at him inquiringly; and he added, with a heavy sigh, "My own wishes are struggling with my sense of what I owe to those who are dependent on me. Will you call me selfish if I acknowledge that I am beginning to think it is now time those wishes were allowed to make themselves heard?"

"You are troubled about your brother. It has vexed you that he harps upon this voyage; and yet——"

"And yet you think, with him, that I ought to cheerfully give him the help he requires. And so I ought; but, Eda, must I always make these sacrifices for others? Always?"

"I think you are happier for them," she told him.

"I have been; but not now!" he answered. "I used to be pleased to think that I lived solely for my family. It was no trouble to me to deny myself for their sakes; and I cannot remember ever relaxing in my toils until the young folks were all fairly started in the world. But just lately——. I may tell you all that is in my thoughts, may I not, Eda? It will not pain you to know that you are very dear to me, will it?"

She did not answer; her heart was throbbing too tumultuously for speech; but he saw her cheek crimson, her eye droop, and he took heart from her confusion.

"Just lately"—she comprehended the delicate intimation—"new hopes and wishes have risen within me. I have dreamed of working for a dear little wife—of seeing the only woman I have ever loved beside me, and of having my life crowned and glorified by her affection. If this dream is never destined to be realised, tell me so, Eda, and I will try to forget that I have cherished it!"

The hand that lay on his arm began to tremble, but it was not withdrawn; and Mr. Allonby went on, "Only yesterday I told myself that I should soon be in a position to say to you—'Eda, will you be my honoured wife?'"

But here Eda suddenly checked him, and her face wore a doubtful look. "Do I deserve to hear you say this? Do you forget how short a time it is since you saw me——"

"I forget nothing," he told her, when she paused. "I have watched you too closely not to know that your regrets over that affair were more for Richard Atwood's dishonourable conduct than for yourself; and I have loved you too well, ever since I first knew you at Chessington, not to feel that such a heart as yours, dear Eda, would be well worth the winning. But I may not say to you now, 'Try to love me a little, until I can teach you to love me better'—I may not say this now."

"And why?" she asked, almost inaudibly.

He sighed. "Because within the last hour or two, as you have just heard, a fresh call has been made on me. Only yesterday I was telling myself that I was just rich enough to make the old home brighter and pleasanter for your reception, if I could prevail upon you to come to me, and still have a few pounds left for any rainy day that may come upon us. But if I meet this fresh demand, my own wishes must be set aside for a considerable time. Can I help feeling irritable and impatient? Other men are not tied and burdened thus, whilst I can never shake myself clear."

"You would not wish to!" said Eda, gently. "What would your home be without Gran or Doris?"

"Nay, bless them both! I have never classed either of them as among my burdens!" he cried, with a softened look. "Gran helped to make the home, such as it is; and Doris, when she might have married well, with no condition annexed but giving us up because we were too poor to be acknowledged, elected to share our fortunes, though they were at the ebb. I was not thinking of them when I spoke. Is it selfish to feel that I ought not to be expected to defer my own happiness in order that Harry may try an experiment which may not be successful?"

"Poor boy, he looks very delicate!" said Eda, whose sympathies were divided ones.

"Do you think so?" asked Fritz, anxiously. "He was always Gran's cosset-lamb, because she fancied his chest was weak; but he has not complained until this last winter. Now you speak of it, he certainly does look far from strong, Eda!" And then he paused, and gazed in her face, with his own features working strangely.

"Dear Mr. Allonby—dear Fritz—we can trust each other, and wait a little longer!" she whispered, with modest blushes. "You will let Harry go, and I shall esteem you all the more for being so brave and generous."

"But I want you so badly, Eda! and every time I think of you harassed with those troublesome children, and not half appreciated by their parents, I feel that it is time I took you away."

"But I shall not mind such petty annoyances now!" And that last monosyllable spoke such volumes, that Fritz was consoled.

A few tender, earnest words, one long, firm clasp of hands, and then they parted; the artist to rejoice his brother's heart with the tidings that the money he required should be forthcoming, and to be rewarded presently by the young man's restoration to health in that genial clime to which he hastened; and Eda to ask herself, as she hastened back to Tyburnia, what she had done to merit the blessing of such affection as Fritz Allonby's. He was not the gay handsome ideal of her youthful visions, but he was the Christian hero with whom she could tread life's thorniest roads patiently, sustained by his love and fortified by his example. She had truly told him that no trifling vexations would harass her now that she had his tenderness, his manly devotion to rely on!

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Eda was still wrapped in her new-born felicity, and wearing brighter smiles than her lips had known since those first happy days at Chessington Park, when her brother called upon her, and abruptly proposed that she should resign her situation, and reside—for a time, at all events—with Sophie.

"You are not looking well," he said, without appearing to see her astonishment, "and the change of air and scene will brace you up again. Mrs. Granton will be very glad to have you, so there need be nothing said about obligations."

"But Sophie thought she would like to go abroad," Eda remarked. "Do you propose taking her?"

"Certainly not. She has a pleasant little home of her own: why should she wish to leave it? Besides, she is the last person who should propose travelling. Indolent and ill-tempered people, who are always on the qui vive for a quarrel, are nuisances at hotels, where you must submit to some discomforts."

"I do not see why a trip to Paris under your protection need entail upon your wife many of the unpleasantnesses you name; and it is very natural that she should wish to do as other people do," cried Eda—so boldly that her brother fidgeted on his chair, and looked annoyed.

"She shall have her wish some day; but just at present it is impossible."

"Why, Mark? You speak as if you had duties that keep you in town, and forget that your first duty should be to study the happiness of the woman to whom you are so deeply indebted!"

"Isn't Sophie old enough, think you, to take care of herself, without your playing the champion?" Mark demanded, with an offended air. "Seriously, Eda, your love of interfering is growing upon you. I never come near you but you have a lecture ready for me!"

Eda apologised, and then sat wondering to herself if what he said was quite correct, and if she was, as he asserted, fond of fault-finding. No one else accused her of it, and surely it could not always be through a petty passion for meddling that she found herself so continually in opposition to her nearest and dearest relation. Somehow, he contrived to grate upon her more than any one else did. Her sense of what he ought to be was always at war with stern reality; and to see her only brother overweeningly ambitious, greedy of gain, and careless of right, vexed and angered her till, perhaps, her irritability induced her to deserve Mark's reproach.

"You will come to Sophie at once? Say to-morrow," he urged, "and I will meet you at London Bridge, and take you down with me."

"But it is impossible!" Eda replied. "Little Rose has been ailing ever since I was at Sydenham, and the medical man who was called in this morning says she has the symptoms of scarlatina. I could not leave the child while she is ill."

"Why not? You are not her nurse; and it is very foolish to make a slave of yourself for other people's children."

"I love the child, and I could not resolve to leave her as long as she needs me," his sister responded. "Besides, you do not absolutely want me at Sydenham, do you, Mark? You said that Sophie is well."

"Yes, she is quite well—in health, I mean." And then he made so long a pause that Eda laid her hands on his, whispering, "What is it, dear Mark?"

"Oh nothing, nothing! only"—and now his vexation was audible in his voice—"only it would be a great relief to me if you would come and pay us a good long visit. The society of a sensible, energetic, unprejudiced woman like yourself, might make Sophie less intolerable!"

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"Mark's despised and neglected wife."—p. 283.

He gave himself a shake as he encountered the reproving glance in his sister's eyes. "Perhaps I ought not to have said so much; but I am getting quite sick of my life. Sophie is too inert to employ herself as other wives do, and so she wastes her time in brooding over her fancied wrongs, and considers herself ill-used whenever I leave her for an hour or two."

"Then don't leave her," said Eda, drily.

"Absurd! Because a woman is jealous and ill-tempered, am I to pin myself to her apron-strings? Of course it is dull for her to be left alone," he added, hastily; "especially as she hasn't any resources in herself, but it is unavoidable. Perhaps, Eda, you will be able to rouse her a little, and give her some conception of what an English wife should be."

"That task should be yours, Mark. Only from her husband should such teachings come; if," she added, "Sophie really requires them—which I am unwilling to believe. And my own opinion is, that nothing is wanted but your affection and a little forbearance, for she is eager to please you, and loves you dearly."

"It is after a fashion, then, that I find very irksome. If you knew what a vile temper——"

"But I had rather not know!" cried Eda, promptly; and he checked himself.

"You're quite right; I ought not to bore you with a long story of what I have had to put up with lately. If you cannot come to-morrow, when will you? If some one doesn't play the peace-maker, and render the house more habitable for me, I shall be tempted to stay away from it altogether."

"That is a disgraceful threat, Mark!"

"Perhaps it is; but I am provoked to it by her constant tears and revilings. I did not marry to be the slave of a silly woman's caprices."

"As ye sow, so shall ye reap," was in Eda's mind while he was speaking; and very earnestly she prayed him to yield to Sophie's wishes, and take her abroad for a time.

"She may go to Paris, or anywhere she likes!" he answered—"I put no restrictions on her movements; but it must be without me. I have told her repeatedly that I cannot leave London just now. I am concerned in the management of a new company, and must, for my own interests, stay to watch over it."

"Why will you speculate, knowing that Sophie objects to it?" Eda rather abruptly demanded.

"Because I am bitten with the mania, I suppose," was the careless answer.

"But——" she was beginning to say, when he stopped her.

"Now, my dear Eda, you are trenching upon matters that do not concern you in the least. I certainly do not intend to let my energies lie dormant because my wife is miserly, and in terror lest I should lose for her a pound or two of her treasured cash; and I shall be glad if you will make her understand that I am not the sort of man who submits to be dictated to by his better half. It is unreasonable of her to expect it."

"I do not think Sophie is unreasonable."

"I suppose not; you always do take sides against me," said Mark—so irritably that Eda did not attempt a reply; and he began to draw on and button his gloves. By the time this was accomplished his good-humour returned.

"Well, little sis, when am I to tell Sophie that she may expect you?"

"I don't know, Mark. I cannot leave Mrs. de Courcy while Rose is ill."

"Will not, you mean!"

"Will not, then; for I do not think the child would be carefully or kindly nursed if I left her. Besides, I know that I am of use here; and I am afraid that I should not be at Sydenham."

"If you could keep Sophie within bounds I should not know how to be grateful enough to you."

"I have already told you that my sympathies are with her, and that I believe it to be in your own power to end all the unpleasantnesses at which you have been hinting. No one can take your place for you, Mark."

"This is no answer to my question. Will you come?"

"I will think it over, and let you know my decision to-morrow. I cannot say more."

Mark looked seriously offended; but though Eda was sorry to displease him, she would not come to any other determination. Here, her duties, though sometimes irksome, were clear; but she doubted both the prudence and kindness of involving herself in her brother's disputes with his wife. He had asked her to play the peace-maker—a difficult task when both parties are willing to be conciliated; and how much more so when one, at all events, was not disposed to make any concessions? And how could she counsel Sophie to submit herself to his will, while she was feeling that the unfortunate woman was justified in complaining of his neglect, and also in objecting to the hazardous schemes in which he was embarking.

"I will go and see Sophie," she finally resolved; "and if she gives me reason to think that my companionship will be of any service to her I will put all selfish considerations aside, and pay her a long visit. Knowing Mark better than she does, I may be able to come to her aid sometimes, and perhaps smooth over the rough places when he says or does anything to vex her."

But as Violet speedily sickened with the complaint that had attacked her sister, Eda was unable to carry out her intentions, and while she was debating whether to write or leave the matter still in abeyance, she was sent for, one morning, to receive a visitor. Fritz Allonby had contrived to make several calls lately to satisfy himself that his brave little betrothed was not injuring her health by too close an attendance on the sick children; but on this occasion it was not her artist lover who waited to see her, but Mark's already despised and neglected wife.

(To be continued.)

THE CATACOMBS, AND THEIR TESTIMONY TO THE FAITH.—II.

BY THE REV. THOMAS JACKSON, M.A., PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S, AND RECTOR OF STOKE NEWINGTON.

"Of whom the world was not worthy. They wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth."—HEBREWS xi. 38.

IN the sequel, the Apostle of the Gentiles arrived at Rome, and for "two whole years he dwelt in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him." But this truce with heathenism was not to last long. In the tenth year of Nero, the year following that in which St. Paul was released from detention, down came the long condensing forces of heathen prejudice and superstition. The Christians were persecuted with every variety of torture that the inventiveness of malignity could suggest. Some of them were impaled upon crosses, covered with warm pitch and tar, and then set alight to guide travellers on their road. There is no necessity to send down the plummet and line of exact investigation into this gulf of blood. Thousands fled to the catacombs. That these were already to some extent in existence is proved by the oration of Cicero for Cluentius, where he mentions some not far from the Esquiline Gate; and in his defence of Milo, where he speaks of a spot on the Appian Road, which was a "hiding-place and receptacle for thieves."

When the poor fugitives had made their way amid peril and tears into these gloomy recesses, it is but reasonable to suppose that where the galleries approached sufficiently near to the surface, and had been extended into woody regions comparatively distant from the more populous quarters of the city, openings would be made to admit light and air, and to mitigate the horror of the place. Dr. Burton informs his readers that Baronius mentions the cemetery of Priscilla being discovered in his time near the Via Latina; and his description may be applied to all the rest. He says, "It was quite a subterranean city: at the entrance was a principal street wider than the rest, and on each side were several other streets, which again branched off into lanes and alleys. There were fora, as in cities, and more open spaces for religious meetings, which were ornamented with pictures of saints and apertures for light."

Thither went down these persecuted men, with their wives, their sons and daughters, carrying a frugal stock of food, drink, and clothing. The little children were put to rest in the holes and corners of the underground precinct. The principal avenues were dimly lighted by lamps, which could be instantly extinguished did any danger arise from the footfall of an intrusive stranger. Sermons were preached, and the holy sacraments administered in some of the larger chambers. These were lighted by many lamps, to give a cheerful aspect to the scenes of praise and prayer. Hence the old custom throughout Western Christendom of lighting numerous candles when the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is celebrated. In later times as we know, this custom has been perverted and abused, and candles lighted, not to give light, but, in the brightness of mid-day, to give some imaginary additional virtue to the ceremony; and individuals also think their prayers more acceptable if they purchase a taper and set it alight in front of some altar. The tomb of a martyr was often selected, and used as an altar-table; hence, perhaps, the origin of the expression "altar-tomb." These were chiefly constructed of terra-cotta. The marbles of Pentelicus and the porphyry of Egypt were a monopoly in the hands of the heathen. This may have been the reason why the relics of saints and martyrs were preserved beneath the holy table in so many ancient churches. They sang hymns of praise to Christ, they used written forms of prayer, they said or sang the Apostles' Creed. Diligent students of the antiquities of sacred music consider that many of the melodies used in the Temple services at Jerusalem were incorporated into the public worship of the primitive Christian Church. To these tunes were chanted the responsive anthems of loyal praise, which they lifted up, a pure incense, to Christ their adorable Lord and God.

There is reason to believe that many of the saints who were pointedly proscribed by the heathen authorities, passed months and years without ever coming into the upper air; there they died and there they were buried, each sleeping in his coffin-like recess till the morning of the resurrection. Meanwhile the heart of the great city above beat on and on with its accustomed throb. The captive from Britain was forced to fight till he died in some gladiatorial show, to glut the wild and cruel passions of the Roman women. The Imperial government was tolerant to this extent to religious services, that it was ready to incorporate into the pantheon all the gods of all the nations over which the Roman eagle brooded, but utterly proscribed any faith which claimed to be exclusively divine. The vestals still lighted the sacred fires; the augurs still examined the entrails of the beasts slain in sacrifice, or drew imaginary squares and circles in the heavens from which their omens were to be derived; the long trail of the triumphal procession, glittering in purple and scarlet and gold, still traversed the Forum, as when the seven golden candlesticks and the Ark of the Covenant of the rifled Temple at Jerusalem were insultingly borne aloft to show the completeness of the overthrow of the City of God. Little children were still slain, to make poisonous and abominable brewage. The sophist wrangled in the schools of rhetoric. Men were marrying and giving in marriage, as when Noah entered into the ark. The crimes of society were seething as in a caldron. Many, no doubt, thought no change at hand. But in the meantime the stone hewn out of the mountain without hands had begun to roll; Bel was about to bow down, and Nebo to stoop. Beneath the earth were rising to heaven the songs of Christian love, upon the earth the louder cry of the blood of the martyrs. In despite of all the expedients that the subtle policy of the Imperial Government could suggest, the temples were gradually deserted; the oracles lost their inspired voices; the fascinations of idolatry faded into thin air; the last faun ceased to haunt the groves—so that the religion which went forth forlorn and insulted from the hillock of Calvary to the tomb of the Arimethean, within three hundred years ascended the throne of the Cæsars, and grasped the sceptre of the civilised world.

Now how is all this to be accounted for? Why did grave patrician men, and delicately nurtured gentlewomen, light-hearted childhood as well as hoary age, why did they flee to these catacombs, leaving the light and enjoyment of the Italian sky, and all the sweet pleasures of domestic life? Why were they contented to forego the sparkle of the violet and anemone in spring, the flash of the firefly and the evening star in summer, and the ten thousand splendours of column and arch piled on high throughout the city, the fountains of Egeria, the villas of Tusculum, the blue hills of Soracte, and the gardens of the Pincian slopes—in a word, all the pomp and beauty of the life of Imperial Rome? It was because their old faith in heathen mythology had been out-thrust and utterly trampled down by the expulsive force of a new and better faith. In obedience to the influence of that faith, sometimes overawing them by its majesty, and sometimes drawing them as with cords of exquisite love, they had become Christians, but with no feeble or transient conviction. To be a Christian in those days was to have a very intense and solemn sense of forgiveness through the blood of Christ, and a blessed hope of immortal life beyond the grave; but it was also to risk the loss of all things. It was for a man to see his property confiscated, and his life hunted like that of a partridge upon the mountains. It meant to the more timid and retiring an escape down deep into some dim catacomb, living there half a life, a sort of living death. Now how are all these phenomena to be accounted for? Is it to be supposed that a few Galilean fishermen invented this religion?—a faith, be it remarked, not propagated by the sword, but which conquered by suffering, so that it was well said, the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church. The more the whole story is dispassionately weighed and studied, the more the conviction will grow upon the mind that it was the light of a new Revelation, shining in the hearts and influencing the conscience and, through the conscience, the policy and conduct of men. In other words, that our Lord Jesus Christ, alike in His Person and work, was indeed the manifested power and wisdom of the rewarding and punishing God, not only to the Jew, but to the Gentile, Jehovah, Lord Supreme over all, blessed for evermore.

But the argument would be incomplete if we omitted to refer to the readiness with which the slaves and lower classes of the population accepted the new and rising faith. It was to them indeed glad tidings. The slaves lived in fearful bondage. They were liable—though in some cases educated men—for slight offences to be scourged, crucified, or cast into deep fish-ponds to feed the lampreys. Here came a blessed emancipation. The apostles did not indeed advise a slave to run away from a cruel master, but they said, "If thou mayest be free, use it rather;" and a Christian bondsman was not to be regarded a mere serf, a sort of domestic chattel, by his Christian master, but "a brother beloved." There is every reason to believe that hundreds and thousands of these men, grateful for the knowledge of their true humanity which had been taught them by their employers, would be glad to share their privations, would cheerfully give up the amenities of the capital, the pomp of festival, the dance, with its fascinating involutions, the sports of the hippodrome, and the combats and dramas of the theatre—would descend with them into these dens and caves of the earth, proving how forceful was the influence of the religion they professed. They were prepared to endure the loss of all things, if only they could retain the blessed privileges of divine worship, of companionship with the good, and all the inward satisfactions which these privileges implied.

It has been already observed that many illustrious confessors of the Church were interred in the catacombs. We learn from Tertullian that the primitive Christians never adopted the custom, then a novelty in Rome, of burning the dead. They rather followed the example of the ancient patriarchs and Jews of burying their dead out of their sight. This shows how deep was the respect felt by the primitive Christians for the institutions recorded in the Old Testament. Nor were they unsupported by the customs of the more ancient inhabitants of Etruria and even Rome itself. In the neighbourhood of Cære, the city from which the Romans are said to have derived their knowledge of the accessories of Divine worship (hence our English word ceremony), are hundreds of tombs. Some of these, when opened, if we may believe the traditions current among the neighbouring peasantry, disclose some mighty Tarchun, reclining upon a massive couch of bronze, covered with rich ornaments of gold, and surrounded by furniture of elegant and varied design. As soon as the air is admitted the whole crumbles into shapeless dust. The Christians buried their dead as an act of faith in the resurrection of the body—an imperfect act, it is true, because the all-powerful Saviour can rebuild the body as much from the ashes of a funeral pile, or the deepest caverns of the ocean, as from a shelf in a catacomb. No interments were allowed in Republican or Imperial Rome within the walls of cities. Consequently the catacombs were largely utilised for Christian burial. There the solemn services of the liturgy were not likely to be disturbed by profane and scoffing intruders. All around were the silence and the horror of outer darkness. Anastasius, in his life of Calistus, who was Bishop of Rome in the third century, tells us that this prelate specially utilised a catacomb as a burial-place for many priests and martyrs. Some say that, in all, the mutilated remains of 170,000 martyrs were walled up in these gloomy galleries. This statement has been impugned as an obvious exaggeration. But it is not so improbable when we remember that Rome and the country round it contained at this period nearly three millions of inhabitants, and that the time of persecution lasted not far short of three hundred years.

Turning to the pictures and the inscriptions, we remark that their chief characteristic is tender and consolatory thought. Affection, says a discriminating visitor, sighs its regrets, and faith breathes in hope. There is nothing pompous, nothing to recall the dignities of this world; not a harsh word concerning their oppressors; much cheerfulness, much simplicity, much sweetness. In some cases birds and flowers, emblems of the joys of Paradise and immortal life, are painted on the space above the arch of the tomb. The cemetery of St. Calistus was lost for some hundreds of years, like a Pompeii of the primitive Church. Let us translate some of the inscriptions; here is one:—

> "The fifth of the Kalends of November
> Here was laid to sleep,
> Gorgonius, whom all loved and who hated none."

Here is another of great antiquity:—

> "Too soon hast thou fallen,
> Constantia! admirable for beauty
> And for her charms. She lived
> XVIII. years, VI. months, XVI. days.
> Constantia in peace."

The inscription to the memory of a young officer under Adrian, named Marius, is that

> "He lived long enough, for he spent his life and his blood for Christ."

Mark the memorial of an envoy from Gaul, and the illustration it affords to what has been stated concerning the fidelity of Christian servants:—

> "Here Gordianus,
> Messenger from Gaul, slain for the faith,
> With all his family.
> They rest in peace.
> Theophila their servant had this done."

Next comes a memorial of one of the sextons or grave-makers of the catacomb. His picture represents him carrying a lamp in one hand and a mattock in the other; around him are the tools of his business, and at each corner of his tunic is embroidered a cross.

Another records the worth of—

> "Adeodata, meritorious virgin, who rests in peace, Christ having willed it so."

Another is designated as—

> "Friend of the poor, tender and blameless soul, lamb of the Lord."

The symbols are a sort of continual sermon, illustrating Christian faith, patience, resignation, and hope. There is the anchor representing hope, the dove flying away with the olive-branch, an emblem of the Christian soul departing this life in peace; the fish; ΙΧΘΥΣ, the Greek word recalling the titles and attributes of Christ, and furnishing the initials of the formula, "Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour."

These old worthies were diligent readers of the Bible. They represent the Good Shepherd bringing back the lost sheep; the raising of Lazarus; the holy Vine and Vine-dresser. The Old Testament furnishes the three children in the fiery furnace, and Jonah swallowed by a whale; Daniel in the lions' den; and Moses smiting the rock.

These few instances will suffice to show how overwhelming was the force of conviction upon the minds of these people. Most of them had been brought up amidst the revolting orgies of the Paganism of old Rome. Then they had been converted to the faith of Jesus Christ; then in due time denounced, persecuted, proscribed, and driven from house and home, till they were hidden in the catacombs. There they had assembled for worship. There their little children had lived and died by tens of thousands, slain, not as at Bethlehem, by the sword, but by impure air and scanty diet, and the chagrin and anxiety of exile; there, in process of time, they were entombed themselves. One compares the cavities where the skeletons may still be seen to chests of drawers from which the drawers have been taken out. As already stated, the inhabitants of these subterranean abodes formed four hundred miles of streets, so that the whole upper city of Rome was actually mined by the catacombs. There they remain to the present day. Those of St. Agnes are not generally shown, because the labyrinth of them is so intricate.

Surely a voice speaks to us from the depths of these venerable tombs! It rebukes our want of faith, and our comparative indifference to the maintenance and extension of the Gospel. It addresses every drowsy spirit, and says, "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light!" If the days of Nero and Diocletian were to return, would not many voices which now cry, "Hail Master!" be found no more sincere than the salutation of Judas Iscariot?

THE FIRST FALSE STEP.

CHAPTER I.

A GROUP of merry children were playing on the sands at Longmere, some chasing each other to the water's edge, some digging in the sands with their bright new spades, and one or two trying hard to induce the little dog Tiny to venture into the sea after a stone, or a piece of wood. But this Tiny resolutely refused to do; she would stand in the most provoking manner, with her feet just touching the water, her tail wagging furiously, and her little head on one side, as she watched the stone thrown into the waves, apparently all eagerness to follow it, but at the last moment she always changed her mind, and stood quietly beside her young master, as if she had never thought of anything so foolish.

"How stupid you are, Tiny!" exclaimed Fred Bartlett; "why don't you go after that bit of wood, floating quite close in to the shore, "go in, Tiny, or I will throw you."

"No, no, please don't do that, Fred!" said his sister Amy; "perhaps she is not the right sort of dog to swim, and if so you know you could never make her go into the water. If you throw her in she will be drowned."

"Oh nonsense! drowned, indeed! a dog can surely take care of itself; she will swim fast enough when she feels herself in the cold water. Here, Tiny," and he stooped to lift the little creature, who, seeming to guess his intention, began to try and hide itself behind Amy, shivering and frightened.

Amy took the dog up in her arms, "Now, Fred," she said, "I will not have Tiny teased, and perhaps half-killed, just to please you. She is as much mine as yours, because you know auntie gave her to us both, and I shall take her away with me. To-morrow you can bring Rover down to the water; he loves a good swim."

"Oh, very well, just as you like; I don't care about it, I am sure," and he turned away.

But all the same he did care, for Fred was a boy who liked to have his own way in everything, and if his pretty sister had not been there would have forced the little dog into the sea.

Amy walked off, talking to her little dog, who was soon running playfully by her side. She did not join any of the other children, but strolled slowly along towards some rocks situated just above high-water mark, and at some little distance from where she had left Fred and the rest. Towards this same spot Amy had turned her steps for several days past, and each time she had been trying to make up her mind to do that which this morning she had at last determined to do. It was a very little thing for her to take so long about, but Amy was rather a shy child, and could not always decide quickly when she had to act for herself.

She walked straight up to the high overhanging rocks, where seated, or rather lying on the sand, was a pale, interesting-looking lad of about twelve or thirteen years of age; his right arm was in a sling, and a shawl partly covered him, although the day was so hot.

He did not notice Amy as she came up to him, so she walked slowly past him, calling her little dog to her in order to attract his attention. He looked up then, and half smiled at Tiny's playfulness, as she danced round her young mistress's feet. This was quite enough for Amy; turning to the boy, she said, half-shyly, "I am afraid you have hurt yourself. I have seen you here for some days, and you never seem to get any better. What is it?"

"Oh yes, miss, indeed I do get better!" he answered, raising himself into a sitting position, and respectfully touching his cap with his left hand, "I walked here quite by myself to-day, and mean to go back too if I can."

"And how far was that?" asked Amy.

"Do you see yon white cottage amongst the sand-hills, miss?" he said, pointing to one about half a mile off, "that is where I am stopping."

"Then you don't live here?"

"No, I only came here to try if the sea air would make me strong again, and at first I thought it would be no good, but now I feel getting better every day."

"I am so glad of that," said Amy, kindly, "I like people to get better who come to this pretty place. Besides, it must be so dreadful to have to lie still all day instead of running about as we do. Don't you want very much to run about again, little boy?"

I must tell you that he was much older than Amy herself, but he looked so helpless lying there on the sand, that she could not help calling him "little boy," though it amused him very much, as he thought how tall he should look if he stood up beside this fairy-like little lady who was talking so kindly to him.

"Yes, indeed, miss," he answered, "it is very hard to lie here, when I want to be going about; but there is something I want to do much more than run on the shore here."

"What is that? do tell me, and perhaps I can help you."

"Thank you, miss, but it is nothing you can do for me. I want to get strong so that I can work, and help poor mother, and the little ones at home."

"But why does not your father work for them?" asked Amy.

"He is dead," the lad replied, simply.

"Oh, I am so sorry! Then you are the only one to help them when you get better. I shall tell papa about you, and I am sure he will do something for you. Papa is a very rich man," she added, "and always kind to poor people. I dare say he will come and speak to you if I ask him."

"I am much obliged to you for your kindness, miss, but a very good kind gentleman has sent me here, and has promised to find something for me when I get better, so I am nearly sure to get work."

"What sort of work would you like?" asked Amy, who had not the least idea what boys of that class did, as she fancied they were always at school like her brothers, and she knew this was far too respectable a lad to sell matches in the streets, or to black boots.

"What I should really like most," he said, speaking very slowly and with his eyes fixed on the water shining brightly in the warm sunlight, "would be to go to sea. Oh, how I long to be away in one of them big ships I sometimes see sailing past, and I watch them till my eyes ache with straining after them!"

Amy knew that he ought to have said "those" ships, instead of "them," but she did not quite like to tell him of the mistake, so she thought if she said it properly herself, and laid a little stress upon the word, that he might notice it, and remember next time.

"But many of those ships are lost; I often hear papa talk of dreadful shipwrecks, and the sailors all being drowned. Should you not be afraid of that?"

"No, I think not," he said, smiling, "leastways, I should like just to try one voyage."

"But I don't think you look strong enough for the sea," Amy said, putting on a very wise air, "sailors are always big and strong."

"So I shall be, miss, I hope by-and-by; there was not a stronger boy than me in King Street before I was so ill. It was that pulled me down, not my arm being broke."

"Is your arm broken?" exclaimed the little girl. "How dreadful that must have been! Did it not hurt you very badly? How did you do it?"

"It did hurt terribly at first. I fell off a balcony," he said, lowering his eyes before Amy's inquiring gaze.

"At your own house?" she asked.

"Oh no, our little houses don't have balconies," he said, smiling to himself at this young lady's ignorance, as he pictured the wretched room which was all he could call home.

"Then what where you doing on a balcony?" for Amy's curiosity was excited, and she was very much interested in this pale pleasant-mannered boy.

To her surprise he covered his face in his hand for an instant, and when he drew it away he was crimson to the roots of his hair.

"Do you really want to know, miss, because I dare not tell you a lie?" he asked, in such low tones she could scarcely hear the words.

"Yes, of course I do," she said, decidedly, little dreaming of what was coming.

The boy paused, then said, in a tone of misery, as if the words were wrung from him, "I was trying to steal, but thank God I was saved just in time."

As she heard these dreadful words, Amy jumped up from where she had been seated as if she had been stung.

"What!" she cried in horror, "trying to steal! Are you a thief? And I felt so sorry for you, and thought you such a nice boy! How could you do such a bad wicked thing? I must never speak to you any more now that I know what you are," and she moved sorrowfully away from him.

"Stay, stay!" cried the boy, rising up and eagerly holding out his hands towards Amy, "do not leave me without hearing my story, now that you know so much. Let me tell you how it was that I was driven to do such a wicked thing. Do listen to me, miss!" he implored, as she still kept her head turned away from him.

"You can't have had any excuse for stealing," she said at last, feeling very undecided as to what she must do, for she longed to hear the boy's story, and yet felt that now she knew what he had done, she ought not to talk to him any longer.

"I know that too well," he answered, sadly, "and bitterly I have been punished for it, but if you knew what it was to have sickness and starvation staring you in the face——"

"Well I never, Miss Amy, here have I been looking for you everywhere!" broke in an impatient voice, "and wanting you to come home to dinner ever so long since. And here you are all this time talking to a common beggar boy, which you know your mamma would not allow you to do. Come along with me at once!"

"I am coming now, nurse," said Amy, quietly, "but this is not a beggar, I assure you. I shall come and speak to you another time, I must go now," she added, turning to the boy, who was now leaning exhausted against the rock, and watching her earnestly.

He touched his cap, and murmured "good-morning" as the little girl walked away, but when Amy turned after a minute or two to look at him, he had flung himself on the ground with his face hidden, and had she been nearer she would have heard the deep sobs which escaped from him as he lay there weeping with shame and regret.

(To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

105. What two Gentiles did Jesus especially commend for their faith?

106. What king's son was lamed by falling from his nurse's arms?

107. Who was the "chief man" on the island of Melita where St. Paul was shipwrecked?

108. Quote a passage from the prophets in which God is called a "Judge, Law-giver, and King."

109. On what occasions were messages brought to this earth by the Archangel Gabriel?

110. How long is St. Paul stated to have lived at Rome in "his own hired house?"

111. Where do we find it recorded at any time of Moses that he was "leprous?"

112. Quote a passage in which St. Paul speaks of his having written an Epistle to the Laodiceans.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 256.

93. Ruth (compare St. Matt. i. 5 and Ruth i. 22).

94. St. Paul. "Whensoever I take my journey into Spain;" "I will come by you into Spain" (Rom. xv. 24, 28).

95. Rom. ix. 29.

96. See St. Jude, 14, 15.

97. Ishmael (Gen. xxi. 20).

98. Zenas (Titus iii. 13).

HEAVEN.

NO poet, praying for the breath
Of inspiration, may unfold
The bliss beyond the gates of death,
Or with desiring eyes behold
The streets of gold;

Or picture that eternal stream,
Upon whose banks the angels throng,
Where, as in some delicious dream,
The soft low music floats along
Of sweetest song!

No mortal tongue can ever make
Those joys celestial understood,
Which Christ, for my unworthy sake,
Bought on the rough and reddened wood
With precious blood!

I think the landscape must be fair,
That flowers of fadeless beauty grow
To deck the bright and flowing hair
Of those whose robes were washed below
As white as snow.

I know that gladsome palms they bear,
Like victors when the strife is won,
And that they find safe refuge there,
Now all their toil is past and done
Beneath the sun.

His wondrous beauty they behold,
Whose love has led them all their days;
On harps with strings of shining gold
Those sweet seraphic singers raise
Their ceaseless praise!

And brightly every gracious brow
A crown of dazzling light adorns,
To purchase which Christ wore below,
Amid revilings, scoffs, and scorns,
A crown of thorns!

This is the heaven for which I pray:
When high above the stars we meet,
O Saviour, on Thy advent day,
May I, with Mary, find it sweet
To kiss Thy feet!

J. R. E.

(Drawn by M. E. EDWARDS.)

MORNING.

FRESH and sweet came the breath of the morn
Over the purple hills;
It rustled among the yellow corn,
And rippled the reed-crowned rills;
It stole the scent of the violets blue,
And rifled the wild thyme bed;
Then coaxed out the jasmine stars anew,
And played round the roses red.

Up! up! for morning is riding fleet
  Over the dark hill-side;
The golden sun is beneath her feet,
  And her robes are in crimson dyed.
She breathes on the waves of the restless sea,
  And they break into silver chimes;
And the rooks caw loud from the tall elm-tree,
  And the honey-bees hum round the limes.
She kisses the little ones in their sleep,
  Till they open their beaming eyes;
And through the casement the sun-rays creep,
  And out come the butterflies.

The breath of morning hath touched the cheek
  Of a maiden pale with care,
Who hears a voice in the breezes speak,
  Bidding her not despair:
What though the night spread her gloomy wings,
  Till a pathway one scarce can see,
New life and light each fresh morning brings,
  And a day of hope for thee;
After the night shall come the light,
  As life shall come after death—
O world! O world! read the legend aright
  That is borne on the morning's breath."

JULIA GODDARD.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER I.—VENUS'S FUNERAL.

VENUS was dead. Dolly was crying, and Sally was sobbing, and the boys were trying to hold aloof; but Tom looked very grave, and Will—tender-hearted Will—said, sadly, "Poor old thing! We'll dig a grave for her in the middle of the best flower-bed."

"Papa will be so angry, if we do," said Sally, looking up for a minute; "for we shall be sure to kill the flowers." Not that Mr. Woodward was ever really angry with his children in his whole life.

"We'll bury her under the sycamore-tree," said Dolly; "that will be better than the flowers, which die when the summer goes, for it stands there all through the winter, and its branches will keep off the cold." Dolly had always quaint fancies of her own, and to her the sycamore-tree at the end of the long weedy untidy garden was a wise old friend, with a strange language and soft whisperings, which she alone dimly understood.

So the grave was dug, and Jane, the servant (who was as much grieved as anybody else), went first, carrying the remains of the lamented Venus done up in a piece of old carpet, and Dolly and Sally went next, both weeping bitterly, and, last of all, Tom, carrying a spade, and Will, looking half ashamed of his own grave face. And when the cat was buried, and they were all walking back—those old-fashioned Woodward children—Sally stopped suddenly, and exclaimed, breathlessly, "Dolly! there's Netta at the study window, with mamma, and she's been watching us all the time!" They came to a standstill, with dismay upon their faces, and the colour rushed to Dolly's cheeks.

"Bother!" said Tom, energetically.

"Won't she laugh at us, that's all!" said Will, a little ruefully.

"And tell old Cockamoroo all about it, too—that's what she'll do."

"Tom!" said Dolly, solemnly, "you ought to be ashamed of yourself to speak in that disrespectful manner of grandpapa!"

"I don't care! he never did anything for us; and he has made a nasty stuck-up thing of her. I am sure you need not stick up for her, Dolly, she always snubs you enough; and she'll only laugh at you when you go in."

"Well, and I don't care for that," she answered, stoutly; "I am not ashamed, or afraid either."

"Afraid! No, I should think not," said Will, admiringly. And this was half the secret of her popularity with the boys, that "she was always good for fun, and never afraid." Yet she was not by any means a madcap, in spite of her love of fun; on the contrary, she was an old-fashioned, womanly child, full of fancies, and day-dreams, and hero-worship, and longings after vague things she did not comprehend; a girl in whom it seemed as if womanhood and childhood were so blended together that she would never grow more out of the one than it was necessary that she should grow into the other—both had come to her together.

Then, with flushed and slightly defiant faces, they entered the house. They were not going to be bullied by Netta, the boys thought; and if she attempted it "they'd let her know."

"I never saw a cat's funeral before," said the Beauty—she was always spoken of as the Beauty by those jesting young brothers of hers. "How grandpapa will laugh when I tell him about it! The idea of Dolly going out to bury a cat! I shouldn't have dreamt of such a thing when I was sixteen."

"Dolly's only a child," Mrs. Woodward said; "and a good thing too, for I can't afford to let her grow up yet; girls cost so much more when they cease to be children."

"I am certain I shall never quite grow up," said Dolly, hopelessly.

"Oh, won't you?" laughed Netta. "And," she added, "I wish you would not stare at me so. What do you do it for?"

"Because she chooses!" said Tom, valiantly, feeling that the fighting-time had commenced.

"Thank you!" she laughed, merrily. She was wonderfully good-tempered, though a little heartless perhaps, and with just a tinge of unconscious contempt for her less fortunate brothers and sisters. She did not mean to be unkind; but if fate or fortune set an example, why should she not follow it? It is such a common fault, this; not that she committed it knowingly, mind.

Mrs. Woodward had married against her father's wish, and, with the exception of Netta, neither she or her children had ever been welcome at old Colonel Wade's. Yes, he had been kind to the eldest son, Robert—had bought him a commission in the army, and occasionally sent him presents to India, where he was now stationed with his regiment. Netta had always been his favourite; her beauty won the day when she was a mere child, and, ever since, she had been petted and spoilt, sent to an expensive school, and, now that she had left it for good, lived with the colonel, who was to her the kindest and most indulgent of grandfathers.

CHAPTER II.—THE KEY OF EDEN.

THERE was no doubt about her beauty. Dolly looked at her longingly, almost envyingly, many a time. A graceful, aristocratic-looking beautiful girl, who would grow into a still more beautiful woman, was Netta Woodward. She was fair, with masses of golden-brown hair, which she wore twisted about her head in the fashion of a crown; she had soft eyes, and a quick, bright, almost saucy smile, and a graceful figure: a girl lovely enough to win all hearts before her, with the exception perhaps of those belonging to her Bohemian-looking brothers and sisters. They stood before her, now eyeing her almost scornfully, all but Dolly, who forgot everything in the one thought of "Oh, how beautiful she is, and how happy I should be if I were but like her!"

"I have only come for a few minutes," she said, "The brougham will be here for me directly. Oh, Dolly! mamma says that yellow rose up there is yours," and she pointed to the one flower on the one rose-tree in the establishment. "I want it to wear to-night; we are going to a party."

"I can't give it to you," said Dolly, decisively, looking at Netta's silk attire and her own shabby garments; "I want it myself. You have lots of other flowers."

"Nonsense, Dolly!" said Mrs. Woodward; "go and get it. It won't suit you, and Netta wants it." Mrs. Woodward was always ruled by the strongest will present.

"I don't want it for myself," answered Dolly slowly; "I want to give it to Mr. Fuller."

"Whatever do you want to give it to him for?" asked Netta, scornfully. "As if he'd care for a stupid rose!"

"He is going to China for two years, and I shan't see him again; and he has always been kind to me, and taught me French, and all sorts of things. No one ever sent me to school," and she looked straight at her sister.

"Dolly, you ought to be ashamed of yourself!" said Mrs. Woodward, half crying. "You know your father has not had the means."

"Tom," said Netta, "go and get me the rose at once."

"Shan't!" answered Tom, concisely.

"It's too bad of you, Netta, when you know it's the only thing I have to give Mr. Fuller," poor Dolly said, her lips beginning to quiver.

"Very well," laughed her sister, smoothing back her hair—that lovely rippling hair, with the golden tint upon it, which poor Dolly envied so much—"I don't care. I should like to see what this wonderful Mr. Fuller is like, for you seem quite in love with him. I suppose you think he'll come back from China some day, rolling in money"—Netta always thought of money in connection with matrimony—"and marry you."

Dolly stood still, staring at her sister, while the colour came slowly to her face and dyed it crimson. Then she looked out of the window at the sycamore-tree at the end of the garden, under which poor Venus had just been buried. It always seemed to her, in after years, as if a part of the old life went out from her in that gaze, and for the first time she understood that childhood is a sort of Eden, of which innocence, or ignorance—call it by which name we please—is the key. She looked out of her Eden for a moment, and for the first time, that morning. No one had ever mentioned love to her before as a thing that might appertain to her own life. It seemed like a bit of knowledge, of old-world knowledge, suddenly presented to her; and she lost her first sweet ignorance in that one long look out into the weedy untidy garden. Surely Netta was, unconsciously, a little cruel to her that summer morning!

Then the brougham came, and the Beauty rose and shook out the folds of her dress, and drew on her spotless gloves, while the children watched her reverently, and kissing her mother and brothers and sisters, she prepared to depart. And as she went Dolly roused herself, and, rushing to the tree, picked the rose, and flung it into her sister's lap as she was seated in the carriage.

"Here, Netta, take it. I did not mean to be unkind!" she exclaimed. But the Beauty flung it carelessly back, and, missing the girl, it fell on to the pavement—that rose poor Dolly had tended so carefully!

"I don't really want it, you little goose!" laughed Netta; "I was only teasing you." But when she saw the tears come into Dolly's eyes—brown eyes, and soft as were her own—she bent forward and kissed her, and said, "Good-bye, dear," in her sweetest tones, and fascinated that little dreamer her sister completely.

Then the brougham was quickly driven off, and Dolly stood watching it disappear, with the crushed rose lying at her feet. She had so speculated on the happiness of giving the flower to Adrian Fuller! Her beautiful sister had spoilt her dream, and Dolly was ready to weep—she did not know why, but probably it was more for the loss of the dream than the rose. (To be continued.)

DAVID, THE OUTLAW.

BY THE REV. W. HANNA, D.D., EDINBURGH.

INSTEAD of falling, as he did ten years afterwards, on the heights of Gilboa, had Saul fallen in that rout of the Philistines which followed the slaughter of Goliath, how would things have gone then with David? The sudden tide of popular applause excited by his smiting the Philistine might have lifted him easily and at once into the vacant throne. But would that tide have been broad enough, and strong enough, and sufficiently enduring, to have supported him for life upon that throne? Sooner or later would there not have arisen a division of opinion, a challenging of his right? In Jonathan, had he survived his father, there was a rival whose claims, though he might be ready enough himself to waive them, many might be ready to support. Even supposing that there had been no division, no rivalry, no disputing at the time of David's claim, his youth and inexperience must have operated against him. Strong as his hand was to smite the giant, had it strength enough to hold steadily for years so full a cup, thrust into it so suddenly? Vigour enough there might have been, even at that early age, to be its military chief; but would there have been wisdom enough to rule a rough community, unaccustomed to the royal yoke? Humanly speaking, we should have trembled for the result, both as to the people and as to their young king. But it was otherwise ordered. Ten years of persecution—seven or eight of them of outlawry—were interposed between the great feat in the valley of Elah and the crowning of him as king at Hebron—no short, no meaningless, no unproductive period of his life. It is almost impossible to over-estimate the dangers that it averted, the benefits that it secured. What, in the way of preparation for his great life-work, the forty years in Midian did for Moses, after his smiting the Egyptian—what the three years in Arabia did in like manner for Paul, after the commission given to him at Damascus—the same office did those years of persecution by Saul, his life as a fugitive and outlaw in the wilderness, discharge for David. Let us briefly survey this instructive period of his history, noting more particularly the features of character that it served to foster, and the special training for higher after-tasks of government that it supplied.

The scene with Samuel and the prophets at Naioth, the information given afterwards by Jonathan in the field, at last satisfied David that Saul's hatred was implacable, that it was the fixed and steady purpose of the king to take his life, and that there was nothing left for him but to put and to keep himself beyond Saul's reach. So great was his terror, and so hasty his flight, that it was as a solitary, hungry, unarmed fugitive, that he presented himself at Nob, near Jerusalem, the first place at which he stopped on his way southward from Gibeah. The high priest, Ahimelech, who lived there guarding the Ark of the Covenant, and surrounded with the children of the house of Eli, was greatly alarmed at the manner of his appearance. What could have happened, that the king's son-in-law, the idol of all the people, should present himself in such a guise? Seeing the suspicion and the terror pictured in the priest's countenance, David, in his turn, got alarmed. A man so timid might prove treacherous; could not be trusted with the truth. Why not leave him, then, to his fancies and his fears, and pass on from Nob? Because of the urgent need. That need, if Ahimelech were told of its origin, he might be indisposed to relieve. Under the strong and sudden pressure, at once of hunger and of fear, David invented the story of a secret commission; got the shewbread from the altar table, and the sword of Goliath from behind the ephod. Impatient to be off, he seized the food, he grasped the weapon, saying, "There is none like that; give it me;" and "fled that day for fear of Saul." But somewhere in the sanctuary, "detained that day before the Lord," Doeg, the dark-minded Edomite, the head of Saul's herdsmen, had been taking note of the fatal interview. David's eye fell upon him; the presentiment that he would tell Saul flashed at once upon his mind. A few months later, and that presentiment of danger was turned into a bitter pang of keenest self-reproach, when the solitary survivor of the eighty-five priests of Nob fled to him in the wilderness, and told him how his father the high priest and all his family, and "all the women, and children, and sucklings, and oxen, and asses, and sheep," had been smitten by Doeg's own hand with the edge of the sword. David frankly and mournfully acknowledged that he had occasioned the catastrophe. He did all afterwards that he could for Abiathar. But he could not recall the dead, nor repair the evil done. The falsehood, by means of which he had deceived the high priest, how did it look when seen in the light of that terrible catastrophe it had brought down upon Ahimelech and all his house?

From Nob David fled to Achish, King of Gath. There, amid the fiercest enemies of his country, he fancied he might be safe. They might not recognise him; or if they did, the very fact of his being so obnoxious to Saul might create a feeling in his favour. He found himself mistaken. The king might have received him, but his servants not only recognised him as the David that slew Goliath, but as the future king of Israel—the future most dangerous foe to the Philistine. Too glad would they be to seize the opportunity now given, and cut him off. The peril was extreme. It forced David to have recourse, if not to a spoken, yet to an acted, falsehood—beating with his fists upon the doors, jabbering incoherently, letting the spittle run down upon his beard, feigning, and feigning effectually, that madness which in Eastern lands is so sure a passport to sympathy and protection.

Gath no fitting place of refuge, he sought one in the Cave of Adullam. In the days of Joshua there was a town of that name lying in the low country, not far from Gath, of which no trace has yet been discovered. But in the neighbourhood there is a singular cave, which has recently been very thoroughly explored, and of which the reader will find a most interesting account, by Lieutenant Conder, in the Quarterly Statement for January, 1874, of the Palestine Exploration Fund. From the association of the name with the neighbourhood, it has been conjectured that this must have been the cave to which David fled, a conjecture sanctioned by some of our best recent authorities. But would he not, in his great terror of the Gittites, have fled to a place somewhat farther off, and which offered not simply a cavity in the rocks difficult of discovery and access, but a district around it offering varied facilities of concealment and protection for a fugitive? The cave, besides, which he occupied afforded shelter and an occasional home not to himself alone, but to a large band of followers. Could the cave described by Mr. Conder have done so? Perhaps in point of space it might, though even that is somewhat doubtful. But the principal objection to its being the cave of David and his band is what Mr. Conder himself tells us of its "entire unfitness for human habitation." Our eye turns naturally to the traditional Cave of Adullam as meeting all the requirements of the narrative. It lies southward from Bethlehem—farther away from Gibeah—within a two hours' easy journey from the village, and on the very border of the wilderness which became David's haunt for years thereafter. Dr. Thomson tells us of the fearful gorge below, of the gigantic cliffs above, of the narrow footpath winding along the shelf of rock, and of the long leap he had to take to get at the low entrance into this cave, which is situated in the very face of an almost perpendicular cliff. The writer vouches for the exact accuracy of the description, even to the difficulty of the leap and the narrowness of the entrance. But once within, the caves of Khureitun "are vast enough," as Dr. Tristram tells us, "to afford concealment in their miles of labyrinth for any number of men." The most careful exploration of what is in fact a great network of caverns was made by Tobler in 1845. The main gallery was followed to its termination, and many of the countless side passages surveyed. From the entrance to the end of one apartment measured more than a thousand feet.*

Here was room for as large a company as chose to gather round the semi-regal outlaw. And it was by a very motley group that he was in the first instance surrounded: "Every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented." Not a lawless set of fugitives from justice, the refuse and offscouring of the people, but a band composed mainly, perhaps, of those whose bitterness of spirit and discontentedness sprang from injustices and oppressions to which they had been exposed under the loose capricious rule of a king who was fast becoming bloodthirsty, before whose murderous jealousy David's own family now fled from Bethlehem, and who gave the order for the slaughter of so many of his subjects at Nob. "Even the debtors in such a time of misrule were in most cases better men than their creditors. Nearly everybody is in debt in these Oriental countries. . . I hardly ever knew an estate in this country that was not found encumbered when the death of the owner brought out the truth; and very generally the creditors are cold cunning usurers, hated and hateful." The mere fact that a man was in debt may not have carried with it any imputation of dishonesty. In times of misrule the opportunities given to extortion may have multiplied; and some of David's followers, though driven into exile by such extortion, may have been among the best of the land. Whatever their character, and whatever their object in coming to him, and putting themselves as they did under him as their captain, it was open to David from the first to decline their companionship. So far as his own personal safety was concerned, it had been better, perhaps, that he had done so. Alone, or with a very few trusty followers, it had been much easier and safer for him to have moved about from one hiding-place to another. But except for self-protection, David had no desire to secrete himself. He would rather meet than shun the public eye, having done nothing towards his prince or any one of which he was ashamed. And if others came to him who had their own burdens to bear, their own tales of injustice and oppression to tell, what though there were not a few of them whom he might not, in other circumstances, have chosen as his associates would it be generous in him to cast them off? They came proffering submission to his guidance and rule. His acceptance of the position so tendered enabled him in the depth of his own oppressed condition to become a protector of others. It brought him into close, familiar, continued contact with that very class of his own future subjects with whose wrongs, whose sufferings, whose crimes it was most important he should be acquainted. He got thus a clear insight into their condition. The hidden fountains of their complaints, or their misdeeds, were laid bare. The opportunity was given to David of trying his hand in the most difficult of all kinds of government—the government of those who have thrown off the restraints of law: no useless part this of that training which fitted him to fill the throne. Perhaps those who first chose him for their chief had their eye fixed alone or mainly upon his singular fitness to be their leader in any strife—his wisdom, his promptness, his courage, his strength. And these were not wanting in the hour of need, nor did they fail to clothe him with the power their possession and display always give to a victorious warrior chief. But when David's hand was laid upon the rough elements around him, there was another spell that it exerted over them—the spell of that example of singular kindliness, strong personal attachment, generous forbearance from revenge, chivalrous loyalty to his prince, strong trust in God, which, day by day, and throughout all his wanderings in the wilderness, he displayed.

* Ritter's Comparative Geography of Palestine, vol. iii. p. 98.

Among the first who came to David in the Cave of Adullam were "his brethren and all his father's house." The terror must have been an overpowering one which drove them from the ancestral home at Bethlehem. Such protection as his presence might give, David was ready enough to extend to his brethren if they were ready to share his exposures and dangers. But for such a life as his was now almost sure to be he felt that his aged parents were ill-prepared. One of his first cares, therefore, was to carry them away across the Jordan to the land of Jesse's grandmother, where memories of Ruth's story were still lingering. Presenting them to the King of Moab, he said, "Let my father and my mother, I pray thee, be with you, till I know what God will do for me." The king willingly undertook the trust. David left them in his hands, and we hear of them no more.

A singular obscurity hangs over David's mother. We do not know who or what she was. Her name is never mentioned. David, we know, had seven brothers, all older than himself; the eldest of whom, Eliab, is spoken of as Jesse's first-born (1 Chron. ii. 13). There were besides in the family Zeruiah and Abigail, who are said to be sisters of David (1 Chron. ii. 16), but never expressly called daughters of Jesse. One of them, Abigail, we are told, was the daughter of Nahash, as the other in all likelihood also was. But who was Nahash? Was this but another name for Jesse, as a Jewish tradition taught; or had David's mother, before her marriage with Jesse, had another husband, Nahash, to whom Zeruiah and Abigail were born? If, at Dr. Stanley's suggestion, we accept the latter alternative, which would put many years between David and his sisters, we can understand all the better how David seems to have associated with his nephews more familiarly than with his brothers, the nephews being more of his own age. Among these nephews particular mention is made of Abishai, as one of a distinguished three among the thirty captains who "went down to the rock to David into the Cave of Adullam" (1 Chron. ii. 15, 20). On returning from Moab David appears to have shifted his quarters from the cave dwelling to some position of strength in some rocky height outside the land of Judah. He was joined here by Gad, the prophet (an early friend, perhaps, and old companion in the schools of the prophets), whose word of warning and command was—"Abide not in the field; depart, and get thee into the land of Judah." From this time forward, for some years, there were so many shiftings of position that it becomes impossible to trace David's footsteps, or to note exactly the sequence of events. The district lying east and south of Bethlehem and Hebron, to which these wanderings were limited, was not a large one, David never seeming to have been farther than thirty miles or so from his native village. But though small in area, it presented a great variety of surface. There were some rich pasture lands in it, such as those lying round Maon and Carmel. There were forests, such as those of Hareth and Ziph, long since swept away. It abounded in rocky heights difficult of access. "We were now," says Dr. Robinson, "in the wilderness of En-gedi, where David and his men among the 'rocks of the wild goats,' and where the former cut off the skirts of Saul's robes in a cave. On all sides the country is full of caverns, which might then serve as lurking-places for David and his men, as they do for outlaws at the present day." A large part of it, particularly that running down to the south-western shore of the Dead Sea, was utterly desert, seamed from east to west by wild deep gorges, down which in times of tempest the mountain torrents rushed, and crowned by many tall bold isolated cliffs, such as that of Masada, then, as now, the haunts of the "wild goats." "I had wandered," a modern traveller tells us, "through the Alps, the Pyrenees, and many other mountains, I had seen countries blasted by the curse of the Almighty—the plains of Moab and the land of Ammon—but had seen nothing to compare with this. Here is desolation on the grandest scale. In this striking and solemn waste all around is enveloped in the silence of death. The regular step of our camels returned a dull sound, as if the earth were hollow beneath our feet. The monotonous chant of the camel driver accompanied at times the step of this inhabitant of the desert, but was suddenly stopped, as if he feared to awaken the silence. Everything combined to make the scenery awfully sublime." One striking peculiarity of this region is the acoustic property of the pure clear air. Dr. Tristram had noticed this on his first ascent of Masada. "As I sat astride a projecting rock on the north peak I could look down from my giddy height, and yet so clear was the atmosphere, and so extraordinary its power of conveying sounds, that I could carry on conversation with my friends in the camp below, and compare barometers and observations." On his second visit to this neighbourhood he had occasion still more accurately to test this power. "Hayne had remained behind when we started for the ascent of Masada. When at the top we saw him on his way to join us at the foot of the next cliff, about 500 yards from the base of the rock, and 1,250 feet below us, yet at this immense distance of over 600 yards we not only carried on a conversation with him, but as he proved on joining us he could hear several of our remarks to each other."

It may have been from a cliff of this very height that David "cried after Saul" on his leaving the cave. Nor can we wonder any longer that when David "stood on the top of a hill afar off, a great space being between them," that he could converse so easily as he did with Abner and the king.

THE BROTHERS.

AN INCIDENT OF AUTUMN, 1874.

THEY left the garden as the sun
Sank o'er the mist-wrapt town,
Two boys, and by the hedges dun
They sought a chalky down.

Two little boys, who hand in hand,
Prattled as on they went,
Found leaves, old nests, and yellow sand,
Until the day was spent.

The shadows deepened, and the breeze
Sighed somewhat sadly round;
The brothers 'neath some old oak-trees
Stood frightened by the sound.

"Oh, brother, turn we now!" cried one,
"Night hastens on; 'tis dark!
I want my mother—let us run—
Call loud! call louder! Hark!"

'Twas vain! no greeting met the ear,
No welcome cry of aid;
O'er the wide down, with many a tear,
Far from the path they strayed.

Unselfish then, and with some pride,
As in their mother's stead,
The elder stripped himself, and tried
To heap his brother's bed.

And where a dimple marked the sod
Bade him lie down, while he Beside him slept, secure that God
A Father kind would be.

Thus folded slept they, angel wings
Hov'ring around the pair,
While the hard north its snow-drift flings
To fleck their golden hair.

When brightened morn they found one kept—
Just kept—the vital breath;
His elder brother, he too slept—
The peaceful sleep of death.

M. G. WATKINS.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

MRS. GRANTON was looking haggard and spiritless, and in answer to Eda's affectionate inquiries she admitted that she had come to town to consult a physician. Her mother had died young with some internal disease, and Sophie of late had had some reason to think that she inherited the complaint. Dr. —— poohpoohed her fears, but he had not succeeded in dissipating them.

She did not mention her husband until Eda had twice asked whether he had driven her from Sydenham. When the question was repeated, a red spot began to burn in her sallow cheek, her eyes flashed and darkened, and she restlessly locked and interlocked the long thin fingers of the hands that lay upon her knee.

"No, Mark did not bring me to town," she said. "I suppose he is well, but I have not seen him for these three days; and I don't expect that he will come near me till he wants some more money."

"Dear Sophie, you cannot mean this!" exclaimed her grieved hearer.

"Why not? You know as well as I do that it was only for that he married me," Mrs. Granton retorted, in the same cold hard tones.

"He has vexed you, and so you are inclined to think the worst of him," Eda said, gently. "But do not estrange him by such a taunt as this! Love begets love, and if you will but bear with his faults patiently you will have your reward."

Mrs. Granton's mouth quivered for a moment, and then her lips were compressed as rigidly as before. "You are very kind to say this, and to try to set us at one again. And, mind, I do not pretend to assert that I have not been to blame for many things that I have said and done; but the result would have been the same—it must have been the same. He married me for my money, and he hates me because I will not let him have it to squander."

"Do not let us speak of it," urged Eda, to whom this was all so unspeakably painful that she shivered as if with cold. "You are faint and tired with your journey; let me go and ask Mrs. de Courcy for some wine for you."

But Sophie wrapped her arms round her, and would not let her go. "I shall never be better; I do not wish to be! I am heart-stricken, and longing to die. Ah, Eda, I did love and trust him so fully!"

"Love him still! if he is in error, bear with him, and presently he will see his folly, and be grateful to you for your goodness."

"He might be if he were like you; but he is absorbed in himself. What room has he in his cold soul for kindly thoughts of the wife he has made so wretched?"

"You are speaking of my brother," Eda reminded her.

"Yes; and if he were here he would tell you, as he told me before he left Sydenham, that mine are the ravings of a madwoman. He called me mercenary, too, and covetous, although he knew that nothing delighted me more than laying the best of all I had at his feet, until I found him out!"

Eda tried to turn the current of Mrs. Granton's thoughts, to interest her in her own concerns—and told how patient in her illness the hitherto ungovernable Violet had shown herself. But though Sophie murmured a languid response, it was evident that she was not listening, for her mind was so concentrated on her domestic troubles that she could neither speak nor think of aught else.

"Three days!" she exclaimed—"three whole days he has been away, and not even sent me a line to account for his absence. Is not this a sufficient proof that he cares nothing about me?"

"You parted in anger," Eda reminded her. "Have you written to him apologising for any unkind speeches you may have made?"

Sophie's colour rose again. "How could I? The last time I threw myself into his arms, and entreated his forgiveness, he put me aside, and told me I bored him with my demonstrations. Does he wish that I were dead and out of his way? Yes, yes, I am sure he does!"

"Hush!" said Eda, firmly; "nothing can justify you in saying such dreadful things as these; you are husband and wife, bound to each other as long as ye both shall live. Why embitter your union with such harsh judgments?"

"Is it only I who am hard and unjust?" asked Sophie, irritably. "However, I will try to be more patient, more gentle," she went on, with a heavy sigh. "But what can I do while he avoids me? I do not know whether to call upon him at the offices of his new company, or to go home and wait till he relents and joins me there."

"Call at the offices by all means, and take him home with you," cried Eda, brightly; "give him a nice little dinner, sing him his favourite songs, and strive not only to make him happy, but to be happy and hopeful yourself."

Mrs. Granton shook her head dubiously, but she promised to be guided by the advice, and appeared soothed, if not inspirited by Eda's affectionate

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"Clinging to Eda, hid her face on the young girl's shoulder."—p. 299.

speeches. She called her sister-in-law the dearest and fondest of all good counsellors, and seemed quite reluctant to leave her; yet when Eda made an allusion to Mark's proposal to her to take up her abode at Sydenham she positively negatived it.

"No, child; it would not be fair to let you come to us now. You could not take part with both; neither is it in your disposition to play the neutral. Besides, Mark and I often say things to each other that it would distress you to be obliged to hear."

"But if I could be of any use to you, dear Sophie, I would come as soon as my little pupils are well enough to be left."

"And make yourself miserable over troubles for which not even your kindly spirit could devise a cure? No, dear, you shall not be called upon for so great a sacrifice. You are Mark's sister, as you bade me remember a little while ago; do you keep your trust in him, if I cannot. I will not have you made more unhappy by our ill-judged marriage than I can help. Your sympathy has been very sweet to me, and I shall never forget how generously it has been proffered."

With these words she kissed Eda, and went away to wait in a cab near the City offices where Mark was generally to be found, until he appeared, and then prevail upon him to return home with her. He consented to do so; and had she been a discreet or forbearing woman the cloud might have passed over; but unfortunately for their domestic felicity she was neither. Mark's cold responses to her caresses fanned her smouldering resentment into flame, and they had not been together for more than a couple of hours when some fancied slight induced her to break into the angry reproaches that always disgusted and drove him away. When the outer door slammed after him, Eda's more prudent counsels were remembered, and Mrs. Granton spent the greater part of the night in hysterically bewailing the violence of temper that was still further estranging her unloving husband.

Eda had paused to wipe away a few tears, after her visitor's departure, before returning to her little charges—who were incensing the ill-tempered Manon by fretting for their more gentle governess—but as she was proceeding up the stairs, two of the female servants started from the drawing-room door, at which they appeared to have been listening, and came towards her with looks of concern and alarm. Mr. de Courcy was in a fearful passion, they whispered, and, as far as they could judge, was threatening his lady with personal ill-usage.

The tale was so extraordinary that Eda heard it with incredulity. Mr. de Courcy, on the whole, was as good-humoured as careless indolent men usually are. He was liable to sharp though transient fits of anger when a dinner was badly served or an order neglected, but he had never been in the habit of quarrelling with his wife.

Seeing Eda's disbelief, the frightened women bade her listen for herself; and it was certainly true that, mingling with the loud passionate tones of the gentleman could be heard Mrs. de Courcy moaning and sobbing, as if in terror. What could have happened to ruffle the current of the lives that seemed to glide on so smoothly?

"Has Miss Granton courage to enter the room and interfere in our lady's behalf?" one of the servants now asked; and while Eda was hesitating how to answer, the door was thrown open, and Mrs. de Courcy came out, her features distorted, her eyes quite inflamed with weeping. Without noticing any one, she passed quickly on, and locked herself in her chamber.

No one but her maid saw her again until the evening, when she came into the nursery where Eda sat watching over Violet, who had suffered a slight relapse, and was too restless, in consequence, to enjoy the sweet sleep of convalescence in which the healthier Rose was wrapped. Mrs. de Courcy's countenance still bore traces of the morning's agitation, although a little rouge had been carefully laid on to hide the pallor of her cheeks. Much to Eda's surprise she was in full evening dress; and, by her cloak, bouquet, &c., it was evident that she intended going out.

She went to the crib in which lay the sleeping Rose, laid one of her flowers beside the child's chubby face, laughing affectedly at her own conceit; then came and stood at the foot of Violet's bed, holding her perfumed handkerchief to her nose, as if haunted with some dread of infection, Violet watching her the while with childish pleasure in her sheeny skirts and glittering ornaments.

"And so you cannot sleep, pauvre petite!" Mrs. de Courcy said. "I am afraid you give Miss Granton a great deal of trouble."

"She does not mind it," said the little girl, slipping an arm round Eda's neck. "She is always good to me, isn't she?"

"Yes," said her mamma, more graciously than gratefully; "Miss Granton is excessively good, and we are all very much obliged to her."

"Miss Granton recollects having the scarlatina," Violet went on, eagerly; "and her own dear mother was alive then, and used to sit by her at night—sometimes all night—only think! Mamma, you never come and sit by me. Why don't you?"

Mrs. de Courcy began to make a jesting reply about being too inexperienced to play the nurse, but broke down in the middle of it, and coming nearer to the bed, kissed her little daughter with unwonted affection. "I am afraid mamma isn't half as good to you, my darling, as she ought to be! But never mind, you have Miss Granton, who makes up to you for all my shortcomings."

She was hurrying away, as if ashamed of the emotions she was evincing, but Violet caught hold of her hand, and drew her back. "Kiss me again, mamma! I like you best when you talk like that. Will you hear me say 'Our Father' before you leave me? I think I could go to sleep then."

Mrs. de Courcy faltered something about Miss Granton and her own haste to be gone; but Eda chose to be too busy at the other end of the room to hear her, and as Violet was pertinaciously bent on having her wish gratified, she gave way. It was a strange contrast—the child in her simple night-dress, with her soft curls falling loosely on her shoulders, and her face so perfectly colourless that by the shaded light of the lamp it looked like marble, kneeling on the bed with her hands clasped in those of the fashionable dressy mother; but at last the simple petition had been murmured, Violet nestled down on her pillow, and Mrs. de Courcy looked relieved. She was her old frivolous self when she paused beside Eda to say good-night.

"Will you button my glove for me, Miss Granton? Thanks! I am positively too nervous to do anything for myself;" and she gave a little shudder. "Such a frightful scene with Mr. de Courcy this morning—ah! I know I can confide in you!—such a frightful scene that it horrifies me to recall it. I suppose the servants heard all, and told you what he said?"

"I am not in the habit of listening to anything the servants say," Eda rather stiffly replied.

"Oh, but they will chatter! I am sure Manon knows everything. I don't know why I keep her, for she is both troublesome and insolent. Mr. de Courcy has lost some money—I am sure I don't know how—or some one has been worrying him for money, that is it, I believe; and he declared this morning that we are ruined—absolutely ruined! He was so violent," she added, smelling at a vinaigrette fastened to her chatelaine, "that I was immensely terrified—at first. But men always exaggerate, don't they? It can only be a temporary derangement of our affairs, can it?"

She looked eagerly for a confirmation of this opinion; but those unpaid and long-standing bills were in Eda's thoughts, and she could not give it. No fortune, however handsome, could support for any lengthened time extravagance so reckless as that in which both husband and wife had been indulging. Finding, however, that she was expected to say something, she asked what Mr. de Courcy proposed doing.

"I am sure I cannot tell. He said such dreadful things, and raved so wildly, that at last I told him he was a monster, and left him. Things must come right," Mrs. de Courcy added, confidently—"they always do; and then I shall make him have my rubies reset, for they are so hideously old-fashioned I hate to wear them. Where is he?"

"Who, madam? Mr. de Courcy? I heard Manon say that he has been in the study, writing, or looking over papers, ever since the morning."

Mrs. de Courcy stood for a moment flirting her fan, and meditating. She was still trying to disbelieve the startling facts her dismayed spouse had told her. It could not be true! she kept telling herself—it could not be true that she, who had been wont to indulge herself in every caprice, was reduced to poverty. Her husband was cruel to say so. Perhaps people were pressing for their money: but what then? She had heard of noble lords owing immense sums for years, and yet keeping up their establishments, and behaving as if they were solvent. Or if the worst came, some of their relatives must step forward and help them.

She started from her reveries to fold her opera-cloak around her, and say, with an effort at a smile, "Eh bien, it is no use staying at home, and giving myself the blues. By-bye, Violet, my darling; and if papa should ask for me you can tell him that I had an engagement I was obliged to fulfil. Will you give me your arm to the bottom of the stairs, Miss Granton? I feel so weak this evening."

Eda accompanied her to the hall, but ere they could cross it Mr. de Courcy opened the study door. Unshaven, his hair and dress in disorder, his eyes bloodshot, his lip bleeding where, in his agony of mind, he had fiercely gnawed it, he stood glaring at his elegantly-attired wife, who suddenly lost her presence of mind, and clinging to Eda, hid her face on the young girl's shoulder.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Perhaps Mr. de Courcy, like many more of his kind, found solace in the midst of his troubles in heaping reproaches on the spouse who, after all, was not more guilty than himself. Both had been as selfishly bent on what they called enjoying life as if they had adopted the motto of the Assyrian king—"Let us eat, drink, and be merry to-day, for to-morrow we die." Of that morrow they rarely troubled themselves to think; they considered that they made sufficient preparations for it by attending a place of worship when the weather was neither too hot nor too cold, and subscribing to a few of the principal metropolitan charities. And so the hour of real distress found them utterly unprepared to encounter it.

"Are you going out for the evening, madam?" Mr. de Courcy tauntingly inquired. "May I ask if you intend to walk? Our carriages and horses—thanks to your extravagance—have been seized by a jobmaster with whom you have run me into debt in a most reckless and uncalled-for manner!"

Mrs. de Courcy disclaimed this faintly, and with increasing bitterness he went on—"Do you propose drawing down more disgrace upon me by exhibiting yourself in public now my ruin is in every one's mouth? Have you no shame, no good feeling? Do you forget that it is through your carelessness of my interests that I find myself in such a position?"

The virulence with which he spoke stung his wife into retorting, and she boldly declared her disbelief in his statements. Provoked by her incredulity, he seized her by the wrist, and compelled her to accompany him into the study, where he had been engaged in separating, from the great heap of bills that had been sent in as soon as the news of his losses on the turf got wind, all that came from the tradesmen she had so extensively patronised. Whether her millinery had cost more than his own personal expenses was a question he did not choose to consider.

Not sorry to be released from her passive share in this scene, Eda went sorrowfully back to the chamber where Violet had fallen into a doze at last. She tenderly covered the arms that had been tossed above the bedclothes, and speculated with increasing sadness over the changing fortunes of these petted children. What would become of them now the wealth of their parents had melted away?

Presently Violet stirred, and remembering that it was near the hour at which her medicine was to be administered, Eda had fetched the bottle, and was carefully measuring it, when Mrs. de Courcy ran past the open door in the direction of her dressing-room.

One glimpse of her face as she went by, and, chilled with vague apprehensions, Eda hurried after her. Short though that glimpse was, it had shown a change so great, so alarming, in the ordinarily bland and smiling lady, that Eda's heart failed her when she heard a key click in the lock, and knew that the miserable woman had locked herself in. What was she about to do? Had the taunts of her husband, or the conviction that the direst poverty lay before her, turned her brain, and in her frenzy was she thinking to end all earthly misery by a wild plunge into the hereafter?

Eda was flying down-stairs in search of help, when she recollected that through Mrs. de Courcy's sleeping-apartment there was another way into the dressing-room. She ran thither; fortunately, that door was unfastened, and pushing it open, she found her worst fears realised. The wretched woman had been searching for a phial of laudanum purchased some time since to ease a distressing toothache, and had just found it.

Eda seized the hand with which she was raising it to her lips, and tried to wrest it away, but in vain. Never very strong-minded, Mrs. de Courcy had now lost all self-control, and did not seem to hear her expostulations. "I am too miserable to live! let me die! let me die!" she kept exclaiming, at the same time making frantic struggles to free herself. Eda, however, contrived to draw her by slow degrees across the corridor, and into the chamber of her sleeping children.

With clenched teeth and fixed eyes, Mrs. de Courcy strove with all her force to disengage herself, but the violence of her passion soon exhausted her, and when her gaze did fall upon the little sleepers, she commenced moaning pitifully, and at last dropped on her knees, and hid her face in the bedclothes.

And now the phial was extracted from her relaxing fingers, and the danger was over. In her relief Eda breathed such a fervent ejaculation of thanksgiving, and such an earnest prayer that God would pity and pardon the fearful attempt, that Mrs. de Courcy began to comprehend whither her madness had led her, and to shrink with horror from the gulf into which she had been rushing headlong.

"What was I about to do?" she gasped. "To die? Alas, I am not fit! Oh, Miss Granton, what a wretch I am! Pray for me again, for I dare not pray for myself!"

"Look!" she exclaimed, still more wildly, as Eda endeavoured to soothe her. "Look! Poor little Violet is waking! She will see me—she will guess what I have been doing. Take me away! Pray take me away! Don't let my own child know how weak and wicked I am!"

Assisting her to rise, Eda led her back to her own chamber, where, with the tenderest compassion, she waited on her till the tears that were raining down her face began to flow less hysterically. Then she persuaded her to be undressed, and the now faint and penitent woman permitted herself to be assisted to bed, and her aching head bathed with cold water until the pain that racked it was less intolerable.

As she was passing through the dressing-room to return to the nursery, Mr. de Courcy came quickly in, but started back on seeing her, and asked, "Who is ill?" (To be continued).

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 17. Paul and Silas at Philippi.

Chapter to be read—Acts xvi. 16—34.

INTRODUCTION. This lesson will give an opportunity for vivid picturing out of the various scenes, and also for earnest personal application to the children.

I. A Spirit Rebuked. (Read 16—18). Remind the children of Paul and Silas going to Philippi. What called them to Europe? At whose house did they stay? Where had they met Lydia? Would they leave off prayer because received an answer? So continue daily going to pray at the river-side. Whom do they meet? Remind how soothsayers are found in all countries; how Saul consulted the witch at Endor, though no witches allowed to live (1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 9); children will often have seen gipsies pretending to tell fortunes. Which commandment do they break? For who is alone the Wonderful Counsellor? (Is. ix. 6). Tell children that at the time Christ was on earth evil spirits seemed to be allowed to enter into people in a peculiar manner, and remind how often Christ cast out evil spirit, and how the devils recognised Him as their master (Matt. viii. 29). So now with St. Paul. Picture the apostles day by day going to prayer-meeting; the girl and her masters coming away from the place of prayer; the crowd following the girl; the spirit in the girl recognising the servants of Christ; her pointing to the apostles; her cry day after day. At last, St. Paul in indignation turning back, commanding the evil spirit to come forth. In whose name did he speak, and with what effect? As Christ his master before had rebuked them (Mark i. 25.)

Practical Lesson. What evil spirits with us still? Spirit of sullenness, murmuring, discontent, evil temper, indolence, &c. Always have their backs turned to prayer. Must be met with prayer and determination; in whose name and strength? As Satan departed from Christ (Matt. iv. 10), so will these from us.

II. The Apostles beaten. (Read 19—24). Who would be vexed at the spirit having left the girl? No longer able to bring money to her masters. What did they do? Cannot make the healing of the girl an offence, therefore will bring a charge of disaffection against the apostles. Picture the men taking hold of the apostles, violently dragging them to the magistrates' court, the crowd surrounding and following, the charge made (ver. 21), the multitude excited, apostles not allowed to speak; the magistrates, without hearing the defence, ordering them to be scourged, and then imprisoned. What an end to their work at Philippi! one family alone converted, and the whole town excited against them as traitors! Let children see how like this was to the Jews' treatment of Christ. Could not bring charge against Him for His miracles, so accused Him before Pilate of treason, by whom was scourged and imprisoned.

Practical Lesson. The benefit of a clear conscience. If we were to be accused by our enemies, what could they find against us? Would it be true of us as of Daniel (Dan. vi. 4), that there would be no occasion of fault, except of undue devotion to God?

III. The Apostles in Prison. (Read 25—34). Describe the scene in prison; apostles bleeding from wounds, thrust into inner prison: prisons gloomy enough now, far worse then—thick stone walls, damp streaming down, strong bolts and bars, feet in stocks; describe painful attitude of feet at right angles to body, in cramped position. Enough to daunt the stoutest heart, and produce gloomy and desponding thought. Christ had warned of tribulation in world (John xvi. 33), but bidden to be of good cheer. How was it possible now? But what are the apostles doing? praying—as the Church did when Peter was in prison, for deliverance, if it be God's will; but also, is it possible, singing praises! What can they find to praise for? Perhaps for life still spared. Might have been killed, like Stephen, but surely for presence of Christ in prison, to cheer, support, and comfort. Nothing can really harm as long as trust Him. Now hymn suddenly stopped. What is this rumbling noise? Describe loud creaking of the doors, bars, windows, floor rocking, whole prison shakes, chains break, fall off prisoners; all darkness, confusion, dismay. Picture the gaoler suddenly aroused; the prison doors all open. Where are the prisoners? What shall he do? his first thought of suicide; his relief at hearing Paul's voice. Now comes in trembling. Actually entreats his prisoners. What does he say? Perhaps only thinking of having offended their God unknown to him, who has sent the earthquake; perhaps had heard them preach in the town, and now convinced of the reality of their message. Anyway, Paul fastens on his question, and tells him of Christ. Now picture the scene in the gaoler's house. The family aroused; lights carried about; assembled in the sitting-room; the prisoners brought in; preaching to the whole family; the eager listening. What outward evidence of belief required? (Mark xvi. 16.) So there is a midnight baptism of the whole family. How else does faith show itself? So gaoler now treats his prisoners as guests, and there is joy in the household, as well as in the presence of God. (Luke xv. 10).

Practical Lesson. Joy in believing. Have been speaking of young converts and old converts. Both full of joy: the gaoler at having heard of pardon and salvation, the good news of the Gospel; the apostles at the presence of Christ, and joy of Holy Ghost in heart. (Gal. v. 22). Press this home to children. Have heard of Christ all their lives; do they really believe, i.e., look to Him alone for pardon and peace? If so, have they the other joy, which gives comfort and even happiness in sorrow, persecution, prospect of death? Must first have desire for salvation, like the gaoler, then all rest follows as Christ's gift.

Questions to be answered.

1. Give instances of spirits being cast out.
2. In what way are evil spirits still with us, and how are they to be subdued?
3. Show how the apostles at Philippi were treated similarly to Christ.
4. What had Christ said about tribulation, and how was it fulfilled?
5. Describe the scene after the earthquake.
6. What lessons may we learn?

THE FIRST FALSE STEP.

CHAPTER II.

VERY sad felt little Amy Bartlett as she walked home, and nurse could not succeed in getting a word from her as to the boy with whom she had been found in conversation, though she was herself very curious to know what they had been talking about. All through dinner Amy could not keep her thoughts from dwelling upon what had passed; and the more she thought of it all, the more anxious she became to know the boy's whole history; he had spoken so nicely, and seemed such a respectable boy, that she could not understand how he had come to do such a dreadful thing, and she felt sure he had some explanation to give her. But then Amy knew, as she had herself said, that there could be no excuse for stealing; did she not know that to break the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal" was a wicked sin, for which people were sometimes taken up, and sent to prison? She supposed he ought to be in prison too, but then she remembered his saying that he was only trying to steal, and had been prevented just in time. Amy recollected, too, as she ate her nice currant-tart at dinner, those dreadful things he had been saying about starvation, just as nurse had come up to them, and she wondered whether he was still hungry. She had once been out with her papa and brothers on the hills, when they had lost their way, and been two hours late for dinner, on which occasion Amy had been quite famished, so she thought she knew quite well what starvation meant.

This afternoon Amy waited until she saw him go into his room, then she ran in after him, and before he had time to settle himself to his writing, his little daughter stood beside him.

"Papa, are you very very busy to-day, or may I talk to you, just for a few minutes, before you begin to write?"

"Well, I suppose my letters must wait a little," Mr. Bartlett said, lifting Amy to her favourite post on his knee, "and my little Pussie must tell me what made her look so grave all through dinner, and now too. I hope Tiny has not lost her collar."

"Oh no, papa; it is quite a serious matter this time. It is a very dreadful thing indeed——"

"That you have been doing, Amy?" interrupted her father.

"No, that he has been doing, I mean that nice-looking boy. But of course you don't know what I mean, papa, and I must tell you. Three days ago, when we were all playing on the shore, I noticed a boy lying under the shade of the rocks, looking very pale, and with his arm in a sling, and I felt so sorry for him being there while we were all enjoying ourselves! I walked up to him once or twice, and thought I should like to speak to him, but he did not look at me, and I did not know quite how to begin."

"I thought, Amy, mamma had told you she did not wish you to speak to any strange children you might meet on the sands."

"Oh but you know, papa, that was because she was afraid of our catching measles, or something, but this boy was only ill from an accident. Besides, he is a very poor boy, not a gentleman's child at all."

"And do you think, then, that poor boys never have measles, or 'something'?" asked Mr. Bartlett, much amused.

"Yes, I suppose they do," said Amy, "but, indeed, papa, he looked so sad, I could not help speaking to him, and you know I could not catch a broken arm from him, could I?"

"No, I think you were quite safe as far as that was concerned; but what did this boy tell you was the cause of his broken arm, Amy?"

"Well, papa, that was the dreadful part of it. After I had talked to him a little, I asked him how he had hurt himself, and do you know he told me that—" and here Amy hesitated and blushed, as if she were about to tell of some fault of her own—"that he had fallen down off a balcony whilst he was trying to steal. Was not that a shocking thing for such a nice boy to have done? Nurse came just at that minute, and made me come away, but I did so want to stay and hear his story. He seemed so much ashamed of himself. I may go and talk to him again, papa, may I not? and, oh, I wish you would come with me."

Mr. Bartlett had listened very attentively to his little daughter, and had started, and looked quite pleased when she told him of the lad's confession, which was rather odd of him Amy thought, as she had expected him to be very much shocked.

"So Ned really told you of his own accord what he had been doing," said Mr. Bartlett, "that is just like the brave lad I took him for."

"Ned! do you know him, papa?" asked Amy, in great surprise.

"Yes, my child; I think I can tell you a good deal more about him than you are likely to learn from himself, if you really want to know his history."

"Oh yes, that I do; please tell it me, dear papa!—if you are not too busy," added this thoughtful little maiden. "It will not take me long," said her father, pulling out his watch, "and then you must run away and leave me to write my letters. You must know then, Amy, that Ned Roberts lives in one of those narrow little streets not very far from our own home; his father is dead, his mother has seven children to support, Ned being the eldest. They got on very well till last winter, when two of the children were very ill for a long time, and Mrs. Roberts had to give up her own work to stay at home and nurse them. When they got well again she had the doctor's bill to pay, and found herself in great difficulties, which my little Amy would not understand, as she does not know what it is to want money, and even food. Well, things went on getting worse and worse, till after a time they were nearly starving, though they would not tell any one, or ask for help, as they had once been in a much better position. Ned came to me as office boy about three months ago, and a very quick bright lad I found him; I had every reason too to believe him honest, and I was very much pleased with him."

"But, papa, surely he did not steal from you," here interrupted Amy.

"You shall hear presently, dear, if you listen to me. I sometimes fancied Ned looked hungry and sad, so I tried to get him to tell me about his mother and younger brothers, but he never seemed to like talking of them. He was doing his work very well, and I was so much pleased with him for his extreme quickness and attention, that I was just going to raise his wages, when this sad affair happened."

Amy's attention here increased, and she fixed her eyes on her papa's face as he continued.

"Do you remember my being ill, and staying at home for a few days before we came here?"

Amy nodded her head, too much excited to speak.

"The last day before I went back to the office, Ned was sent up to me with some letters; I was sitting in the library, with the window open, I told the servant to send him up to speak to me, and he looked so pale and ill that I asked him if anything was wrong, but he said no. About two hours after Ned had gone, as it was getting dark, I had to go again into the library for something, and as I hastily opened the door, to my surprise I saw the figure of a boy escaping through the open window. I rushed after him, but was too late to catch him, as he had climbed like a cat over the railing of the balcony; in doing so, however, his foot slipped, and he fell on to the grass beneath. In the glimpse I caught of him, I fancied he looked like Ned, so instead of calling the servants, I quickly ran round to the hall-door, and was just in time to catch him, as, half stunned, he was rising from the ground. He did not try to run away, but burst into tears, and prayed me to forgive him, confessing at once that he had come there intending to rob me. And then the whole story came out, how he and his mother, with the younger children, were almost starving, how he had gone without food himself day after day, in order to take all he could home to the others, and had often fainted at night in consequence. That his little sister was ill again, and they could not afford to get a doctor for her, and that when he stood in my room that day he had suddenly felt tempted to do that which it shamed him now to tell me of."

"And his broken arm, papa?" asked Amy, whose ready tears were now flowing.

"All this time he never said a word about his arm, though the pain must have been great. After hearing his tale, and talking to him of the sin of which he had been guilty, I went home with him to see if his story were really true, and it was not till we got there that Ned fainted away, and I found that a small bone in his arm was broken."

"Was it all true, papa?"

"Yes, my child, and much more than Ned had told me," said Mr. Bartlett, gravely, "but I will not pain you by telling you all I saw and heard that day. You may be sure I did my best to help and relieve them, and that I never let Mrs. Roberts hear of the crime into which hunger and trouble had driven the son of whom she was so proud. I sent the next boy off for a doctor, and whilst we waited for him, the poor mother told me that but for Ned she hardly knew what would have become of them all, and that a better son never lived. As soon as I could get to speak to him alone for a moment, I made him promise me that he would not say a word to his mother of what had happened, for I saw he was feeling so keenly the shame and disgrace, that he would be certain to tell her everything as soon as I had left, and I would not have that poor woman's faith in her son shaken."

"But, papa," said Amy, with a very puzzled look, "you have always taught us that it was such a wicked thing to steal, and yet you helped Ned directly afterwards without punishing him a bit."

"My little girl, do you not think such a boy as that has been well punished by all he has gone through since he tried to steal from me that day? Before then he knew himself to be a truthful, honest, straightforward boy, whom his master trusted, and who did not even know the feeling of shame which has never left him since. You are too young, Amy, to understand what it means by losing your own self-respect, but when you do, you will know how much Ned Roberts has suffered. Besides this, he has been very ill, and his arm has given him great pain; he has also lost his place in my office, and been unable to do anything to help his mother."

"But she is not starving, papa?" Amy asked, eagerly.

"Mr. Bartlett smiled, "No, Amy, you do not think I could leave her in such a condition. She has been well cared for, and so have the other children. Ned is staying here with a sister of his mother's, who is very glad to take him for the sum I pay her weekly, and I hope he will soon——"

"Then you are the kind gentleman he spoke of, papa," interrupted Amy, and she told her father what Ned had said. He seemed pleased to hear this, and promised to take Amy the next day to speak to Ned, who was so much better since first he came to the sea, that Mr. Bartlett hoped he would soon be quite strong again. Amy then told her papa what Ned had said to her as to his great wish to become a sailor, and Mr. Bartlett said he would speak to him on the subject, and see whether he had really set his heart upon it, or whether it was only a boyish fancy, from seeing the beautiful ships pass whilst he lay on the beach.

Nearly two years after this time, as Mr. Bartlett was leaving his office one evening, he was stopped by a tall, brown, healthy-looking sailor lad, who respectfully touched his hat, and asked if he might be allowed to call and speak to Mr. Bartlett for a few minutes. He was so changed, and so much improved, that his old master did not know him in the least until he smiled, but then there was no mistaking him, and the exclamation, "Why, Ned my lad, I am glad to see you back again!" sounded very pleasant in Ned Roberts' ears.

He found his way up to Mr. Bartlett's house that same evening, and gave a long account of his voyages and adventures, to which Amy too listened with great attention, sitting by her father's side, and fixing her bright eyes on the young sailor, as he modestly told the story of his life since he had left England. He liked being at sea very much, he said, though it was a long time to be away from mother, but it was a great happiness to find her so well, and comfortable, and next time he hoped to take a shorter voyage. Just as he was leaving the room, he shyly drew a little packet from his pocket, and asked leave to present it to Miss Amy, saying he had brought it for her from the West Indies, and hoped she would accept it. Amy opened it, and found a beautiful many-coloured shell, with lines like mother-of-pearl, with which she was greatly delighted.

Ned did not leave the house without thanking his kind friend Mr. Bartlett for all that he had done for him since that day, when, tempted by hunger and poverty, he had forgotten his duty towards God and man, and taken that first step in the path of sin which leads on from evil to evil.

"I always thank God, sir," he said, "that you found me that day just in time to save me, for where should I have been now if I had taken your goods, and had not been found out. The chances are I should have tried again and been caught, and have broken poor mother's heart. Oh, sir, I wish that every poor lad had such a friend as you, just to save him when he first begins to do wrong!"

"Indeed, I wish so too, Ned, for it is always hard to turn back when the first false step has been taken. But you will find a better friend than I can be, my lad, if you take all your troubles to God; He will never forsake you, and has brought you safely through all the perils of the sea, and will be with you to the end if you trust in Him, as I believe you do."

Ned Roberts became in time mate, and finally captain of a ship. He was a favourite with all the sailors under him, and an example to them by his steadiness and honest conduct; but it was noticed that he always took the greatest interest in the young boys who joined the ship; and many a mother has had cause to bless him for the care which has saved her son from the first false step.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

113. What was the name of the wife of Moses? and how many sisters had she?

114. What king visited a dying prophet's bed, and wept over him?

115. Do we possess any sayings of our Lord's not mentioned in either of the Four Gospels?

116. What was the name of Isaiah's son?

117. Upon what occasion did our Lord check the undue curiosity of one of His apostles?

118. What funeral was suddenly interrupted by an armed band, and with what result?

119. What king's body was fastened on the wall of Beth-shan?

120. Who is compared to one that taketh a dog by the ears?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 272.

99. "And Abraham planted a grove [a tree] in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God" (Gen. xxi. 33).

100. Of lentiles (Gen. xxv. 34).

101. Prov. xxv. 19.

102. "Behold I (St. Stephen) see the heavens opened and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God" (Acts vii. 56).

103. Seven ewe lambs (Genesis xxi. 30).

104. Elijah (1 Kings xix. 3).

(Drawn by F. S. WALKER.)

SPRING-TIME.

ONLY a little while, my darling,
Only a little while,
And the sky will clear and the woodlark sing,
And the fields in their freshness smile;
The dove will coo to his wondering mate,
The young lambs frolic and play,
And the winds now rough, will but sigh, love,
Their musical notes to the day;
Kissing the lilac, and 'mong the locks
Of the lady laburnum-tree,
Will hide-and-seek play with her yellow hair,
And you will be there to see.

Only a little while, my darling,
  Your own pet swallows will come
Back to the eaves of the summer-house,
  Back to their English home.
The martins will sit and twitter to you,
  When their nursery duties are done,
Of the three yellow beaks that have closed at last,
  At a hint from the setting sun.
The scent of the cowslips will mellow the air,
  And yellow-cups pant for the dew,
The bluebell and violet creep through the fern
  All stealing a glance at you!

All in a little while, my darling
  Mother! I know it well;
The lark and the dove will gladden their mate,
  The bluebells ring in the dell.
But I—well, the song I shall hear, mother,
  Will be sung very far away;
And the song be sweeter than dove's or lark,
  Let them sing how sweetly they may.

The yellow-cups there will be made of gold,
  That the children of Jesus twine
Into wreaths, to circle His fair calm brow
  Mixed with silver eglantine.
And the Saviour thinks of the old-world time,
  Till His pitying eyes grow dim,
For dew-laden flowers and moss-tipp'd buds
  Are the crowns now twined for Him.

All in a little while, mother,
  And spring will be coming to me;
Light in the east, and light in the west,
  And a great light over the sea.
The notes of all the birds in the world
  Will swell in one grand weird song,
The triumph of light over weariful night,
  The triumph of right over wrong.
A few more aches, and a few more pains,
  And the buds will burst from the tree.
All in a little while, mother,
  Your spring will bring summer to me!

J. R.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER III.—UP AT HAMPSTEAD.

THE house was very badly furnished, and, as a rule, it was always untidy; and yet there was an attractiveness about the poverty-struck rooms, and even about the very untidiness. And as for the garden! every one who knew them loved that rambling old garden, with the long reedy grass waving and nodding to the wind, and the one cultivated spot, the middle bed, which looked blooming whenever it was possible that flowers could make it look so; and the summer-house, with the dusty painted table in the middle, on which all lost books in the house were generally discovered, especially novels, for they were an indolent, ease-loving, novel-reading set. And there was the sycamore-tree—which was Dolly's favourite retreat—with the rickety seat beneath it, on which you had to sit down very carefully, and right in the middle, lest it should tip up at one end, and place you in a position more ludicrous than graceful. There was a tumble-down pigeon-house in one corner of the garden, too, which had always been a target for balls and stones; and as for weeds, and underwood, and overgrowth, and briars, and tall poppies, and fluffy dandelions, they were in all the corners. There was a fence round the garden, and from the bottom a view of the dear old church, and the green trees, and a country which has not even yet left Hampstead. The Woodwards had always lived there, for the locality is one that has long been popular with artist and literary folk, and to the latter class Mr. Woodward belonged. He was a clever man, but it had been his misfortune perhaps that he had been liked and made much of in society, and that his talents were ruined by brilliant flashes, made when he roused himself to the occasion, rather than by any sustained effort. Then he fell into a literary set, one of the best, perhaps, but a dangerous one for a young man having his own way to make, and then he, to crown all, married beautiful Annetta Wade, against the wish of her father, who accordingly did nothing for them; and then he found that, unless he worked hard and steadily, he and his wife would have a fair prospect of starving. They were such an indolent careless couple too; and though they accepted life and its burdens, and even its troubles, easily enough, they could not make themselves like work. Mr. Woodward could not, at least, and his wife always wore his likes and dislikes as closely as he himself did. Luckily, he had a sub-editorship offered him just when their second child was born, and things were at a very low ebb, and five years afterwards he became editor, but the post was not worth very much, for it was a small weekly paper, only circulating among a certain educated class. They had been able to keep a home together, but they had never had a sufficient sum with which to buy furniture, and the rooms looked bare and shabby, so that the children, as they grew up and realised the fact, were ashamed to receive visitors, though they were seldom troubled with them. Yes: Mr. Woodward occasionally brought home some one he had known in early days, or some clever thoughtful man, to have a quiet talk and game of chess with him, but that was all; and the daring, laughing, Bohemian-looking children, kept all the prim and proper inhabitants away—they were half afraid of their saucy faces. The boys went to a day-school, but no one had ever spent a penny on education in favour of Dolly or Sally. But they were knowledge-loving children, and picked up things amazingly; and they could think, and the father was a clever man, and liked talking with his children; and what greater educators are there than thought and the companionship of a clever man? Once, long ago, when he happened to have a few pounds in his pocket, Mr. Woodward picked up an old cracky piano, and Mrs. Woodward indolently taught Dolly her notes, and somehow both the children, nay, all of them, had a knowledge of music in consequence; and once, Adrian Fuller—a great friend was Adrian Fuller, and a favourite with them all—had said it was a pity Dolly did not know French, and, half in fun half in earnest, gave her a few lessons. The result was that she had a pretty good knowledge of the language as far as reading it went, and Sally learnt quickly from her sister. So they picked up their education and yet remained children—a group of quaint old-fashioned children not easily forgotten. Children? Yes, but Dolly was almost a woman, and no one yet had realised it, not even she herself perhaps, till she stood over her spoilt rose on the morning that Venus was buried.

CHAPTER IV.—THE END OF A SUMMER DAY.

They were all in the garden, and had had tea beneath the sycamore-tree, but now the breeze was playing and whispering among its branches, and the long summer day was dying out. Mrs. Woodward said it was chilly, and was going in-doors. The boys had learnt their next-day lessons, and were throwing stones in at the door of the pigeon-house. Sally sat in the summer-house, with her elbows resting on the dusty table, reading the "Vicar of Wakefield," for the Woodward children always read grown-up books, and Dolly was at the end of the garden. She was leaning over the low fence, looking at the trees, and the crimson sky above the church, and felt as if she was waiting for something, as if she had awakened to new feelings and understanding since the morning; but the new life incident to them had not yet commenced. Above all too, she was thinking and feeling that when the twilight fell about the trees to-morrow night, and all the nights for many a month to come, there would be no Mr. Fuller talking politics with her father beneath the sycamore-tree, and she should miss him so! Just as Sally looked up to her, and set her life by Dolly's clock, so Dolly set hers by Adrian Fuller's. It was only a child's liking, though he was but six-and-twenty, and Dolly was sixteen, and could hardly be called a child, in years at any rate. She had known him since she was nine, and he had been the king of playmates to her, and was the king of heroes, and this losing him was the first great trouble of her life. She was not in love with him, in spite of her sixteen years; she was too much of a child to understand what that meant, save in the vague indistinct manner in which even a child understands it.

"Dolly, I am going in, the dew is too much for me."

"Very well, papa." She did not raise her head, but waited till Mr. Fuller came and stood close by her.

"What is the matter?" he asked, cheerily enough, and he followed the direction of her eyes, and watched the trees also for a moment; he knew the scene so well, and had sketched it many a time, but he never saw it with the shadows deepening on it as he saw it now, without a rush of feeling which reminded him that he was an artist at heart as well as by profession. Then he looked up at the soft sky and at the stars coming out one by one, and his thoughts reverted to the little figure by his side again. "Are you thinking what a different Dolly the stars will look down upon when I come back two years hence?"

"No, I was thinking how I shall miss you when you have gone," she answered, simply.

"Ah, you'll soon supply my place!" he laughed. "You'll be a woman before I return, and go and see your rich grandpapa, and forget all about Hampstead." He was as great a Bohemian as the Woodward children behind him, and there was something almost sorrowful in his voice as he spoke of Colonel Wade. "What jolly days we have had in this old garden!" he went on; "many a good romp and long drowsy afternoon, eh Dolly?"

"Yes," she answered, sadly, still watching the dim trees. "They'll never come again."

"No, I suppose not," he said, with a sigh, speaking rather to himself than to her. "It seems such a little while ago that I sent in my sketch on the chance of its being accepted for your father's paper, and that we made acquaintance, and in time he brought me home here. What a queer little girl you were, Dolly," he laughed, while she rested her head on her hand upon the fence, and turned her face away, as if she were not listening to him. "I remember you so well, you took to your heels the moment you saw me, but I propitiated you later on by teaching you how to spin a whip-top. We soon became friends, did'nt we?"

"Yes," she said, still with her face turned away; "and I wanted to thank you for teaching me French, and telling me what books were nice to read."

"Dolly," he exclaimed, "you are crying!"

"No," she said, but her head drooped lower and lower. After all she was such a child. "It is only——"

"Dolly! Dolly!" called Mrs. Woodward from the study window, "come in immediately. Your sister Netta is here!"

"Netta again, and at this time! Why, she said she was going to a party!"

"I will wait here," said Adrian Fuller. "I don't want to see her."

"Come along, Doll," shouted Tom; "here's Netta again."

"Mr. Fuller, you are to come in, please; mamma says so!" and Will and Sally came down the garden path.

"Very well," he answered, discontentedly. "I suppose I must pay my respects to the Beauty." He had never seen her as yet, and had taken his tone towards her from the children. Then he and Dolly, and that awkward Tom, with his mass of light hair pushed back from his grubby forehead (for he had been gardening after his own fashion, and showed traces of his industry), and quaint-looking Sally, still hand in hand with her favourite brother, went slowly down the moss-grown pathway towards the house. Adrian Fuller stopped for a moment, and the little crowd of children stopped with him, before they reached the house, and looked back at the garden, and at the shadowy view beyond, and up at the sky, with its many stars. "How lovely it is," he said. "We'll come out again presently. There is nothing more beautiful than the end of a long summer day."

"But it is a little sad also," said Dolly, gravely; and they went into the house.

(To be continued.)

THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

IV.—THE WORD OF DESERTION.

"And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"—MATT. xxxvii. 46.

WE come now to the period of darkness—a darkness which preternaturally descended about mid-day, and at the time of full moon. This circumstance is to be noted, because it is preclusive of the supposition that the darkness is to be accounted for as that consequent upon an eclipse of the sun. This darkness, which was of three hours' duration—lasting from the sixth to the ninth hour—i.e., from mid-day to about three o'clock in the afternoon, was a physical circumstance which we must regard as intimately associated with the remarkable utterance of Christ which we have now to consider. This fourth word—the word of desertion—shows plainly that the waves and the billows were indeed rolling over Christ; it is a cry which must have fallen upon the astonished, if not terrified, ear of the universe, issuing as it did from the profoundest deeps of a voluntarily endured humiliation.

Up to mid-day the sun shone upon the scene of horror with which we are presented at Calvary. All things pursued their usual course. There was no supernatural portent to indicate that the critical hour of the world's history had arrived. But about the sixth hour—at noon—when the sun was shining in all its meridian splendour—a preternatural darkness descended upon the earth, wherewith all found themselves at once enshrouded. It was a warning sign that they were committing a sin of such unparalleled enormity that the sun could no longer shine upon it; that they were perpetrating a deed of horror which needed to be so veiled. This darkness must have powerfully affected the minds of all capable of thought, awakening a feeling which would, naturally enough, find expression in the traditional words of Dionysius, uttered on beholding this darkness in Egypt: "Either the Divinity himself is suffering, or sympathises with one who suffers."

In this cry of desertion we have the opening words of Ps. xxii., one of the most remarkable of the typical Psalms, and which, while finding partial fulfilment in the experience of David, received its final and complete fulfilment in the experience of David's Son and Lord. As we read the Psalm we see the sorrowful form of the Divine sufferer rise up before us. The Messianic character of this Psalm is so unmistakable, that one who would willingly exclude Christ from the Old Testament, says of it—"We have here the programme of the crucifixion." Yes, so wonderfully is this the case, that as we read this Psalm in the light of what actually transpired on Calvary, it wears for us an historic rather than a predictive character.

Christ from the first had suffered, but we now come to the very climax of His sufferings. The sufferings now became visible which had long burdened Him invisibly. The sinfulness, the unbelief, the ignorance, the perversity of men, everywhere and always so obtrusive from the very first, must have been occasions of continual suffering to the Redeemer; but towards the close of His life they were concentrated into greater intensity, and became the occasions of more extreme bitterness.

That suffering without measure should have burst as a desolating tempest upon the head of the Holy One, is less surprising than that the Divine Saviour instead of remaining, as hitherto, unmoved, should have been so sensibly and visibly affected.

Does not this reveal to us the fact that Christ's sufferings consisted chiefly in the travail of his soul? His most extreme physical sufferings were those that He endured at an earlier period, and those He endured without a complaint, without the utterance of a word which had reference to Himself. But this exceeding bitter cry which smote against the black unanswering heavens tells us of the agony of soul which He endured, of a strange and terrible consciousness of desertion. No one can understand this cry, and what it expressed, who refuses to admit that Christ suffered and endured as our representative. He suffered for us, He bore our sins in His own body on the tree, the Lord laid on Him the iniquities of us all. Hence His sufferings had a special character, and may not be compared with any other sufferings, however extreme. Christ was then vicariously offering a sacrifice for us, and vicariously bearing our burden. Need we wonder, can we wonder, that so situated, He should have so suffered, or have thus exclaimed?

However regarded, this appeal must be taken as expressive of quite an unexampled state of mind. We may search through the successive pages of the world's history, and we shall find no parallel to this. For here we have the strange spectacle of one clinging to God in the exercise of faith, yet at the same time overwhelmed with a terrible sense of being deserted by God. We are amazed as we listen. Christ is now performing the very work which He came into this world to accomplish; in anticipation of this very sacrifice which He was offering—the sacrifice of Himself—does He say, "Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me, to do thy will, O God;" and yet, instead of seeing from the opening heavens a manifestation of the excellent glory, the descent of the mystic dove, and hearing the audible voice proclaiming, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," instead of this, there is the agony, and the chill horror of death; and from the cross, shrouded in preternatural darkness, there is heard ascending, to an apparently inattentive heaven, the cry of the God-deserted soul, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?"

There is much here which is by us undiscoverable; yet is there much also on which we may, in devout meditation, profitably dwell. Let us, then, consider what this strange cry expresses. We have taken for granted throughout that we are listening to our Saviour here, crying from the very lowest depth of humiliation and suffering; and without violating their sanctity, we may reverently inquire, In what did those sufferings consist?

The cry which our Saviour uttered in this time of sore extremity has significance clinging to every word, and upon the force of every word should we thoughtfully dwell.

Why hast Thou forsaken me? What is the meaning of this darkening of my Father's face? Are not the sufferings of the cross enough? Will it not suffice that I yield to death and endure its agony? Must I even in the very death-struggle have my Father's face hidden—turned away? Why should my soul be thus disquieted within me? My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?

Why hast Thou forsaken me? That the world should treat me thus I do not wonder, for I am not of the world. That even my friends should have forsaken me, and fled, I, knowing their weakness, can understand. But why hast Thou—the changeless One, whose name is love—why hast Thou forsaken me?

Why hast Thou forsaken me? I might have endured all else—pain and anguish, the assault of fiends, the ingratitude and cruelty of men, the recreancy of friends. Cheered by Thy smile, with the consciousness of Thy favour, I might have endured all this without complaint, but not this greatest woe of all—the hiding of Thy countenance—My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me? Me, the Son of Thy love, in whom was all Thy delight, who has come to do Thy will, and who is now, in all this shame and painfulness, doing Thy will—My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me? He was indeed made to drink the wine of astonishment.

We see, then, that this fourth word of Christ expresses an extreme sense of solitude, surprise, suffering, combined with a continued trust in God.

This cry is expressive of an extreme sense of solitude—utter solitude and desolation—it is the cry of the soul that feels itself forsaken. In the moment of most urgent need, He feels—who can imagine what this means?—He feels Himself forsaken of God! To a large extent, and from the very first, Christ's had been a lonely life. He trod the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with Him. His character was misunderstood—His words, His work, His entire mission were misunderstood, not only by His enemies, but even by His friends and followers. Living no recluse life, having daily intercourse with men, He was yet, to a large extent, alone. But while even His true friends failed of discerning His real character, He did enjoy a certain measure of human sympathy, and by it was in His previously painful way refreshed. But from all this He is now shut off. Take the innermost circle of all. Where are they who, with Peter, declared that they would rather die with Him than forsake Him? By one He has been betrayed; by another He has been blasphemously and repeatedly denied: and only one, of all the twelve, ventures near enough to the cross to catch word or look of the dying Christ.

For the last three years Christ has been ceaselessly going about, not only speaking wise and loving words, but healing all manner of sicknesses and diseases among the people. He has opened the eyes of the blind, unstopped the ears of the deaf, purged the leper of his uncleanness, raised to life the dead. But of these we find none at the cross—at least none uttering any word of protestation against the tragedy enacted, or of sympathy with the Divine sufferer. By all this ingratitude and unkindliness would the human heart of Christ be pierced. He who was so free to manifest sympathy would most keenly feel its want. But we are called to witness not the mere withholding of sympathy, but the infliction of the most cruel insult and injury. Christ was dying for them, who, with malignant looks and mocking words, were gathered round the cross, and who had personslly or instrumentally fixed Him to it. The wounds inflicted on the sensitive soul of Christ were more terrible to bear than all the bodily anguish of the crucifixion. Never was death endured under circumstances of such absolute desolation. But all this, heart-rending as it must have been, constituted the lightest part of that terrible burden which pressed upon the dying Saviour. Till now Christ could always say, "I am alone, and yet not alone, the Father is with me." The consciousness of the Divine presence was able to people and cheer the most dreary solitude. But now it is different—a terrible and unaccustomed sense of loneliness is invading His heart, the face of God seems hidden, and the shadow of a great darkness is resting on His soul. He is there the forsaken, the desolate, in a sense that, let us thank God, we can never understand. He has long known what it is to be despised and rejected of men; He feels now as if He were forsaken of God. Can we wonder that, thus situated—hung up between earth and heaven, isolated from both, can we wonder that, with this sense of absolute privation, there should issue from the depths of that awful solitude and silence the cry, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

This utterance seems expressive of surprise—of astonishment. Why, oh why, hast Thou forsaken me? The consciousness of the favour, the approval of His Father, had never been interrupted before; but now, in this time of darkness and agony, He seems unable to realise what has always hitherto been a stay and support to Him. This strange sense of desertion, desolation, abandonment, is what He cannot understand, it fills Him with perplexity and astonishment. He wonders not at the faithlessness of friends, or at the rancour of enemies. His wonder is this, that at such a time the face of His Father should seem hidden. Why, oh why, is this? My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?

This cry is to be regarded not merely as expressive of the most severe suffering, but reveals to us the fact that the main element in our Saviour's sufferings was spiritual. Not the torments of the crucifixion, great as they were, called forth this cry, but the invisible and unimaginable agony of soul—the travail of our Redeemer's soul—of which the old prophet spoke.

The bodily sufferings of our Saviour were of an extreme kind, but severe as they were, they were as nothing compared with those mysterious pains which He bore while offering Himself as a sacrifice for sin. In this, the extremity of mental agony, He had little thought, it is probable, of his bodily torture. If mere bodily pain could have subdued the soul of the Redeemer, it would have enforced an acknowledgment of its presence and power before this. When He was bearing, and well nigh fainting, under the burden of the cross, He could say to those who were expressing their sympathy, "Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and your children." When first extended on the cross, the time, it is likely, when He was enduring the most acute physical pain, He could forget Himself and pray for His murderers. And now, we may be assured, it is not the pains of a mangled body, but the sorrowfulness of a deserted and desolate soul, which extorts this cry. It is suffering such as the soul only can experience, such as only the soul of the Redeemer could endure.

In thinking of these sufferings we must remember that the bitterest ingredient in the cup which our Saviour was then draining to the very dregs is to be found in this interruption of the consciousness of the Divine favour and presence. This is a great mystery, which we would not even seek to explain; but to the fact, however mysterious, we would tenaciously cling. Our Saviour, during this temporary period of desertion, was enduring what He only could endure, and what He came into the world, and assumed our nature, in order that He might endure. This was the fiery baptism to which He had looked forward from the first—it was terrible to Him, by all save himself it would have been intolerable. Well might He at such a time have used the prophetic words—"Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of His fierce anger?"

This must be regarded as the critical period in that great contest which was being waged between the Redeemer and the Destroyer. This is the hour and the power of darkness. A crisis, this, of unparalleled interest to the world, and to the universe. The head of that serpent, within whose complicated and ever-tightening folds the world was lying, is now being crushed, but not without cost of suffering to the victor. At the very commencement of His public ministry, the Son of Man entered the lists with the great adversary, and there was a sharp conflict; but Satan, after his ignominious defeat in the wilderness, seems for a while not to have cared about renewing his assault upon Him who came to subvert his kingdom and to destroy his works. But now things are approaching their crisis; the controversy must be settled in one way or another, and the contest must be decided at Calvary, and while Christ is hanging on the cross. There, by dying, He is to vanquish him who had the power of death, even the devil. We can form no conception of the severity of the conflict which then and there took place. We see our redemption wrought out by our Suffering Substitute, and we know that His sufferings must have been extreme, from the fact that they extorted from Him the exceeding bitter cry, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

Here, then, we see Christ suffering as none but He could suffer, and suffering from a strange, mysterious sense of desertion—yet all the while professing faith in God, and claiming special relationship to God. Though the face of God be hidden, His hold on God does not relax. From the darkest depth of all, His cry is—"My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" As the Son of Man he seems amazed, bewildered, terrified, but He feels that God is His God still. He cannot realise what, till now, throughout His earthly ministry, He has realised, and what in times of greatest distress has been a joy to Him. But even now, when His Father's face seems hidden, and darkness has gathered around His soul, He can say—"My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" Is there not, occasionally, something corresponding to this in the experience of Christ's people? We may be placed in painful and trying circumstances, in which we may feel confused and bewildered. We may wonder what is going to happen next, what, indeed, will become of us. We may feel alone and desolate. Our heavens may be overcast, and our heart heavy, and yet we may feel that we have an interest in the unchanging love of God, though for a time we may fail to realise its sweetness. When things are at their worst we can say, "My God, my God!" and with the old patriarch, are ready to exclaim, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

Has not this — the very extremity of our Saviour's woe—a suggestion of comfort for us in the dark and trying hours of life? No such darkness can settle on us as settled on Christ—and to no such depth can we descend as that to which He descended. He descended to the lowest depth of all that we might not, and that we, when in the lower deeps, might be able to feel that we in Christ have One who is able to sympathise as well as able to save.

And is not this word a word of encouragement to those who believe not—those who are inquiring whether they may be saved? Christ thus suffered, and from this lowest depth of suffering thus exclaimed, that He might be able to save to the uttermost all who go unto God by Him. Yes, as sinners we shall ever have reason to praise God that for us Christ endured this extremest woe—and in the great travail of His soul, cried out—"My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?"

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 18. Paul in Greece.

Chapter to be read—Acts xvii.

INTRODUCTION. Question the children upon the events at Philippi, and the treatment received by Paul and Silas. Roman citizens beaten and imprisoned uncondemned by Roman magistrates, who, in fear lest apostles should inform against them, come and entreat them to leave the city quietly (xvi. 39). What a triumph for the apostles! So they take leave of Lydia and the brethren, and depart on their journey.

I. Paul at Thessalonica. (Read xvii. 1—9.) Let children trace their course on a map from Philippi through Amphipolis to Thessalonica. What did Paul do there? Must always preach to the Jews first; the message the same—that the Christ so long expected was not a mere earthly prince, but a suffering Saviour—who must die for sin and rise again; all which fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. The effect the same as before—a few Jews, and many of devout Greeks, and some of chief women. Persecution also followed from the unbelieving Jews, who could not endure the preaching of Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ; so they raise the old cry that apostles are preaching treason to Cæsar. Who took the alarm? the rulers, like Pilate, afraid of being accused to Cæsar, the Roman Emperor, of encouraging disloyalty, require Jason, Paul's friend, to find bail for peaceable behaviour, as Paul and Silas could not be found. Where were they?

II. PAUL AT BEREA. (Read 10—15.) Picture Paul and Silas being sent away by night—the hurried farewells, and journey to Berea; their immediately going into the synagogue of the Jews, and beginning to teach them. Notice three things about the Bereans. (a) They heard readily. Remind of parable of sower, where seed fell on stony ground, and not having much depth of earth, sprang up quickly. The Bereans were easily impressed, disposed to listen, and heard attentively. (b) They searched the Scriptures. As Jews they had Old Testament, heard Scriptures read every Sabbath day, knew the prophecies about Christ, now compared the apostle's teaching with the Scriptures, to see if agreed, and finding they did agree, believed. (c) They easily fell away. Who came and disturbed the good work?

PRACTICAL LESSONS. (1) Perseverance. Jews earnest in putting down what they thought false doctrine; are we as earnest in spreading what we know to be true? Paul and Silas went on fearlessly, just doing their duty, not caring for consequences. What an example to all! (2) Steadfastness. Great danger in being easily impressed, unless really give heart and soul to God. Test of sincerity—not if moved by hearing Word, but of stand when Word is evil spoken of.

III. PAUL AT ATHENS. (Read 16—34.) Describe the character of the Athenians. (a) Idolaters. Beautiful city; capital of ancient Greece; full of beautiful works of art, &c.; centre of all luxury and refinement; one thing wanting—knowledge of true God; city full of idols. (b) Philosophers. Explain how they had many exceedingly wise men, always, like man in dark, groping after the light of truth. Notice these points in the speech:—(a) He fastens on what was good in them. "Too superstitious" (ver. 22) is rather "very much devoted to religion." This was in itself good, though the object of their worship was wrong. Let the children admire the clever way in which St. Paul begins with "The Unknown God," to whom he had seen an altar dedicated. (b) God needs no temples. Remind of Stephen's speech, how he showed that Abraham and other saints worshipped God acceptably hundreds of years before the Temple was built. He who made man cannot actually need anything made by man. (c) All men are made by God for Himself. All are of one blood, and their habitations settled by God. Ask what they were required to do after the Flood, and how they were dispersed. (Gen. xi. 8.) Also how Abraham was taken from his own country (Gen. xii. 1), and his descendants first settled in Egypt, afterwards in Canaan. So that we live and move only as God allows (see Ps. civ. 29, 30), and are intended to seek God, who is near to us all. (d) Need of repentance. Not a mere permission, but command to repent, because of coming judgment. Notice the effect of the sermon. How was it received? Incredulity by some, indifference by others, faith by a few (ver. 34).

PRACTICAL LESSON. Take heed how hear. We in favoured country, abundant means of grace, always hearing. Do we mock? delay repentance? or believe? Resurrection is certain, and unless repent must all perish.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the apostle's reception at Thessalonica.
2. What three points do you notice about the Bereans?
3. What lessons may we learn from them?
4. Describe the Athenians.
5. Name four heads of St. Paul's speech.
6. Give a practical lesson.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

AS Eda stood face to face with the ruined man, all other emotions were swallowed up in pity for him, and her quiet "It is I, sir; can I do anything for you?" was spoken in such gentle tones that, although he brusquely answered in the negative, he passed his hand over his eyes, and threw himself into the nearest chair, with a sigh that was almost a groan. He looked so unspeakably haggard and wretched that she could not resolve to leave him quite alone, but busied herself in putting away the ornaments Mrs. de Courcy had been wearing, till nearly an hour had passed away.

At last she ventured to inquire if she might fetch him a cup of coffee.

"Yes—no—it is not worth while," he roused himself to answer. "I do not think I have had anything since the morning. But no matter; I am neither hungry nor thirsty."

But Eda, who knew that no man could take a hopeful view of his difficulties while sinking with inanition, begged him to stay where he was till she had procured him some refreshment, and for this purpose she took her way to the kitchen. Despite the lateness of the hour several of the servants were still there—Mrs. de Courcy's smart maid amongst them. They were loudly and unfeelingly discussing the state of their employer's affairs, for, alas! the tie between the De Courcys and their domestics had been one of self-interest on both sides, and the faithful service that is given as much for love as reward was unknown in their establishment.

(Drawn by F. Barnard.)

"How came this phial in the room?"—p. 315.

There was a hush when Eda entered, but it was induced by curiosity alone; and when she had told her errand, and offered to wait for the dry toast she had asked for, no one hesitated to resume the conversation.

The cook, a portly woman, whose perquisites had been enormous, began to bewail her wrongs loudly. "I never would have taken the situation if I'd ha' known that this would be the end of it. Fine trouble I shall have to get myself comfortable settled again! me toe, that's never lived except in the best of families! But when a master and missus disgraces theirselves, every one that has to do with them suffers for it."

There was an assenting murmur from those who stood round, which rose to audible complaints when Mrs. Cook added her conviction that they should all be sent about their business without a skurrick of their wages.

"And this for people that have never had a bit of feeling for nobody but themselves!" said one of the housemaids, sharply. "You might slave yourself off your legs, and what did missus care? There was Anne—the young woman who was here when I came—lost her health entirely through the hard work, and what did they do for her? Packed her off to the hospital, and never asked a single question about her from that day to this!"

Eda sighed; but she stayed any further details by saying, gently, "This is scarcely the time—is it?—to recall anything to Mr. or Mrs. de Courcy's disadvantage."

No one answered, but the girl who had been kneeling before the fire toasting the bread looked up and smiled in sympathy. She was a rough, awkward girl, employed in the scullery, and hourly rated by the other servants for her clumsiness, but her invincible good-humour enabled her to bear all their cross speeches with composure. She and Eda were old acquaintances, for she was none other than the much-enduring "'Ria" Ingle, on whom, as eldest daughter, all the care had devolved of her mother's large family during the hard-worked charwoman's repeated absences from home. They rarely encountered each other in the palatial mansion, where the governess and the scullion were so far apart, but Eda contrived to see the girl sometimes, and say a few encouraging words, or by some little gift brightened her toilsome existence; and 'Ria, who had always looked upon Miss Granton as one of the best and cleverest of young ladies, was ever ready to testify her gratitude by those good offices which the humblest may find opportunities of performing.

Though five minutes earlier she had been nodding with weariness, she now ran about with alacrity, preparing the tray which she insisted on carrying up-stairs for Eda, whose quiet "Thank you" sent her away sufficiently repaid. Mr. de Courcy was still sitting in the same despondent attitude, but he eagerly swallowed the coffee, and then made an inquiry for his wife.

Eda hesitated whether to evoke his compassion for her by divulging the state she had been in, or keep the secret even from him, but he did not press for a reply, crying, hastily, "She has gone to bed, I suppose. Poor thing, poor thing! Let her sleep, if she can."

He was evidently relenting towards his partner in folly, and Eda went away better satisfied. If this thoughtless couple would but cease these useless recriminations, and endeavour to support and console each other, there might be greater happiness in store for both than they had ever known while the gay world of pleasure stood between them.

Beginning to feel really weary as soon as she was once more alone, Eda sat down by the table in the nursery, trimmed the lamp, and opened her Bible, to read a few verses ere she aroused Manon, who had been lying down all the evening with headache, and went herself to rest. How quietly, how soundly the children had slept while the scene that might have ended so tragically was enacted close to them! As she sat turning over the pages of St. John's Gospel, she could hear the regular breathing of little Rose; and Violet too, who had been so restless a few hours ago, did not appear to have changed her position. But what indefinable impulse made Eda rise as she was thinking this, and go to the bedside to lean over the child and look at her?

Violet was dying! The little lips that had so lately murmured her evening prayer, and said her loving good-night to her mother with unusual affection, would never speak again! The hands that had so often been clasped round Eda's neck in merry caress or in penitence for some fit of waywardness were rapidly growing cold, and the warm little heart—so full of good feeling, despite her caprices—had almost ceased to beat!

After the first start of horrified incredulity, Eda flew for assistance. The nearest doctor was sent for, and was quickly in attendance, but he could do nothing. Before morning broke Violet de Courcy was no more, and her parents forgot all other losses and all dissension while they wept together over their firstborn.

CHAPTER XL.

It was not often that Eda was found wanting when her help was needed; but now the shock of her little pupil's sudden decease seemed to have overwhelmed her. She could not weep, as Mrs. de Courcy did, nor sob and exclaim like Manon, who had rushed into the room when the alarm was first given. A strange oppression was upon her, and she longed to be able to get away to some quiet corner, where she might clasp her hands over her eyes, and ask herself if it could be true—if Violet was really no more.

But there was no escaping from the scene of confusion; for Dr. Edwardes, after a long and careful examination of the child, had sent for a professional brother, with whom he gravely conferred. Then Eda was questioned by both in a manner which bewildered and provoked her, because she did not feel able to collect her thoughts, and answer as promptly and coherently as she ought to do.

It vexed her to find that she could not even remember, when the question was first put to her, at what hour she had adminstered the last dose of medicine to the little girl.

"You say you were going to give the child a dose about half-past nine this evening, but you did not do so. Why?"

"I was interrupted," said Eda.

"Then you wish us to understand that you did not give it to her at all? You are sure? And yet you were in the habit of administering it with great punctuality. Did any one else give the dose?"

"No one had been in attendance upon her all the evening but myself," was the reply; "for her nurse was suffering with headache."

"Humph! will you let me look at the phial of medicine I sent you?"

"Eda sought for it in vain. It was not on the table, where she felt tolerably certain that she left it when she hurried from the room in pursuit of Mrs. de Courcy.

Some little time was spent in the search, and at last, heated and distressed, she was obliged to confess that she could not tell what had become of it.

"Are you quite sure that you did not give the poor child a dose from this phial instead of the right one?" asked Dr. Edwardes, holding up the one that contained the laudanum.

"Quite sure," she answered, emphatically, although unable to repress a little shiver as she recollected to what a terrible use the drug had so nearly been put.

"And yet," said the doctor, with unpleasant significance, "it is to an overdose of laudanum that my patient has succumbed; how and by whom administered is what I shall insist upon knowing. Take a little time for consideration, Miss Granton. If you have unfortunately made a mistake, would it not be as well to confess it?"

For a few seconds Eda stood and gazed at his grave and even accusing face like one in a dream; one startling event had followed another, till she felt too stupid to arrange her ideas. "I have not made any mistake, Dr. Edwardes," she said at last, slowly.

"How came this phial in the room? If you can explain that——"

But she was silent, for she could not do so without naming Mrs. de Courcy; and finding that she could not, or would not, say any more, the medical men whispered together for a while, and then decided to leave the affair in abeyance until the morrow.

Before they came again Mrs. de Courcy was raving with brain fever, and her personal attendant, professing to be afraid of infection, packed her trunks and left. But Manon, with a degree of unselfishness that surprised every one, volunteered to take the soubrette's place, and nursed her mistress with the utmost tenderness and devotion, refusing to leave her even to procure needful rest, but snatching half an hour's sleep occasionally on a sofa by her side.

Little Rose was hurried off to the house of her grandparents, and Eda's occupation was gone, for Manon jealously excluded her from Mrs. de Courcy's sick-chamber, and a strange woman, with a keen, watchful face, was in the nursery watching beside the dead child. Several gentlemen came in and out during the day, and were closeted with Mr. de Courcy, who had shut himself up in his study, his first passionate burst of grief having been followed by the deepest dejection. He was verifying Shakespeare's assertion that our griefs often come upon us in battalions; and he had yet to learn whither to go for help to bear his burthen.

Again Eda was visited by the medical men, in the school-room, to which she had retreated, and questioned as closely as before; but she could throw no light upon the circumstances attending Violet's death. She was asked if she could explain the disappearance of the medicine the little girl had been in the habit of taking, and on answering in the negative, a stranger who had accompanied Dr. Edwardes to the room, and prompted his questions, inquired to whom the work-box belonged that stood on the table where the phial should have been. When Eda told him that it was hers, he asked if she would have any objection to its being examined.

"None," she replied, and put her hand into the pocket of her dress for the key. With a cry of mingled surprise and consternation, she drew from it the missing bottle, of which Dr. Edwardes instantly possessed himself.

She saw that the circumstance was looked upon as a strange one, and yet a few minutes' thought enabled her to give a simple and truthful explanation of it. When disturbed on the previous evening she was in the act of measuring out the spoonful of medicine; and in her haste to follow Mrs. de Courcy she must have slipped the bottle into her pocket, and then totally forgotten having done so.

Dr. Edwardes "hemmed," looked across at his companion, and then, in ominous silence, they rose and left her. But Eda, who followed to the landing to see them descend the stairs, caught the purport of two or three sentences they interchanged, and comprehended, at last, that she was suspected of having caused Violet's death by her own carelessness.

She learned, too, that an inquest would be held, at which she would have to appear, and submit to more questioning and cross-examining — a prospect so appalling to a sensitive and already overwrought woman, that she sat down on the top of the stairs faint and trembling. In this position she was found by Mr. de Courcy, who, frenzied by grief for the untimely death of his child, assailed her with the bitterest reproaches, and declared that if it could be proved that Violet had been poisoned through her unpardonable negligence, he would not rest until she had been punished with all the rigour of the law.

When Eda, stunned by her position, did creep back to the school-room, she was joined there by the strange woman, who was evidently ordered to exercise some degree of surveillance over her. All her devotion to the children, all her faithful services to their parents, were counted as naught, because Mr. de Courcy recollected to have once heard his wife say that she did not think Miss Granton liked Violet.

On this speech, uttered in a fit of peevishness, and forgotten by the speaker before the day was over, a theory was now founded that the bereaved father was only too ready to credit. Miss Granton disliked his child so much that, even if she could be acquitted of malice prepense, there could not be a doubt of her having been cruelly negligent; administering the medicine so carelessly that the child's death had ensued in consequence.

As soon as Eda recovered herself a little, she sent for Fritz Allonby. On his judgment she could rely better than on Mark's, although the latter was more energetic and worldly-wise. He came as soon as he received her note, and let her weep the tears with which she greeted his appearance, until they had relieved her overcharged heart. Then he sat down beside her, soothing her with his gentle, hopeful words, and listening with profound interest to the long strange tale she had to tell him. His face was very grave as he gleaned from the narrative the difficulties of her position. Mrs. de Courcy, on recovering her senses, could of course account for the phial of laudanum being in the nursery; but how it came to be substituted for the medicine and administered to little Violet must be ascertained before Eda could be exculpated.

"Do you not think it just possible that in your hurry and agitation you picked up the wrong bottle?" he asked. "Do not be offended with me for suggesting this."

"I am not offended," she answered; "though the barest supposition that I could have done such a thing makes me miserable. But I was neither hurried nor agitated when I returned to the nursery. You must remember that I was for some time in attendance on Mrs. de Courcy, and had also been to the kitchen for coffee. Besides, I discovered that Violet was dying within ten—or, at the most, fifteen—minutes after I came back to her. The dose that Dr. Edwardes asserts to have killed her must have been swallowed long before."

"Could she have got out of bed and taken it herself?"

Eda cogitated, and then replied that she did not think this suggestion at all feasible, for the child, though in a fair way of recovery, was so weak as to be scarcely capable of such an effort; besides which, she had never been taught to wait upon herself, and would fret if Eda refused to let Manon be summoned every time she required anything.

"Some one must have entered the nursery while you were engaged with Mrs. de Courcy," was Fritz Allonby's conclusion.

"But who would have done so? None of the servants ever came there but Manon, and she was in the spare room, lying down with headache."

"You are sure of this?"

"Quite sure. I carried her some hartshorn to relieve the pain, not long before Mrs. de Courcy came up-stairs, and she was then so drowsy that she could scarcely rouse herself sufficiently to use it."

"Nevertheless, I should like to see this Frenchwoman. In fact, I intend to question every person in the house—separately—about this mysterious transaction."

Fritz asked and obtained an interview with Mr. de Courcy, and being as determined as he was courteous, he obtained permission to carry out his resolve. From humble 'Ria in the scullery to Manon—who was inclined to be angry and insolent when summoned from her post at the request of a stranger—he saw every domestic in the household, but without eliciting aught but the most positive denials that they had entered the room appropriated to the sleeping children.

When Fritz went back to the school-room there was an anxious look in his eyes, though he endeavoured to conceal it. Nothing is more distressing than a mystery, and a fear that Eda would have much grief and annoyance to endure, if this one were not quickly solved, was upon him.

"My dear, there will be an inquest held on your poor little pupil this evening. I shall insist on its being adjourned, to enable Mrs. de Courcy to attend, and explain how the laudanum came to be in the nursery. When this ordeal—and it will be a painful one for you, I know—is over, you must go home with me to Gran. I cannot leave you here alone!"

It was indeed a trying ordeal that Eda underwent when summoned before the coroner; and though she told the little she had to tell with the simplicity of truth, she saw that she failed to obtain credence from those who listened to her with such profound attention. The laudanum had been found where she confessed to have put it; and by her own showing no one else had been in the habit of administering the medicines prescribed for the sick child. She alone had been in attendance on Violet de Courcy that evening; and even this fact told against her. As Eda glanced from face to face of her questioners, she could divine that one thought possessed them all. They unanimously believed that she had carelessly substituted one phial for the other, and was too much alarmed at the sad consequences of her mistake to confess it.

She endeavoured to repeat her assertions of innocence, but her voice failed her, and in uncontrollable agitation she clung to the arm of her only friend, Fritz Allonby. How was she to prove that she was guiltless of the child's death—guiltless even of the neglect that had led to it?

(To be continued.)

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A.

"GOLD MAY BE BOUGHT TOO DEAR."

THE poets say that, long long ago, Saturn, the chief of the gods, was dethroned by his son Jupiter, and that, being turned out of heaven, he made his way as best he could to earth. Instead of going into the sulks, as he might very well have been excused for doing under the circumstances, he determined to make the best of a bad business and put as good a face upon matters as he could.

Accordingly, instead of making every one around him miserable, he took kindly to the situation, and proceeded to make himself as agreeable as possible to the folk amongst whom he came to dwell.

As the story goes, he and one Jason, who was already in the king line, went into partnership together. It was before the days of public companies with limited liability, or they would have set up, no doubt, under the name of "Jason, Saturn, and Co., Limited," and who knows how grand a prospectus they would have put forth? But as it was they did much better—they did not put forth any prospectus at all, but they did all the good they could, and hence, under their sway, this period of the world was called "The Golden Age."

At this time, we are told, there were no laws and judges, for people did what was right without them; as to the police, they were nowhere.

Peace, plenty, and equality ruled amongst mankind; every one gave every one else the wall, they were so polite; but no one "went to the wall," as we say, for everybody was kind to every one else, and every one had enough and to spare.

As to the earth, it had every reason to be satisfied with the management of Messrs. Jason and Saturn, for under it it paid tremendous dividends, producing all kinds of fruits without cultivation, basking in perpetual spring, having brooks of milk, and so forth; the latter, no doubt, keeping steadily and honestly free of all chalk formations, and setting well to cream in all its little puddles, and, for all we know, when it stood long enough, coagulating into cream-cheese.

But, good reader, I must leave all this to the poets, and I must, to my sorrow, come down to prose, of which (with a touch of poetry now and again) I find life to be chiefly made up—prose, as the printers would say, "set solid," and some of it heavy reading enough.

I can't help the heavy reading, but I must keep as far as I can from heavy writing, and so I have given you a little spice of the poetical age before I come to our present age—the old golden age of the poets, which was very different indeed from the golden age of the present. For this, beyond all question, must in its own sense be called "a golden age," just as, in its own sense, that one was also.

I am sorry to say that I have not much good to write of my own day and generation in its light of being a "golden age." The proverb which stands at the heading of these lines leads up to this. Ours is the age of hard gold, and men need to hear the wise proverb that "Gold may be bought too dear."

Never was there any age when this proverb was more necessary to be recited and believed than the very one in which we live.

This is the golden age, in the love of gold itself, in the respect that is paid to it, in the evils which flow from it, but not in the good which might, if it were put to proper use.

What is gold? Shakespeare, in Timon of Athens, calls it "this yellow slave." He might more properly have called it "this yellow master;" especially as he immediately proceeds to catalogue some of the evils which it produces.

Gold is of very little value as compared with many other metals, except for purposes of ornament. Its rarity constitutes its chief value; so that, being recognised amongst all nations, kindreds, peoples, and tongues as scarce, and therefore precious, it is a convenient form of exchange. If only it were as plentiful as iron, the latter would be much more valuable, because of its use for the ordinary purposes of daily life.

But as a representative of value, as being able to procure much, and perhaps to avert much, gold has great power, and is eagerly and dangerously sought after, more or less, by almost all sorts and conditions of men.

Few people care to keep it by them, or to look at it; but they value it as the representative of power and possession—a power which, like the gold itself, is frequently never used.

Many a man spends his whole life with no more for his money than simply the consciousness that he may have and can have so-and-so if he likes. It is a kind of wishing-cap, such as the fairies are represented as letting people put on now and again; but our owners of gold frequently are people who never put on the wishing-cap at all, and who, moreover, would not put it on on any account, for they could only have their wish at the price of part of their gold.

Now gold, though the greatest buyer in the world, is bought itself. You can get more for gold than for anything else; and you must very often give more for it, also, than for anything else; and our proverb says, and that truly, that you may buy gold too dear.

How is gold bought, and with what? In many cases it is bought with sweat of brain.

The worst and most exhaustive of all sweat is that of the brain. And see how heavily in brain-sweat many are paying for gold!

It must not be supposed that we object to intellectual labour, or to brain-work of any kind that is right in itself. It is as legitimately the work of some men as bodily labour is the work of others; but it is infinitely more exhaustive, and man can afford to give much less of it in proportion for gold than he can of toil in the workshop or the field.

See the price at which many merchants with their legitimate speculations, and many people with speculations which are not legitimate, buy the gold they get. See the price the lawyer pays for it, racking his brain often to make the worse appear the better reason. And not only these, but all whose occupations require thought. And wherever you find the occupation by which gold is got carried to such an extent, for the purpose of getting more gold, that either the bodily health is injured or the man made the slave of his work, there you have gold bought too dear. We are only looking at this world's side of the matter as yet; but surely even here the proverb holds good.

(To be concluded.)

THE MESSENGER BIRD.

"WHY did I ever come here, and leave my own village, and my kind neighbours, and the fresh air, and sweet flowers?"

"Mother dear," answered Hetty, as she sat by the bed-side trying to finish a piece of work which had dropped from the sick woman's feeble hands. "Don't fret, you'll soon be well, and I'll work hard till then."

"Hetty, you don't know what you're talking about; how could a child like you do enough to support us all, and I'll never get better in this close place? I've worked on, and striven beyond my strength, and now I can do no more. If kind Mrs. Melton knew the state we're in, I'm sure she would help us."

"Why not write to her, mother; perhaps she would let you go out to the old cottage, and get a breath of fresh air to make you well."

"No use, dear; I heard she was not at home. Hetty, do you ever think of the time when your father was alive, and we used to watch you going to school, down the pretty green lane, where the flowers bloomed and the birds sang in the hedges? I little thought then ever to see us as we are now."

"Mother," said little Ellie, starting up from the foot of the bed, "if you were back at the cottage, and saw the flowers, and heard the birds, would you be well?"

"What's the use of asking?" replied Hetty, impatiently, "you know we can't go back. Stay quiet, and don't disturb mother."

"Well, give me a bit of bread, and I'll go to sleep again."

"There's not a morsel in the house till I take home this work."

"Make haste with it then, Hetty," said the child, as she nestled down close to her mother, and remained silent for a few minutes. Presently an idea struck her. "Hetty, do you remember a story you once told me, about birds bringing bread and meat? Was it the same birds mother talks of, that sang in the lane? and if we were there now, would they bring us food every day?"

"No, no, Ellie, those were ravens that brought bread and meat to the prophet Elijah, long ago; I learned about it at school."

"And who gave them the bread?"

"God did, I suppose."

"Well, I wish he would send them to us now, for I'm very hungry."

"You must have patience, dear," said her mother; Hetty will soon have done her work, and bring in some bread, God does not send birds now to feed people."

"Why, does He not care for them?"

"Oh yes, though sometimes I almost fear He has forgotten us."

"Would father forget us if he was alive?"

"No, dear, never."

"Hetty says, God is our Father in heaven, and you know we ask him every morning for daily bread; mother, I'm sure He'll send us some."

There was silence for a while, during which the sick woman lay with closed eyes, and Ellie slept. At length Hetty quietly rose, and folding her work, threw her mother's old shawl round her, and left the room.

Half an hour elapsed, when, weary and dejected, she re-opened the door, dreading to witness the disappointment of those within, for on taking home the work over which her weary hands had so long laboured, she had been told to call again in a few days, as the lady was out of town. Slowly and sadly she bent her steps homeward without either money or food, but what was her astonishment on entering the room to see Ellie bound towards her in a state of excitement, hunger for the time forgotten.

"See, Hetty, what flew in at the window while you were away!" she said, holding up both hands, in which were clasped a pretty little green bird. "Mother says she never saw one like it in the lanes or fields, so I think God must have sent it from heaven, only it did not bring us any bread. Have you got some? I'm so hungry!"

Poor Hetty had to see her mother's look of pain and Ellie's disappointed face as she related what had occurred. The little one still held the bird tenderly in her hands, and now gazing reproachfully into its clear bright eyes, she exclaimed, "Oh, birdie, I prayed to God to send you, but you have forgotten to bring us anything!"

"Don't be so sure of that, Ellie, some one might give us money for this bird, to buy bread. It's a pretty tame little creature, shall we go out and try to sell it, mother?"

"You had better first ask Mr. Myers if he knows what kind of bird it is, and if it's of any value? There's an old cage, if you could find it, that you brother Jamie kept his blackbird in before he went to sea; poor thing, it didn't live long in this dingy place without air or sunshine!"

"Here's the cage, mother; I've put birdie in. Come, Ellie." And the two girls tapped at the door of the next room.

On their entrance, Mr. Myers raised his head from the newspaper he had been reading, and, examining the bird, declared he had never seen one like it before, except at the Zoological Gardens, and laying his finger on a paragraph in the paper, he added, "I have just been reading that some of the birds there escaped when the doors of the aviary were burst open by that terrible gunpowder explosion on the canal the other day. Where did you get this one, children?"

"It flew in at the window," replied Ellen, "and was so tame, I caught it easily."

"Well, any one finding one of these birds is requested to restore it without delay."

Hetty's countenance fell. "I was in hopes we might have sold this one. Is it of much value, sir?"

"I should think so, but that does not concern you, once you know to whom it belongs. You must take it back."

"But I don't know where to find the owners."

"You have only to go to the gate of the Zoological Gardens, and will be sure to see some one there to take charge of the bird and give it to the proper authorities."

Hetty repeated to her mother what they had heard, and as she had no work to do at home, proposed going at once to the Regent's Park. "The sooner we get rid of the poor little thing the better," she added, "for we have not even a crumb to give it to eat."

"Take Ellie with you," said the mother, "I can't bear to see her hungry here, poor child."

"Come along then, Ellie;" and, carrying the large old cage with the tiny green bird within, they set off for their walk.

In passing along the streets many eyes were directed towards them, and once they were surrounded and delayed by a group of boys and girls. At another time a door opened opposite, and the sisters were beckoned over by a little boy, who admired the bird, and inquired what they would take for it."

"We can't sell it, sir," replied Hetty.

"And pray why not? 'Tis a pretty love-bird, and I'll give you five shillings for it."

"Five shillings!" whispered Hetty to her sister, "that would keep us till my work is paid for, but then 'tis not ours to sell."

"Hetty, if it's a love-bird, God must have sent it to us for some good, so don't do what is wrong with it to make Him angry."

Hetty moved on, grasping the cage more firmly, and merely saying, "I'm sorry, sir, but it's not my own," hastened away from the tempting offer.

At length they neared the Regent's Park, and gazed in wonder at the masses of ruin, the great branches torn from the split and blackened trees which stood here and there along the way, tokens of the fearful devastation which had so lately taken place. By the time they reached the entrance to the Zoological Gardens, poor little Ellie was so tired and hungry that she could hardly keep from crying, but while Hetty hesitated what to do next, her attention was attracted to a group of ladies and merry-faced children, who were passing in to see the wonders of the place.

"Mamma," said a little girl of about Ellie's age, "look at the pretty bird in the great big cage!"

The lady turned, and seeing Hetty's sad face, asked where they had got the bird, and what they were going to do with it.

Hetty answered, simply adding that she did not know who to give it up to.

"Come in with us," said the lady, and we will find the proper person." The sisters obeyed.

"Mamma," said the child, who had first noticed them, "I have given my bun to those poor girls, and though they look so hungry they have not eaten it all. Why don't you finish it, little girl?"

"I'm keeping a bit for mother; she's very ill, and has eaten nothing all day."

"What is your name?" asked the lady, "and where do you live?"

"I am Hetty Ray, and this is my sister."

"Hetty Ray—I know that name well. Have you ever heard your mother speak of a Mrs. Melton?"

"Oh yes, ma'am, she spoke of her this very day. Are you Mrs. Melton? We thought you were away."

"I am on my way home from abroad. Tell your mother I am sorry she is ill, and hope to call and see her to-morrow. Meantime, take this money, and go home with some food quickly. Leave the bird with me, and I shall see that it is restored to its place."

The children lost no time in obeying these directions, and when they returned to their mother, bringing some nourishing food, little Ellie rushed in exclaiming, "Mother, it was a love-bird sent by God, and here is the bread and meat it brought."

Next day the promised visit was paid, and the result was that as soon as the sick woman's strength became sufficiently restored to undertake a journey, she and her two little girls returned to the pretty cottage in her native village which she so often regretted having left; her health was fully re-established, and Hetty and Ellie went together every day to Mrs. Melton's school, along the pretty green lane, where the flowers bloomed and the birds sang.

S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

121. What biscuit of modern use is mentioned in the Bible?

122. Quote any passage in which the apostles of our Lord are called Galileans?

123. Mention any passage where "old clouts" are spoken of as used in helping a prophet out of a dungeon?

124. Why may Solomon be said to have been a great naturalist?

125. What epistle does St. Paul state he wrote with his own hand? Give passage.

126. Who was the founder of Samaria?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 288.

105. The Roman centurion (Matt. viii. 10), and the Syrophenician woman (Matt. xv. 28).

106. Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, son of Saul (2 Samuel iv. 4).

107. Publius (Acts xxviii. 7).

108. Isaiah xxxiii. 22.

109. To Daniel in his visions (Daniel viii. 15, and ix. 21), to Zacharias (Luke i. 19), and to Mary the Mother of Jesus (Luke i. 28).

110. "Two whole years" (Acts xxviii. 30).

111. Exodus iv. 6.

112. Colossians iv. 6.

HOME.

OVER dark fields, and rivers deep and cold,
And fen-land waste and drear,
Flies the glad message on a wire of gold,
"Home and true hearts are here!"

Fain would I hide me from the icy blast,
But yet it may not be;
So, with averted eyes, I hurry past
The firelight and the glee—

Home! gasps my home-sick spirit, and I bound
Onward and onward still;
Glad, when in distance dies the syren sound,
That might have warped my will.

And as at length I fling the wintry gloom
And perils far behind,
The twinkling point becomes a fire-lit room,
And rest, and peace of mind,

And happy faces, and a loyal wife,
Whose pulses ever beat
One tune amid the treacherous chords of life,
Unchanging, true, and sweet.

So, from the lattice in the sapphire keep,
(Where lie the treasures true)
A line of glory threads the mazy deep,
A voice comes out to woo.

Pure is the lamp that guides our feet on high,
And sweet the gentle call,
So soft around Love's silken fetters lie,
There is no sense of thrall,

As to one goal we move, a pilgrim band,
Chastened by tears and pain,
Thorns hedging up the way on either hand,
Lest we should run in vain.

G. S. OUTRAM.

(Drawn by ROBERT BARNES.)

"Happy faces and a loyal wife."

"HOME."—p. 320.

(Drawn by MISS E. STEVENS.)

REPOSE.

THE day is done, and man no longer turns
The wheel of work in garden or in field;
But restful silence, while the sunset burns,
Above the earth outspreads her mystic shield.

The kine are musing by the glowing stream,
The song-birds chanting soft their lullaby,
In slumb'rous quietude the unfettered team
Enjoy their well-earned wage of liberty.

The milkmaid slowly leaves the neighbouring well,
With empty pail in hand, and happy smile,
And, touched by parting sunshine's latent spell,
Before the dairy threshold halts a while.

Pausing, she wakes the blackbird in his cage,
Who turns to chirrup forth his last good-night;
Unusual thoughts her wondering soul engage,
Of Heaven and all the glories of the light.

The glow of eve enwraps the peaceful farm,
Where labourers' tools stand idle by the shed;
And rosy children nestle, safe from harm,
To gentle sleep by kindly Nature led.

So night treads on the footsteps of the day,
As fades the sunlight slowly in the west;
While grateful mortals humbly kneel to pray,
And, labour over, thank the Lord for rest.

ANNE BEALE.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER V.—"BUT OH! HER BEAUTY WAS FAR BEYOND."

UP they went to the sitting-room; but when they got to the door they stood still, staring in at her. The gas was lighted, and under it was Netta, dressed, not as she had been in the morning, but in a long flowing white dress—delicate lace, it seemed to Dolly, with shining silk beneath—and there were flowers on her skirts and in her hair, and jewels on her neck and arms.

"Oh Netta!" Dolly gasped; and then they entered, and clustered round her, Adrian Fuller with the rest, forgetting the man in the artist. "Oh Netta!" she said again. "Why, whatever have you come for? and like that, too!"

"Didn't I tell you I was going to a party to-night? it is only a little way further on, and mamma asked me if I could call in as I passed, just to let her see me."

"I never saw her dressed for the evening before!" Mrs. Woodward's words seemed half pathetic to Adrian Fuller, as he stood leaning against the fireplace, for she was speaking of her own child. "Netta, dear, this is Mr. Fuller: Adrian, you never met my daughter before."

"I have so often heard of you, Mr. Fuller," and the Beauty held out her hand, and bent her soft blue eyes down upon him.

"Look at her hair," said little Sally; "it's as bright as gold. I think she looks just like an angel."

"An angel has a crown on its head though!" said Will, reflectively.

"And an angel doesn't give herself airs, and she does," said Tom, with whom Netta had never been a favourite. Then they all turned upon Tom, all but Netta, who laughed merrily.

"I am sure I don't give myself airs, Tom!" she pouted. She was a born flirt, and coquetted even with her brothers. She was a born woman of the world too, for she added, "You must think me dreadfully vain, Mr. Fuller, to come and show myself in my finery, but I did not know that you would be here."

"Yes you did," said Tom, again breaking out. "Dolly told you he was coming when you went on so about her rose."

"What rose?" asked Adrian.

"Shall I tell him, Dolly?" Netta asked, teasingly.

"No!" said the girl, raising her eyes from Netta's glistening raiment to her beautiful face; "please don't, Netta!" The tone was so humble and entreating it touched the Beauty's heart, and she unsnapped a bracelet from her arm, and turned away her head quickly, and, gathering her snowy wraps around her, said good-bye to them, and went back to the carriage, which, with her patient chaperon within it, was waiting for her.

"Good-bye," she said, looking back at the untidy sitting-room and the group of badly-dressed brothers and sisters. "Dolly, I want you," and Dolly obeying, followed her. "I want to give you this, dear," she said, putting the trinket she had unsnapped into her hand. It was not valuable—a little gold bracelet some one had given her years ago, but it seemed priceless to unsophisticated Dolly.

"Oh no, oh no, Netta!" then she looked up again at her sister's face—that little Dolly was such a beauty-lover—and timidly put her arms about the Beauty's neck. "Oh, Netta! if you would only care for me, and not laugh at me, I should like it far better than having a bracelet!"

"I don't laugh at you, you little goose," and she kissed her warmly back again. "And I am very fond of you, of course. There, now I shall put this round your wrist," and she fastened it on, and rustled out, and into the carriage. "Dolly," she said, looking back, "your friend, Mr. Fuller, is very handsome. I wish I'd seen him before;" and then she drove away.

"Let us come back to the garden," Adrian Fuller said, when Dolly returned to the sitting-room. "I have not said good-bye to it yet. We will not stay long, Mrs. Woodward," he said; "I only want to stroll round it once more." So the children followed him.

"Do you know," said Dolly, "I think trees know all sorts of strange things. I always feel as if they are my friends too." And she looked up at the sheltering branches of her favourite sycamore, through which the stars were glittering. "This is where we buried Venus," she added. "Netta came and caught us."

"Yes; and said Dolly was too big for that sort of thing," said Tom.

"What was that about the rose?"

"Nothing," said Dolly, hastily.

"I'll tell you," said Tom. "Dolly had a rose to give you, and Netta wanted it, and Dolly wouldn't let her have it."

"Be quiet, Tom!" exclaimed Dolly, angrily; "it's very mean of you to tell tales."

"And then," continued Tom, remorselessly, "Netta said Dolly was in love with you."

"Tom!" gasped Dolly, and burst into tears. Adrian Fuller laughed, he could not help it, till he saw poor Dolly's face, frightened, proud, and pale, ashamed of her position and her tears. Then he smoothed the dark hair off her brow.

"Never mind, Dolly, little woman," he said, soothingly. "Perhaps, when I come back in two years' time I shall be in love with you."

"Isn't sister Netta pretty?" asked Sally, when they were all in the house again. Mrs. Woodward looked up eagerly. She was so proud of her eldest daughter.

"Pretty!" he answered; "she has the loveliest face I ever saw in my life! I would give anything to get a chance of sketching it." Dolly looked up wonderingly at him, thinking vaguely that it was a great blessing to be beautiful, and he, seeing the grave childlike face, with the troubled look it had worn beneath the sycamore tree still upon it, forgot the Beauty, and talked to his old playmate, who would never be his playmate more.

"What did you do with the rose, after all?"

"It is there," she said, pointing to a side table, where it had lain since the morning. He went and took it up, limp and broken as it was, and put it between the leaves of a pocket sketch-book.

"I shall keep it in remembrance," he said.

"He never wanted to paint you, Dolly," said Tom, a little later, when by the star-shine the children watched their friend out of sight. "And he did Netta? He thinks you a guy."

"Yes," answered Dolly, absently.

"Netta will cut you out when he comes back," he added, obligingly. Dolly looked at him almost bewildered for a moment, she was thinking of Adrian Fuller's words, "Perhaps when I come back in two years I shall be in love with you," and he had taken her rose too! It seemed to Dolly afterwards that she had learnt so much in that day. She had strayed out of her Eden, and the penalty of knowledge is this—that ignorance cannot be regained.

"No she won't," she answered, sorrowfully, for she was thinking of his absence, not of his return, or of what would happen then.

(To be continued).

"NO NIGHT THERE."

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC., ETC.

"And there shall be no night there."—REV. xxii. 5.

ONE of the most attractive descriptions of the heavenly life is, that there is no night, no darkness there. This is generally quoted or referred to as a peculiar height of glory and blessedness; and so it is. Yet night is here in many respects beneficent. In our present earthly condition we could not bear continuous unshaded light; therefore the Creator has interchanged it with darkness. As the day dies into night, every morning comes as a sort of resurrection; and as darkness maintains its turn, light becomes to us the more welcome. Night, then, is a boon to the earth. During the darkness the dew is formed and deposited for its refreshment, and other influences are exerted, so that vegetable and animal life are both benefited by the regular recurrence of night. Thus, it answers wise and beneficial purposes in the economy of Nature and the arrangements of Providence. But in heaven there is no night—

> No night,
> But light—
> Ineffable, eternal light.
> No night, oh where?
> Where God the Saviour fills the place,
> And with the brightness of His face
> Makes sorrow, sin, and darkness flee.
> In heaven, throughout eternity—
> No night is there!"

1. Night, as the season of darkness, is the emblem of ignorance. In the darkness of night men cannot see their position or surroundings, for there is no vision then. The traveller or tourist who arrives in a moonless night at some Alpine village can see nothing of the glaciers around him, or of the snow-peaks which transcend the clouds and pierce the skies above him, or of the abysses near him, down which avalanches have occasionally rolled for many centuries past; he can only see the furniture and the faces in the room where he sits, lighted up by the fire in the stove or the lamp on the table. What a revelation does morning make, when it comes! But not so marvellous as will be the transition, at death, from the gloom and obscurity of this world to the radiant clearness of the heavenly state, where there is no night. In the hours of night there is no clearness of perception, and danger of stumbling is in proportion to the thickness of the darkness. "Therefore night shall be unto you, that ye shall not have a vision; and it shall be dark unto you, that ye shall not divine" (Micah iii. 6). Such, according to the prophet, was the condition natural and judicial of man in this life. But in heaven there will be no night, no darkness, no stumbling; it is the region of accurate and perfect knowledge. "Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known" (1 Cor. xiii. 12). This world is a region of mingled light and obscurity—shadow and sunshine are mixed and interchanged; the cloudy and dark days are many. In the heavenly life it will be light always, and light entirely. How little we know on earth, how limited our scope of vision, how feeble our powers, how liable are we to doubt, mistake, and error! The difference between our knowledge here and what it will be hereafter in the world where there is no night is inconceivable. Our vision will always be finite, and our knowledge the knowledge of creatures, but its expansion will be wonderful; and there will be no eclipse to darken the prospect, no clouds or shadows to hinder our progress. There will be no mistake, no error, no stumbling, no misapprehension then, but clearness of perception, fulness of vision, and glory of widening prospect impossible to us now. Truth is the natural food of the mind, but our nourishment on it here is only partial and feeble. The sum of all our knowledge in this life is so fragmentary that, in comparison with the knowledge of the life to come, St. Paul likens it to the imperfect notions of childhood in comparison with the ideas of manhood. When the Christian dies and goes to his heavenly home he will look back upon the sum-total of his knowledge of truth on earth, as in old age he looks back upon his infantile or childish plays. There we shall have clear views of truth—the truth about God, ourselves, redemption, and the universe; and shall see, in the reconciliation of all things in Christ, verities too high for us now fairly or fully to understand, and even to the dim thought of which we can only soar by the force of a faith which is "the evidence of things not seen." What revelations will burst upon us in our future life, and what disclosures will be made to us there, when our eyes will be unsealed, we cannot tell; but as light here is suited to the nature and capability of the eye, so there the effulgence of the discoveries and the grandeur of the knowledge will be in keeping with the grasp and energy of our emancipated powers. As there will be no night there, we shall have clear views of duty as well as truth. "If a man walk in the night, he stumbleth." In this world, with its entanglements and obscurities, we are often perplexed as to what we should do or which way we should take in some particular crisis of life, and the perplexity brings trouble and anxiety; but in heaven all will be transparent, and the path of duty ever clear, so that stumbling or mistake will be as impossible as sin. What we ought to do will be intuitively seen, without a hindrance or a cloud. The light and resplendence of the land where there is no night, eye hath not seen nor heart conceived.

2. Night, as the time of darkness, is the season of inactivity. Work is for the day-time. "Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour, until the evening." When the sun sets and the shades of darkness fall, labour is left for repose, and men retire to rest. This is a most merciful arrangement, adapted to our condition and constitution here, for work in the hours which should be devoted to sleep, if continuous or frequent, is injurious. "The night cometh," said the Saviour, "when no man can work." But in heaven there is no inactivity, and no room or need for cessation. There energy never tires, there work never wearies, there activity never declines. Here on earth Nature itself seems to need repose, and the land has to lie fallow, and the vitality of vegetation seems in abeyance during the months of winter. But the sun is ever marching in his beneficent strength, the moon is ever waxing or waning, the stars are ever shining. So in heaven there is no exhaustion of energy, no diminution of strength, no ebbing of activity, for there is "no night there." And the activity of the saints will be varied—as varied, doubtless, as are their pursuits and enjoyments on earth. Some, with the grasp of their intellectual nature predominant, may have new truths to discover, new worlds and new works of God to explore, and new sciences to evolve. Some, with their emotional nature in the ascendant, will find—as, indeed, all will find—raptures of gladness in the contemplation of the Saviour's goodness and truth, and ever sing with fresh delight—

> "Millions of years our wondering eyes
> Shall o'er Thy beauties rove,
> And endless ages we'll adore
> The glories of Thy love."

And some, with energy for service gained in their preparatory course on earth, may be employed on missions of blessing inconceivable to us now; and some there will be of whom it is truly said—

> "They also serve who only stand and wait."

All will be exercised according to their ability and peculiarity, but nowhere will there be any sense of weariness. Here the flesh is weak while the spirit is willing. The body is often felt to be burdensome, and the most agreeable occupation at length palls upon us. But in heaven there is no night, for no night is required in which to recruit expended strength or to restore exhausted energy. There the redeemed will never tire of the triumphs of song, or of the joys of fellowship, or of the delights of service. Fit exercise and enjoyment for the ransomed sons of God, in holy energy, guided by perfect wisdom and inspired by perfect love, will fill and occupy the saints in light.

3. Night, as the time of darkness, is hailed on earth as the opportunity of sin. Iniquity and shame, which hide their heads in the day-time, come forth to do their temptations and revel in their abominations at night. Gross sins are mostly committed under the shades of darkness. The assassin, the burglar, the thief, the sensualist, find night the fittest season for the accomplishment of their wicked purposes. The moral and social "pestilence walketh in darkness." "They that be drunken are drunken in the night." It was at night that Belshazzar and his nobles, in his impious feast at Babylon, brought forth "the golden vessels" taken from the temple, to drink in them defiance to the God of Israel. And at night, for the most part, the fooleries, debaucheries, and great crimes of the world are done. In the day wicked men concoct their evil projects, plan their orgies, and in the night perform them. But into heaven "there shall in no wise enter anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie." There is "no night there"—no deed, no thought, no wish or purpose needing to be under the cover of darkness. "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all." He dwells "in the light which no man can approach unto." How pure is light! The sunbeam, falling on a feculent pool and revealing its impurity, is reflected back from its surface pure and uncontaminated. It comes from heaven, and is reflected as pure as when it comes. "Darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people" in this unregenerate world: but heaven is the inheritance of the saints in light. They are there without "spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing;" their robes have been washed, and made "white in the blood of the Lamb." There is nothing in their heavenly condition which can be represented as darkness or defilement—no sin, no shadow—but light, all light for ever. "The city has no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." Here in this world "men love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." The idea of the connection between darkness and evil is thus often suggested to us by the phraseology of Scripture; and we can conceive no greater change in the character and condition of men, than is represented by their translation from this region of obscurity and darkness to that world where there is no night, where there is no evil to hide, but where thought, feeling, and action are in the full blaze of unclouded and perfect light, because in the effulgent presence of God and the Lamb.

4. In night there is a sense of insecurity—sometimes imaginary, indeed, but often real. In the darkness many of our dangers we do not see; nor can we discern our foes. When the shades of night fall, and evening closes in upon us, we shut our gates, lock or bolt our doors, fasten down our windows, and take all needful precautions to protect ourselves and our property against the invasion of the robber and the cunning of the thief, who take advantage of the darkness to ply their craft. But in heaven, as there is no night, and no sense of insecurity, beautiful is the thought suggested by the words, "The gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there." They present a bright and attractive picture of security and peace—in Eastern lands perhaps more expressively than to us, with all our appliances and organisations for safety by night as well as by day. The gates of Jerusalem are still shut every evening, at the close of the day, that no foe may come into the sacred city unawares, during the hours when its inhabitants are asleep. To the writer and some travelling companions it happened, a few years ago, that on arriving at the convent of St. Catharine's, in the wilderness of Sinai, after sunset, they found the gates shut, and no entreaty could induce the authorities to open them for our admission, so that we had to find what sleep we could in the open air, at the foot of Jebel Musa. This was simply, on the part of the monks, the carrying out of a law which, for the safety of the convent, had been maintained for many centuries. There is no night in the celestial city, no insecurity, and no shutting of the gates. There is no enemy to encounter there—no darkness which by any possibility can conceal a foe—no evil which can unexpectedly assail us, or dangers into which we can suddenly fall.

What a wonderful change this will be from the moral and social state of things in this world and this life! Here we are exposed to temptations of many kinds; our spiritual enemies take advantage of our weakness, and invade our peace; they hide themselves in the clouds of gloom and uncertainty which often envelope the soul, or hang over the horizon of our hopes. The pestilence which harasses the mind or pollutes the soul walks in darkness. The weakness of our faith invites its approach, and makes us often an easy prey to its evil influences. The changes and uncertainties which belong to this life tend to produce careless indifference; and indifference is perilous. The apprehension, even, of vicissitudes, such as is felt by many, endangers safety; and the obscurities of time and the mists of this world produce insecurity. But in heaven there is nothing to fear; there the citizens never tremble from a sense of danger; there peace is never disturbed, hope is never blighted, and the harvest of joy never fails; there the life can never be soiled, nor can character ever degenerate, for there is "no night there." "Purity dreads no assault, holiness fears no decay," blessedness anticipates no cessation or diminution, for ever.

5. Night, as the season of darkness, is the occasion and emblem of depression. What an influence has a dull, foggy day upon the spirits! To be sunless is to be cheerless. The trial or disappointment which comes upon us unexpectedly at night looks very dark: it puts on the gloomiest aspect, and appears of the most hopeless or forbidding character. But with the light of the morning it has apparently undergone a striking change: we can look at it calmly, and speak of it hopefully, if not cheerfully. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." How blessed and cheering, then, is the influence of light! "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart." When the sun sets, and the shades of night come on, the animal creation seems to feel a consequent depression: the song of the lark is hushed, and the gambolling of the lambs and other creatures ceases, to be renewed with the return of light in the rising sun. Then Nature smiles again, and all life seems to revive. Of symbols of sadness and depression, can anything be more dismal, dreary, or dreadful, than that which represents the final abode of the impenitent and wicked as the region of "outer darkness"? But in heaven there is no darkness, no night: "they need no candle, neither light of the sun: for the Lord God giveth them light." Yea, more: "the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." We are assured that sorrow and sighing are for ever fled away out of the heavenly world; all tears are wiped from every eye, and all occasions of grief are for ever gone. There is nothing there to afflict, or depress, or disturb, any more. It is the land of everlasting day, of unclouded noon, of radiant light, where lies the unfading inheritance of the saints. It is at God's right hand, where "everlasting joy is upon their heads"—the very fulness of joy—and where "there are pleasures for evermore."

In this home of liberty and life, of perfection and love, there will be nothing to fear for ever, but something to hope for always; abounding happiness, world without end. Our highest business here, then, is to receive the light and dwell under the radiance of the Sun of Righteousness; to walk as children of the light and of the day, having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. Thus shall we find growing meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light. The voice of Christ is to every one of us, "Walk in the light."

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 19. St. Paul at Corinth and Ephesus.

Chapters to be read—Acts xviii., xix. (parts of.)

INTRODUCTION. Last lesson spoke of St. Paul at Athens — capital city of Greece. Was there any other large town? must visit it also; so goes to Corinth.

I. St. Paul at Corinth. (Read xviii. 1—17.) (1) The tentmakers. What Jews did he find at Corinth? From what city had they been banished, and by whom? Of what trade were they? Explain that all Jews, even well-to-do men, learned a trade, so as never to be left destitute. Picture St. Paul being welcomed into the workshop, the friends working together, the long talks over their work, the pleasant evenings for searching the Scriptures when work over. Refer to ver. 26 to show that Priscilla joined in these readings, and was consequently able, with her husband, to be useful to Apollos. Let the children see from this the advantage of studying the Scriptures in some Bible class, or two or three together. Benefit to themselves and others. How different these good people to the other Jews! (2) The Jews. How did St. Paul always spend his Sabbaths? Who joined him at Corinth? Now for the last time he preaches first and especially to the Jews; evidently felt much their opposition; and with special earnestness bore witness to Christ (ver. 5). Remind how his words would come with greater effect because of his being himself at first an unbeliever in Christ. Was there any effect? What did St. Paul say to those who opposed? When had similar words been said before? As the Jews rejected St. Paul, so had they rejected Christ before, with same result (Matt. xxvii. 25). Tell how fearfully this was fulfilled by the destruction and dispersion of Jewish nation. But some did believe—who were they? (ver. 8.) (3) The Vision. St. Paul, having much to try him in Corinth, how would he feel? Very trying to meet with constant opposition and unbelief. How was he encouraged? What a comfort this dream would be! Would wake in the morning, like Jacob, feeling that God had been very near him (Gen. xxviii. 12). Remind also of Elijah's feeling despondent in the wilderness—he alone left of all the prophets. The Jews having rejected God, he was told of 5,000 faithful people (1 Kings xix. 18). So now St. Paul told of much people in Corinth (ver. 10); therefore, with new vigour, he taught for eighteen months.

PRACTICAL LESSON. God's presence with his faithful servant. A boy in school or at work, trying to do something for Christ, jeered at, ridiculed, finds efforts all in vain, as he thinks. Let him patiently trust and wait on God; will find some special sense of God's presence given. Perhaps find the "bread cast on waters" produce results where least expected.

II. A JOURNEY FINISHED. (Read 12—22.) (1) Gallio. On what charge was Paul brought before Gallio? Show that Gallio, being the Roman governor, had nothing to do in his court with questions as to the Jewish ecclesiastical law. So, what did he say? What charges could he decide? But St. Paul had done no offence in that way, so the charge was dismissed. What do the Jews do in their anger? Attack Sosthenes, and beat him. This an offence which Gallio ought to have punished, but he cared for none of these things. (2) Ephesus. Now St. Paul leaves Corinth. Who go with him? and when do they come? Does he keep to his intention of turning to the Gentiles? No. Must still reason with Jews. Has such longing for their salvation (Rom. x. 1). What do the Christians at Ephesus beg him to do? Why will he not? Being a Jew will still observe the Jewish feasts, but promises to return. So he ends his second journey by returning, as before, to Antioch.

III. THE CHURCH AT EPHESUS. (1) Apollos. (Read xviii. 24—28.) Now hear of a new and most promising convert, educated at Alexandria, capital of learning. A Jew, learned in Jewish Scriptures. By them had learned much, but still anxious to learn more. What did he do? He taught boldly in the synagogue—did all he could. Who heard him, and taught him still more? Let children notice these points about Apollos: (a) He was anxious to learn. Though well read, and himself a public teacher, he continued to learn all he could; never considered his education finished. (b) He was humble—willing to receive instruction from Aquila and his wife. (c) He was useful. See what the church at Ephesus wrote; letters of commendation. What report was received of him? Not only helped believers, but was mighty in convincing unbelieving Jews in Achaia. Who had sown the seed there? Now the harvest reaped. So successful was he that many at Corinth made a party for him in rivalry with St. Paul, for which were reproved by St. Paul in a letter (1 Cor. i. 12). (2) A Baptism. (Read xix. 1—7.) While Apollos is thus useful at Corinth, St. Paul pays a second visit to Ephesus. What question does he ask the converts? They not only not received, but not even heard of outpouring of Holy Ghost. Been baptised with John's baptism, what did he require? Repentance. Yes, but more than that. Faith in Him who was coming, who should baptise with fire (Matt. iii. 11).

PRACTICAL LESSON. Duty of following on to know the Lord. Those anxious to learn will be taught more. Must use all means of grace in our power; will then be guided into all knowledge. Only use well what have got.

Questions to be answered.

1. What was St. Paul's trade, and with whom did he work?
2. What do you know of Aquila and Priscilla?
3. What encouragement did St. Paul receive at Corinth?
4. Describe the character of Apollos.
5. What was wanting in John's baptism?
6. Suggest a practical lesson.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XLI.

MR. DE COURCY vehemently opposed the adjournment of the inquest, which Mr. Allonby, acting on Eda's behalf, now demanded. His wife, already prostrated with grief for her child's untimely death, had suffered enough, without being tortured with questions concerning a matter that could throw but little, if any, light upon the case. That Mrs. de Courcy could not have made the fatal error Miss Granton had herself testified; what, then, would she have to tell that would assist the jury in their verdict?

A discussion ensued, to which the sad weary Eda was vainly striving to turn a deaf ear, when she caught the sound of 'Ria Ingle's voice raised in urgent supplication.

"Oh please, sir! oh please, gentlemen! do let me come in! do let me speak!" she was pleading, in tones that quavered with terror at her own boldness. "Oh, if I may, please! I did not know—I did not understand, before, what the gentlemen meant when they came and asked me questions. But it isn't true that Manon did not go into the nursery after Miss Granton left it. I don't know why she said she did not, but it isn't true."

"What is she saying?" asked Fritz, who had indistinctly heard a word here and there; and, telling her not to be frightened, he led her forward, and bade her say all she knew.

Gaining courage as she went on, the girl told how, on the evening of Violet's death, she had been sent up-stairs by Mrs. de Courcy's maid to fetch something from her bed-room, which was in an upper story. She had slipped off her heavy shoes, to avoid disturbing any one, and was descending with the article for which she had been sent, when she saw Eda leading the sobbing Mrs. de Courcy across the landing, in the direction of that lady's own apartments. Startled by their appearance she let the reel of silk she held drop from her hands. It rolled into a corner, and while she was groping for it Manon emerged from her chamber, stole on tiptoe to Mrs. de Courcy's door, where she was kneeling with her ear to the keyhole, when one of the children cried out from the nursery. Their nurse ceased her espial, and went to answer the call, and 'Ria proceeded down-stairs, to be well scolded for having been so long away.

When the girl had finished her story Manon was recalled, and confronted with her.

"You have deceived us!" her master sternly exclaimed. "You declared that you had not been in the nursery!"

Manon tried to repeat the falsehood, but she was a coward at heart, and the sight of the grave faces around awed her so much that she broke down in the middle of a vehement protest, and by slow degrees the truth was extorted.

Curiosity had drawn her from her bed when she heard Mrs. de Courcy's sobs, and the same hateful passion had led her into the nursery, where Violet, aroused by the same sounds, was tossing on her pillow, and crying out for Miss Granton. Finding the child had nothing to tell, but was inclined to be irritable and restless, Manon snatched up the spoon and glass to give her a dose of her medicine. Without glancing at the label, she made the poor child swallow the nauseous dose, and then left her—without, it must be added, the slightest suspicion of the truth until aroused from sleep with the tidings that Violet was dying.

At first it was only a natural dread of her master's anger that made Manon desirous of concealing her share in the disastrous event; but when she found that Eda was suspected, her silence was prompted by less pardonable motives. Her selfish fears lest a confession of her mistake should militate against her procuring another situation had mingled with a revengeful feeling towards the governess whose consistent conduct and gentle firmness had been continual rebukes of her own violent temper. It was partly in remorse for what she had done, and partly to avoid the questions she found so difficult to parry, that Manon had betaken herself to the sick-room of Mrs. de Courcy; assuring herself that she was making amends for the past by her care of her unhappy mistress.

"Now you must let me take you away, for Gran and Doris to nurse you. Indeed, you look quite worn out!" Fritz urged, when the painful scene was over, and Eda, still breathless at her narrow escape, was leaning upon his breast, and murmuring her thankfulness that her innocence was fully proven. But ere she could assent to his proposal they were joined by Mr. de Courcy, who had already expressed his regret for his own doubts in a very gratifying manner.

"You are not going to leave us, I hope!" he said, anxiously.

"Miss Granton is so thoroughly unfit to bear more fatigue or worry, that you must excuse me if I hurry her away," Mr. Allonby replied.

"Certainly. No one can find fault with you for taking care of her—better care than we have ever testified; but I hoped she would prove that she forgives us by staying, at least until we have lain our child in her grave."

This appeal was irresistible. Eda forgot how careless, how haughty, Mr. de Courcy had been in former days, scarcely condescending to recognise the existence of the humble governess, or how lately he had railed at her with cruel harshness. Sickness, poverty, death, were now hovering about him; his fashionable friends were rapidly falling away; and she pitied him greatly.

"Let me stay, Fritz!" she whispered, thus acknowledging his right to guide her. "Now Manon is gone, there is no one else to attend to Mrs. de Courcy."

He shrugged his shoulders, but consented, and loved her all the better for such ready forgetfulness of herself. Others, too, during the sorrowful days that followed, learned to appreciate her as she deserved, and never spoke of her afterwards without a little thrill of gratitude for such true and disinterested friendship.

Not till Mrs. de Courcy was sufficiently recovered to be moved to the house of her parents, where she would be affectionately tended, did Eda leave her. As soon as that time arrived, the beautiful house in Tyburnia was dismantled, and its contents scattered. Creditors seized upon the valuable paintings and statuary and bric-a-brac that had adorned it, and in a little while the gay couple, whose sumptuous entertainments had never wanted for guests, would be forgotten. Mr. de Courcy was glad to accept a post as vice-consul at some remote foreign port, where his salary would be somewhat less than he had once paid to the chef of his kitchen; but his wife and child would go into exile with him, and the lessons of adversity, though bitter at the time, so often bear good fruit, that, Eda ventured to hope there was happiness yet in store for him.

With a curl of Violet's hair in her pocket-book, and a few forget-me-nots plucked from the child's grave when she went with the weeping mother to bid it farewell, Eda took her departure from the

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"There has been enough said."—p. 331.

mansion, where bills of the coming sale were posted in every window; and, after a brief visit to the Allonbys, started for Sydenham, where a note from Sophie—received that morning—assured her she would be affectionately welcomed.

CHAPTER XLII.

Mark Granton had thought proper to consider himself aggrieved by his sister's obstinacy in remaining with the de Courcys after what he designated as their infamous suspicions; he had therefore held aloof even more than usual, and she knew nothing concerning him but what she gathered from Sophie's notes. These, too, became briefer every week, and rarely contained any tidings of Mark beyond a curt "My husband is well." Whether she agreed with him any better Mrs. Granton did not say, nor did Eda like to inquire; but she hoped, from the wife's silence on this point, that her sense of his coldness and neglect—if they still continued—was less keen than it had been.

Sophie's pleasure when her guest arrived manifested itself in so many acts of kindness that Eda was almost overpowered. When she had admired the pretty room, newly furnished for her use; the flower-stand fixed in her window, and filled with the flowers she loved best; and tried the piano Sophie had chosen for her, and which was to be her own when Mr. Allonby took her away—she was glad to be left alone.

Mark, when he returned home in the evening, was less gracious, for he added to his greeting kiss the remark that Eda came too late to deserve any thanks for her compliance, and that while she was devoting herself to Mrs. de Courcy she had quite overlooked the fact that Sophie had greater claims upon her than any stranger.

"I stayed with Mrs. de Courcy because she was ill and in trouble," she explained.

"And has not Sophie been ill, too?"

"I was not aware of it. You did not tell me that anything was amiss," and Eda turned to her sister-in-law, who pressed her hand, and smiled rather sadly.

"There was no necessity for making you uneasy, my dear; you could not have done me any good had you been here."

"That does not lessen Eda's unkindness in staying away," Mark retorted. And his sister forgave his ill-humour to herself, in consideration of the kindlier feeling he was evincing for his wife.

While sitting with Sophie on the following morning she said something of the kind, and was rather disconcerted when a heavy sigh was the only response her observation received. Surely Mark and his wife were more united than they used to be! He came home earlier, showed more consideration for her wishes, and actually set aside a plan of his own, to carry out another that she suggested. Yet Sophie's eyes never lighted up as they used to do, nor did her pale face flush with pleasure, as in the old times, whenever he spoke affectionately. Had his unkindness quite killed the love she had once lavished upon him? No; Eda could not believe this, for she was more careful for his comforts, more yielding, more quietly desirous of pleasing him, than she had ever been before; although she permitted rather than accepted his attentions with a curious air of depression as though they pained as much as they gratified her.

About a week after Eda's arrival at Sydenham the trio were sitting at breakfast together and looking over the contents of the post-bag. Mrs. Granton had but one letter, from the agent who managed her West Indian property. Mark, however, had several, and Eda was not without her share. Fritz Allonby's note was slipped into her pocket, to be read when she was alone, but her other letters were opened at once. There was a long affectionate epistle from Lady Eudora Chesney, now the happy wife of her cousin; and a sadder but equally kind one from Mrs. de Courcy, who confessed to be hourly missing the gentle but active girl who had helped her to bear up against such a weight of troubles.

While Eda was wading through the closely-written pages, she became aware that Mark was urging something upon his wife which distressed and agitated her.

"Do not go away!" Mrs. Granton said, as she rose, not knowing whether to remain or leave them together. "If Mark is as satisfied that he is doing right as he professes to be, he cannot object to your knowing what it is he wishes me to do."

"Eda can stay, if you like. My request is not such an absurd one that I need mind who hears it," he answered, defiantly. "As to acting rightly, I think I ought to be allowed to judge for myself sometimes."

"Tell her, then, that you wish me to sell out one thousand pounds, that you may invest it in shares in the new company you have assisted in founding."

"It will be to our mutual advantage if I do," he declared, though his eyes avoided his sister's inquiring ones. "I should not wish it unless I was very certain that you will never have cause to regret your compliance."

"And you assure me that this company is a flourishing one?" Mrs. Granton observed, rather incredulously.

"Certainly it is. It has in it all the elements of success. You shall have better interest for your money, my Sophie, than you have dreamed of!"

"And yet Mr. Edwards, whom I went to see last week, and commissioned to make searching inquiries into the affair, writes me word that it cannot stand unless a large number of the shares are taken up; and that even then its ultimate success is doubtful."

On hearing this Mark forgot himself, and flew into a passion. His wife disgraced herself and him by setting a mean-spirited lawyer to pry into his concerns, and make garbled reports of his doings! Was he a rogue, that he was treated in this manner? Did Sophie think that he would risk so large a sum unless he had convinced himself that it would be safe?

"I do not doubt your good intentions," she interposed; "but I fear you are over-sanguine."

"Fear!" he repeated, scoffingly. "Say at once that you are determined to make my life a burden to me by your love of domineering. You want me to be a child, a puppet in your hands, going where you please and doing as you please; and threatened with hysterics and reproaches if I exercise a will of my own. You take a mean advantage of your power, madam! It is you who hold the purse, and you make me feel this every hour of my existence."

"No, Mark, no!" she faltered.

"But I tell you, Yes! yes! You know that I am deeply interested in this company, and that I ask nothing more than as your husband I am justified in demanding, but your mean, miserly disposition, your eagerness to keep me under your thumb, thwarts every plan I form! This is not the first time by many that you have made me feel my helplessness, and exulted in your own petty triumphs."

"You are too cruel, Mark!" she answered, clinging to Eda for support, for she was trembling in every limb with suppressed agitation. "No such degrading motives have influenced me. How can you upbraid me in this manner?—you who for the last few days have been kind—not because you love me, but to regain your ascendency, and coax and flatter me into compliance with your wishes. Why have you taught me to despise you?"

"There has been enough said!" cried Mark, pushing back his chair with such force that it fell over. "I might have known by experience that if I asked a favour you would hedge out with some such excuses as these. If your money is dearer to you than I am, keep it! keep it!"

"Stay, Mark!" she exclaimed, sitting up and composing herself, though she was white to the lips, and kept her hand tightly pressed to her side. "I do not refuse you the thousand pounds you say you require. I will give it you, if you insist upon it; but, for both our sakes, don't do so. We may not be together long: do not cloud the remaining hours of our union with dissension, nor compel me to feel that I have been thoroughly deceived in you. It is not from any covetous love of money that I have demurred at your request—indeed it is not!"

"But you expect me to knuckle under to your chief adviser, clever sapient Mr. Edwards, whose opinions you always adopt in preference to mine."

"I have great faith in Mr. Edwards, and with good reason; but I have no desire to force his opinions upon you," she answered. "It is the whole system of speculative investments that I object to; and I feel that I ought not to be forced to embark our capital in them."

"Are you going over all the old ground again?" Mark irritably queried, as he snatched up his hat.

"No, I am not equal to it;" and she pointed to writing materials. "I will give you what you require if you still wish it; but, Mark, I warn you that it will be the last sum you will ever obtain from me."

"There is no necessity to tell me this. I dare say I shall be in a position to repay you the whole amount very shortly."

Sophie sighed, and began to write, then paused to regard her impatient husband steadfastly; but he would not perceive her pleading looks, and taking out his watch, held it towards her, that she might see how she was detaining him.

Still she lingered over her task. "Mark, if you had asked me to refrain from doing anything as urgently as I have asked you to spare me this trial, I could not have refused."

He heard her with ill-concealed annoyance. "No, my dear, I dare say not; you are a good creature. But I shall lose the train if you keep me any longer."

She signed the paper, and pushed it towards him; but when he put out his hand to take it she laid her own on his, and spoke more earnestly than before. "Oh, my husband! it is not worth the price you are giving for it. You may have all the success you hope for, you may double this amount, but it will never compensate for the love and trust you destroy in gaining it. Believe me, that in winning what we crave we often lose what is of far more importance to us!"

"You are quite enigmatical this morning," he replied. "If it goes to your heart to part with this money, for goodness sake keep it, and I will get it elsewhere!"

The wife's arms dropped by her side, and she leaned back in her chair, looking so ghastly that Eda bent over her in alarm. "Do not leave us!" she cried to her brother; "Sophie is ill!"

But he made light of the attack, though he assisted his wife to the sofa, and stood by till she opened her eyes and pronounced herself better.

"She will excite herself so foolishly!" he muttered in Eda's ear. "I wish you could imbue her with a little of your own composure. I hate to see women always flying into extremes!"

Perhaps Mrs. Granton caught the purport of his speech, for she turned from his proffered kiss, and when he asked if he could bring her anything from town, her only reply was a dissenting shake of the head.

However, Mark went away in high spirits, with the precious slip of paper in his pocket-book; and Sophie, after an ineffectual attempt to regain her composure, confessed that she felt very ill, and went to bed. Eda sat beside her till she seemed drowsy, and then went to answer her letters, hoping to find her sister-in-law refreshed by a sleep when she rejoined her.

Mark was peevish when he came home and found his wife too unwell to take her place at the dinner-table. "He could not understand a woman fretting," he crossly said—"actually fretting over her money, when she was induced to part with any of it!"

"Is it possible," Eda retorted, indignantly—"is it possible you do not comprehend that it is not the loss of her money for which Sophie grieves, but something of far more consequence to an affectionate wife?"

"No lecturing, Eda," he interposed. "I will not submit to it from you. No wife has had her comforts studied more thoroughly than Sophie. If she will make herself miserable because it is not in my nature to play the ardent lover, I cannot help it. Leave her alone, and she will be more rational to-morrow."

However, the morrow found Sophie still the invalid. She had suffered another attack in the night, and it had left her in such a state of exhaustion that Eda, now thoroughly alarmed, insisted on having advice. But she was scarcely prepared for the verdict of the medical gentleman whom her note brought to the villa. He had seen Mrs. Granton twice before, and had warned her of the danger of giving way to any agitation. He did not think she would rally again, although he would try every remedy he could devise. Were not her friends aware that for some time past her heart had been extensively diseased? Mrs. Granton herself had known it, and had spoken to him with great resignation of her impending death.

When Eda recovered the shock these tidings inflicted she telegraphed for Mark, who had left for London by an early train; but he had been summoned to Manchester on business connected with his new undertaking, and her summons did not reach him until the following day. Nor even then did he hurry home! Eda was easily frightened, he told himself, and Sophie was fond of punishing him for his offences by professing to be very ill. He could not or would not believe that there was anything serious in this attack, and was horror-stricken when, on his appearance at Sydenham, his sister met him with the sorrowful cry, "You are too late! She will not know you!"

Nor did her eyes unclose, or her lips move, in recognition of his entreating, "Speak to me once more! Oh, my wife, say that you forgive me!"

The marriage—which, after all, was no true marriage, entered into as it was by the one in the hurry of a love that bordered on idolatry, and by the other from mercenary motives—was dissolved by death. Mark had not been in the house ten minutes when the last struggle took place, and he was a widower!

(To be continued.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

TAKING IN STRANGERS.

YES; listen to that startling clangour of military music coming from an upper room. We are standing, you know, in the cheerful kitchen of that Refuge for the Homeless in the renovated old slaughter-house in Newport Market, and I want you to come with me to see the boys' school, which occupies a very considerable portion of that weatherproof but ramshackle building.

Only those who are acquainted with the poverty and the crime of this great metropolis can estimate the deep and urgent need that still exists for refuges in which homeless, destitute, and neglected children can be received for shelter, food, and clothing. Only the practical student of the effects of our present administration of the Education Act can calculate how vast a necessity is likely to exist for the reception and instruction of the children of the poorest, even when all the machinery of the present School Board is put in motion for vindicating the compulsory clause.

Let that clause be interpreted in the most liberal manner—which would be in effect to provide State education without cost to the parents—and the Act will still leave untouched a vast number of children for whom nothing can be done until their physical necessities are provided for—children who are perishing with cold, starving for want of food. A visit to some of the big buildings recently erected by the London School Board will reveal the fact that there are many such children now in attendance: neglected, barefoot, half-clothed, hungry, and with that wistful eager look, sometimes followed by a kind of stupefaction, which may be observed in the poor little outcasts of the streets. There is no reasonable hope of doing much with these little creatures till the "soup-kitchen" and the "free breakfast" are among the appliances of education, where the necessity is most pressing, and the children perish for lack of bread as well as for lack of knowledge.

As it is—I need not refer again to the escape which is always open from the streets to the prison. The few Government industrial-schools to which magistrates occasionally consign young culprits brought before them are intended only for those who come within the cognisance of the law.

The operations of these reformatory-schools are successful so far as they go. They represent seventy-five per cent of successful reformatory training as applied to juvenile transgressors committed by magistrates to their training.

Perhaps, when we are fully impressed with the meaning of the statistics which are published each year in the Report of the Inspectors of Certified Schools in Great Britain, we shall begin to consider how it will be possible to regard destitute children in relation to the guardianship of the state before they qualify themselves for Government interposition by the expedient of committing what the law calls a crime.

The last Report states distinctly that the sooner criminal children are taken in hand, the more complete is their reformation. There are fewer "criminals" of less than ten years of age than there are hardened offenders of from twelve to sixteen. This is, so far, satisfactory; but when we consider that (including Roman Catholic establishments) there are but fifty-three reformatories in England, and twelve in Scotland (thirty-seven of those in England and eight in Scotland being for boys, and sixteen in England and four in Scotland for girls), and that in 1873, when the last Report was issued, the sum-total of children in all these institutions was but 5,622, of whom one-fourth were in the Roman Catholic schools—we cease to wonder at the vast number of homeless, neglected, and destitute children in London alone—a number which, notwithstanding the efforts of philanthropy and the activity of School Board beadles, exceeds the total of all the inmates of the State reformatories throughout the kingdom.

This refuge at Newport Market had included destitute and starving boys among those who were brought to its shelter from the cruel streets, the dark arches of railways and of bridges, and the miserable corners where the houseless huddle together at night, long before its supporters could make provision for maintaining any of the poor little fellows in an industrial-school. But the work grew, and the means were found, first for retaining some of the juvenile lodgers who came only for a night's food and warmth and shelter, and afterwards for receiving them as inmates.

Some of these are sent to the Refuge by persons who are furnished with printed forms of application, or by mothers who can afford evident testimony that they can scarcely live on the few shillings they are able to earn by casual work as charwomen, or by the no less casual employments where the wages are totally inadequate to support a family; while a few lads have themselves applied for admission because they were orphans, or utterly destitute and abandoned by those on whom they might be supposed to have a claim.

A portion of the old building, which has been adapted to the purpose, and has been added as the need for increased space became pressing, is now devoted to the dormitories, play-room, and school-room of some fifty to sixty of this contingent of the great army of friendless children; and at the time of the last Report fourteen had but just left to be enlisted in military bands; two had become military tailors; situations had been found for others; while one had been regularly apprenticed to a tailor in London.

There are frequently several boys ready for such apprenticeship, for tailoring is the only regular trade taught, the time of the lads being occupied in learning to read, write, and cipher, to acquire the outlines of history and geography, and to take a place in the military band which is at this moment making the cranky old building resound with its performance on clarinets, hautboys, cornets, "deep bassoons," and all kinds of wind instruments, under the direction of an able bandmaster, who keeps the music up to the mark with a spirit which bespeaks confidence in the intelligence of his pupils.

This confidence is not misplaced, for during the past year eleven youthful recruits have been drafted from among these boys into the bands of various regiments, while there are above ninety applications still on the books for more musicians who have chosen this branch of the military service. It is a matter of choice, of course; and there are some who prefer to become sailors, or to go into situations and learn the trade of tailoring, that their instructors may be able to recommend them to respectable masters, as apprentices.

But let us walk through the kitchen, and ascend the short zig-zag stairs which lead us by a passage to the school-room, where most of the boys are at work with their slates. Very few of the little fellows are more than thirteen years old, and some of them have been but a short time at school; but even those who came here totally uninstructed have made admirable progress, and some of the writing-books containing lessons from dictation are well worth looking at for their clean and excellent penmanship and fair spelling; while in arithmetic the boys who have been longest under tuition have advanced as far as "practice." There is nothing superfluous in school-room, work-room, or play-room—indeed, one might almost say that they are unfurnished, except for desks and forms and plain deal tables. The play-room is a lower portion of the old slaughter-house, with a high ceiling, to a beam in which is fixed a pair of ropes, terminating in two large wooden rings, by which the youthful gymnasts swing and perform all kinds of evolutions, while a set of parallel bars are among the few accessories.

It is evident that nothing is spent in mere ornament, and that the expenditure is carefully considered, though recreation, and healthy recreation too, is a part of the daily duty, which is regulated in a fashion befitting the rather military associations of the place. Even now, as the cheery superintendent, Sergeant Ramsden, late quartermaster-sergeant of the 16th Regiment, calls "Attention!" every boy is quickly on his feet and ready to greet us; and what is more, the boys seem to like this kind of discipline, for it is kind in its prompt demand for obedience, and the regularity and order includes a kind of self-reliance, which is a very essential part of education for lads who must necessarily be taught what they have to learn in a comparatively short time, and are then sent out where order and promptitude are of the utmost service to them. Economy is studied, but the recollection of the cheery kitchen suggests that there is no griping hard endeavour to curtail the rations necessary to support health and strength. In fact, the boys are sufficiently fed, warmly clothed, and are encouraged both to work and play heartily. Breakfast consists of bread and coffee; dinner, of meat and vegetables three days in the week, fish on one day (Wednesday), pudding on Monday, soup on Friday, meat and cheese on Saturday; tea or coffee, with bread and dripping, while on Sundays butter is an additional luxury both at breakfast and tea; and on Thursdays and Sundays tea is substituted for coffee at the evening meal. All the boys are decently and warmly clothed, and though only some of their number "take to music" as a profession, and choose to go into the military bands, they all receive instruction. They are taught to keep their own bunks and dormitories neat, and, in fact, do their own household work; while, morning and afternoon, personal trimness is promoted by the military "inspection" which is part of the discipline. There is half an hour's play after breakfast, another quarter of an hour before dinner, three-quarters of an hour for "washing and play" after dinner, a quarter of an hour before tea, and from an hour and a half to two hours for boot-cleaning and play before bed-time, besides outdoor exercise daily, except in wet weather, when drill and gymnastics take its place. They also go to Primrose Hill on Tuesday and Saturday afternoons, there to run in the fresh air and disport themselves in cricket, or such games as they can find the toys for by the kindness of the committee or generous visitors. Even with these recreations, however, they find time to go through a very respectable amount of work in the fourteen hours between rising and bed-time: and the letters received from lads who have left the school are an evidence that they remember with pleasure and with gratitude the Refuge that became a home, and to which they attribute their ability to take a place which would have been denied to them without the aid which grew out of pity for their neglected childhood.

Here is a short epistle from one of the juvenile band at Shorncliffe Camp, written a year or more ago:—

"I now take the pleasure of writing these few lines and I hope all the boys are all well, and all in the school and please Mr Ramsden will you send me the parcel up that I took into the school it was laying in the bookcase in the schoolroom and I hope that all the boys are all getting on with their instruments and the snips with their work and I should like you to read it to the boys and I wish that you would let ——— answer it and I am getting on with my instrument very well, and I will be able to come and see you on Cristamas season."

This is a characteristic schoolboy letter, which shows how much boys are alike in all grades. The following is another letter from Shorncliffe:—

"Dear Sir,

"I received your kind and welcome letter along with mothers, and I wrote back to tell you we have all been enlisted and sworn in, and we expect to get our clothes next week and we all feel it our duty to express our deeply felt gratitude to you Mr. Dust and the Committee, and we are all very happy at present please give our respects to Mrs. Ramsden Sister Zillah Mr. McDerby Mr. Mason Mr. Goodwin Miss Cheesman and please remember us to all the boys. Leary is on sick furlough since the 15th of Decr. and has not returned yet and Brenan, Lloyd Graham McCarthy Henderson and all the others are very jolly at present & we have been out all the afternoon amongst the snow So I conclude with kind thanks to one and all and believe me to be Dear Sir

"Your late pupil ———

"Band —— Regt."

The following will show how the memory of the old slaughter-house and the school in Newport Market remains after the boys have left and have entered on a career. It is addressed from Warley Barracks:—

"Dear Sir

"I now take the opportunity of writing to you hoping you and all the rest of the school and the sister also. It is a long time since I left the school now and I dont suppose you would know me if I was to come and see you I was apprentised out off the school along of J—— R—— to Mr W—— in 1869 I think it was as a Tailor. I should like you to write and tell me if you know what Rigment J—— H—— belong to his school number was 34 and mine was 35 me and him was great friends when we were in the school and I should like to know very much were he is. When I left the School Mr. L—— was Supperintendant and I dont suppose I should know you sir if I was to see you I shall try to come down and see the School if I can on Christmas for I shall be on pass to London for seven days and I should like to know where J—— H—— is so as I should be able to see him. I have a few more words to say that is the School was the making of me and I am very thankful to the School for it so with kind love to you all

"I remain your humble servant

"Band ——— Regiment,

"Warley Barracks Essex.

"J—— H—— number was 34 and mine 35.

"Excuse me addressing this Letter to you as I dont know any thing about you sir."

There is something pleasant indeed in letters like these; and I for one am not surprised that the boys should go to their musical practice with a will.

They are just preparing to play something for our especial delight now, and so burst out, in a grand triumphant blast, with "Let the Hills Resound," after which we will take our leave, and, we hope, not without melody in our hearts. Just one word as we go through this kitchen again. Two West End clubs supply the Newport Market Refuge with the remnants of their well-stocked larders. Did it ever occur to you how many hungry children and poor men and women could be fed on the actual waste that goes on daily in hotels, clubs, inns, dining-rooms, and large and ordinary households every day? M. Alexis Soyer used to say that he could feed ten thousand people with the food that was wasted in London every day; and I am inclined to think he was not far wrong. At all events, an enormous salvage of humanity might be effected if only the one meal daily which might be made of "refuse" pieces of meat and bread, bones, cuttings of vegetables, cold potatoes, and general pieces, was secured to the thousands to whom "enough" would often indeed be "as good as a feast." To people who know how much that is really good for food—not the plate-scrapings and leavings, but sound and useful reversions of meat and bread and vegetables, bones, and unsightly corners of joints—is either suffered to spoil or is thrown at once into the waste-tub, both in hotels and private houses, the additional knowledge that there are hungry children in every district in London to whom a bowl of nourishing soup or a plate of minced meat and vegetables would be a boon, may easily be a pain in the inability to suggest how to organise the means of utilising what one is tempted to call undeserved plenty.

AUNT JESSIE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

IN a small back room in a narrow street of one of our large overcrowded manufacturing cities, a woman sat alone at work one wet February afternoon. In consequence of the already waning light, she had drawn her seat as near as possible to the window, whilst she held her work close to her eyes, which she was straining, to enable her to continue yet a little longer at her task.

But darkness seemed to be coming on apace, the heavy clouds—which had stretched themselves like a curtain over the city that afternoon, and had been persistently discharging themselves in torrents of rain for hours without even now showing any sign or cessation—having helped to shut out daylight almost an hour before the usual time.

After further vain endeavours to thread her needle and set a few more stitches in the shirt she was making, the lonely worker gave up the attempt as hopeless; and suffering the garment to fall from her hands, she pressed them over her eyes, as if the latter ached and smarted. Then she sat a while dreamily gazing out through the little window; though the prospect from it was neither cheerful nor extensive.

It was a sweet face that was thus turned away from the darkening room, where the corners were already in shadow, towards the few remaining rays of light which yet came struggling through the thickly-falling rain-drops. It was a face which, if not strictly beautiful—as the features were worn and thin, whilst the eyes were hollow, and the hair fast becoming grey and scanty—was strangely attractive and expressive. It seemed almost like an open page, on which the history of a life had been written, and the workings of the mind within had stamped themselves. Care and suffering—either past or present, or both—were printed there; but so were also patience, and quiet strength, and the courage of endurance. She might have pain to bear, but she was evidently content to bear it.

She sat on for some time, seemingly lost in deep thought; for though the clock struck once or twice she heeded it not.

At length however she roused herself from her reverie, and rising, groped her way to the chimney-piece. Striking a match, she lighted a small candle, and then, still groping, brought out her little tea-pot, and made some tea. But she only allowed herself one cup, and reserving the rest, put the pot on the hob to keep warm.

The rain came against the window, driven by the wind, which howled and moaned, and swept up the street as though it would carry everything before it.

"Poor child! what a walk she'll have! But I hope she's in sheltering somewhere; for it isn't fit for her to be out to-night."

But even as she said this to herself a light tread might have been heard on the stairs. Then the door opened, and a young girl of about seventeen or eighteen years of age entered the room.

The worn face which had been watching for her broke into a bright smile of welcome. "Come at last, Esther!" she exclaimed, as if the time had seemed long. "But I was half hoping you wouldn't turn out such a night as this. How have you managed to walk through all this rain and wind, my child?"

"Oh, I got on very well, Aunt Jessie. It isn't as bad out of doors, perhaps, as it sounds to you here."

When she came nearer the light, she displayed a pleasant, smiling face—something like her aunt's might have been in youth—with a blooming colour which battling with the wind had called into her usually pale cheeks. Her dark brown hair had been blown out of its customary smoothness into some disorder; and as she stood stroking back into their proper places a few stray locks which had straggled into her eyes, she stole, unperceived, a quick observant glance at her aunt's countenance.

"Come near, and let me feel if you are very wet. You must take off your damp things, Esther."

"Yes, aunt, I'll do it at once, and then I can come and sit down by you," replied the girl, retreating, meantime, rather than advancing, as though she did not wish too close an inspection of her state to be made.

Still keeping at a distance, she stooped, and drew from her feet a pair of boots, limp from the rain which had soaked through them, and with signs of holes in them which appeared more unmistakable than ever to-night.

"Let me have your boots, Esther, to put by the fire to dry."

"I can put them down, thank you, aunt dear. There! they'll be all right there," said Esther, placing them as far from the other as possible, as though she wished them to escape observation. Then, kneeling on the floor at her aunt's feet, she laid her arms on her lap, and looking up with her own bright eyes into the faded tired ones of the older woman, she said, coaxingly, "Do put by your work for to-night, auntie. I'm sure you've done enough for to-day: for it has been so wet I don't expect you've been out at all, but have just sat stitching stitching all the time."

"But what should we do, dear, if I didn't?"

"Ah what, indeed!" and a shadow seemed to dim the young eyes for a moment. "But I'll go on with your work now," and she tried to take the shirt from her aunt.

The latter resisted. "No, dear; you must dry yourself first. And, see, I've kept a cup of tea for you; so drink it off, and I hope it will help to keep out the cold."

Whilst the girl was obeying, the neighbouring church clock struck ten.

"How late it is, Esther, before you get home now."

"Yes: we are always so busy I can't be spared any sooner. But now, aunt, let me have the work."

"No; it's time for you to go to bed, dear; after your long day at the shop, standing all the time, you must be tired enough, my child."

"Not so tired that I want to go to bed yet, auntie, for I'm getting used to the standing now; it's only at first people feel it, they say."

Esther gained her point; and whilst her busy fingers stitched she chatted cheerfully, relating all the little events of the day, until the careworn expression gradually passed away from the elder woman's face as she gazed lovingly upon the features of the other—gazed with a wistful, fixed look, as if she foresaw a time coming when she would no longer be able to study them, and so was trying beforehand to impress them upon her mind's eye. But the other appeared unconscious of the gaze, as she worked on without lifting her head. At length, however, Mrs. Lang insisted that it was time to put up.

Esther made but a short night of it. Long before daylight, in the cold chilliness of the winter's morning, she was up, though moving cautiously and quietly so as not to disturb her aunt; of whose waking, however, she had not much fear, as she knew she was apt to lie sleepless for a good while in the earlier part of the night, and then, towards dawn, worn out, she would drop off into a sounder slumber.

She lighted the candle, and then—as though it were a thing she was accustomed to do—she took out the shirt at which her aunt had been working on the previous day, and began hastily unpicking the greater part of what had been done before she came in—at the least every stitch that the other had set after dusk or by candle-light. The young face wore a grave sad look the while, but the busy fingers never paused; and just as she had accomplished the task of doing again what she had undone, and had put it by, her aunt awaking and the clock striking simultaneously, told her that it was time to light the fire and prepare the breakfast, and then get ready to set forth to her daily employment.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

127. What accident occurred while St. Paul was preaching at Troas?

128. Mention passages showing that Nehemiah was noted for his spirit of prayer.

129. Whom did the Jews seek to put to death after he had already died? Quote passage.

130. What was engraven on the front of the high priest's mitre?

131. What relation was Mordecai to Esther?

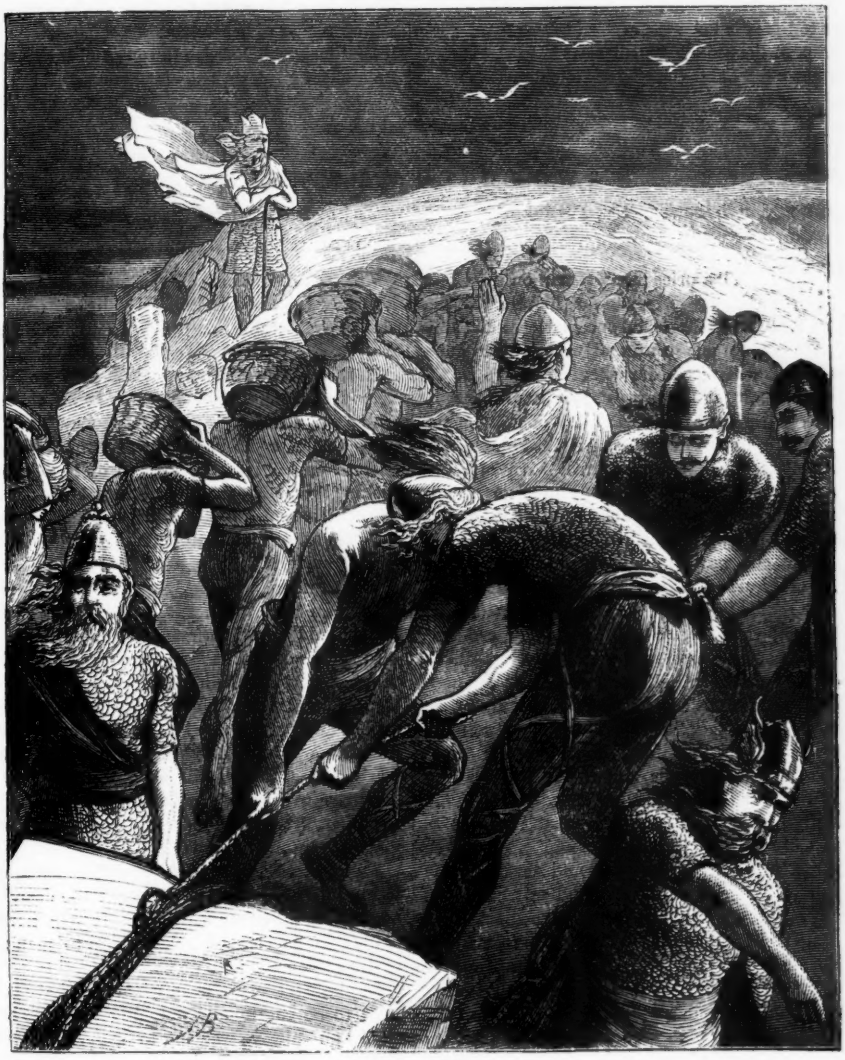
132. Where is our Saviour spoken of as the son of Abraham? Quote passage.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 304.

113. Zipporah (Exodus ii. 21). Six sisters (Exodus ii. 16).

114. 2 Kings xiii. 14.

115. Acts xx. 35.



116. Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Isaiah viii. 3).

117. When St. Peter wished to know what would happen to St. John (John xxi. 21, 22).

118. 2 Kings xiii. 20, 21.

119. The body of Saul (1 Samuel xxxi. 10).

120. Prov. xxvi. 17.

(Drawn by E. BUCKMAN.)

THE SEA-WALL.

THE old sand wall, with grasses waving o'er,
Where the broom blossoms for the earnest bee,
Has been for ages on this level shore
A rampart of defiance to the sea,
Guarding the flats where once its waters rolled
Up to the purple of yon distant wold.

Their names have mouldered from the roll of fame
Who raised this wall in ages long ago;
With toil and peril to the strife they came,
And reared a trophy o'er the baffled foe—
Far better omen to the country-side,
Than fields of blood to nurse a barren pride.

Hark to the roar upon the eastern breeze!
Think of the souls his giant arms have slain!
Sure never did Saint George, or Hercules,
Cope with a monster of more subtle brain,
A grasp more deadly, or a wrath more dread,
And yet they drove him from his ancient bed.

And oft I muse, when night begins to fall,
And, like some cruel monster of unrest,
The hungry tide comes frowning at the wall,
How names of benefactors die unblest,
Whilst men of Belial live in song and tale.
Hail, silent shadows, stalwart heroes, hail!

G. S. OUTRAM, M.A.

TWO-EDGED PROVERBS.

BY THE REV. P. B. POWER, M.A., AUTHOR OF "THE 'I WILLS' OF THE PSALMS," "THE FEET OF JESUS," ETC.

"GOLD MAY BE BOUGHT TOO DEAR" (concluded).

WHAT a price many a man on the Stock Exchange pays for his gold! The feverishness of speculation makes his life one continual worry. He never knows what will meet him when he wakes in the morning; many and many a day he knows that he may be a beggar by the next day of settlement: and thus life passes in one long irritation.

Anxiety as to how things will turn out, disappointments, frettings when things go wrong, make life miserable, and the gold that they purchase to be bought too dear.

Look at the way in which men deprive themselves of any recreation, and those under them too, for gold. Now, without recreation (as the word itself signifies, re-creation or new creation, that is, of strength) men are but poor creatures. The body and the mind both need it. They need it singly; they need it in their relation to each other, as joined together by God, for the work of life. Rest, family comfort, home, are oftentimes paid as the price of gold; and at the price of any one of them gold is bought too dear.

Sleep cannot be lost without the setting up of a whole train of evils in the body, and often in the mind too. The digestion goes, and that alone is enough to account for a thousand miseries; but man never stops to think. He goes to the doctor; and if he will continue in the same course, all that the doctor can do is to patch him up for a time, for no doctor is bold enough or fool enough to say that he can fight successfully against the laws of Nature. And the man goes on, paying his liver, or his brain, or his lungs, or his digestive organs, or his heart, for gold.

There is another account-book kept, besides the one in which Mr. Bull keeps a record of his investments and what he paid for them; and its entries run somewhat thus:—

£10,000 Erics. Ah, how they went up and down! Twelve nights' sleeplessness, with palpitation of the heart, &c.

£5,000 Atlantics. One fortnight's nervous headache, great irritability, light and noise almost intolerable, tendency to hypochondriasis, &c.

£3,000 Odessa Waterworks. Ups and downs very frequent. Price: A feeling as if there were water on the brain swashing to and fro for a fortnight. Cloths in cold water on the forehead, and so on, and so on, and so on! Bit by bit picking away at the nerves, breaking down the constitution, making life miserable, laying up for a broken-down old age, if indeed there is to be an old age at all.

As to family comfort, many a time has gold broken in upon that. It cannot be helped that men should be away a good deal from their homes during the day; but home has certainly a legitimate claim upon them in the evening. But Gold steps in, and says, "No, you are mine at home as well as everywhere else!" and so wife and children get little of the gold-buyer. Gold has said, "If you buy me, it must be at my own price; you must throw in family and all."

Thus it is with the man who makes gold his one great aim in life.

And, indeed, it does not require much thought to see how easily it can be bought too dear. For, after all, gold never satisfies. It was never intended to do so. Its relationship to man is not such as to enable it to do so.

In the first place, even when men have it, they have to be continually watching it. It is always on the go—always wanting to be off. If there was trouble in getting it, there is often quite as much in keeping it.

And in the next place, men sometimes get tired of it. They have not the heart to do good with it, to see what happiness they can get in this way out of it; they keep it, and yet they feel they are getting no pleasure from it—it is doing no good either to themselves or any one else. I have heard of a man who said he was tired of making money; but I never yet heard of a man who said he was tired of doing good with his money.

Well, I say, a thing which cannot satisfy, which does no real good to many a man, may be easily bought too dear. That certainly should be worth a good deal for which a man will part with his head, and his heart, and his lungs, and his liver, or some of them; for which he will spend sleepless and fevered nights and anxious days; for which, alas! too often, he will sacrifice his heart in its highest sense. Gold has bound up more hearts in chains and frost than anything else; shut men up, and made them inaccessible to all the tenderest and best feelings of humanity. Unless God send some great corrective to its large acquisition, or a man supply himself with what I firmly believe is its greatest neutraliser as a poison, and man's greatest preserver—viz., the large and liberal bestowal of it for charitable purposes—it will eat, in most cases, into a man's moral being, like a cancer; and "hard," indeed, as our Lord says, "is it for a man that has riches to enter into the kingdom of heaven."

And surely, if one had the power of looking at gold after one has gone, in many a case we should have a witness that gold has been bought too dear. All the toil has been spent for those who enjoy themselves upon the fruit of it, and care little for the one by whose life-long efforts they are enriched.

The whole of some men's lives is spent in just adding one 0 to four or five others, in an estimate of what they are worth; and it is a positive fact that they are really no better off than if they had spared themselves many of their aches and pains, and sat quietly by the fire and put down as many cyphers as they pleased.

But, setting them aside, any gains in business which are bought at the expense of health, or peace of mind, or neglect of duty to home or to one's fellow creatures, are one and all, "Gold bought too dear."

And, now, this is a two-edged proverb. It has reference to the other world and its affairs as well as to this.

Gold hides out the other life, and in many a case makes man lose it. A sovereign put close up to the eye, small as is its circle, will hide out the mighty orb of the sun, so that a man will be in pitch darkness, and, in fact, practically blind. The other life is lost to many a man simply by its being hidden out. This life has come between him and it. He cannot see it; and if he does not see it, he does not care about it.

And the desire of acquisition here makes man procrastinate as regards the great acquisitions of the other life. Those things are more remote, these are near; he will take what lies to hand first. Men do not care about securing the other world until they have first secured a bit of this. Thus they go on, entirely pre-occupied, their characters deteriorating, their unfitness for the other life becoming more and more every day.

And even by real Christians gold is often bought too dear.

The world, in this form, sometimes makes an inroad upon their souls, and for a while they become like it, and, generally by losses or some kind of afflictions, God makes their gold too dear. They may have gotten gold, and much gold, but it need not have been at this price. They might have sat loose to it, even while legitimately acquiring it; but with it came the love of it, and eagerness about it, and it wrought its own mischief, to their great hurt.

Greatly, too, has God's cause suffered from the dealings of His people with it. Not from their dealing with it, at all—for that may be not only lawful, but actually good—but from their too great eagerness for it, or their too tight hold upon it. That gold is bought too dear which throws any scandal on the religion we profess; that gold is kept at entirely too high a price which is held back from the cause of God—that gold which is His proportion.

This will tell much in the matter of future reward. He that soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he that soweth liberally shall reap also liberally. As a man soweth, so also shall he reap.

Little do Christians know of what they are depriving themselves by keeping back His portion from their Lord. The way to become really poor is to hoard—to have found what should be the "hallowed things," in our house—the Lord's money amid our gold.

Let us open heart and hand to Him, the hand because the heart. And then we shall be preserved from the thousand snares which gather themselves about gold, and the many sad experiences which it brings to mankind, not one of the least of which is that

"Gold may be bought too dear!"

"WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"

BY THE REV. D. MOORE, M.A., VICAR OF HOLY TRINITY, PADDINGTON; AND CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN.

"The burden of Dumah. He calleth out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night: if ye will enquire, enquire ye: return, come."—ISA. xxi. 11, 12

MUCH of the obscurity which attaches to this prophecy against Idumea, arises, no doubt, from its standing so completely alone. It has no connection either with what goes before or with what follows; but, like some detached fragment of inspiration—some startling and hasty message delivered by one who, having done his bidding, adds no more words—it refuses to have more light thrown upon it than can be gathered out of the prophecy itself, and the circumstances of the people to whom it refers.

These last are the Edomites, or the inhabitants of Idumea, for which Dumah is another name, and of which the chief city and stronghold was in Mount Seir. That country, as well as the land of Israel, was destined to fall under the yoke of the king of Babylon. And the prophet here introduces a dialogue between one of the people and himself, in which, either honestly, or doubtingly, or derisively—for there is nothing in the context to determine which—the Edomite inquires what are the signs that these threatened calamities are approaching? "Watchman, what of the night?" "You stand upon your watch-tower to note signs, to mark the changing aspects and phases of our national destiny, to see when the light is departing, and the clouds are closing in upon our sky of hope; at what stage have we arrived in the development of God's providential purposes now? What is the last token of a near and overtaking woe?" "WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"

To this repeated cry, in whatever spirit it may have been uttered, the watchman makes answer:—"The morning cometh and also the night." As if he would say, "This night you inquire about, and whose advent you perhaps disbelieve, though certain to come upon you, shall not be YET. God, in his long-suffering mercy, has ordained that there should be a morning first—a morning of hope, and light, and opportunity of repentance. But this abused, this neglected, this wasted in deferred and halting purposes, 'the night cometh'—that endless night in which no man can work, which has no morning after it, an eternal sky of thick cloud."

Still the watchman will not conclude his message without a word of encouragement. Do ye indeed inquire touching the Lord's purposes concerning you? Is it in fearful and trembling apprehension of this overspreading blackness, and of your own righteous exposure to the storm, that ye ask, "Watchman, what of the night?" Then inquire, and inquire on. At the priest's lips seek knowledge. "Seek ye out of the book of the Lord, and read." With resolved purpose of heart, "return" unto the Lord your God; and come see what He will do for those who will be warned, and be wise in time:—"If ye will enquire, enquire ye: return, come."

There is reason to fear that Edom did not seriously inquire: did not return: did not come. The prophecies against it, repeated yet more strongly in the 34th chapter, were fulfilled with a terrible significancy. The morning came, and also the night—a night of desolation and waste, which has continued to this day. Nettles and brambles have come upon the fortresses of Mount Seir, and there the wild beast makes his lair. Swept away are the habitations of men; and, save when the screech-owl moans, and the vulture calls to her mate, no sound disturbs the profound and awful solitude. Oh, well might the Psalmist exclaim, "Come hither and behold the works of the Lord! what desolations he hath made in the earth!"

But no Scripture is of private interpretation. The language of the Spirit, whether of warning or of encouragement, has a reach and purpose far beyond those perishable dynasties whose destiny formed the subject of these prophetic announcement. It deals with universal truths, with universal interests, with the universal tendencies of our common nature. Under the Old Testament or the New, under an economy of quickly ensuing retributions or under a dispensation of grace and truth, God is one. And human nature is one also—prone to doubt and speculate concerning the Divine declarations, however much, by line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little, we are assured that all things shall be fulfilled. "Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, "The morning cometh, and also the night. If ye will enquire, enquire ye: return, come."

I. Let us deal first with THE QUESTION, and who puts it. "He calleth to me out of Seir, 'Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?"

From what we are elsewhere taught of the general character of the Edomites, their stout-hearted indifference under the most solemn and repeated warnings—the more frequent supposition of commentators has been that the person who puts the question of the text, is one of the profane scoffers—one who, with impious defiance, makes a mock at sin—one who, like the children in the time of Elisha, "came forth out of the city to mock the prophet of the Lord." The world has never been without these despisers of a Divine message. When Noah went forth on his mission of righteousness to an ungodly and licentious generation—proclaiming, year by year, and with deepened intensity the coming night of heaven's avenging—the world that then was did but laugh him to scorn. People went on building and planting, buying and selling, marrying and giving in marriage, to the last. They saw the ark a-preparing—the type of a redeemed and rescued Church, to be self-launched by the upheaving flood. But still there was the same sun to shine, the same dew to fertilise, the same impress of calm goodness stamped on the face of all created things. How like the narrow and short-sighted philosophy of unbelief, to argue, "Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation." What, therefore, should make us fear any departure from Nature's order now? What dark portents can you point to as presaging the near wrath of God? "Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?"

And like as it was in the days of Noah, so it was in the days of Lot, so it was in the days of Elijah, so it was in the days of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. It is always easier to despise than to argue—to laugh at the contents of a revelation of God's truth, than to prove them to be unfounded or untrue. Religious wit is, of all others, the easiest wit. All kinds of wit being dependent upon strong contrasts—the near apposition of the trifling and the grave—it follows that the satire will be most pungent which deals with the sanctities of religion, and the jest most easily pointed which makes mock at the truth of God. In this has been found the stronghold of infidelity, from the time of Celsus and Porphyry to this day. The sceptic rarely trusts himself to the manliness of fair discussion. He finds it easier and safer to take up at second-hand the playful smartnesses of Volney, or the insidious sarcasms of Bayle, the coarse buffoonery of Paine, or the scarcely veiled but revolting blasphemies of Rénan. And if the scepticism of our educated classes appears now to take a more rational and scientific form, accounting for the miracles of Scripture by the operation of fixed laws; reducing its mysteries to a bold figure of speech; resolving its inspirations into the flights and fancies of religious genius; yet will the ultimate method of reasoning employed in these instances be found to be for the most part an attempted reduction to the absurd, the arguing from the consequences of a truth rather than from its own intrinsic and antecedent evidence. "What!" we sometimes hear it derisively asked, "the whole human race ruined because one man ate some fruit from a tree! a crawling reptile made to hold discourse with a woman! the entire planetary system thrown into confusion in order that a Jewish leader might be heartened to his work by seeing the sun stand still! what find we in the whole compass of physical analogies at all answering to such things? Who can receive as the dictate of infallible truth and wisdom the book in which such statements are contained?" "Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?"

II. But another opinion which has obtained among commentators is, that this Edomite is proposing his question in a spirit of unbelief merely, rather than that of contemptuous levity. There was a disposition, not among the people of Idumea only, but, as we learn from Ezekiel, among the Jewish nation generally, to make light of the messages of their prophets, on the ground of their being overstated, pressed with exaggerated and needless minuteness, pushed to an excess which He who sent them never intended. The Divine authority of the message is not doubted, but the teacher is overdoing his part. "Then said I, Ah! Lord God, they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?"

The question may fairly be raised—Is this Edomite spirit of unbelief cast out from among us? Are God's spiritual watchmen taken at their word when they warn their people of the danger of neglecting the great salvation? Are they thought to be in earnest when they set forth certain marks and fruits as being essential to the Christian character? When they tell those they address that they have not the Spirit of Christ, and can be none of His unless there be in them the graces of meekness, and humility, and brotherly love, and tenderness of conscience, and daily thankfulness, and much prayer? When they proclaim unreservedly that a man has no part or lot in Christ who knows not how to forgive an injury, or who shuts up his compassions from a suffering brother, or who earns his living by means which hurt his neighbour, or who is intent only upon earthly prosperity and success, or who is strange to the repose and relief of communion with God, or who has no anxiety to be instrumental in saving others' souls, and no care to be assured even of the safety of his own? Is any credit given to them for meaning what they say, when, taking up the words of the Master, "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish," and proving, from other Scriptures, what this repentance is and what it must include, they proceed to set forth the conditions of the Christless soul in the retributions of another world? In what subtle form unbelief, especially on this latter topic, creeps in, it may not be easy to determine. For certainly no one can accuse the watchman of investing the night of a lost eternity with a more appalling blackness than it is hung with in Scripture. No uninspired imagination could ever attain to such heights. The worm, and the fire, and the outer darkness, and the eternal thirst, the curse abiding, and the separation ever widening from repentance, and God, and hope—these, if figures of speech at all, at least are not "the watchman's" figures, but the figures of One who must have chosen such a medium of illustration, because the intense and overwhelming awfulness of the subject could not be described in any other way. And yet, it is very certain that the uneasy thoughts that should be stirred up by these statements are got rid of somehow. There must be a possibility, it is thought, in the Divine arrangements, that this dark night should never arrive. Whether annihilation is to supersede it, or another chance is to be given in a kind of post-obit purgatory, or whether eventually God will dispense with the equities of moral government altogether—on these points the mind may not be made up. It is made up to one thing only, namely, that the penalties of the eternal world must be stripped of their terribleness; that the "watchman," in his description of the night, has outstripped the bounds of religious sobriety; that either sin is not the abominable thing, or else law is not the inflexible thing, or else a lost immortality is not the dreadful thing, which preachers are constantly making out. Somewhere, someway, somehow, there must be a flaw in the statement. "We shall not surely die." God will not surely unparadise so large a portion of the human race. The day of grace and visitation will not surely come to an end. "Watchman, what of the night? WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"

(To be concluded.)

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

FEEDING THE MULTITUDE.

I SUPPOSE there are people still to be found who have but a vague notion of what it is to be really hungry. They may be conscious of possessing a good appetite now and then, and having the means of obtaining food, and to a certain extent of choosing what they will eat, regard being rather "sharp set" as a luxury which gives additional zest to a dinner, enabling them to take off the edge of their craving with a plate of warm soup, and to consider what they would like "to follow."

Of course we most of us read in the papers of the distress of the poor during the winter, of the number of children for whom appeals are made that they may have a meal of meat and vegetables once or twice a week, of the aggregate of casual paupers during a given period, and of cases where "death accelerated by want and exposure" is the verdict of a coroner's jury; but we do not very easily realise what it is to be famished; have perhaps never experienced that stage beyond hunger—beyond even the faintness and giddiness that makes us doubt whether we could swallow anything solid, and would cause us to turn hopelessly from dry bread. There is no need here to detail the sufferings that come of starvation. They are dreadful enough; but if our charity needs the stimulus of such descriptions we are in a bad way, and are ourselves in danger of perishing for want of moral sustenance.

Those who need assurance of the hunger of hundreds of their poor neighbours need not go very far to obtain it. A quarter of an hour at the window of any common cook-shop in a "low neighbourhood," at about seven o'clock in the evening, when the steam of unctuous puddings is blurring the glass, and the odour of leg-of-beef soup and pease-pudding comes in gusts to the chilly street, should suffice. There is pretty sure to be a group of poor little eager-eyed pinched-nosed boys and girls peering wistfully in to watch the fortunate possessor of twopence who comes out with something smoking hot on a cabbage-leaf, and begins to bite at it furtively before he crosses the threshold.

Of course, according to modern social political economy, it would be encouraging mendicity, and sapping the foundations of an independent character, to distribute sixpenny pieces amongst the juvenile committee of taste who are muttering what they would buy if only somebody could be found to advance "a copper." But it is to be hoped or feared (which?) that a good many people yet live who would instinctively feel in their pockets for a stray coin to expend on a warm greasy slab of baked or boiled, or on half a dozen squares of that peculiarly dense pie-crust which is sold in ha'porths. This is a vulgar detail; but somehow poverty and hunger are vulgar, and we should find it difficult to get away from them if we tried ever so hard. Even School Boards, peeping out upon the children perishing for lack of knowledge, find themselves in a difficulty, because there is no provision under the compulsory or any other clause for the children who are also perishing for lack of food. The Board beadle does not at present go about with soup-tickets in his pockets; and for the poor shivering shoeless urchins who are mustered in the big brick-built room where they assemble according to law there is no free breakfast-class.

It must one day become a question how they are to learn till they are filled. Grown people find it hard enough to fix their attention on the best advice or the most saving doctrine while they suffer involuntary hunger. The multitude must mostly be fed before they are taught. Even disciples have had a revelation of the Bread of Life in the breaking of bread that perishes. Do we still need a miracle to teach us that?

Happily, efforts are made to give meat to the hungry. During the winter weather food is distributed in various ways amidst some of those poverty-stricken neighbourhoods to which I am obliged to take you during our excursions; but the demand far exceeds the supply, and people suffer hunger at all seasons, though most of all in the time of bleak winds and searching cold.

I want you to come to-day to a kitchen which is open all the year round—the only kitchen of the kind in London which does not close its doors even when the springtide brings buds of promise on the shrubs in Leicester Square, and the London sparrow comes out from roofs and eaves, and preens his dingy plumage in the summer sun, as though Great Windmill Street had something in common with its name, and sweet country odours came from the region of the Haymarket.

For, you know, we are still in the district of Soho. I have but just now brought you out of Newport Market, and now we are in a very curious part of this vast strange city. The streets are dim and dingy, but not so squalid as you might have imagined. They are still and silent, too, as of a neighbourhood that has seen better days, and even in its poverty has a sense of gentility which is neither boisterous nor obtrusive.

You will remember that I referred to this neighbourhood of Soho when I spoke of those old French refugees who came and made industrial colonies in London after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. This is the only really foreign quarter of London which has lasted until to-day; but that is to be accounted for by the fact that it became representative of no particular industry, and that, probably from the fact of many of the patrons of literature and art having then town houses about Leicester and Soho Squares, the more artistic refugees took up their abode in the adjacent streets.

From the time when William Hogarth painted his picture of the Calais Gate till only a short time ago, when refugees fled from besieged Paris to find some poor and wretched lodging in the purlieus of Cranbourne Street, where they might live in peace and hear their native tongue, this has been the resort of poor foreigners in London. It almost reminds one of some of the smaller streets of a Continental city; and as we look at the queer shabby restaurants, and the shops with strange names painted above them in long yellow letters, we almost expect to find the pavement change to cobble-stones, and to see some queer wooden sign dangle overhead, so like is the place to the small bourgeois quarter that in our earlier days lay behind the Madeleine and the Porte St. Denis.

For here is an actual crêmerie—a queer compound of cook-shop and milkseller's—with a couple of bright dairy cans outside the door, and a long loaf or two amidst the cups and plates and sausages in the dingy window. Over the way you see "Blanchisseuse" in large letters; and next door is a laiterie, which differs from a crêmerie as a café alone differs from a café restaurant with its "commerce de vins" painted in big capitals in front of a long row of sour-looking bottles and a green calico curtain. It is a quaint jumble, all the way to Dean Street, and till we reach the edge of the Haymarket—a jumble of Brown and Lebrun, of Jones and Jean, of Robin (fils) and Robinson; but for all the little musty-smelling cafés, the blank bare-windowed restaurants, the crêmeries, and the laiteries, there is nothing of a well-fed look about the district, especially just at this corner, leading as it seems to a stable-yard or the entrance to a range of packers' warehouses. There is one open front here—is it a farrier's or a blacksmith's shop?—where they appear to be doing a stroke of business, however, for there is a clinking, and a fire, and a steam; but the steam has a fragrant odour of vegetables—of celery and turnips, of haricots and gravy—the clink is that of basins and spoons getting ready, and the fire is that of the boiler which simmers two mighty cauldrons.

Step to the front, and you will see in big white letters right across the house, "Mont St. Bernard Hospice." You may well rub your eyes, for you are in the heart of London, and stand in Ham Yard, Leicester Square, before the soup-kitchen that is open all the year.

There is something very appetising in the steam that arises from both these huge cauldrons, one of which is the stock-pot, containing bones, remnants of joints (not plate-clearings), and reversions of cold meat, &c., from two West End clubs. To this are added vegetables—celery, haricot beans, or barley—making it a fresh palatable stock, not remarkable for meatiness, but still excellent in flavour, as you may find for yourself if you join me in a luncheon here. But the real strengthening gravy has yet to be added, and the cauldron on the left hand is full of it—real, genuine gravy soup, made from raw meat and bones purchased for this purpose. As soon as this has simmered till it is thoroughly ready, the contents of the two cauldrons are mixed, and the result is a delicious stew, which is ready to be turned out into these yellow pint basins, for the hungry applicants, who sit down there and then at one of two deal tables, each of which has its rough clean form, or to be dispensed to those who bring jugs, bowls, cans, saucepans, kettles, pipkins—any and almost every receptacle in which they can carry it steaming away to their families.

Let us stand here and see them come in. Here is a poor famishing fellow, who looks with eager eyes at the savoury mess. He has evidently seen better days. There is an unmistakable air of education about him, and as he sits down with his basin and spoon, and the handful of broken bread, which is added to the soup from one of a series of clean sacks emptied for the purpose, the superintendent, Mr. Stevens, kens him with a quick eye, and will probably speak to him before he leaves. There is a foreigner—an Italian, by the look of his oval olive face—who takes his place very quietly, and as quietly begins to eat; and yonder a famished-looking, rough fellow, who has already devoured the basinful with his eyes, and is evidently in sore need. Men, women, and children, or, at all events, boys and girls, come and present their tickets, and receive this immediate relief, against which surely not the most rigorous opponent to mendicancy can protest. The cadger and the professional beggar do not go to the soup-kitchen where nothing is charged, for they do not need food, and will only seek a ticket where it is likely to be accompanied by the penny which will buy a quart. Be sure that there are few cases here which are not so necessitous that they are not far from starvation; and many of them represent actually desperate want.

The tickets for obtaining this prompt relief—often only just in time to save some poor creature from utter destitution and crime, and as often administered when a family is without food, and yet clings to the hope of finding work to prevent that separation which they must submit to by becoming paupers—are placed in the hands of clergymen, doctors, district visitors, Bible-women, and those who know the poor, and can feel for them when in hard times they pawn furniture, tools, and clothes, and suffer the extremity of want, before they will apply for parochial relief, and have offered to them the alternative of "going into the house." The annals of the poor, from which extracts occasionally appear in the newspapers in the accounts of coroners' inquests, prove to what dreadful sufferings many decent but destitute people will submit rather than become recognised paupers; and no system of charitable relief outside the workhouse walls will be effectual or useful which does not recognise and respect this feeling. Who would let the possible accident of some unworthy person getting a gratuitous pint of soup stand in the way of a work such as we see going on here, where one year's beneficent action includes above ten thousand persons relieved?—the larger number of whom are temporarily taken into the Hospice, as we shall see presently, while a large contingent is represented by the family tickets, which enable poor working men and women from various districts in London to carry away a gallon of strong nourishing soup and an apronful of bread to their hungry little ones. You see that great heap of pieces of fine bread—slices, hunches, remnants of big loaves, dry toast, French bread, brown bread, and rolls—all placed in a clean wooden bin, they also come from the two great West End clubs before mentioned, and are so appreciated by the applicants for relief (they being usually good judges of quality) that you may note a look of disappointment if the stock of club bread has been exhausted, and a portion of one of the common loaves bought for the purpose is substituted. The small broken bread in those clean sacks is club bread also—the crumbs from rich men's tables, but clean, and thoroughly good, fit for immediate addition to the soup, which a hungry company of diners consume in a painfully short space of time.

They are not inhabitants of this district, either; comparatively few come from the immediate neighbourhood, though, of course, some poor families of the adjacent streets and alleys, and occasionally foreign workmen—many of them adepts in artistic employments, who are in the land of the stranger and in want—come here and have not only the help of a meal, but the kind inquiry, the further aid that will sustain hope, and enable them to look for work, and find the means of living. Londoners from Kentish Town, Lambeth, Shoreditch, and Chelsea—poor hungry men and women from all parts of the great city—find their way here to obtain a dinner; and it is extremely unlikely that they would leave even the least profitable employment and walk so far for the sake of a basin of soup. Food alone is offered, not money, and there is little probability of imposition when there is so little to be gained by the attempt. But while the great cauldrons are being emptied, let us hear what they do at this "Mont St. Bernard Hospice" at the Christmas season.

Here is a list of good things that were sent last Christmas-tide for a special purpose:—A noble earl sent a sheep, if not more than one, and other generous givers in kind—many of them manufacturers of or dealers in the articles they contributed—forwarded loaves, biscuits, hams, rice, flour, currants, raisins, ale, porter, cocoa, peas, and other comfortable meats and drinks, so that there was a glorious distribution to the poor on Christmas Eve, when 936 families were provided with a Christmas dinner, consisting of 4 lbs. of beef, 3 lbs. of pudding, bread, tea, and sugar, together with such other seasonable and most acceptable gifts as were apportioned to them in accordance with the number of their children and the quantity of miscellaneous eatables and drinkables available for the purpose.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

"She stayed till her alarm, and a little natural resentment of his injustice, had passed away."—p. 349.

But we have not quite done with it yet, for it is a hospice in fact, as well as in name. Just as in the Newport Market Refuge, the houseless and destitute are received with little question—the homeless and friendless are here taken in after little inquiry, even the subscriber's ticket for admission being occasionally dispensed with, when Mr. Stevens, the superintendent, sees an obviously worthy case among the applicants who come to ask for a meal. It must be remembered, however, that an experienced eye can detect the casual very readily, and that Mr. Stevens, who served with his friend Sergeant Ramsden, of Newport Market, when they were both in the army, is as smart a detective as that shrewd and compassionate officer. It is so much the better for those who are really deserving—so much the better even for those who, being ashamed to dig, are not ashamed to beg—the ne'er-do-weels who, even in the degradation of poverty brought about by idleness and dissipation, come down to solicit food and shelter, and find both, together with ready help, if they will mend their ways. There are some such, but not many: more often a man of education, broken by misfortune, and perhaps by the loss of a situation through failure or accident beyond his control, finds himself starving and desolate. Such men have come here, and found, first, food, then a lavatory, then a bed in a good-sized room, where only seven or eight persons are received to sleep, then a confidential talk, advice, the introduction to people willing and able to help them among the committee and subscribers of the Institution.

It may be a French tutor destitute in London, but with his character and ability beyond doubt; it may be, it has been, a young foreign artist; a skilled labourer from the country, who has come to London to find work and finds want instead; a poor school-teacher who, having lost an appointment, and being unable to work at any other calling, is in despair, and knows not where to turn; an honest fellow, ready and willing to turn his hand to anything, but finding nothing to which he can turn his hand without an introduction. Such are the cases which are received at this hospice in Ham Yard, where they are permitted to remain for a day or two, or even for a week or two, till they find work, or till somebody can make inquiries about them and help them to what they seek.

About seven men and eight women can be received within the walls, but there are seldom the full number there, because it is necessary to discriminate carefully. The object is to relieve immediate and painful distress, and to give that timely aid which averts starvation by the gift of food, and prevents the degradation of pauperism by means of advice, assistance, and just so much support as will give the stricken and friendless men or women time to recover from the first stupor of hopelessness or the dread of perishing, and at the same time afford the opportunity of proving that they are ready and willing to begin anew, with the consciousness that they have not been left desolate.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE week that intervened between Sophie's death and interment was always reckoned by Eda as one of the saddest and most unsatisfactory periods of her life. It is true that a long-cherished wish was realised—that she was dwelling once again beneath the same roof with her brother, and there was nought to come between them, save the memory of the dead; yet she could take no pleasure in Mark's society. He seemed to be very unhappy, wandering from room to room, or sitting in a dejected attitude before the fire; he was always complaining that the house was chilly and comfortless, and rarely saying anything else unless addressed; but he evinced none of that tender sorrow with which we mourn some loved one suddenly snatched away. It is true that he would sometimes burst into self-reproaches, and blame himself for not having obeyed the summons home more promptly; but he always wound up with an assertion that he could have done nothing, positively nothing, for his dying wife, had he been on the spot hours earlier.

"Did Sophie appear to be distressed at my absence?" he asked Eda, on one of these occasions.

Eda was obliged to acknowledge that Mrs. Granton had only mentioned her husband's name once, and then it was to say, mournfully, "He never loved me! He will not miss me!" She could not bring herself to add that Sophie had asked her to repeat the words of Wolsey when he fell into disgrace, "Had I but served my God," &c., and was evidently applying them to her own case, as she sorrowfully murmured them to herself again and again.

But after a day or two, Mark, by some mental process Eda could not fathom, contrived to convince himself that he had indulged in his remorse long enough, and might allow other emotions to come to the surface.

"Did Sophie make another will?" he inquired of his sister. "I suppose you know—what, however, I never discovered till after we were married—that her property was entirely under her own control? Soon after our marriage she devised it to me, for my sole use. Poor Sophie, I think she was fond of me! She did not make any alterations in her bequests?"

"I do not know; we never had any conversation on the subject."

"You are quite sure that she did not send for her lawyer, or for that meddling Edwards?"

"Nay, Mark; on the first day of her illness she expressed a wish to see both those gentlemen."

"Well?" queried Mark, anxiously, and with a startled look coming into his eyes, "Did you send for them?"

"Yes; but when they arrived Sophie felt too weak to see either of her visitors, and I had to tell them so, and express to them her regret for having given so much trouble."

Mark's brow began to clear, and he settled himself in a more comfortable attitude. "It is just as well that she did not see Edwards, he is a meddling fool, and would have persuaded her to hem me round with provoking restrictions. I have had enough to contend with already. Poor Sophie was very narrow-minded, in spite of her warm heart and generous disposition. We might have been very happy if she had not been so opinionated."

Eda opposed to such remarks as these a silence that was sufficiently eloquent, if Mark had not been too self-engrossed to perceive how much he shocked and distressed her by every fresh instance of his utter indifference to his wife. And when, feeling no compunction at unfolding his designs to so safe a listener, he began to sketch out his future, she generally brought his communications to an abrupt close by making an excuse for leaving him.

"I do not think I shall keep this house," he said, when he came down-stairs on the morning appointed for the funeral. "The air of the place does not suit me. I have such frightful dreams! As soon as we can do so decently, we will advertise it to be let or sold furnished, and you and I will go into apartments nearer town, till I can settle myself somewhere else. You'll not think of leaving me just yet, Eda?" he went on, when he found that she did not answer; "my nerves are so terribly shaken, I do not feel fit to be left alone. You're not thinking of quitting Sydenham, are you?"

"Not at present, for Mr. Allonby is not ready," she answered, blushing slightly.

"Nor ever will be," said Mark, abruptly. "If he had cared anything about you, he would not have made such paltry excuses for delaying your marriage."

Eda's colour rose. "Fritz has not made any excuses; none are needed; we quite understand each other."

"Yes, you are one of those simple trusting girls that such men like to trifle with; but, never mind, I'll put an end to his shilly-shallying, and my sister shall marry some one fitter for her than a third-rate artist, who shelters himself behind his brothers and sisters, and his responsibilities, when it does not suit him to fulfil his engagements!"

This attack upon Fritz Allonby fairly took away Eda's breath. She was very much inclined to angrily forbid Mark's interference, but it was not a proper moment for risking a dispute, and so she constrained herself to make no reply. If her brother broached the subject at some future time, she would then tell him that she had deliberately pledged herself to become the wife of Fritz when he felt himself justified in asking her to fulfil her promise. Till then she resolved to wait, and trust him, let Mark say what he would.

The funeral ceremony was attended with what Eda considered a great deal of unnecessary pomp and show. Knowing how sad and secluded a life Sophie had been living, it pained her to see so many indifferent persons assembled at her interment. But Mark willed it so; he had invited every one who could claim any acquaintance with his late wife, and he had desired the undertaker not to spare any adjuncts to the ceremony that could heighten its effect, or prove the profundity of his own grief.

That he was deeply impressed while he stood by the grave his sighs and almost convulsive shudders attested; yet, when the funeral cortége had returned to the house, he was sufficiently recovered to listen to the reading of Sophie's will.

He thought himself well acquainted with its purport. But did no misgivings assail him? Had he never reminded himself of her warning words—not spoken in the heat of passion, but with the most sorrowful earnestness—that if he insisted on having the one thousand pounds she was so unwilling to sink in a doubtful scheme, it would be the last, actually the last sum he would ever wring from her love or her duty?

Eda, who would gladly have excused herself from being present had he not peremptorily desired her to remain, saw, from the quiet corner to which she retired, Mark's face flush and change when the lawyer unfolded a parchment he had brought with him; and, rising from his seat, he exclaimed, in tones sharpened by uneasiness, "What is that?"

"The will Mrs. Granton signed at our office, and left in our care," the lawyer civilly explained.

Mark stepped forward, glanced over the speaker's shoulder, and began to evince much agitation.

"That is not the will my deceased wife dictated shortly after our marriage."

"No, Mr. Granton, it is not. About a week or ten days before Mrs. Granton's illness, she came to our office, asked for the will to which you are alluding, and destroyed it in our presence. By her directions I then drew up the one I am now going to read, and she signed it in the presence of sufficient witnesses."

"Did she go to your office alone?" and Mark's eyes rested suspiciously on Mr. Edwards, who met his gaze, however, with unruffled composure.

"Yes; Mrs. Granton was alone, and, at her request, we procured her a cab when she left us, as she disliked making her way to the railway station on foot without a companion. Shall I proceed?"

Mark nodded assent, and then sank back in his chair, and shaded his eyes with a hand that trembled violently. Hitherto he had been inclined to congratulate himself that the brief illness of his wife had effectually prevented any alteration in the conditions of her bequests; but his confidence had received a rude shock when he discovered that she had not only destroyed the document drawn up at the time she believed him to be devotedly attached to her, but executed another without consulting him, or even making him aware of the step she had taken. He began to feel sick with fear of the consequences. He had dwelt so much on the pleasant thought of having the uncontrolled use of this money, that the shock of learning that it might not be his after all was indeed a startling one. Now that it was too late, he recalled the early days of his married life—the unlimited trust his wife had then reposed in him, and how he had requited it. To grasp at gold he had trampled down every kinder, better feeling. There had even been a guilty joy fluttering in his heart ever since Sophie died, and he had been able to secretly tell himself that there was no one now to thwart his schemes, be they ever so ambitious or visionary!

But the lawyer was droning through the customary preamble, and he roused himself to listen, impatiently flinging off the hand which Eda, who had stolen to his side, laid affectionately on his shoulder.

"To her beloved husband—thank heaven there was no allusions to his unkindness—to her beloved husband, Mrs. Granton devised an annuity of one hundred pounds per annum, to be paid to him in quarterly instalments."

Just enough to keep him from positive want! and Mark's face grew ghastly as he heard it.

Was this all she had bequeathed to him? Yes; all. After setting aside certain sums to be paid to charitable institutions, she left the remainder of her property to her faithful friend, Joseph Edwards, of —— Lane, City, in trust for her sister-in-law, Eda, or Editha, Granton, to whom she also bequeathed her wardrobe, jewellery, and such articles of plate as Eda might choose to select. In the event of the legatee refusing to accept these bequests they were to devolve upon the charities already named.

Mark Granton's pride enabled him to conceal his mortification from the eyes of his guests, but Eda sat like one stunned, her only thought, how could Sophie be so cruel as to enrich her at her brother's expense?—how imagine that she would ever accept a bequest that would impoverish him?

A burst of tears relieved her a little, and by the time the so-called mourners, seeing that they were de trop, had said their adieus and departed, she had regained her composure. She was even sanguine enough to tell herself that after all it was of little consequence. This will had doubtless been dictated in one of those fits of jealous fury that attacked the unhappy wife but too often; but Sophie had felt no remorse, no uneasiness concerning her rash act, knowing full well that Eda loved her brother too dearly to take advantage of it.

"I shall make the property over to Mark," Eda concluded, as she wiped her tears away, "reserving to myself a few little articles that poor Sophie valued, and this unfortunate document will be as if it never existed."

But when she would have thrown her arms around her brother's neck, and assured him that she should only consider herself his purse-bearer, she was roughly repulsed. They were alone now, and the mask of smiling indifference Mark had been forcing himself to wear could be thrown off.

"Hypocrite!" he exclaimed. "Do you think to silence my reproaches by such deceptive caresses? It was you who dictated this will!"

"No, Mark, no, on my honour. I had not seen nor even heard of it till now!"

"But you cunningly suggested it. You sided and condoled with the weak woman, who could be so easily led by any pretence of affection, till you persuaded her to think you an angel and me a fiend! If I had not trusted you so blindly I might have foreseen that you would take advantage of her infatuation."

"You cannot mean what you are saying," Eda faltered, in dismay. "You cannot really think that I have wronged you. Oh, Mark, do me more justice! I am incapable of such conduct. It would be unnatural."

"Pshaw! you are the gainer by it, and so no one will blame you," he responded, bitterly.

"But, Mark, my dear brother, pray do not speak in this strain! After all what will it signify? I mean——"

But ere she could finish the sentence he broke into passionate exclamations.

Did she pretend not to know what it signified to him? Was it to mock him she took this tone? "I am ruined," he added, "ruined, beggared! every hope blighted—every aspiration crushed—and through you! through you!"

In his fury he strode towards her with his hand upraised and clenched, as if tempted to strike her; but Eda, perceiving that he was no longer master of himself, turned and fled; nor did she pause till she had reached the room so lately tenanted by the unhappy Sophie, and locked herself within it.

There, kneeling by the window, with her arms folded on the cushioned seat, she stayed till her alarm, and a little natural resentment of his injustice, had passed away; till she could say softly and pityingly, "Poor Mark, poor mistaken Mark! is this to be the end of his attempts to win riches? Will he never never see how much he loses while he grasps at baser metal!"

CHAPTER XLIV.

EDA went to rest sanguine of finding her brother more reasonable in the morning; but she was doomed to be disappointed. Mark regretted the loss of the money too deeply not to feel very bitter towards the more fortunate legatee. He came to the breakfast-table still pale and sullen—returning the briefest answers to her conciliatory speeches, and when she would have entered on the subject of the will, silencing her with such cruel taunts that at last she could not hear them patiently.

"For shame, Mark, for shame!" she cried, indignantly. "Do you judge me by yourself? Do you think that gold is more precious in my eyes than my own self-respect? Peace! I will not hear you say such things again!"

And she ran out of the room, determined to take refuge with Gran till Mark had come to his senses, and could be induced to believe her protestations of innocence. But ere her trunks were packed, she hesitated to take this step. How could she leave him in his present mood? Did he not need her forbearance now more than he had ever done? If she—his nearest relative—his truest, and, perhaps, in the day of adversity, his only friend, estranged herself, and left him to his own devices, what would be the end of it?

With these thoughts kindlier emotions returned. She would be patient with him, be he ever so froward, and take counsel with Fritz how to act with regard to the acceptance or rejection of Sophie's bequest. No pleasurable feelings could attach to it if Mark must be the sufferer by her prosperity, and but for the hope that he would permit her to share it with him, she would have been tempted to write to Mrs. Granton's lawyer at once, and positively decline to become the recipient of the legacy.

However, Eda was not accustomed to act too hastily. Fritz, whose well-doing was as dear to her as her brother's, must be considered and consulted, and she was just folding and directing a note to the artist, entreating him to come to her at the earliest opportunity, when Mr. Edwards was announced.

"I am glad to find you alone, Miss Granton," he said, "because I want you to thoroughly understand my deceased client's motives in making so strange a will. I had enjoyed her confidence for some years, and I believe that since she learned from her physician that her days were numbered, she was unselfishly anxious to do her best for the young man she married—excuse my candour—more hastily than wisely."

"And yet——" Eda began, but paused, unwilling to cast a shadow of blame on the memory of the dead.

"And yet you think she has treated him ill in leaving him merely a small annuity? She did not do this till she had assured herself that Mr. Granton had fallen into the hands of a set of scheming, unscrupulous men, who will ruin him. Had she left him all she possessed it would only have gone to swell their purses. Can you wonder, then, that she preferred to bequeath it to a person who would put it to better uses?"

"But why should Mark always be the dupe of the designing?" asked Eda, doubtfully, for she was disposed to resent the disparaging tone in which the elderly and successful man spoke of his younger rival in the field.

"I think I can tell you, Miss Granton. It is because he is over-confident in his own abilities as a man of business."

"Mark is clever, energetic, and persevering, no one can deny that!" the affectionate sister interposed.

"And yet he is always being victimised, because he is not content with reasonable gains. He has heard of speculators who by some lucky chance have bagged their thousands, and he aspires to be equally fortunate; this it is that induces him to consort with a set of crafty fellows who encourage his eagerness to grow rich, not from any desire to see him succeed, but that they may make use of him, and so he is flattered and blinded with promises that some day or other he finds his clever friends unable to perform. How people, who are sensible enough on other points, can be so easily led away, so duped by the tall talk and speciousness of a few knavish rascals, I never have been able to understand, and perhaps I never shall."

"But how shall I make my brother see that it was in love, and not from any revengeful feeling for fancied slights, that his wife dictated her will?"

Mr. Edwards, who had grown very warm with talking, fanned himself with his hat, and pondered a while before replying.

"You must not think that I approve of what Mrs. Granton has done, for I see that it has placed you in a false position; but I had no hand in it, beyond verifying her own suspicions of the state of Mr. Granton's affairs."

"Are you then quite sure that they are as desperate as he—as you have just now represented them?"

"Quite," was the emphatic reply.

"But a timely advance, might it not enable him to recover himself?" asked Eda, doubtfully.

"No, for the scheme in which he has embarked so much of his cash, and would have risked more, has no foundation. It is one of those paper kites flown to attract the unwary, as Mr. Granton himself will soon be forced to acknowledge. A very little while, and there will be an exposure, and the projectors of the affair will make themselves scarce till the first hue and cry has gone over. Depend upon it, my dear young lady, your brother will be better off with the annuity he now despises than if he were burdened with the liabilities of a defunct company. When he begins to see this, then tell him that steady work is the surest and only legitimate road to prosperity. and that making money for money's sake is about the saddest lot to which a clever young fellow can doom himself."

When Fritz Allonby arrived, bringing in his looks and softened voice the pity and comfort Eda now so sorely needed, he would fain have taken his betrothed at once to Gran and Doris, for her face wore a sadder and more harassed look than he had ever before seen upon it. But he had too great a reverence for the bond of brotherly and sisterly unity to counsel her to take any step that might increase the ill-feeling Mark was already evincing, and so he contented himself with doing his best to cheer her, and counselling patience.

"Your brother cannot long remain insensible to the truth, dear Eda. In the first bitterness of his mortification he has forgotten your much-tried affection and your consistent life. Presently he will be ashamed of his violence, and you may be able to make some arrangement for his future without galling his pride or interfering with his own independence of action."

The advice was felt to be good; and, sustained and inspirited by her lover's daily letters, Eda persevered in her endeavours to conciliate the angry sullen man whom she only saw at meals, and who still refused to see her pleading looks or accept her smallest attentions.

One morning, as they sat vis-à-vis at their silent, unsocial breakfast, she saw Mark suddenly lay down the morning paper, looking, as he leaned back in his chair, so ghastly, that she started up, thinking he was ill; but without replying to her inquiries he put her aside, and left the room. However, on running her eye down the column he had been reading, the cause of his agitation was palpable enough, for there, in large letters, she saw announced, "Another Fraud on the Public. Collapse of the —— Company." The bubble had burst, and the secretary had absconded, carrying with him the last thousand Mark had wrung from his reluctant wife.

That same evening one of the servants whispered to Eda that Mr. Granton was packing a portmanteau, and making preparations for a journey.

(To be concluded.)

AUNT JESSIE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER II.

A FEW evenings afterwards, when Esther came home as usual, her quick eyes perceived in a moment that something was amiss with her aunt. It was not only that the patient face looked even paler than its wont, but there was a deeper shade of sadness on it—so deep that even the smile of welcome with which she always greeted the returning one could not entirely chase it away.

"What is it, Aunt Jessie?" said the young girl, coming across and taking up her favourite position on her knees in front of the little fire, and close beside her aunt's chair. "Has anything been vexing you?"

"I'm afraid I've been vexing myself, dear, and fretting a great deal more than I ought, when I've so many blessings left me."

"But what have you to fret about, aunt?—I mean, what new thing?" and Esther looked up with that searching inquiring gaze with which she so often lately had scanned her aunt's face.

"I took the shirts back to-day, Esther, to Mr. Jones."

"Did you?" exclaimed the girl, with a start, as she thought upon the heavy sleep which had prevented her awaking the last two or three mornings, until so late that there was not a minute for work. "I thought they weren't finished," she added.

"Yes; I finished them this afternoon, and went with them directly, because, you know, Mr. Jones was in such a hurry for them. But, Esther——"

"What, Aunt Jessie?"

"He says he can't give me any more to do."

The last words were spoken in a sad tone, and brought tears into the eyes of the young girl. She tried to blink them away unperceived, looking earnestly into the fire meantime; and then, in as quiet and calm a voice as she could assume, asked, "Why won't he give you any more, auntie?"

"Because"—and the speaker paused, as though reluctant to bring out the words—"because, he says, they are so badly done—some of them, at least—that he could never sell them with such work in them. He said he couldn't afford to pay me for simply spoiling the goods."

"Oh, Aunt Jessie!"

"So I had to come away without any more. Only he picked out two or three, and said I must do them over again, and put better work in them."

"Oh, auntie, how could he!"

"It was quite natural, dear, if they were badly done."

"But you've worked for him so many years; and I'm sure you used to put beautiful work—nobody could have done better."

"'Used to,' perhaps; but I don't now, I'm afraid. Mr. Jones has found fault several times lately; and at last he says he can't employ me any more."

There was a moment's pause, during which time Esther remained motionless, with her head resting on her aunt's lap, and her face hidden from view.

"Can you guess why the work is so badly done, Esther, dear?" and the elder woman's hand was laid gently upon the bowed head before her.

Another pause; and then all Esther said was the one word—"Why?"

"Because, my child—and it's no use to try to hide it from you any longer—your aunt is getting old, and her sight isn't what it used to be. In fact, Esther, I—I am getting blind!"

The girl started up, and threw her arms impulsively round the other's neck.

"Oh, auntie, surely, surely it cannot be true!"

"It is, my darling, I'm afraid, too true!"

"But perhaps it may get better again. Perhaps, if you were to go to some doctor, he might be able to do you some good. You haven't tried that yet."

"Yes I have, dear: I've been to Dr. Middleton, who is considered so clever with the eyes. I went at the time he sees people free; and he looked at me, and said he feared there was no hope."

"You never told me," said Esther, in tones of gentle reproach.

"No, dear, I didn't tell you, because I couldn't bear to bring any fresh cares upon your shoulders, and so I thought I would wait until I was quite sure. I tried to hide it from you, for I thought that as long as ever I could you should go on in ignorance of the trouble coming upon us. But now, Esther, I can't keep it from you any longer."

The young girl kept her own counsel, and said not a word of how she had guessed the secret for herself, and how her heart had often bled, to watch the precious sight growing dimmer day by day. She had seen through the loving devices of the other to endeavour to spare her as long as possible, and had breathed not a word of her suspicions; but it had been hard at times not to break through the barriers of silence, and pour out the sympathy with which her heart had overflowed whenever she had seen the deepening look of care and sadness resting on the beloved face of her who had been almost more than a mother to her.

For they both knew what blindness meant in this case: not simply deprivation of sight—one of God's choicest blessings—but the means of earning a livelihood, scanty though that might have been, taken away, and nothing save deepest poverty, almost starvation, staring the elder one in the face, or, that greatest dread and fear of the poor, the workhouse. For Esther—willing as she was, and ready, in the depths of her grateful loving heart to work and toil as far as human strength and ability could carry her—knew to her sorrow, that she could do little more than she did already.

She had only lately obtained this, her first situation, in Mr. Webbe's shop; and for the next two or three years she was to receive nothing, but to give her services in return for learning the business. She had her dinner and tea there, and, indeed, could have lived altogether in the house; but it was her own wish and choice to come home every night, even though doing so involved a long walk through some of the worst parts of the city. But her aunt would have been lonely without her; and that aunt had toiled and striven for her ever since she had been left, a helpless infant, to her care. Esther longed so ardently to be able to repay some of that love and devotion; but circumstances had always seemed against her.

When Esther had been old enough to leave school, Mrs. Lang, thinking it would be a good thing for her niece, and might enable them hereafter to keep a little home together, had embraced an opportunity which offered itself of apprenticing her to a dressmaker who at that time was living in the same house, and, according to appearances, had a tolerably good business. To do this she had been forced to "live hard," as the expression goes—had stinted herself in every way, and had sat up a great part of the night, week after week, and month after month, working as fast as her fingers could go, at the shirt-making, which was her only means of earning money.

The shop for which she worked had employed her for years, and she had received a constant supply, sufficient to keep her always occupied. But it was miserable pay—only enough, with all her industry, to provide them with the bare necessaries of life, without which they must have perished, and making no compensation for the perpetual weary aching of back, and head, and eyes, which such close unremitting application entailed.

At length, when Esther's term of apprenticeship was beginning to draw to a close, and she was indulging hopes of being able in time to earn something, and thus be no longer a burden to her aunt, Miss Cooper's affairs suddenly appeared to be in inextricable confusion, she hastily threw up her business, quitted the place, and Esther was cast upon her own resources.

Nothing had offered, save this situation at Mr. Webbe's—a linendraper's shop, in one of the busiest and most crowded of the narrow streets of the old city. Esther had engaged herself, as they were honest respectable people; and, in time, there was the promise of a salary, though for the present her hopes of helping her aunt were disappointed.

She had hard work at her new post—had to be there early in the morning and late at night, with scarcely a minute's breathing-space through the day, and the additional fatigue of her long walk to and fro. And she was naturally delicate, and ill fitted to stand such a life. But she had a brave spirit, and tried to make light of all disagreeables, and be, as she had ever been, the joy and comfort of her aunt's declining years. But Mrs. Lang knew, and her niece knew, that with the former's sight would go her power of maintaining herself; and Esther not having yet attained to the summit of her wishes—namely, to be able to support them both—what could be done?

No wonder that the utterance of that short sentence—"I am getting blind!"—had struck with a chill sense of sorrow upon the young heart, confirming the fears which she had been struggling to put from her; whilst even to the other the sound of her own words seemed to place the fact beyond all doubt and question.

Esther took the rejected shirts—for there was no longer cause for concealment; she need no longer pretend not to see that the sight of the other was failing—and, trying to force back the tears which filled her eyes, she bent over her work for some time without speaking.

"It's all quite right, Esther," said the quiet voice of her aunt, at length—"we are sure of that, aren't we?"

No reply, save a sort of stifled sob.

"And if we should have to part for a time, and I seek a shelter somewhere else, it would still all be right and kind—we should be certain of that, shouldn't we?"

"Oh, Aunt Jessie! it seems so hard!"

"That's because we can't see aright, Esther. But whatever we do, don't let us doubt the loving-kindness of our Father. I have been faithless, I know; I've sat wondering and thinking what would become of us, and prayed the Lord to spare me my sight until you were able to be earning something; because I know your loving heart, Esther, and that you'd be glad to give me a share of anything you had."

"Oh, how glad!" ejaculated Esther.

"But He hasn't granted me that," pursued the other, "and so I know He has something better for me instead. If that had been the best thing, He would have given it."

Esther glanced up with a sort of veneration at the sweet face before her, marvelling at its patience and calmness; and as she looked, she inwardly acknowledged that she had still much to learn before she could yield up her will in such submission.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

133. What king was smitten with leprosy for burning incense?

134. What miracle did God work to enable a widow to pay her debts?

135. Quote a passage in which several tools of the carpenter are mentioned.

136. Mention some women who helped to build the wall of Jerusalem.

137. Who are mentioned by St. Paul as his kinsmen?

138. Where is it stated that to win an "offended brother" is harder than to take a strong city? Quote passage.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 320.

121. Cracknels (1 Kings xiv. 3).

122. "Behold, are not all these which speak Galileans?" (Acts ii. 7).

123. When Ebed-melech, the Ethiopian, drew up Jeremiah out of the dungeon (Jer. xxxviii. 11, 12).

124. Because "he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes" (1 Kings iv. 33).

125. The Epistle to the Galatians—"Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand" (Gal. vi. 11).

126. Omri (1 Kings xvi. 23, 24).

MINE.

IF mine 's the tree, the leaves were mine,
But they from all their boughs are fled;
If mine 's the field, the tree was mine,
But that is weather-wrecked and dead.

If mine 's the stream, the water 's mine,
But yet for me it will not stay;
I cannot keep me all that's mine,
As God may will it goes away.

But if I lose the leaves of mine,
The spring gives new ones to the twig;
And if I lose a tree of mine,
My sapling groweth on tree-big.

If I lose water that is mine,
More follows to me from above;
And if the Lord may take of mine
He well can make it good in love.

(Drawn by F. BARNARD.)

THE SONG OF THE BELLS.

REMINISCENCES.

ONE sunny morn in early Spring,
When the grass was bright with dew,
And from his nest with flutt'ring wing
The lark to heaven flew,

Passing beneath the grey church tower,
We heard the old bells ring—
My love and I—and mystic power
Seemed born in their joyous swing;

And as the notes came stealing
Along on the breezy wind,
Glad hopes in their tones revealing,
We stood with arms entwined;
For they told of a joyous morrow,
When we two should be one,
Of a life scarce knowing sorrow
Beneath Love's cheering sun.

At noon-tide on a summer's day,
When all around was bright,
And soft white clouds of fleecy spray
Were sparkling in the light,
Slow-stepping from the church's shade
We heard the glad bells peal—
My wife and I—the day that made
Us one for wee or weal;
And the tones o' the bells loud ringing
Our joyous marriage lay,
Seemed those of old friends bringing
Good wishes for the day;
For they sang of a happy present,
Of joy in the bright to-be,
Of a future whose sky was pleasant,
From threat'ning storm-clouds free.

When blew the breath of autumn days
Through trees fast growing bare,
And the setting sun's bright golden rays
Were flushing the mellow air,
Walking along the dead leaves o'er,
We heard the bells again,
And memory with their music bore
One little note of pain;
For the voice of the bells seemed telling
Of a child at her mother's knee;
And then like dirge-notes swelling
In mournful melody;
Hands clasped in prayer at even,
Cold with the morning sun!
O Lord, who hast all good given,
Thy will, Thy will be done!

On frosty night 'mid Winter drear,
When snow lies thick without,
We wait the death o' the glad old year,
And hear the bells ring out—
Those bells we heard in days long-past,
We hear again to-night,
And this world's veil seems fading fast,
And rolling out of sight;
For the tones o' the bells loud ringing
The happy young year's lay,
To us seem also singing
To welcome us away;
For they tell of a home in heaven,
A haven of peace and love,
Where we who on earth have striven
May dwell together above.

G. W.

LOST IN THE WINNING.

CHAPTER XLV.

THE thought that Mark might be leaving her to return no more gave Eda courage to enter his room, and beseech him to tell her whither he was going.

"To America," he answered, without looking up from the valise he was strapping; "there may be better openings for a penniless man in that country than there are in this."

"But you will never be penniless, dearest Mark, while I have anything for you to share. Why will you persist in misjudging me? How can you help seeing that I deplore Sophie's bequest as much—nay, more than you do?"

"We will not discuss this subject," he answered, more affected by her streaming eyes and clinging arms than he would have acknowledged. "No, I am not angry with you now, Eda. If you did forestall me with my wife, you only acted on my own maxim—every one for himself. No, I am not angry; but we are best apart, and I am sick of England."

"But these are not sufficient reasons why you should leave in such haste," she urged, resolutely putting her own soreness of heart in the background. "If you are determined to begin the world afresh in another land, it would be useless opposing you; but let me go with you, if only for a year or two. Oh, my brother, don't thrust me from you again! Let me share your fortunes till you are a happier man."

"This is nonsense," he exclaimed, roughly. "You know very well that if I were to accept your offer you would draw back."

"Try me!" she said, looking into his face—"try me, Mark!"

"And Mr. Allonby? I thought your attachment in that quarter would come to nothing as soon as you heard of this legacy!"

The sneer was passed over as if she did not hear it; though Eda's voice took a tenderer tone as she replied, "Fritz will wait for me. We do not love each other so lightly as to fear a parting, even though it may be a long one; and he is too fond of his own brothers—too ready to make far greater sacrifices for their sakes—to come between me and mine."

"I shall not demand any sacrifice from either of you. I will go alone, and you can forget me as soon as you please; though I suppose I need not have troubled you with this injunction; men who have failed soon pass out of mind."

Eda's tears dried on her cheeks as she listened to this cruel speech, and she felt greatly tempted to leave him; but the impulse was conquered, and only by a quiver in her voice did she betray how deeply it had stung her.

"Mark, we are the children of the same loving mother, whose last words were a prayer for those she left behind. Had I no affection for you I should still endeavour to obey her injunction, that we should cling together; and I am ready to share your fortune either in England or America until brighter days smile upon you."

He did not answer, till, wearying of his silence, she said, "Will you not take me with you?" when he uttered a curt and decided, "No."

Still Eda kept back the angry words thronging to her lips. It was hard to have her affection slighted, and her motives misconstrued, but she would not increase the bitterness of such a parting by retaliating; and, bending over him as he knelt on the floor busy with the lock of a travelling-bag, she left a kiss and a tear on his forehead, and then sorrowfully turned away.

"Eda!"

The barrier was broken down at last! With his features working convulsively, and a suspicious moisture in his eyes, Mark had started up and extended his arms. The next moment his sister was wrapped in them, and weeping on his breast. For some time not a word was spoken, nor was any avowal made of remorse for past unkindness. But it was not needed; that long lingering embrace atoned to Eda for all she had suffered.

"You must let me go, little sis," Mark said, presently, touching the valise with his foot; "I shall never do any good here, and I have always had a great fancy for seeing New York."

"But not alone, Mark?"

"Yes, Eda, alone! No, not another word; I neither can nor will take you with me. I have been a selfish fellow all my life, but I'm not bad enough to stand in the way of your marriage. Every one speaks so well of Allonby, that I suppose he is worthy of you. When I have made a fortune I'll come back to see you in your new character as a wife."

"But you will take time for consideration; you will promise not to do anything hastily?"

He hesitated; but he could no longer steel himself against her entreaties. "To please you, I will start from London in the Bremen, which does not sail for a week, instead of taking my passage from Liverpool to-morrow; but pray don't ask any further concessions, there's a good girl! for nothing but change and action will rid me of the feverish misery that is now oppressing me. I cannot reconcile myself yet to what has happened."

Eda clung closely to his side during the next few days, or when he was absent busied herself in gathering together everything that could add to his comfort on the voyage. She removed to an hotel in the City, so as to be near him when the winding up of some business connected with the defunct company rendered his presence there necessary; and Doris joined her, proving invaluable in selecting and packing the voyager's wardrobe. Fritz, too, came once or twice every day, to give his betrothed the support of his firmer mind; and though Mark had in a great measure relapsed into his sullen reserve, he was no longer unkind nor ungrateful.

Eda prayed so earnestly that he would go with her to look at their mother's grave, that, although it was against his will, he consented. But she was almost sorry she had urged it, when Mark, with one hasty glance at the lowly mound, moved away, and waited for her at a distance. How changed he was from the bright bold boy who had been the object of so many prayers! If his mother could see him now, would she recognise in this haggard moody man, whose eyes were rarely lifted from the ground, the hopeful Mark who had thought it would be so easy to climb to fortune?

Then Eda began to grieve for herself. She had started in life intent on carrying out that dear mother's most cherished wish—she had resolved to be Mark's friend and adviser, cheering him when he looked sad, and rejoicing with him when all went well—but every attempt to do this had been thwarted, and by Mark himself.

Ought she, however, to turn back from her self-imposed task now he might be induced to take a truer view of life, and glean from his failures wisdom to guide him through the future?

She carried her troubled thoughts to Gran, who chided her for them. "Child, can't you see that there may be a lesson for yourself in your want of influence over your brother? Haven't you depended too much on what you could do towards making him a good man? You forget that he is in God's hands, and under His guidance, though he rebels against it, and won't see it just yet. Pray for him as much as you like, my dear, but leave the issue to Him who doeth all things well."

Eda was rebuked, but at the same time consoled, and she went bravely through the parting scene with Mark, whose spirits rose as he stepped on board the Bremen, with the notes his sister had procured from Mr. Edwards in his pocket-book. He was pleased with the arrangements that had been made for his comfort, and the neat little cabin secured for his use; and as his sister and Fritz lingered till the last moment, he began to talk hopefully of what he should achieve in the West.

But his brow clouded when the signal for strangers to leave the ship was given, and he kissed Eda's lips repeatedly ere he put her into Mr. Allonby's arms. "Take care of her!" he said, huskily. "She has been the best of sisters; she will be the best of wives. If I do prove good for anything, it will be to Eda that I shall owe it; and now wish me success and good-bye!"

But still Eda grasped his sleeve. "I cannot let you go, Mark, till you give me one promise—that if your heart yearns for home, you will come back to us."

"I do promise, Eda."

"And dear, dear brother! will you try to think that there are some things well lost in the winning, and a prize to be won better worth striving for than gold or worldly renown?"

He nodded, and gently withdrew himself from her clasp; but seeing that Eda still regarded him wistfully, he came back to embrace her again, and to whisper, "I do think so now. I do feel that my life has been hitherto one tissue of errors and mistakes: but if I live, little sister—if I live, with God's help," and he bowed his head reverently, "I will retrieve them!"

The ship sailed away, and Eda went to be the light of a good man's home, a true helpmeet to Fritz Allonby, and a wise as well as loving mother to his children.

The ship sailed away, to be heard of never more. Whether, in the tedious hours of the voyage, Mark communed with his own heart, and sought at last the true riches which alone bring peace with them, none here can know; but the hopes engendered by his parting words mingled with Eda's grief for his loss; and by her at least his memory was, and always will be, tenderly cherished.

THE END.

"WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?"—II.

BY THE REV. D. MOORE, M.A., VICAR OF HOLY TRINITY, PADDINGTON; AND CHAPLAIN IN ORDINARY TO THE QUEEN.

"The burden of Dumah. He calleth out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night: if ye will enquire, enquire ye: return, come —Isa. xxi. 11, 12.

THERE is yet one other view sometimes taken of this text and the spirit in which it is proposed, namely, that it is the cry of one under feelings of real awakening and alarm, penetrated with a sense of impending danger, and inquiring anxiously as to any appearing signs of its approach. "Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?"

And this is a stage of religious experience which it may be believed there are very few who do not pass through, whether it issue in hardened impiety and confirmed estrangement from God, as in the case of Pharaoh, or Felix, or those who were "cut to the heart" at the preaching of Stephen, or whether it be followed up by "a repentance unto salvation," as in the case of the gaoler at Philippi, or of the three thousand on the day of Pentecost. "And when He is come," it is said, with regard to the Divine comforter, "He will reprove the world of sin." This is His first work in the heart of all of us—to revive impressions of guilt upon the conscience, to break up the reign of a false and delusive peace, to suffer us no longer to be settled upon our lees, and to bring before the mental eye, in all its vast proportions, the sin which made a Saviour die. And the greatness of the ransom shows the greatness of the deserved condemnation, and therefore the awful peril of continuing any longer under the frown of God. There is nothing like a right view of the great facts of redemption for helping us to a right understanding of what sin is, what moral government is, what an intensely holy thing the holiness of God is. Who—in contemplation of the quenchless love, the endured scorn, the unknown sufferings, the unwearied compassion of the Son of God, when angels were looking on with powerless amazement, and the arm of the Lord would not suffer itself to be revealed, as if the cross of Christ were a pillar to uphold the sanctities of the eternal throne—could consider sin a light thing? Who—in view of the strong crying and tears, the night-long supplications and prayers, the pleadings, deep, ceaseless, and unutterable ever going up for us before the altar of the Holy One—could consider salvation an easy thing? Who, in anticipation of the fact, that "this same Jesus which is taken up from us into heaven shall so come in like manner as we have seen him go into heaven," to seal his servants on their foreheads, to gather his redeemed under his shadow, to distribute, among the children of the resurrection, mansions, dignities, spoils, thrones, but on the other hand to bind in chains them that loved Him not, to banish from His presence them that sought Him not, to hide in the abysmal deep of eternal night all that refused His grace, resisted His Spirit, put from them the overtures of His mercy, and counted the blood wherewith they should have been sanctified an unholy or an unneeded thing—Who, we ask, in the thought of these things, can rise up, lie down, walk forth, day after day, in the midst of a thousand deaths, without the frequent and anxious self-inquiry, "Am I Christ's? In what state or stage is my soul's work? Lord, make me to know mine end and the measure of my days what it is." "Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?"

IV. But let us say a few words on the answer which the watchman returns to this cry. Whether the question be put by the scoffer who rejects the Divine message, by the practical unbeliever who makes too light of it, or by the awakened sinner who would fain be admonished by its threatened penalties, the answer of the prophet is the same—solemn, dignified, startling, full of emphasis, and yet as full of love. "I will tell you what of the night. The morning cometh and also the night. If ye will enquire, enquire ye: return, come."

"The morning cometh." The question, we are to suppose, was prompted by something of darkness, already brooding gloomily over the fortunes of the nation. Was this the skirting edge of the coming cloud, the forecast shadow of this predicted night of wrath? "Not yet," answers the watchman, to those who might be really in alarm about the matter. "This darkness will pass away, and your fears with it, it may be. For the light will dawn as usual. And you will think no more of God or of His judgments; will wonder what there could have been in that cloud to alarm you; and will begin to doubt whether all this night of burden, and woe, and wrath, and ruin, be not some gloomy creation of the prophet's brain. But the sun of grace as well as the sun of Nature knows the time of his going down. There is a fixed limit to all your working time, to all your seeking time, to all your praying time. And then the darkness sets its seal to the work, in whatsoever state it be." "The morning cometh and also the night."

The words should suggest a thoughtful scanning of God's ways and dealings with us, more especially His afflictive providences—what they are sent for, how they are received, what impressions they leave behind. It is a merciful necessity of our moral nature that sorrow should endure only "for a night." It may be a very long night, and "the morning" not a very bright one, by which it is succeeded. But if the chastenings of the Lord have been "despised," or if we have "fainted" under his rebukings, if the pruning hook has only made the branch to stretch out in more wild and barren luxuriance, and if, in our ease, we "recant the vows made in pain as frivolous and void," what is the morning to us but a morning between two nights—between the night of unblessed affliction and the night of God's avenging wrath? When trouble was upon us, when there was a cloud upon the spirit, when we saw not the way of peace, when Christ seemed afar off, when, for the greatness of our sins and for the distress of our fears, we "walked in darkness and had no light," we could humbly repair to Christ, the true watchman of Israel, to ask, "What of the night?" "Tell us what of the night?" And in all kindness He answered us, and yet in very faithfulness, "The night you fear is not yet. The morning cometh. The light of God's reconciled countenance shall yet shine upon you; only see to it that ye walk in that light. Go not a step out of that belt of sunshine. It is all darkness beyond—thick darkness. For relapses after vows, backslidings after convictions, new insults after deliverances, lookings back upon Sodom after being dragged therefrom by an angel's hand, these must shorten the hours of our day of visitation, may put an end to them suddenly." "The morning cometh but also the night."

And then let us note the prophet's closing sentence—a full gospel in three words; the soul's salvation suspended upon three acts—"enquire:" "return," "come. "If ye will enquire, enquire ye"—teachably, as one sincere; diligently, as one in earnest; solemnly, as one resolved to act upon the light you gain. Inquire "what of the night?" when it shall arrive? on whom it shall fall? how its gloom may become changed into brightness, and its shadows as the noon-day? Inquire not the way to Zion only, but the signs that you yourselves are in that way. An interest in Christ is too momentous a thing to be taken for granted. The soul's welfare for eternity should rest upon a surer basis than a peradventure. It is too large a concession to the wisdom of the multitude to suppose that the many must be right; and it is poor honour to that "inspiration of the Almighty which gave us understanding" to suppose that we shall any of us get to heaven blindfolded. No; we must "inquire." The marks of vital goodness, the notes of the spiritual mind, the proofs of a subjugated will, the indications that Christ is formed in us, that the spirit dwells in us, that our soul's life is being drawn up into high and mysterious fellowship with the Father and the Son, are matters which we can learn of the great Teacher, and of Him only. "If ye will enquire, enquire ye."

And "return:" for, as supposed in the case of all awakened penitents, you have gone very far wrong; you have ground to retrace, fellowships to break off, false guides to part from and quit for ever. There must be a turning back—to a quitted home, to a forsaken pasture, to arms that would fold you in their kind embrace, to a Father who will weep for you at your return. Only begin while the morning lasteth. Take some practical step at once. Whilst inquiring the way to Zion, set your face thitherward. Resolve: arise: "return."

And then "come." So begins, and so ends all Scripture. Whether the watchman tell of the night, or the prophet assure us of the morning; whether the law tell us of a world where the very "light shall be as darkness," or the gospel of the heavenly Jerusalem saying, "There shall be no night there"—precept or promise, woe or warning, reproof or doctrine, they all speak one voice,

"come." To the cross "come," that you may die to sin; to the grave "come," that you may rise again unto righteousness; to the throne of grace "come," that you may find rest for the burdened spirit; to the heaven of heavens "come," that you may see Jesus in His ascended majesty, loving you as on earth He loved, and loving you to the end. AMEN.

ENGLISH SACRED POETRY.—III.

THE POETRY OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

WE have now carried our history of English sacred poetry from the early times of our Saxon forefathers to the times of Robert Henrysoun, from whose works our last extract was taken, that is to say, to the year 1508. We are rapidly approaching an entirely new epoch in the history of literature, full of interest, and full of great names and mighty works; but before we come to the reign of Queen Elizabeth we must review the sacred poetry of the intervening reigns, particularly that of the reign of Henry VIII. One of the most curious phenomena in the history of English literature is, that between 1461 and 1509, there is scarcely a name of any eminence in the literature. We find none but mediocre versifiers, many of them possessed of respectable talents, capable, too, of writing rhythmically, but all absolutely devoid of genius in the ordinary sense of the word, of that quality which makes Chaucer or Shakespeare or Milton so great. This is more than ordinarily strange, because, usually, when a great poet like Chaucer appears, he is followed, not only by a long train of imitators and disciples, but by men of real and independent genius, who have been stimulated but not inspired by the master mind. But there is another circumstance which makes this period still more anomalous. The genius which ought by the rules of historical analogy to have made its appearance in England appeared in Scotland instead. Three great Scotch poets flourished now, men of whom any country may be justly proud—William Dunbar, Gavin Douglas, and Sir David Lindsay—by the way, the last was a little later, but we class them together because they all three have so much in common, were under the same influences, shared the same sympathies, and present the same characteristics. As, however, none of them can be entitled sacred poets, we shall pass them by, culling a few passages which fall under the class of sacred poems. William Dunbar is a voluminous author: most of his works are allegorical, some of them satirical, all of them thoughtful in conception and brilliant in execution, particularly his "Thistle and Rose," and his "Golden Terge"—the first composed in celebration of the nuptials of James IV. and Margaret Tudor, the second written to demonstrate the general ascendency of love over reason. The following verses are worth reading and reflecting on. The thoughtful reader doubtless will recognise many sentiments and expressions which have won their way into the pages of our modern poets:—

"Be merrie man and take not sair in mind
The wavering of this wretched world of sorrow;
To God be humble, to thy friend be kind,
And with thy neighbours gladly lend and borrow—
His chance to-night, it may be thine to-morrow.
Be blythe in hearte for my aventure,
For oft with wise men it has been said aforow
Without gladness avails no treasure.
Follow on pitie, flee trouble and debate,
With famous folkis hold thy company.
Be charitable and humble in thine estate,
For worldly honour lastes but a cry.
For trouble on earth tak no melancholy;
Be rich in patience, if thou in gudes be porr.
Who lives merrily he lives mightily;
Without gladness avails no treasure."

There is a lovely poem of Dunbar's, in which he fancifully describes the song of a merle and a nightingale: the one praises love, the other contends that all love is lost, save that which has God for its object. The poem is too long to cite at length, but one stanza we cannot forbear quoting. It occurs just after the passage in which the nightingale is represented as having won the merle from the false to the true love:—

"Then sang they both with voices loud and cleare—
The merle saug, 'Man love God that has thee wrought.'
The nightingale sang, 'Man love the Lord most dear,
That thee and all this world made of nought.'
The merle said, 'Love him that thy love has sought
Fro' heaven to earth, and here took flesh and bone.'
The nightingale sang, 'And with his dead thee bought—
All love is lost but upon him alone."

Gavin Douglas, celebrated for his elegant translation of Virgil, only concerns us as being the author of a poem entitled "The Palace of Honour," which is so similar in scope and execution to "Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress," that it is difficult to imagine that the author of our great allegory was ignorant of it. Passing over several minor poets, who, not having written sacred poetry, do not concern us, we come to the Earl of Surrey and Sir Thomas Wyat. Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, was born probably in the City of Westminster, about 1516. As he belonged to a noble family, and soon showed signs of that brilliant and accomplished genius which was destined to form an epoch in the literature of his country, the greatest care was taken of his education. He travelled in Italy and Germany, and on his return became one of the greatest ornaments in the court of Henry VIII. Who has not heard of his romantic attachment to the fair Geraldine, and of his equally romantic friendship with Sir Thomas Wyat? His brilliant military successes at last raised the jealousy of Henry VIII., and this, aggravated by certain family intrigues, particularly with the Seymours, led to his being put on his trial for high treason, January 13th, 1547. The young earl defended himself with great ability, and was staunchly supported by the few friends who stood by him. But all did not avail, and on the 19th of the same month he was beheaded on Tower Hill. His remains were shortly after interred in the Church of All Hallows, Barking, thence they were removed to the place where they now lie, Framingham, Surrey. The Earl of Surrey has left a large collection of poems, mostly dedicated to love, consisting of songs and short pieces. He was the author of the first sonnet in our language, and was the first to introduce blank verse into England. Most of his sacred poems were written towards the close of his life; and he is said to have composed them to atone for the gaiety of his life and the levities of his earlier muse. They consist of paraphrases of certain chapters in Ecclesiastes and in the Psalms. The Psalms he has selected are the fifty-fifth, the seventy-third, and the eighty-eighth. To the first and the second of these he has prefixed a poem, which is a sort of comment on the contents of the Psalm paraphrased. We give a specimen, which is a fair example of these not very interesting works:—

"Give care to my suit, Lord, fromward hide not thy face,
Behold sinking in grief lamenting how I praye,
My fooes they bray so loud and eke threpe on so fast,
Buckled to do me scathe so is their malice bent.
* * * * * *
It was the Lord that breake the bloody compackts of those
That preloked on with yre to slaughter me and mine—
The everlasting God whose kingdom hath no end."

These lumbering lines it will be seen are blank verse of twelve syllables, or Alexandrines. It is curious and somewhat touching to see how the world-worn young poet has selected the passages in sacred writ which are the saddest and the most applicable to his own state. If he could not touch the sacred lyre with the grace and brilliance with which he swept the chords of the secular, he had at least the wisdom to seek for comfort where alone it can be found, and he pointed the path which many of his countrymen more successfully trod. His friend Sir Thomas Wyat has also left some scriptural paraphrases, under the following quaint title: "Certayne Psalms chosen out of the Psalter of David, commonlye called thee VII. Penytentiall Psalms, drawen into Englyshe meter by Sir Thomas Wyat, Knyght, whereunto is added a prologue of the authore before every psalme, very pleasant and profettable to the godly reader." In these poems there is one stanza almost sublime. He represents David after his great sin retiring in shame to a "darcke cave," where he bitterly repents of his wickedness and implores God's mercy:—

"Thys whyle a beam that bryght sonne forth sendeth,
That sonne the whyche was never cloude could hyde,
Pereeth the cave and on the harpe descendethe,
Whose glauncing lyght the cords dyd over glyde,
And such lustre upon the harpe extendethe
As lyght of lampe upon the golde cleane tryed."

The story of Wyat's life is soon told. He was born in 1503, was educated at both Universities, was a brilliant and worthy man at the court of Henry VIII., and formed a memorable friendship with the Earl of Surrey, with whom he had so much in common, and whom he appears to have resembled in genius and accomplishments. Like his friend, he found an early grave, though a tyrant was guiltless of his blood. He died at Sherburne, in Dorsetshire, in 1541, aged 37 years. He has left behind him a large collection of poems much of the same order as Surrey's; as a secular poet he is decidedly inferior to his friend; as a sacred poet as decidedly superior. After Surrey and Wyat followed a collection of poems written after their model, commonly entitled "Poems of uncertain Authors." In this collection there is a rather interesting piece called "The Repentant Sinner in Durance and Adversitie." Of this, the last four lines are quaint and pleasing:—

"With repentant heart I laud thee Lord on high,
That hast so gently set me straight that erst walked so awry,
Now graunt me grace my God to stande thine strong in sprete,
And let the world then work such wayes as to the world seems mete."

George Gascoigne, author of the "Steele Glass" and of two among the first of our early dramas, is the next name on our list, though, chronologically, he belongs to the epoch which will be the subject of our next paper—the Elizabethan age. Gascoigne's poetry is, for the most part, secular, but he has written three sacred poems, which are by no means contemptible, entitled "Gascoigne's Good Morrow," "Gascoigne's Good Night," and "Gascoigne's De Profundis." The most striking characteristic of these pieces is their intense earnestness, every word seems to come from the heart: the verse is flowing, but not of uniform smoothness. We quote a few lines from his last poem, addressed suppliantly to the Almighty:—

"Oh, bend thine eyes attentively to heare!
Oh, turn thine eyes, behold me how I wail!
Oh, hearken Lord, give eare for mine avail!
Oh, mark in mind the burdens that I beare!
See how I sinke in sorrowes everywhere,
Behold and see what aoloure I endure;
Bende willing ear, and pittie therewithall
My wailing voice,
Which hath no choice,
But evermore upon thy name to call."

Gascoigne tells us that the idea of these verses struck him as he was riding in a storm of rain along the high road to London.

We now come to good honest old Tusser, author of "The Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry." He was born at Rivenhall, in Essex, about 1523, of an ancient family. He was educated at Eton, and Trinity College, Cambridge. Thence, under the auspices of his patron William Lord Paget, he proceeded to court, and there for ten years he remained. Tired, however, of that toilsome and fettered life, he exchanged the pursuit of a courtier for the humbler calling of a farmer. He now seems to have roved about from one place to another—too restless to settle, too poor to be altogether idle. The first edition of his "Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry" was printed in 1557, when the poet was living at Ralwood, in Sussex. This poem aims at being to the English farmer what Hesiod's "Works and Days" was to the Greek farmer. He gives advice on almost everything connected with farming; and has produced a work which, in the language of Warton, is valuable as a genuine picture of the agriculture, the rural arts, and the domestic economy and customs of our industrious ancestors. This poem is interspersed with some charming bits of sacred poetry, such as his "Christmas Caroll," a description of Christmas, besides many other stanzas interspersed among his poems, for Tusser was evidently a devout and pious man. These, however, we pass by, and select for quotation a little poem among what he calls his "Miscellaneous." It is entitled "A Poesie for thine own bedchamber":—

"What wisdom more, what better life than pleaseth God to send?
What worldly goods, what longer use than pleaseth God to lend?
What better fare than well content, agreeing with thy wealth?
What better guest than trusty friend in sickness and in health?
What better bed than conscience good, to pass the night with sleep?
What better work than daily care from sin thyself to keep?
What better thought than think on God, and daily Him to serve?
What better gift than to the poor, that ready be to serve?
What greater praise of God and man than mercy for to show?
Who merciless shall mercy find that mercy shows to few?
What worse despair than loth to die for fear to go to hell?
What greater faith than trust in God through Christ in heaven to dwell?"

There is more in these pithy verses than will appear on the first perusal. Tusser, like many others who have given the world wise advice, does not seem to have followed it himself, and this shrewdest and most practical of bards, who was successively musician, courtier, schoolmaster, farmer, grazier, and author, closed a thriftless life in poverty in London, where he lies buried at St. Mildred's Church, in the Poultry, or we should say at the place where St. Mildred's Church used to be, for it has lately been pulled down.

We have now traced the history of sacred poetry to the age of Elizabeth; we have seen the muse gradually passing from the hands of ecclesiastics into those of the laity; we have seen it asserting its position and employing the talents of courtiers and men of fashion like Surrey and Wyat even in the worldly and frivolous court of Henry VIII., and in the future we shall find that it steadily grows with the growth of secular poetry till it culminates in the 17th century with a Milton, in the 18th with a Cowper, in the 19th with a Keble.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"MARY."

The voice was very low and feeble which spoke that single word, but it was instantly heard by her to whom it was addressed.

"I am here, dear; I was only gathering this lovely white rose for you—is it not beautiful? So pure and delicate!"

"Yes, it resembles you, my child, with your white dress and fair sweet face," said the old man who had first spoken, with the courtly gallantry of a generation that is rapidly passing away. "But come, now, and sit down beside me; there is much that I have wished to say to you for a long time past, and this hour seems well suited to the task—all is so still and tranquil."

It was in truth a peaceful scene on which the eyes of the speaker rested. His chair had been placed in front of the picturesque little villa, which he had inhabited for more than twenty years, and as the house had been built on the brow of a hill, it commanded an extensive view on either side, over one of the fairest counties in England—rich pasture-lands, sweeping away in graceful undulating lines towards the far horizon, alternated with orchards and gardens and wooded knolls, where pretty country houses peeped out, half hidden by the clustering trees, and immediately below the sloping lawn where the old man sat, a little murmuring brook ran merrily along, its clear waters dividing the grounds of the villa from a soft green meadow which lay beyond; and over all the sylvan beauty of that smiling landscape had fallen the calm and glory of the sunset hour, bathing it in the lovely light of the after-glow, which filled the western sky as with a sea of gold, and hushing it into that indescribable peace, which steals so gently on the living world after the death of day. Scarce was there a sound or movement in all the tranquil scene; only faint sighs from the rising night wind rippled the long grass in the field, and swept the fragrance of the roses in the villa garden through the scented air, while, occasionally, soft musical murmurs told that the little sleepy birds were nestling down to rest, among the ivy leaves that clothed the sheltering walls around the fair domain. Overhead there was not a cloud or a stain in all the heavenly vault, but just where the limpid blue of the upper arch merged into the clear opal of the sun's forsaken shrine, one pure pale star had started into life, and hung, quivering in its silver radiance, over the darkening earth.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"Fair and sweet, like the white rose she had fastened in his breast."—p. 363.

There is no period of the twenty-four hours when the subtle sympathy of Nature with the human spirit makes itself so deeply felt as in these moments of the unearthly twilight calm, and its influence had fallen, with manifest power, on the two persons who now sat together side by side on the upper part of the lawn, where no trees impeded their view of the far-spreading landscape all around. The elder of the two could, in truth, have nowhere found a more apt type of his own expiring life than the fading light of that summer evening, for not only was he in the evening of his days, but already the shadow of the great night, whose mystery no living eye has ever pierced, was stealing over his wan face and attenuated frame. He was a man between sixty and seventy years of age, whose whole appearance and manner had the unmistakable stamp of high birth and breeding, while his refined and clear-cut features still retained traces of the striking beauty for which he had been remarkable in the days of his youth and strength. For many months past he had been aware that a fatal malady was sapping his life, and he knew that now the end was very near. Yet, though his extreme emaciation and pallor were due to his physical sufferings, it was not any bodily ailment which had set on his forehead the seal of an unspeakable pain—borne by him in impenetrable silence for all the years which made up the sum of her young life who now sat in her fair stillness by his side. There was not the slightest trace of a likeness between them, as indeed there could not be, for they were in no way related by the ties of blood; but Mary Trevelyan had never known any other father, and the house of Louis, Comte de L'Isle had been her home from the days of her earliest infancy.

We have given this man his true name and title by right of birth, but for more than thirty years he had renounced his nationality, and become naturalised in England, while never in all that time had he set foot on the shores of his native France, well as he loved her still. In his adopted country he was known as Mr. Lisle, and none but himself knew that an old French château, where his ancestors had dwelt for many generations, and a noble estate in his own fair land, had passed away from him because he would not compromise the principles which were to him more precious than wealth or position. All his life long he had been an ardent Legitimist, following therein the traditions of his family; but in his devout and earnest mind the belief in the divine right of kings amounted to a religion, so that he did not hesitate to sacrifice to it even name and country. In his youth he had held a confidential post in the service of Charles X.; and when that unhappy king was forced to fly from France, Louis de L'Isle not only insisted on sharing his fallen fortunes, but he took a solemn vow that he would never return to his native country till the day when the Bourbons should be recalled from exile, and the true heir of their princely race should be placed upon the throne of his fathers. That day had never come, as we know, but the loyal true-hearted man had adhered to his resolution, and he had, indeed, been greatly strengthened in it by that which he termed the apostacy of the only relative he had left in France. This was Armand de L'Isle, a brother of his father's, but so much younger that he was very little older than Louis himself. He was a cold, egotistical, narrow-minded man, whose master-passion was the desire to promote his own interests, and whose whole being was so completely given up to a miserable idolatry of self, that there remained no place for nobler aims or purer worship. Armand smiled contemptuously when he heard that Louis had abandoned wealth and position to follow his kingly master into exile, and he composedly entered into possession of the estates, which, he declared, had been forfeited by his nephew. In this proceeding he was openly supported by the reigning powers; and so astute and worldly-wise did he prove himself to be, that with every succeeding change of government or dynasty which gained ascendency in restless France, he managed always to be on the winning side, even while he never took the smallest active part in the service of his country. Such a character and such a career could not but fill a noble-minded man like Louis with ineffable disgust, and he resolutely repudiated all relationship with his uncle, and refused to hold the smallest communication with him. He never so much as mentioned his name; so that his own family were not aware of the existence of this undesirable relation, and, as years went by, he completely lost sight of him, and did not know whether he were alive or dead. Louis knew that Armand had married a very wealthy woman, of low birth—the first unequal alliance which any of their noble family had ever made—but while this step served to increase his indignation against his unworthy uncle, it prevented him from ever hoping to regain his lost estates, as he concluded that Armand would have children, to whom he would take very good care to secure the succession. Louis therefore turned his thoughts away determinately and for ever from the old home of his race, and caused himself to be naturalised in England, as we have said, in order that his son at least might not have the pain of feeling that he was living in exile. To himself, the total severance from his native land was an unquestionable trial, but he found a compensation for it in the love of his young English wife, which drew the sting from that and every other sorrow. For well-nigh thirty years she was the very sweetness of life to him; and in her devoted faithful heart he had found a refuge from every care, till, a few months previously, she had preceded him to that yet surer Home, where a love that cannot die makes sunshine evermore. And now he was following swiftly on the noiseless steps with which she had passed to that unseen country, the true native land of souls that are loyal to the sinless King, and there were but two in the world he was leaving over whom his thoughts lingered with a fond regret—Bertrand Lisle, his only child, and Mary Trevelyan, his adopted daughter. His son had been brought up entirely as an Englishman, and was now, at the age of twenty-six years, serving his adopted country as chargé d'affaires to one of the principal Legations on the Continent; while Mary, who was five years younger, had, ever since the death of Mrs. Lisle, been a most devoted nurse and companion to her adopted father. Yet she knew absolutely nothing of the causes which had linked her in such close bonds with a family to whom she was in no way related. She knew that her own parents had both died on the same day that she herself had been born into the world, and that from the very hour of her mother's departure, Mrs. Lisle had taken her to her heart as her own child; but no explanation had ever been given to her of the circumstances which had led to this arrangement, and when she became old enough to feel some wish to penetrate the mystery, Mr. Lisle drew from her a promise that she would never ask of any one a single question on the subject. She had obeyed, as was natural to her reserved character, without a word of expostulation; but an indefinable instinct taught her, from the first, that the hidden grief which had cast so deep a shadow over the life of Mr. Lisle ever since she could remember, had in some way had its origin on that mysterious day, when, out the very shadow of death which had overtaken those to whom she owed her being, she herself had dawned into the light of the living world.

They formed a striking picture, those two, as they sat there in the peaceful twilight. The dying man lay back in his easy-chair, with the pallor of approaching dissolution on his finely-moulded features, his thin hands stretched out upon his knees, his whole attitude betokening the utter exhaustion of his vital powers. The young girl, who sat by him in all the bloom and freshness of her life's early summer, clasping her little hands fondly round one of his, was, in truth, as he had said, fair and sweet like the white rose she had fastened in his breast. She was not by any means possessed of striking beauty, though her slight figure was singularly graceful, but there was an indefinable charm in her pure calm face, which made itself gradually felt by all who approached her. Her dark hair, which was very soft and abundant, contrasted almost too strongly with the marble whiteness of her colourless complexion, but it harmonised well with the deep grey eyes, fringed with black lashes, which were so marked a feature in her countenance that the absence of warmer tints was scarcely noticed. Her most striking peculiarity, however, both in manners and appearance, was the extreme stillness and quietude which at all times characterised her. No ripple of agitation seemed ever to disturb the pure contour of her pale face, which was always like the surface of a placid lake, perfectly motionless and unruffled, and although a sweet smile would often curve the delicately-formed lips, they were never seen to open for the hearty laugh or unrestrained merriment natural to her age.

Yet her expression was not in the slightest degree sorrowful or anxious, and she bore no trace of the lines of care, which in truth she had never known in any shape, while a glance at her refined thoughtful face was sufficient to show that it was no lack of mental power which gave her a look of changeless calm, such as is not often seen in this restless world. This perfect stillness seemed to pervade her whole being—her step was entirely noiseless, her voice so low and soft that it could scarce be heard where louder tones were sounding; even her movements were so full of repose that her entrance seemed only like the passing of a gentle breeze through the room. Many persons declared that Mary Trevelyan's extraordinary quietness was the result of an absolute want of feeling, but any one who had noticed on this evening the expression of Mr. Lisle's mournful eyes, as he turned them upon her, would have seen that this was at least not his opinion.

"My darling," he murmured, "as I told you, I have much to say to you, and this soft air cannot hurt me—do not be afraid to let me stay out while I finish all I have to tell. I shall speak to you best while the shadows are gathering round us." Gently she stooped, and lifting up the old man's cloak, which had fallen down, she wrapped it tenderly round him, and said, in a tone low as the sighing night wind, "Say what you will, dear, be sure that I am listening."

CHAPTER II.

Mr. Lisle sat in silence for a few minutes, looking out, with a far-away wistful gaze, towards the golden sunset glow, which seemed so like the gate of Paradise, with the one bright star hung over it as a lamp to light the weary feet of those who, passing from life's toilsome journey, might seek and enter there. But at last he withdrew his eyes from the heavenly vision, and fixed them on the fair graceful form by his side.

"My Mary," he said, "we have both known for some time past that I am dying—dying fast; but to-night there is a strange mysterious instinct in my soul, which seems to tell me that I have reached the very confines of the unseen realm, and soon shall be drawn within it to be seen of mortal eyes no more. Do you know, when you were wandering to and fro just now among your flowers, I thought I heard a whisper from no earthly tone, but from the voice that was so long the music of my life, and it softly asked, 'Is he coming?—is he coming?' and there was a murmur of yet softer harmony that answered 'soon—soon!'"

Mary did not speak, but she bent down, and tenderly kissed the hand she held.

"How long is it since you wrote to summon Bertrand home?" he asked.

"Four days," she answered. "I think he would start for England this morning."

"Then even a telegram could not bring him any quicker? Oh, that I may live to see him—my son—my only child! but in case he comes too late, I must say to you Mary some part of what I would have said to him, but not all—oh, not all!" and a shudder passed over his frame.

"Mary, I have a good and noble son in Bertrand, have I not?"

"Yes," she answered, quietly.

"You have known him from childhood, though of late years you have been often parted; is it not true that he is a man of generous nature, of pure and high-toned mind, of ardent impulses, that ever lead him on to all that is best and most unworldly—a man, in short, worthy of all love; is it not so?"

And again she answered, "Yes," with unchanging calm.

"Then let me tell you, Mary Trevelyan, that from the first moment when I looked on your infant face twenty-one years ago, the most ardent desire of my heart has been that you might become the wife of that dear son. I have wished this every hour that you have lived since then, and I wish it now, with all the concentrated power which can be given to a man's last earthly desire by the passion of death. Say that you will not deny it to me?—say that my longing hope shall be fulfilled?"

For the first time a faint rose tint, like the reflection of the sunset hues, just tinged the colourless purity of Mary's face, but there was no tremor in her low voice as she answered, "Dear, I think you forget that it can avail nothing to speak to me of such a wish."

"You mean that Bertrand has not yet told you that he loves you," said Mr. Lisle, somewhat impatiently, "and that till he does, your sensitive delicacy shrinks from so much as entertaining the question. These conventionalities are all very well in the days of life and strength, Mary; but surely, in face of inexorable death they need not be allowed to obscure the momentous verities on which so much depends for us all, living and dead alike. I tell you I am very certain that he loves you, who could do otherwise that had ever known you only half as well as he has done all through your lovely blameless life! Has he not seen you, with never a thought of self, living so purely, so devotedly, for the good of others only, actuated in every word and deed by the holiest motives, and yet so unostentatious, so still, so silent, that none but ourselves could have guessed the treasure we possessed in you. Ah, my Mary, be sure he loves you! I have seen him watching you when you have been moving about amongst us with your quiet grace, bringing peace and consolation wherever your footsteps came, and the expression in his bright blue eyes was not to be mistaken then. If he has not spoken of love, or asked you in so many words to be his wife, doubtless he did but restrain himself, because he felt that in my sickness and desolation it would be cruel to detach you from me. He must have known that the time was very near at hand when my worn-out life would stand no more between him and his happiness, and he has caught the inspiration of your unselfishness, and determined to say no disturbing word which could mar my enjoyment of your care and tenderness, even to the end. No! if my great wish depended on him alone it would have its fulfilment, Mary, I am very sure of that—it is only of you that I am in doubt."

"In doubt?" she said, with a questioning tone, as she raised her large grave eyes to his face.

"Not in doubt of your perfect willingness to do all you can for my contentment, Mary," he answered, smiling at her, "but in doubt of the nature of your feelings towards Bertrand, my son. Do you know, my child, that your remarkable stillness and reserve lead most persons outside our home to the conclusion that you are of a cold apathetic temperament, which is incapable of strong feeling in any way. I know well that it is as false as to say that no heart of fire glows under Etna's white veil when winter wraps it round with snow. I am well assured that not only you are capable of love in its deepest meaning, but that if such a sentiment ever took possession of your heart, it would be with a power and tenacity which would hold it rooted there, unchanged and unchangeable, so long as your life itself should last; am I not right, Mary? If you give your affection to any upon earth it will be but once and for ever—will it not?"

"I have never been able to conceive of love in any other way," she answered. "Surely there can be but one in all the world for each of us, it would be no true devotion which could ever change or waver, for it never could be felt a second time in all the years of life; it seems to me a desecration of the very name to suppose it possible."

"Yet many would tell you that disenchantment, or unkindness, or neglect, has often times driven love from its resting-place to find another home."

"Then it never was true," she answered, "or worthy of the name. How could such trials touch that which becomes a part of the very being of the soul? I do not think that even death, of which we know so little, can in this make any difference, as you will find, dear, when she comes to meet you at the gates of pearl."

"Yes, Mary, it is thus that I was sure you would feel, and it is an unspeakable consolation to me to know it, for if my heart's desire is fulfilled, and you do love my Bertrand, it will be for ever. I shall leave him secure in your affection even as you yourself will be safe in his care; and now you know the petition I would ask of you, that you would give to him the priceless treasure of your heart, which I ask from you in his name, and that now—even now—you would not hold back from me the truth, but tell me freely and frankly, if it should be so, that already you have learned to love him."

Her head drooped till her fair cheek lay upon the hand she held, but she did not speak one word.

Mr. Lisle bent over her with an anxious look. "Mary, I am dealing you hard measure, I know well, in trying to force from one so retiring and sensitive an avowal which is never given except as a response to him who alone has a right to ask it, yet I do claim this self-denying kindness at your hands in the name of all the anguish borne till this hour, whose source and whose extent you can never know. If you would not have it gather with increasing horror round my dying heart, if you would not have it follow me as an accusing spectre through the very portals of the grave, you will tell me that you love my son, if truthfully you can speak the blessed words."

She kissed his hands repeatedly, but still no sound passed her lips.

"Mary, I would not ask it," he said, "if your special quietude and calm had not prevented me from ever gaining the slightest clue to your feelings. I know that Bertrand has been dear to you as one whom you have known from childhood, but such a sentiment might well exist while all your heart was given to another. That which I pine to know, if only it were given me to do so, is the certainty that my son is the man whom you have elected, out of all the world, to be the one and only object of your heart's most deep affection. If it be so, though your delicate spirit may shrink painfully from the admission, yet remember, Mary, you are but whispering your secret to the grave, where soon all that has ever been told to me will be buried in eternal silence; will you not overcome even maidenly reticence to give ease to the last hours of the father to whom you have been and are so dear? Ah, Mary, it is the privilege of the dying that their petitions should be granted, tell me, sweet and gentle child, tell me, do you love my son?"

Then at last the answer came, soft and low, but perfectly distinct, "Better than my life: he is now! and he will be for ever, my one and only love!"

"Thank heaven!" said the old man, falling back into his chair. "Oh, heaven be thanked! Now, indeed, can I depart in peace!"

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 20. St. Paul at Ephesus.

Chapter to be read—Acts xix.

INTRODUCTION. Our last lesson left Paul at Ephesus; and the descent of the Holy Ghost on the Church. What were the great gifts of the Spirit? So these twelve disciples must have helped much in the good work by speaking in different languages, and prophesying.

I. Special Miracles. (Read xix. 8—12.) Where did Christ often preach in the week? Remind of Sermon on Mount, in wilderness, by the sea-shore (Luke v. 2), and many other places; wherever could get people to listen. So St. Paul, always seizing opportunities. For three months teaching in synagogue. How was his message received? (ver. 9.) But was the synagogue a place for public discussion and angry contradiction? So departed from synagogue, and went to a school. Whose was it? Was this a proper place? What should always be taught in a school? and being probably a private place could more quietly set the truth before the disciples. How long did this go on? Time in two years for the news to spread far and wide. All in that part of Asia heard the word of Jesus. What else caused it to spread? Remind of multitudes who always followed Jesus to be fed and healed. So with St. Paul. But what wonderful miracles! Handkerchiefs healing people! Have we heard of any specially wonderful ones before? Who was it whose very shadow healed people? (Acts v. 15.) This almost more wonderful.

And who were healed? Not merely sick, but people with evil spirits. See how much was on God's side. Bold preaching, speaking with tongues, prophesying, miracles. No wonder Satan's power began to tremble. Would Satan make no effort against it? We shall see.

II. Special Superstition. (Read 13—20.) What magicians have we read of? By whom was Simon Magus rebuked, and by whom was Elymas? Do conjurors generally stay in a place? Why not? System of fraud, so might be discovered; so pass on from place to place, like roving gipsies. Some of these wanderers (vagabonds, ver. 13) began to copy St. Paul, and use name of Jesus. Was it any use? See Christ's warning to those who prophesied but did not practise in His name (Matt. vii. 21); and Satan too would not recognise them as allies; so they fled. Remind of Egyptian magicians unable to stand before Moses (Exodus ix. 11). What effect did this have? Showed folly of such superstitions as Ephesians were accustomed to, and showed reality of Gospel of Jesus. But they want to do more. Have been using many books of magic; feel they ought to get rid of them. How shall they do so? Determine to burn them. Picture the scene:—The new converts assembling, each laden with rolls of parchment; the apostles welcoming each comer; a large fire kindled; the valuable books thrown in; the crackling of the parchment; the stirring up of the leaves to make them burn better; the congratulations when the last bad book gone. What was the total value? See what this showed on the part of the converts. (a) They were in earnest. All old superstitions must be put away, however time-honoured and however dear to them. (b) They valued God more than Mammon. Would part with books rather than dishonour God. Remind how often God has required similar test. Abraham must give up his son, the young man his possessions—to follow Christ. (c) They were not ashamed. This burning, done openly, before all. They "confessed Christ," and had reward in that the word of God, which they valued so much, spread widely.

Practical Lesson. Bring this home to the children. Is there anything they ought to give up? Bad books, bad companions, bad habits. Let them do it as Ephesians did—readily and unhesitatingly, or cannot be true disciples.

III. Special Opposition. (Read 21—41.) Tell children that the Athenians wore charms—small models of the Temple of Ephesus. This flourishing city; great many inhabitants; brisk trade in these charms. But what are many Ephesians doing? Giving up books of magic! Will give up wearing charms next! Whom would that injure? So the workmen hold a meeting, to consult as to what shall be done. Who takes the lead? What does he say? (ver. 26.) Which does he really care most about, his trade or the goddess Diana? Like Judas, who wanted the money paid for Mary's spices, pretending he wanted it to give to the poor. Now picture the tumult:—The workmen rushing out excited, shouting aloud; the crowd in the streets; two of St. Paul's companions seized by the mob, carried into the public hall; St. Paul boldly proposing to go to them; his friends keeping him back; the mob continuing to shout; a great many taking part in confusion, but don't at all know what it is all about. Crowds much the same now and always. At last, who comes? The town-clerk, afraid of a real riot; he will be held responsible. So calms the people, and reminds Demetrius that he can always go to law if he has any complaint to make. See how he speaks of St. Paul's friends (ver. 37). After three years' residence in the city, well known to public officials, had reputation for being peaceable citizens, which helped them now. So the danger passed.

Practical Lessons. Why did not these workmen like this new religion? But if this trade injured, might have turned to some new one. Contrast their conduct with that of those who burned their books. Those decided for Christ against the devil; these just the opposite. Such a day will always come to all. For Christ or against—God or Mammon. God will give grace to form right decision.

Questions to be answered.

1. What special miracles were granted to Paul?
2. What were some of the superstitions at Ephesus?
3. Describe the burning of the books.
4. What did the Ephesians show by their conduct?
5. What opposition was stirred up at Ephesus?
6. What practical lessons may be learned?

PERFECT THROUGH SUFFERING.

BREAK not, sad heart!
Full many a bitter tear must yet be shed,
Full many a tender cord lie strained and dead,
Ere thou hast learned, through sorrow's rough path led,
How strong thou art.

Death cometh not
At sorrow's call. The wretched cannot die;
Long at his gate the woe-crushed heart must lie,
Till, raised at length, it findeth, with a sigh,
Grief killeth not.

Wouldst thou learn why?
Perfect through suffering must thy weakness be;
Then, sorrow-taught, thou good in all shalt see,
And joy that not till then was given to thee—
The time to die.

AUNT JESSIE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

ESTHER had been struggling with a severe cold ever since that tempestuous night when she had come in so wet, and had been so anxious to hide from her aunt's eyes the state of her boots, knowing that there was nothing forthcoming towards the purchase of a new pair, and that it would only vex and grieve her to find how much they were needed. At length she was obliged to yield to illness, and was confined to bed with a sharp attack on the lungs. Mrs. Lang was her only nurse; and night and day she watched beside her, doing the best she could, and sometimes making her sense of feeling take the place of seeing.

Mr. and Mrs. Webbe were kind, and sent what help they could. But it was a hard struggle to pull through that time; and many a little possession which she had kept and clung to all these years was Mrs. Lang forced to part with to meet the daily needs. Her overtaxed strength, and sleepless watchful nights, moreover, told upon the feeble remnant of sight that was yet left; and by the time Esther began to recover her aunt saw clearly what was the only course left to her. But to gratify her niece, who wished it so earnestly, she would once more pay a visit to the oculist, and hear his opinion.

It was a bright spring day, warm and pleasant, and the doctor's house being at no great distance, and the way so familiar, she decided to go alone, though Esther tried to persuade her to find some companion to guide her. But she said she could see sufficiently in the bright sunlight not to mistake her way; and so she departed, leaving Esther sitting up, for the first time, that afternoon.

The oculist's verdict was—"No hope, no cure; it must end in total blindness." And the patient heart bowed to receive it meekly. With a simple "Thank you, sir," she turned to grope her way home again.

She had to pass over the bridge across the river; and feeling tired—for this was the first time she had been out of doors, save to the little general shop, since Esther's illness began—she stood a while leaning against the stone parapet, and looking down upon the flowing waters, which she could only dimly make out. But she knew well what their appearance was; she had so often stood there looking down when her sight was still good.

Though it was a bustling part of the city, and busy life seemed ever streaming and thronging across that bridge, she soon grew too much engrossed in her meditations to notice what went on around her. Even in that crowded part a fresh breeze fanned her cheeks, brought by the river, as it seemed to her fancy, from the sweet fields and meadows and open country through which its course lay before it flowed past the great city on its way to the sea.

One peaceful spot upon its banks she knew well; and as she stood looking down with almost sightless eyes, a vivid picture rose up before her mental vision. It was a picture of a substantial farm-house, long and low, with drooping creepers and sunny lawn in front, and meadows stretching down to the river's bank, whilst fruitful orchards lay on either side, and well-built hay-ricks and corn-stacks nestled behind—all combining to give an air of plenty and comfort. She saw a group of children playing about—girls mostly, with only one boy amongst them, and he the youngest of the party. They romped and were merry; but the games were always chosen by him, and it was his likings, not theirs, which always seemed to be consulted. And watching them at their sports, looking on calmly and smilingly, were the figures of a white-haired couple, who glanced continually with fond pride towards the bright comely lad.

But after a time those aged figures disappeared from view, and the laughing group of merry children was exchanged for one of sober women, whose faces often wore a look of care, which they seemed to share together, and which deepened as the days passed by, being always deepest when the brother's name was mentioned.

Then the scene changed again: that band of sisters was broken up and dispersed, having sacrificed their all—and each had had a moderate portion left her by the father—to save the brother from exposure and disgrace. They had gone to seek their fortunes, impoverished by the one on whom they had lavished their affection, whom they had made their idol, and the old home knew them no more. It had passed into other hands, after having been in their family for generations; and strangers would sit in the rooms, and walk in the garden, where every nook and corner had some association with happy bygone days in the minds of these sorrowful sisters.

And of all that band there now remained only the almost sightless woman who stood seeing these pictures in the deep waters.

Then rose up another vision of a few brief years of happy married life with the sailor-husband; the settling into the snug little home which he had prepared for her; the way in which she used to stand on that bridge where she now stood, and fancy the flowing waters as they hastened to the sea were rushing to meet him on his homeward way, would kiss the vessel which bore him, and, lapping against its sides, would murmur their welcome to the brave sturdy seaman.

Then came the time when they had gone to meet the ship, and found that it had returned without a part of its precious freight—without the upright manly spirit which, though firm as a rock to resist evil, was as tender as a woman with the weak and sorrowing; whose bright though quiet example had been as leaven in the midst of that bold, daring, sometimes unscrupulous crew; and who had found a watery grave in the ocean, sending home as a last message to the faithful and faithfully-loved wife, that the God in whom they both trusted would one day gather his ashes again from the deep, and together they would walk in that land where "there is no more sea."

She had waited long for that day—she was waiting still—but come it assuredly would; and meantime she could wait.

Then, still looking back, she saw herself sitting in her sorrow and desolation, and a heart-broken young creature, with a sweet infant, coming in to throw herself upon her for sympathy and protection. It was the brother's wife, whom he had married thinking she had money, and then, finding how miserably small was the portion compared with the greatness of the pressing claims upon him, he had deserted her and her helpless infant, going off secretly to Australia, as he could no longer remain in England.

The little that the sister had was freely shared with the brother's wife. But the latter did not linger long; she passed away to that region above where all sounds of weeping are stilled, and broken hearts are healed, leaving her little Esther to the care of the widowed childless one, who had accepted the sacred trust, and faithfully discharged it. But that (her own part in the matter) was not what she saw; she was looking at the ray of sunlight which had been as a golden thread running through the picture which would otherwise have appeared sombre in its colouring—the love and clinging devotion of the blue-eyed child, who was now approaching womanhood, and from whom, for the first time in all these years, she was about to be called to part. She must let her go out alone to face the world which might have temptations enough in store for one so young and pretty and inexperienced, and from which she would gladly have sheltered her a little longer.

But what was she thinking? Why was she fearing? Would not He who never slumbereth nor sleepeth be keeping guard over her? What need, then, for her to trouble and fret—as if she could take better care of her child than her own heavenly Father! Surely she could leave her to Him, and have not a single anxious doubt!

When she entered the little room, on her return, Esther looked up into her face with a glance which showed how many hopes and fears were hanging upon the result of this visit. Though Mrs. Lang could not see the expression on the countenance, or the half-imploring look in the eyes, as though they were beseeching her to say there was hope, she knew by instinct the question the girl longed to put, and replied to it at once by a gentle shake of her head. That was enough. Then she sat down in her chair.

Neither of them spoke; but Esther rose, and coming across, knelt down beside her aunt, and putting her arms round her neck, clung to her in a close embrace. Then she laid her head down upon the shoulder of the elder woman, who silently stole an arm round her waist, and thus they remained for some moments. No need of language to speak their sorrow, which was more for each other than for themselves; no occasion to express in words the sympathy, and love, and tender unselfish affection, which each bore the other. They knew it all without words: but had they not done so, that mute embrace would have told more than the most eloquent phrases.

(To be continued.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

139. Who is mentioned as having written the Epistle to the Romans for St. Paul?

140. Of whom did our Saviour say, "I will make you fishers of men?"

141. Which of David's relatives acted as a scribe for him?

142. Quote a passage in which St. Paul declares that the Gospel which he preached was taught him by the revelation of God.

143. With what blessing did Aaron bless the people of Israel at God's command?

144. How many times does St. Paul say he was beaten?

145. What was the name of the nurse of Rebekah, the wife of Isaac?

146. Quote the first and last words of our Saviour, while on earth.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 336.

127. Eutychus fell from the window where he was sitting, and was taken up dead; whom St. Paul afterwards restored to life (Acts xx. 9).

128. Nehemiah i. 4—11; ii. 4, &c.; iv. 4, 5, 9; v. 19; and vi. 14.

129. Lazarus. "But the chief priests consulted that they might put Lazarus also to death" (compare John xi. 44 and xii. 10).

130. "HOLINESS TO THE LORD" (Exodus xxviii. 36, 37).

131. Cousin (Esther ii. 7).

132. "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham" (Matt. i. 1).

(Drawn by E. WAGNER.)

APRIL THOUGHTS.

THE April wind was in mine ear—
The low-voiced wind I love so well—
And, like a silver-sounding bell,
A crystal fountain tinkled near,
And dropped into a rippling stream,
Making calm wordless music there,
Whilst all the pleasant woodland air
Seemed taking part in one sweet theme.

The song was old as this green world,
Yet fresher than its fairest spring;
It spoke of beauty on the wing,
Of marvels in a petal curled
By one frail insect for an ark,
Of weeds and coral rich and strange,
And of those ocean flowers that change
To living lanterns in the dark.

It spoke of wonders everywhere—
Wisdom and wonder hand in hand;
The wonders of the sea and land,
The wisdom of "our Father's" care;
Of truths far higher than the stars,
Locked up in Nature from us all,
Save when their shadows faintly fall
On sons of light through prison bars.

And aye, the chorus of the lay
Was, "Gratitude and praise and love
To Him who lives and reigns above—
To Him who rules the night and day!"
So when mine ear had drunk the whole
Of those soft sounds for comfort sent;
The mantle of dull discontent
Fell like chain-armour off my soul.

JANE DIXON.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VI.—OUT OF THE DREAM-WORLD

"WELL, mamma, he will come," said Netta. "He says his mother always used to talk about you, and that he should so like to see you."

"But I hate visitors," answered Mrs. Woodward, "unless they are any of your father's literary friends; they are as Bohemian as ourselves."

"Is he a jolly fellow?" asked Tom.

"Very, worth a dozen of your paragon Mr. Fullers, with his big eyes, and tawny moustache he was so fond of stroking."

"How dare you!" flashed Dolly, feeling that she was beginning to hate this interloping George Blakesley already.

"Well, so he is," she laughed merrily back. Netta never got out of temper, any more than she ever had any violent emotions. "And he's an excellent match. I advise you to set your cap at him, Dolly. Mr. Fuller has evidently forgotten all about you, for he has been gone an entire year, and not written once."

"He's not likely to look at Dolly," said Mrs. Woodward—referring, of course, to the coming Blakesley—"she is such a plain little thing," and she looked up at her eldest daughter. A year had only added to her beauty, and the summer sunlight was resting on the golden hair. "Why, I could not help seeing that Adrian Fuller was struck with the difference in the sisters the last evening he was here!" She did not say the words unkindly, or mean them to sound so, and Dolly knew this, and Netta's beauty and her own plainness were things Dolly had been aware of, and heard lamented all her life, yet the remark struck home, and the hot tears came into her eyes, and a wild wish into her heart for just a little beauty. If her mother could only be proud of her as she was of Netta, or if some one older than herself would love her just a little. She had so longed for this happiness lately. She had no one to look up to now, no one to win praise or love from, save her younger brother and sisters; and her older wiser friends consisted of books and the old sycamore tree. There had been Mr. Fuller, and how she had missed him through all the long months that formed the present year only Dolly's self knew; and how she had waited for a letter day after day, and week after week, till half angrily, half sadly, she gave him up, it was sorrow even to remember. He was dead, she used to think to herself in the sad moments; and he had forgotten her, she thought, half sorrowfully in the angry ones. Be it which it might, however, she could not allow Netta to speak against him. It was her mother's speech, however, that cut her on her tenderest point, for it spoilt what was as yet the sweetest memory of her life. Tom came to her rescue, as heretofore. Tom was sixteen now. How they were growing up, these Woodward children!

"Did he notice the difference!" he said, scornfully. "Netta got the worst of it then, for he was always awfully fond of Dolly. Why, he said he should be in love with her when he came back, which is more than he'd ever be with Netta, I know!"

"Is it?" laughed the Beauty. "Well, we'll see, if ever this wonderful man returns. I shall try what I can do."

"Oh no, Netta!" began Dolly, darting forward, and she put her hand on her sister's arm, and as she did so, saw their two faces reflected in a queer old-fashioned looking-glass, before which Netta had been standing. She gazed for a minute, almost in surprise, at their two faces; the one, with blue eyes and red pouting lips, and a flush upon her rounded cheek—a sweet, fair, English face, crowned with a wealth of golden hair; the other, grave and pale, with dark brown hair falling low on the forehead, and twisted into a knot behind, with grey eyes fearless and truthful enough, but with none of the fascinations of the soft blue ones that were watching her, and a mouth that was large and yet sweet and expressive, and so formed, perhaps, the best feature of the face.

"We are very different," she said, with a long wistful sigh, as she turned away. Then Sally crept to Dolly's side. The quaint child understood her sister better than any other perhaps.

"You would not like the people in books, and all the trees, if you were like her," she said, for these were their common friends.

"No," answered Dolly, looking back almost pityingly at the sister she had envied a moment or two before.

CHAPTER VII.—HOW DOLLY CHANGED HER NAME.

So George Blakesley, who had met Netta at her grandfather's, and who had been anxious to see Mrs. Woodward, because his mother and she had been schoolfellows, made his call, and saw Mrs. Woodward, and was liked, and was asked to come again and see Mr. Woodward, and did. At last he came to spend an evening, just after the fashion of Adrian Fuller of old, and then it was that he first made acquaintance with Dolly. She had determined that she would not see the possible successor of her old friend until she absolutely could not help herself, and she kept her resolution.

Mr. Woodward came home, and George Blakesley arrived, and still Dolly sat beneath the sycamore tree, with a book in her hand, and with Sally at her feet, and Tom standing behind looking over her shoulder. She always felt in after years that she had sat there waiting almost consciously for something that would happen, and when Will came down the garden pathway to her, with something hidden beneath his coat, and said, "Dolly, you are to come in to tea in five minutes; and guess what I've got here!" she answered, without a moment's hesitation, "It's a letter from Mr. Fuller," and it was, and her heart gave a great bound when she saw it was directed to herself, and she was compensated for all the past months of waiting.

She broke the seal, and Tom leant his head forward, and Sally rose to her feet, and Will came round to her other shoulder, and so they read his first letter. He had been ill and lazy, he said, and hated writing, but he had not forgotten them, and in another year he should be home again. "I wonder if I shall find you all much altered," he went on. "You will be quite a woman, Dolly; you must be one already, and I shall call you Dorothy in future. I like the name, and the other is too babyish for you now. I hope I shall find you all the same," he repeated again at the end of the letter, after he had told her about his work and way of living, and the country round about, and said all that people far off invariably do say in letters.

"Why, of course, he'll find us the same," said Tom, when they were going towards the house. "What should we alter for?" and for answer Dolly felt the refrain of a song ringing in her ears, as she heard it for many a long day afterwards:—

"The same, the same, yet not the same;
Oh, never, never more!"

She stopped at the garden door.

"Call me Dorothy in future," she said; "I am too old to be called Dolly any more."

And so the old childish name was dropped for ever.

(To be continued.)

THE TRIPLETS OF THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, AUTHOR OF "THE FURNACE," "THE FACE OF THE KING," ETC.

III.—THE THREE FAVOURED DISCIPLES.

"And He taketh with Him Peter and James and John."—ST. MARK xiv. 33.

AROUND the centre of Divine attraction and source of spiritual life—Christ Jesus—were gathered twelve disciples. They were planets attendant on the Sun of Righteousness, gems in the breastplate of the merciful and faithful High Priest, pupils at the feet of the Great Teacher. Vital union to Him brought them into contact, and bound them together in social affection. To these Jesus often unbosomed Himself, disclosed His unique character, divulged His matchless purposes, and accorded invaluable advice. Bestowing upon them authority, He commissioned them to go forth as ambassadors, and, so far as possible, secure peace between the rebel sinner and the righteous God. But there were three of the twelve upon whom Christ showered signal favours. They were stars of the first magnitude; they were probably the most eminent of the apostolic students, and the most intimate friends of the "Man of Sorrows." With Him when He infused life into the veins of the death-stricken daughter of Jairus; with Him when clothed with celestial radiance on the summit of the holy mountain; and with Him when crushed by inconceivable agony in the enclosure of Gethsemane—this elect triumvirate were evidently chosen to play a conspicuous part in the spread of Christianity. They may now, as Lange suggests, be regarded as representatives of the Redeemer's closest followers—John imaging the friends of Jesus who recline on His bosom, or Christianity in contemplation;

Peter personifying the servants of Immanuel, who work for the extension of His kingdom, or piety actively employed; and James typifying the courageous and persevering witnesses of the cross, or piety suffering martyrdom.

Now, looking at these three disciples, we are reminded—

Of the true humility of our Saviour. In that Christ whom we love we recognise a duality of natures. He was divine, being the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of His person. But He was also human. Though "the Ancient of Days," He was "the child;" though the "altogether lovely," yet he was "without form and comeliness;" though the "Word was God," yet the "Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." Christ was man in the wide sense of that term. He possessed a nature like yours and mine, with only one exception—it was sinless. He placed Himself in the ordinary circumstances attendant on the lot of humanity. He shared the innocent joys and sports of childhood; He discharged the duties of an allotted trade; He secured His earthly maintenance by the sweat of His brow; He worshipped on the Sabbath at the synagogue, as did other devout Israelites; He had dear ones around Him, to whom He was bound by the ordinary ties of humanity. To the full He shared the common occupations, wants, susceptibilities, and woes of man. There was, indeed, so little in the first thirty years of His life to distinguish Him from His fellow-townsmen, that he was known as "the carpenter's son," His divine mission not being suspected. He was no unyielding ascetic. He admired the beautiful, as we do; He enjoyed life's social pleasures, as we do; He did not frown upon innocent enjoyments, not discourage friendly entertainments; He did not withdraw from the elevating stimulus of friendly intercourse. With all human interests He lovingly identified Himself. He sympathised with social feelings, and sanctified by His presence human relationships and joys. He did not relax one of those tender bonds which link heart to heart. And He had His friends, as we have. There were some spots which presented greater charms to Him than others; there were some persons in whose society He felt greater gratification than in others. As He selected from among the many homes where He could have found a warm welcome the united and happy home of Bethany, and found rest in the midst of His true-hearted friends, Martha, Mary, and Lazarus, so from among the twelve disciples He selected these three as favourites, and took them with Him as companions in seasons of His highest joy and deepest grief. In His divine nature He needed not the look, the act, nor the word of kindness; but in His human nature He depended very largely on these. As God, He could not be a stranger to the infinite happiness and omnipotent strength which were inseparable from that nature. But as man He often thirsted for the sympathy, confidence, and attention of the race to which He had voluntarily united Himself. Hence Jesus had His friends, and His favourite friends.

This view is not without its close and encouraging bearing upon our Christian life. We may learn from it that whilst Jesus is a perfect sympathiser with us, He is also a perfect example to us, because of His thorough identification with universal humanity. Goodness, purity, and holiness are ever admirable and precious wherever found, but they impress us less when they have been cultivated amid peculiarly favourable circumstances, and fostered and developed by special means. If our Jesus had been separate from men—separate in His duties, separate in His susceptibilities, separate in His trials, separate in His joys—men would feel that His purity was preserved and His holiness attained by measures to which it is impracticable for us to resort, and hence His example would lose its force. If the Christ had been a solitary recluse, we might reasonably doubt whether the religion He inculcated would be strong enough to assert its ascendency amid the connections, callings, and conflicts of the world. But now, seeing He was every way like ourselves, and yet righteous, we have hope, and heart, and energy in our imitation of Him.

I greatly fear that there is a tendency in these times to ignore the fact that the life of Immanuel affords a perfect model according to which our lives are to be fashioned. The apostolic counsel, "so walk even as He walked," is in some quarters emasculated by erroneous interpretations. It is pronounced presumption for feeble man to attempt to imitate Him. But let us not think or speak so. Just as holy, obedient, resigned, patient, and forgiving as Christ we may never be; but that should not prevent our aspiring to His excellences. The most perfect copy is surely the best to follow. Inferiors, who are themselves learners, cannot instruct like the Master. Representations are not so valuable as the originals. The higher our aim, the loftier our attainment. Oh, it is good to think that the Son of God identified Himself so closely with our humanity, that we may be able to turn to His history, the noblest and best that was ever written, and see how we should speak and act in our varied relationships! He has shown us how our Christianity may be developed amid the chequered scenes of earth; how the sweet light of our interior life may be shed upon every surrounding; how whilst loving the Eternal Father with all our hearts, we may yet cling with tenderness of affection to those whom Providence has endeared to us. Our model as well as our mediator is Jesus. Whilst we give prominence to Him as our propitiation, let us continuously keep Him before us in His humanity as our pattern.

The next thought suggested, as we look at these three favoured men, is, that Heaven often selects the foremost and most honoured servants from the humblest ranks of life. These three men, before they were called to the work of the ministry, were poor and unlettered men. Their early days were devoted to the duties of fishermen. They toiled hard and long for their livelihood. They were devoid of worldly wealth, of literary attainments, and of social influence. It was whilst they were in the prosecution of their lowly life-calling that the Great Head of the Church summoned them to the most honourable of all vocations outside the Upper Temple. It is well they were humble men. Had they possessed great intellectual culture, had they been well-known critics and casuists, had their coffers been full, and their retinue of attendants large, they might have tarnished the purity of the Gospel. There might have been introduced into the expositions of divine truth some of the lifeless dogmas of the philosophic schools. The grand and glorious success of our holy religion would have been open to suspicion of collusion and artifice on the part of its early supporters. If they had enjoyed educational advantages, if they had been men of refined manners and cultivated tastes, if they had been favoured with time to peruse the writings of Egypt and Greece, it might then be said that they thus acquired materials to construct the story of an ideal life. If they had been men of wealth and recognised power, it might then be asserted that imposture was supported by their position—that weakness was imposed upon by might. To say the least, men might conclude, with some degree of reason, that the progress of Christianity was to be ascribed to the well-trained natural genius, and much respected popular status of its first Evangelists. But seeing who the disciples of Jesus were, these objections are wholly crushed. It would be an intellectual impossibility for men so humble to conceive such a character. Rousseau well said: "The inventor would be a more astonishing person than the hero." And having the sceptre of the Cæsars, the wisdom of the Roman senate, and the skill of the philosophic schools marshalled against them, their ability to give currency to a fiction is wholly out of the question.

Luther once wrote: "If the Gospel required the potentates of this world for its planting and preservation, God would not have committed it to fishermen." Yes, these three men were untutored in this world's estimate, but they were taught of God. Heaven made high revelations of its will to them, and Incarnate Wisdom trained them for their duties. They were not blessed with this world's possessions, but they were owners of a priceless treasure: they were rich in faith, and carried in the casket of a loving heart the unsearchable riches of Christ.

Such were the men selected to be the favoured companions of Jesus. The weak things of this world were chosen to confound the mighty. So was it before the Saviour's advent: humble men were raised to stand before princes, as representatives of the King of Kings. So has it been to this hour: lowly cradles have yielded the most lordly spirits; from the shady nooks have been brought the fairest flowers. The names that have been carved highest upon the pinnacle of honour are those owned by parents in the middle and lowest classes of society—Bunyan, Adam Clarke, Carey, Kitto, Newton, Jay, James, Moffatt, and others, whose works still live amongst us, are illustrations of this truth. Let then the choice by Christ of these three men remind us that it is nobility of character, purity of heart, and consistency of life God looks for; and where these are found, worldly belongings are secondary. Though ever so poor and unknown we may be bosom friends of Christ, if truly good.

> Glory and shame from no condition rise;
> Act well your part; there all the glory lies.

These favourites remind us of the diversities existing in the Christian life. We cannot study the careers of these three men—"The sons of thunder and the man of rock"—without being impressed with the differences existing between them. One is demonstrative, another retiring; one receptive, another originative; one intuitive, another logical; one self-reliant, another clinging; one sturdy, another sensitive; one noisy, another gentle; one hopeful, another timid; one changeful, another constant; one a Boanerges, another a Barnabas. But all three loved Christ, and were loved by Christ. All three were found serviceable in the early Church of the Redeemer; and all three varied in their spiritual attainments as time rolled on. Their piety mellowed; their faith was confirmed, though the faith of one differed in degree from that of the others. Prejudices were softened down; fears were exchanged for enduring courage; and each, as he became a man in Christ Jesus, put away childish things.

Such differences still exist among Christians. Why should they not? One of the simplest but strongest proofs of the affluent wisdom and prolific purpose of the Supreme Being is discernible in the diversities of action, and the varieties of produce with which creation is full. In the animal world all flesh is not the same flesh. In the vegetable world there are many kinds of trees, plants, and flowers—no two flowers, leaves, or blades of grass, being exactly alike. Among minerals materials differ in preciousness, from the veined marble to the sparkling gem and serviceable gold. In the heavens one star is different from another star in glory; and those which appear to shine with the same brilliancy are discovered by astronomical science to have different orbits, forms, and colours. And so among men: there are no two alike. Not only are there the great distinctions of race and nationality, not only the differences of birth and education, but there are varieties in mental constitution, no two minds agreeing. An individuality in each should ever prevent the one being mistaken for the other. Thus, the infinitely wise God, unlike man, has never used the same mould twice. He has taught us that the line of beauty is always a curve, and that if the poet be correct that order is heaven's first law, then variety is the second in the code. We might expect a diversity in Christian life, and we discover it both in its commencement and in its development. There is always the same worker, but a modification of operations. Every soul must be quickened by the same Spirit, guided by the same Gospel, clothed in the same righteousness, sustained by the same grace, and directed toward the same goal; and yet each soul may be, is, the subject of a very altered experience to that of others. Let us, then, never be discouraged if we cannot find in ourselves the exact counterpart of the experience of other Christians. Expect not the traits of manhood in a youth of but few summers; nor the full corn in the ear when the grain has been sown but a few weeks; nor the gnarled, giant, and matured oak when the acorn has germinated but a few months. Neither expect from all professing disciples of Jesus an equal amount of fervour, an equal strength of faith, an equal depth of joy, an equal buoyancy of hope, an equal breadth of charity. The point of first and supreme importance is this: Are we united to Christ? Are we true disciples of Jesus? Do we feel delight in communion with Him? Are we walking with God?

Looking at these three favoured disciples, we are also reminded that the liability to err is common to the most excellent of mortals. One of the strongest evidences of the truthfulness of what the sacred penmen record—aye, an incontrovertible proof—is furnished by their fidelity. With a veracity worthy of all admiration, because so unequivocal, they tell of guilt and error even though they criminate themselves. We know how St. Peter, "the coryphæus of the apostolic choir," erred again and again by his impetuosity, and how he brought sorrow upon himself and his Lord. We know, too, how St. James and St. John erred in their views of the Messiah's kingdom, asking, with hasty ambition, for seats on Christ's right and left hand; and how, when the Samaritans would not receive the Redeemer, St. James wished a visitation of quick vengeance. "What wonder," says St. Ambrose, "that the sons of thunder wished to flash lightning!" We must make great allowance for the early mistakes of these men. They were in the moral infancy of their career. But we may learn from them, what is true of all men be they ever so good, that to err is human. "All great natures in this world that are so rounded, so perfected, that they are heavenly before they have left the earth, are to be suspected. They are not true flesh and blood. You cannot have a man in this world who has not a good deal of flesh and blood if he is going to be a man of might, and a master of men. Those names that the world will not let die, you will find are all of them rude, all of them bulging here and there with excrescent faults, all of them more or less needing the fire to purify the dross and bring out the gold." This is not the land of perfection. Character here is not fully orbed. There never has been, and never will be, more than One perfect man on this earth—the man Christ Jesus. All, even His noblest followers, have had their faults, and have stood in need of purification. Yonder, only, are the spirits of just men made perfect! "All the ideal perfections must come afterwards, as ideal colours come late in autumn, and not in midsummer." In heaven alone the inequalities, infelicities, and irregularities of our affections and passions will be for ever swept away.

But why do I so write? To encourage any reader to sin, or to be indifferent to evil propensities in any form? God forbid! Our duty is to aim at perfection—daily to lay aside every weight, and every besetting sin. No, I dwell upon this lesson to remove what I know is often a trouble to sincere believers, the fear that they are not progressing in holiness, and not pleasing God because they discover still lurking in their life that which is unheavenly. Dear friend, when you are tempted to despond because, in some unguarded moment, you exhibited a temper unbecoming your Christian profession, think of the three favourite disciples—so near Jesus, and yet imperfect. Think of them not to think less of the evil temper into which you have been betrayed, but to see that your very frailties and failures Christ knows, and, sympathising with you, will help you to conquer them.

I direct attention to this for another purpose also. To caution you against imitating the mistakes and follies of eminent Christians. The Apostle Paul lays down the safe rule for our guidance, when he says, "Be ye followers of me, even as I also am of Christ." So far as the worthies of the Old and New Testaments followed Christ, we may imitate them; but whenever and wherever they depart from the straight line of Christ's example, we are called on to forsake them. We must not blindly copy the life of any individual whom we may know, be he ever so devout. The great exemplar is Jesus. He only is faultless. The more we can transcribe His excellences, and become assimilated to His unique character, the better for us. Happy shall we be if we can follow the counsel of Chrysostom, "Be clothed with Him from top to toe, that nothing appear in us but that which is of Christ."

Let us remember, in closing, that all the honour and undying renown to which these three men attained they reached by loving and imitating Christ. But for their being followers and associates of Jesus, the world would probably never have heard of either. Thus may we see that moral excellence transcends every other form of greatness, as much as heaven transcends earth. We shall find the royal road to being truly great is that of being greatly good. In a crowded assembly of the nobility of France, when Massillon was preaching the funeral sermon of the French monarch, the preacher solemnly and suddenly exclaimed, "God only is great!" and paused. The entire congregation rose to their feet, and bowed in reverence, under the impression produced by that brief utterance. The eloquent preacher was true: God alone is great; and all greatness worth the seeking, all greatness satisfying to the heart of its possessor, all greatness that shall endure through the changeful influences of time, all greatness that shall be reviewed with endless gratification in the celestial realm, must spring from association with God in Christ.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 21. A Farewell.

Chapter to be read—Acts xx.

INTRODUCTION. (Read 1—5.) Our last lesson left St. Paul at Ephesus, escaped from great danger, after two years' residence there. He would not willingly court danger, so thinks it prudent to retire. Where will he go? His mission was to go far and wide to the Gentiles, so cannot stop permanently as pastor of any church. Time now come, however, to revisit the churches of Greece, so, with a party of friends, he enters Asia once more, dividing the party by sending some on before to Troas, he himself with Luke, the writer of the Acts, following (ver. 5).

I. Eutychus Raised. (Read 6—12). The story of the raising of Eutychus to life may be graphically pictured out as follows:—The place, a large upper room at Troas; the company, the companions of the voyage, and the Christians of the place; the occasion, the presence of these distinguished travellers; the incidents, a long evening meeting, continued till midnight. What day was it? Why had they assembled on the Lord's Day? What feast had the Lord appointed, and with what object? Happy communion feast, showing love to Christ and one another; many lights in the room; many people present; room would become very warm; windows, projecting over street, thrown open for coolness; Eutychus wearied, dropping asleep, falls into the street; the sudden alarm and confusion; the rush down-stairs; picking him up; the cries of the women; bringing him to the apostle; his soothing words; now, as they crowd round, what does St. Paul do? like Elijah to widow's son (1 Kings xvii. 21), embraces him, and the dead is restored. Picture the joy of the company; what a happy supper they all eat together (ver. 11), and what a hymn of thanksgiving they will sing! Now call attention to the following points:—(1) They kept the feast. Evidently stayed at Philippi for the Passover (ver. 6). Ask why Passover was instituted, and when? (Ex. xii.) St. Paul, as a Jew, kept all appointed ordinances as means of grace. What an example to us. (2) They kept the Lord's Day. What day was originally set apart, and why? Day evidently changed now from seventh to first day of week, as Day of Resurrection, so meet on this day for worship. (See 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Rev. i. 10.) (3) They kept the Lord's Supper. Remind how at first partook of this daily (Acts ii. 46); now reserved for the Lord's Day, as more appropriate. From these three things may learn the use of the appointed means of grace. The holy apostle used them, how much more need have we of them!

II. A Farewell. (13—16.) How long was there between the Passover and Pentecost? Much done in these fifty days: five days' voyage to Troas, seven days there, then a rapid journey to Miletus (ver. 14—16); here holds a solemn farewell; gathering of the elders of Ephesus; delivers an address, first about himself, then warning to them. (1) Review of his own work. (Read 17—27.) The following points may be noticed:—(a) A minister's work. His name means servant; he serves his people at all times (ver. 18), but does it because is the Lord's servant (ver. 19); he keeps back nothing profitable, preaching now repentance, now faith (ver. 21); he may not preach smooth things, must arouse careless; reprove, rebuke, exhort (2 Tim. iv. 2); also visit from house to house, privately giving word in season, ministering to sick, &c. (b) A minister's trials. Poor St. Paul! bonds and afflictions in every city; but was he unhappy? What did he do in the prison? So always. Why was he thus full of joy? but because did his duty, strengthened by consciousness of presence of Christ. So may all trying to do something for God be cheered. (c) A minister's joy. What was it?—money, luxuries, honour? Better than these—to finish his course and ministry, i.e., to save souls, thus, like his Master, to glorify God on earth (John xvii. 4). How many that could say are pure from blood of all men (ver. 26)? how many have we led into sin? how many have we saved? (2) The warning to the Elders. (a) Their duties. Are appointed by Holy Ghost. What an honour to work for God! but what a responsibility! Their duties: to overlook the Church, feed the flock with the milk of God's Word, i.e., teach Divine truth. (b) Their dangers. Foes from without persecuting, from within teaching false doctrine. So had Christ warned (Matt. vii. 15). Must earnestly look to God and Word of His Grace, i.e., study the Scriptures, and so be built up in the faith (ver. 32). (c) Their duties. To be ready to minister to the poor, as well as, when possible, to work for themselves after Paul's example.

Now picture the farewell scene. They all kneel down—these friends of three years. St. Paul offers up prayer, then, doubtless gives them his blessing. Picture the weeping friends, the sad parting words, the affectionate embrace. Now the whole party move to the shore; the missionary brethren embark; again last farewells, tears, waving of hands till the ship is out of sight, the slow and sad return home of the elders.

Practical Lessons. (1) Watchfulness. Against what does St. Paul warn these elders? Are other foes beside false doctrine? what are they? without, world and devil; within, lusts of flesh. Against all these must watch and pray. (2) Love between ministers and people. What tender affection Paul and elders had for each other! So should be always respect, affection; they are ministers of God, watch for souls; esteem them as such.

Questions to be answered.

1. Describe the raising of Eutychus.
2. What does it teach as to the religious customs of the Church?
3. Why do we observe Sunday, not Saturday, as the Sabbath?
4. Give an outline of St. Paul's account of himself as a minister.
5. On what points does he warn the elders?
6. What two practical lessons may be learned?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

THE passenger boat from Calais to Dover was making its way over a sea which for once was comparatively smooth, so that the deck of the steamer did not present quite such a scene of desponding human misery as is generally produced by the transit across the channel. One unfortunate Frenchman there was evidently far from comfortable, who kept plaintively asking those around him if they could yet "see de half-way," and two or three Italians, who are proverbially bad sailors, went on continually making significant grimaces, expressive of their intense dislike to the capricious element to which they had trusted themselves; but most of the English on board seemed quite to enjoy the passage. It was nigh summer, in the year 1869, and the sky was blue and cloudless, while the light breeze, that only raised a few little dancing waves on the surface of the water, was full of exhilarating freshness, which seemed to have improved the spirits of many who were seated in groups, talking and laughing, or leaning over the side of the vessel conversing together. All, however, with one single exception, had their looks turned in the direction of the coast towards which they were going, watching for the first shimmer of the white cliffs over the deep blue sea, and eagerly discussing in how many minutes they might hope to set foot on the English shore. The one exception was a very striking looking man, who was leaning with folded arms on the opposite rail, fixing an intent almost impassioned gaze upon the coast of France, which was rapidly receding from his view. Any one who had ever seen Louis, Comte de L'Isle, in his youth, would have recognised his son in the beautifully moulded features of his noble face, and in the stately bearing, which marked the descendant of one of the proudest lines of the old noblesse. But aristocratic-looking and dignified as he was, the great charm of Bertrand Lisle's countenance was in the sunny brightness of his expression, and the frank winning smile which so often hovered on his lips. He looked, what in truth he was, a man at peace with all the world and with himself. His life had been happy, and singularly free from temptation and error, his profession was one which suited him well, he enjoyed the cultivated society of the diplomatic circles to which he belonged, and, as yet no tempest of passionate feeling had ever been roused in his heart, to disturb its freedom and serenity. His appearance was very attractive. He had bright blue eyes, clear and candid, that met every look with a fearless gaze; a broad open forehead, over which the thick masses of his brown hair were always falling in rebellious disorder; and there was a peculiar sweetness of expression in the curve of the lips, which he inherited from the mother whose memory he still adored as being the highest type of earthly goodness.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"He flung his arms round her neck, and kissed her heartily."—p. 379.

Notwithstanding his likeness to his father, Bertrand Lisle was essentially English in manners and appearance; by education and habits, in thought and feeling, he belonged absolutely to his adopted country. He had never spent more than a few hours in France throughout his life; and he would often say, with a rather uneasy smile, that he even spoke French with a truly British accent. England was very dear to him as his home and the native land of his dead mother, and it would have cost him a bitter pang had he been told that he must spend his days in any other part of the world, and yet the gaze which he was even now fixing on the fast-fading shores of sunny France might have disclosed, if read aright, that which was the master-passion of his soul. There is in most lives some secret thought or sentiment which is held too sacred to be ever exposed to the scrutiny or comments of others, and there were many reasons, besides this natural reticence, which had kept Bertrand Lisle rigidly silent to all on the subject that, up to the present time, had always lain nearest his heart. Look at him now as he stands, with just such a look riveted on the vanishing coast-line as men are wont to fix on a beloved face when death is stealing away its animation and brightness, and none could doubt that an intense patriotism bound him with invisible chains to the native land of his race, and that all the vicissitudes of that beautiful and unfortunate country found a response in his loyal heart, which was none the less fervent that it was outwardly unspoken. Many causes combined to keep him silent on this subject, which was to him as sacred as it was mournful. He entirely agreed with his father in political opinions, and was as little hopeful as the old man himself of ever seeing him whom they deemed the rightful king placed on the throne of France, while he shared with him the conviction that a voluntary exile was the only righteous course which remained to them under the circumstances. Yet he felt that if he ever spoke on this theme, it would not be possible to spare his father the pain of discovering that all his efforts to make a thorough Englishman of his son had not eradicated that imperishable love of country which glows in the breast of every true man, and it would not have been easy either to explain to him, or to any one, the conflicting emotions which swayed him in this matter; for, deep and tender as was his devotion to France, he truly loved England as his home, to which he was attached by many a life-long tie, and by his connection with the Reformed Church of the country, in which he had been brought up by his mother. The fact, of which he was aware, that the ancient estates of the family were all entirely lost to them, prevented him from having the slightest desire actually to live in France, and yet, on the rare occasions when he passed through it on his way to or from the Continent, it never failed to exercise a charm over him which filled him with agitation half sweet half sorrowful.

Bertrand continued now to watch the distant coast with the same intent and wistful gaze, so long as it was even indistinctly visible, but when at length the last faint line of the shore disappeared below the horizon, he seemed to make an effort to shake himself free of the influence that so strongly possessed him, and, turning round, he sat down upon a seat, and let his eyes follow the gaze of those around him—towards the well-known outline of the English coast, which was rapidly becoming visible. Then his thoughts flew on to the home and the father towards whom he was hastening, and his bright pleasant face took an expression of sadness which was rare to it. There was a deep and tender attachment between the father and son, which had never been marred by so much as a word of dissension, and the perfect confidence they had always given to each other had been a great source of happiness to both. Bertrand knew well that all this was about to have an end, and his disposition was naturally so gay and buoyant that it was always his involuntary impulse to seek a refuge at once from painful thoughts whenever they assailed him. He turned his mind straightway now, therefore, to that which had been an unfailing source of peace and brightness to him from the days almost of his earliest recollections, and the image rose before him of Mary Trevelyan, in her stillness and grace, with her sweet pure face, and her dark eyes so full of depths of feeling, to which the delicate lips, in their habitual silence, never gave expression, and a sense of consolation and calm stole into his troubled heart with the very remembrance of that dear presence, which had ever shed an abiding light upon his home.

Mr. Lisle had been right when he told Mary that Bertrand loved her; he did love her, with an earnest enduring affection, which had grown up with him from childhood, and which he perhaps scarcely recognised in its real strength, because it was so completely a part of himself, and so entirely without exaggeration or passion. It had never occurred to him to speak of it to her, because she simply seemed a portion of his existence, without whom it would fail of the best elements of its enjoyment. The idea of marriage with her had perhaps taken no definite form in his mind, because they had never been separated long enough to make him feel any urgent wish to bind her more closely to him, and he never could have dreamt of removing her for so much as a day from his father, to whom she was more absolutely essential even than to himself; but he never for a moment supposed that his life could go on without her; and when he looked into the future she was always by his side, sharing all his burdens till their weight became almost unfelt. He had never thought of asking her if she loved him, any more than he dreamt of telling her of his affection in so many words. Her peculiar quietude of manner had perhaps held him back unconsciously, but he knew that her silent care had been round him in well-nigh every instant, that his wishes were interpreted and fulfilled without a question, and that every roughness had been smoothed from his path which Mary Trevelyan could in any way reach with her tender solicitude. The thought of seeing her again, after a year's absence, drew the sting from all the pain with which he anticipated his approaching bereavement, and when at length the steamer reached Dover he was the first to spring on shore and hurry on to take his place in the train for London.

Bertrand was not aware that his father's danger was so imminent as it really was, for the invalid had grown rapidly worse since Mary had written to summon him home, so it was without any immediate pressure of anxiety that he arrived, late at night, at the little country station near Mr. Lisle's house, and having left his luggage to be brought on in the morning, he walked quietly away through the starlit fields which led by a short cut to his father's door.

It was nearly midnight when Bertrand reached the villa, and he rang very gently lest he should disturb the invalid, whom he trusted might now be reposing in slumber. Somewhat to his surprise, however, the door was opened so quickly that it almost seemed as if some one had been waiting behind it to admit him, and his eyes fell at once on the familiar face of an individual known in the house as Nurse Parry, with whom his very earliest recollections were connected. She had taken charge of Mary Trevelyan from the day when the poor little infant had been left motherless within a few hours of her birth; but Mrs. Parry was both in education and position much above the rank of a servant—she was the widow of a missionary who had died in Madeira, and she had been on her way home to England when Mary was born on board the vessel in which she was sailing, and it was a mere sentiment of compassion which had prompted her to take the forlorn orphan into her care until some ordinary nurse could be procured at the close of the voyage; but long before that time the good woman had become so much attached to the poor little babe, which really owed its life to her tenderness, that she could not make up her mind to part with it, and as she was herself childless, and very much straitened in means, she very willingly acceded to the wish of the Lisles that she should continue to take charge of Mary, and make her home with them for the rest of her life; although she was not by any means their equal in birth, she was quite enough of a gentlewoman to make her a suitable associate for Mary, and she was such a perfectly simple unostentatious person, that she preferred taking rank with the housekeeper in social arrangements. She had proved a most valuable friend to them all, however, and Bertrand welcomed with cordial pleasure the first sight of her comely countenance, with the shrewd black eyes—looking all the blacker for the contrast with the grey hair and widow's white cap—and the wide good-humoured mouth, which expanded into a smile the moment her eyes lit on Bertrand, despite the fact that there were traces of tears on her cheeks.

He flung his arms round her neck, and kissed her heartily, while she exclaimed, "My dear boy, how glad I am to see you! I have been waiting this last half hour to open the door!"

"But how did you know I was coming to-night, nurse? I sent no letter."

"I knew it in a very strange and mysterious way," she answered, lowering her voice; "come in and I will tell you;" and shutting the outer door, she drew him into the sitting-room.

CHAPTER IV.

"TELL me first how my dear father is," said Bertrand, anxiously, when he perceived in the lighted room the red rims round nurse Parry's twinkling eyes, which showed how much she had been weeping.

"Ah, my dear Mr. Bertrand, you must prepare for the worst, he cannot long be with us! in fact, I believe he would not now be alive if it were not that he has seemed to feel some urgent necessity to see you again, far beyond the mere desire for your presence, with which his love for you naturally inspires him; but it appears so wonderful he should have known you were coming to-night!"

"But did he know, nurse? it seems impossible; for I did not know myself what day I could start, and I did not write or telegraph!"

"He knew most certainly, for he told me the very hour when you would arrive, as you may see by the fact that I was waiting to open the door to you; but, my dear, I have seen many a one pass over the mysterious bridge between this world and the next, and I know that just at the last the dying have powers and privileges which we, who have to remain longer on this side of the grave, cannot at all understand. I could tell you of many strange experiences in my life connected with that subject, but I dare say you would think me a superstitious old woman, so you shall simply hear what occurred with respect to your father. Two days ago we did not think he could last an hour, and dear Mary has sat up with him three nights in succession; she did not mean to have left him this evening, tired as she was, but about three o'clock to-day he fell into a very deep sleep, and when he woke up from it as it was getting dusk, he called me to him after Mary had left the room, and said, in a very solemn manner, and with unusual strength, 'Nurse, my son will be here at midnight, and I wish to see him alone; you must persuade Mary to go to bed; but do not tell her he is coming;' he spoke with such decision that I asked if he had had a letter from you; then he smiled, and said, 'No, it is not from Bertrand I have heard it, but I have a certain assurance that he will be here to-night, and I must gather up all that remains to me of life and strength that I may tell him a great deal he has yet to learn from me; arrange with Mary that she shall take the rest she needs so much while you watch by me, and then leave me quiet and alone till Bertrand comes.' I had much ado to coax poor Mary to leave him; she could not bear to quit his side, even for an hour; but she saw at last that he really wished it, and she was deceived, poor dear, by his animation into the belief that he was better, though I could see well enough he was only sustained by an unreal excitement, which will leave him more prostrate than before when it passes away. However, it enabled her to go to bed in peace, and she is sweet asleep, the darling, looking as fair and innocent as a little child."

"I had better go to my father at once then," said Bertrand, hastily; for a feeling of greater awe had been produced in him by Mrs. Parry's words than he cared to show her, and, resisting her pressing entreaties that he would take some supper first, he asked her to lead the way to Mr. Lisle's sick room. She took a lamp, and preceded him along the corridor in silence, making him a sign to tread softly as they passed through the part of the house where Mary lay sleeping, unconscious of the new arrival; a half-open door, through which the light was streaming, showed that they had reached their destination, and Mrs. Parry pushed it gently back, and stood aside to let Bertrand enter.

"It will not startle him, he expects you," she whispered; and he stole softly through the room to the foot of his father's bed; there he paused for a moment, struck with the sudden chill, the inexplicable shrinking which we all experience when we draw near to the presence of death.

Mr. Lisle had been propped up in a sitting position in order to relieve the difficulty of breathing, and he was reclining on his pillows in a perfectly motionless attitude, with his hands clasped together over a small black trinket he had brought with him from France so many long years before. There was not the smallest vestige of colour in his face, or in the long thin fingers, as they lay on a counterpane not whiter than they were themselves, and the well-defined lines of his clear cut features had grown sharp and rigid, so that he looked exactly like a figure moulded in wax; the eyes alone demonstrated that he was still a living being, who had not yet escaped the power of earthly hopes and fears, for they were bright and eager, with an expression of keen expectancy, and he held them turned immovably towards the door; when Bertrand came at last within the range of their vision, so that their gaze fell upon him suddenly, there flashed into them a look of such intense delight that it seemed to bring him back at once to the light and warmth of life, and in a moment the ghastly immobility of his attitude had passed away, and he stretched out his arms with a longing gesture, exclaiming, "Bertrand, my son, my son! I have waited for you when already I could hear the voices calling me beyond the brink; I have waited, and not in vain; now shall my spirit be enabled to depart in peace!"

Then the young man went forward, and, forgetting the years that had elapsed since the well-remembered days when as a little child he had often gone to sleep in those protecting arms, he let his stately head fall upon his father's breast, while a great sob burst unrestrained from his lips. The old man folded his arms round him, and held him for a few minutes close to his heart, while Mrs. Parry went softly out and shut the door, leaving those two together between whom so soon was to be fixed the great unfathomable gulf, which even the longing eyes of human love have not power to penetrate or span.

"Oh, my dearest father, I did not think it would be so soon!" said Bertrand, when at last he looked up into Mr. Lisle's face; for the seal of death was so unmistakably set on that pallid countenance that it would have been simple mockery to have appeared to ignore the truth.

"Yes, soon—very soon, my son; and I have so much to say to you; I must not delay, or the strength will fail me which has been given to me for this special purpose. Sit down beside me, Bertrand, and let me hold your hand while I make you my confession."

"Your confession! I am sure after such a blameless life as yours has been you have none to make to me or to any one," said his son, tenderly.

"So it is that we judge one another in our blindness!" said Mr. Lisle, with a sigh; "how little can the human heart be fathomed, even by those for whom it beats with deepest love; but we are a mystery even to ourselves, and well may be so also to others; this I can tell you, however, Bertrand, that the clear illumination which falls from purer realms upon a deathbed, alters strangely the lights and shadows which lie upon our path of life as we look back on it; the interests which were dearest to us in the days of activity and strength shrivel away into nothing compared with any fact in our existence, however little regarded before, which trenches in the smallest degree on the eternal laws of righteousness"—he paused for a moment, while his eyes took a dreamy look, as if his thoughts had wandered back over that past of which he spoke; but soon he grasped his son's hand more firmly, and went on—"Bertrand, you know very well what have been the strongest sentiments that influenced me throughout all the time when I formed part of the living, working world—devotion to my king and country first of all; then love, so deep and absorbing that it made me well nigh forget my France, love for your mother, the sweet young bride of my brightest days, the tender faithful wife of maturer years, lastly a father's proud affection for a dear and worthy son—these have been the ruling passions of my life, the engrossing influences which swayed me every hour, and yet now, Bertrand, they have receded from that awful shore on which my spirit waits its summons, like the swelling waves when the tide is going out, and left behind them only as it were the ghastly corpse of one dead hour, in which a deed was done that never in all the eternal ages shall I have power to recall. Oh, my son! this is in truth the most terrible of all the conditions of our mortal life, that it is possible for us by the act, the rash unthinking act, of one single instant, to destroy our whole existence, and even our whole eternity, and yet the moment in which it was committed once gone from us, borne away upon the wings of time to swell the irrevocable past, never never can we call it back, or undo its fatal instantaneous work, though we might be ready to offer in exchange for it the entire future of our earthly years, with all their golden possibilities of hope and joy! Yes, it is indeed a dread attribute of our complex nature, that we should have the tremendous power to freight a single instant with the most momentous issues, and yet be so utterly, so helplessly, incapable of reversing the character we have stamped on it for ever one second after its record has been written! Ah, my Bertrand, one such moment there has been in my long past, and it stands out before me now, vivid, menacing, filling up all the foreground of my memory, while the vacant throne of discrowned France has vanished into the shadows, and the sweet face of my only love shows dimly through the unknown darkness, and you, my noble son, from whom I am about to be parted evermore, can scarce draw tears from my eyes with the thought of our separation, because of the drops of very blood that I would shed if only I could bring back that one instant from the inexorable past!"

Mr. Lisle paused, exhausted, and as Bertrand gently wiped the death dews from his brow, he said to him, soothingly, "Dear father, whatever you may have to regret in the past, I am sure you have amply expiated it by the sorrow you have felt for it; will you not let it rest now with the mercy of our God, and turn your thoughts to those celestial hopes which come out like stars in the firmament when the sun of life is going down?"

"Yes, my son, I must indeed trust all my regrets and all my hopes alike to that one and only compassion which has no limits; but I may not so much as claim it till I have made all the reparation that is in any way possible for my fault, and it is you, my Bertrand, who must accomplish it vicariously for me; for the power to attempt it in ever so slight a measure ends with my life. It is for this cause that you have been sent to me in time; for this reason that my soul, when already cast loose from earth, was held back by a single thread of life, that I might see you face to face, and win, as I trust, your acceptance of the charge I would confide to you; but to make my meaning clear you must know the whole, dear Bertrand, and I think that I can tell it you, though to do so I must rake up all the ashes of a long dead past, if only you will have patience with my failing breath and feeble utterance."

"Oh, my dear father, I prize the faintest whisper from your voice! would that I might but hope to hear it longer; but it is the exertion for yourself I fear—will it not try you too much?"

"Strength will be given me for this task, my son, and then haply it will fail for ever."

(To be continued.)

BESSIE AND I.

ROAMING together down the glade,
Playing under the hawthorn's shade,
Picking the buttercups on the lea,
Gathering shells by the ebbing sea,
Watching the swallows skimming the brook,
Reading out of the same old book—
So our childhood fleeted by,
And we were happy, Bessie and I.

Then came a time when a golden glow
Spread itself over all below;
For we, who had loved as girl and boy,
Found out a new and thrilling joy,
When standing together side by side,
She plighted her troth as my own dear bride;
No mortals then beneath the sky
Could happier be than Bessie and I.

Now years have flown, our hair is grey;
Our children all have gone away,
And we are left alone once more,
As in those long past days of yore;
Still happy in our mutual love,
We wait the summons from above,
And hope that when life's end draws nigh,
We may go together, Bessie and I.

E. I. TUPPER.

AUNT JESSIE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

ESTHER had by this time recovered sufficiently to return to her situation; but this attack had given additional proof of her delicacy, and made Mrs. Lang feel that it would never do to suffer her for the future to run the risk of such exposure to the weather as she had had in her long walks to and fro to business; especially as it might be avoided by her going into the "house" altogether. So she had gently unfolded to her niece her plan, which was that Esther being provided for in the matter of a home, she, as her sight had by this time altogether departed from her so that she could not manage to get on alone, even if the small parish pay had been enough for both board and lodging, should take shelter for a time in the workhouse.

Esther started as she uttered the last words, and was prepared to make strong resistance to them; but her aunt laid her hand on her arm to stay her, and in her own quiet way showed that there was no other course for the present. So Esther—seeing that to show how much she felt the trial, and how her young spirit was inclined to rebel against it, would only cause more pain to the sorrowful heart which she knew must be bleeding and shrinking at the thought of what lay before them, even though she tried calmly and patiently to meet it—held her peace, and endeavoured to speak hopefully of the time—though, alas! it seemed so very very far off—when she would begin to receive a salary, and they might be able to afford a little room together again.

And now the last day in the little home had come; and though it was but one poor humble room, it had been so peaceful and happy to those two, that it was impossible to quit it without keen sorrow and pain.

Esther was to be spared from business for a couple of hours or so that afternoon, that she might come and fetch her aunt, and lead her to her new place of sojourn. And now Mrs. Lang sat alone awaiting her.

Everything had been put ready. The rent, which had got behindhand, and for which the kind-hearted landlady had never pressed, saying to herself that even if she did lose it, "Why, there! like enough 'twould be made up some other way," had been paid by the sale of some of the few remaining bits of furniture; so that nothing was now left except two or three articles, from which it would have cost the widow much to part, and which the good woman who kept the house had said she would take care of for her until she should be able to have a little room of her own again.

It was almost time to go now. Esther would be coming in about half an hour, as she knew by the clock striking. She had only that brief space remaining of quiet for solitary thought, in which she had been so accustomed to indulge, but which now perhaps would often be interrupted by the perpetual presence of others.

She cast her sightless eyes around the room, as if taking a farewell glance at everything; and then an expression of pain stole into her face for a moment, as if she were realising the fact that she had already taken her last look on earth at every beloved object of whatever nature. She rose, and as though in default of a parting look, she passed her hands slowly, with a sort of lingering, loving touch, over each article one by one: the old arm-chair which had always been her husband's seat; the little table which had always stood beside it; and the chest of drawers in which she had laid by her wedding dress when she had come, a happy bride, to the little home in which she had taken so much pride, but which she had been forced to leave for something lower-rented after her husband's death. In another drawer she had sorrowfully and very tenderly, in by-gone days, laid aside certain baby garments, when the first and only child that had been granted her, had spread its little wings and soared upwards, as if in haste to prove its heavenly birth and nestle in the arms of love Divine.

She had put by these mementoes of her darling in that drawer, which she had kept locked, and had opened sometimes with tearful eyes and aching heart. But those treasures were not there now. She had given them all away, years ago, to a neighbour even poorer than herself, who was in need of everything; and the much-prized little garments, which her affection had prompted her to hoard, but her higher nature had told her to give, had been worn out and cast aside long since by the healthy active child who had lived and flourished, and grown up robust and hearty.

She could not help a few silent tears falling as thought went over all this; but there was no bitterness in those tears; and as, passing her hand along the top of the drawers, she came to the old Bible, which had been her husband's, and on the fly-leaf of which were inscribed the dates of the birth and death of her child, as also the day on which her husband had entered into his rest, her courage seemed to revive. Taking the book in her hands, she went back with it to her seat; where Esther found her a little later, with so calm and placid a look resting on her face, that had she not known her aunt as she did, she would have fancied that the parting after all had not cost as much as she had feared, and that she need not have dreaded it so much.

"I can't see to read it any longer, Esther," she said, holding up the Bible; "but I should like to take it with me."

"Let me carry it for you, dear aunt Jessie."

"No, thank you, dear: I think I'll carry it myself. To feel I've got firm hold on it seems to help me somehow. And now let us go."

And so they went: Esther giving her arm to her aunt, and guiding her carefully through the crowded streets. The Union lay outside the town; and soon they reached the open country, where the pure fresh breeze blew upon their cheeks, bringing with it the scent of spring flowers, and the sweet notes of the singing birds.

They walked slowly; for the one was becoming old and feeble, and the other had not yet fully recovered her strength after her illness. Besides, they would willingly prolong this last quiet walk together.

Esther could not prevent the tears every now and then making their way into her eyes, and even rolling down her cheeks; but she did not heed them so much, as she knew they could not be perceived by the other. Her chief care was to keep her voice firm and steady, but in spite of herself a sorrowful quaver made itself heard at times. It caught the listening ear of the other, and made her long to give some comfort before they should part.

"You'll be able to come and see me sometimes, Esther."

"Oh yes, aunt! and you may be sure I shall come as often as ever I can."

"And you won't fret about me, my child?"

A moment's pause, and then came the answer, with a sob which could not be kept back, "How can I help it, aunt? Oh, how can I help it?"

"Because there's no need, darling—no call for it at all. I'm in good hands, Esther, and so are you. You feel that, don't you?"

"I scarcely know what I feel, it all looks so dark—so dark!" murmured the girl, with a sudden burst of sorrow; but, vexed the next moment that she should have given utterance to the words, she went on, "I'll try and think of all you've said and taught me, Aunt Jessie; and I dare say in time it'll all seem right. But oh, aunt"— and again her feelings overcame her self-control—"if your sight could only have lasted another couple of years or so, and we could have scraped on through that time, then it wouldn't have been quite so hard to bear! for we shouldn't have been obliged to part; and you wouldn't have had to go to the——"

She broke off. She could not utter the word which, to her, spoke only of misery and humiliation.

"But why should I not go there, my child? If the path to the home above leads by there, and if that is the gateway by which I'm to enter, should I murmur at having to pass through it, and say it looks low and narrow, when I can catch glimpses beyond it of the mansion the Saviour has got ready for me. A workhouse now—but only for a little bit of time at most. A seat in heaven afterwards for a long time—for ever and ever. Have I anything to complain of?"

"Ah, Aunt Jessie, how good you are! You take everything so meekly. I wish I could bear troubles like you."

"It's harder for young things, who may have a long life before them: but at my time I feel it can be but a little while; for it sometimes seems I've waited long—so long it can't be much longer—to go to all my dear ones who are watching for me."

"Oh, aunt, don't talk of going! don't leave me—oh, don't leave me!" cried Esther, in sudden anguish, as she looked upon the pale face beside her, and thought it appeared paler and thinner than even its wont, whilst the sweet peace which rested on it she felt was not of this earth—as indeed it was not. A fear, which somehow or other had never arisen with such force before, had suddenly taken possession of her.

"You won't ask to be taken, Aunt Jessie, will you?"

"No, no, my child; for your sake I'd be glad to stay as long as ever the Lord sees fit; for 'twould be a sore parting, Esther. But we needn't look on to trouble beforehand."

"For you've enough to bear in the present, poor Aunt Jessie!" said Esther, tenderly.

"Not one bit more than I can well bear, because, dear, I'm not left to bear it alone. And may-be the trouble seems greater to you than it does to me. For comfort comes with it, Esther. Now that it's all dark without, it seems all bright within; I see things I never saw when I had my eyesight."

"What things, auntie?" whispered Esther.

"I see my Saviour closer than I ever saw Him before. I seem to see His tender face looking down on me, oh so compassionately! and He seems to put out His hand, and tell me to hold to it, and He will guide me, so that I shan't stumble. You know how He took the blind man by the hand, and led him out of the town, when he was going to heal him; and sometimes I feel I'm exactly like that man. I'm being led aside by Jesus, and I know as well as the man did that I'm going to have my eyes opened some time, and that then, just like the blind man, the first sight they will look upon will be my Saviour. But that will be in heaven—not here; only I can very well wait: I wouldn't have it a minute sooner than He sees fit."

"Dear Aunt Jessie," murmured Esther. It was all she could say.

"So don't fret about me, Esther; it's all well. If God takes away a blessing with one hand, it seems to me He's always ready to give two with the other. 'Tis so with me: the light that streams from His face is better than the brightest sunshine, and it seems to come straight into my heart now. If I can't look upon you, Esther—and yours is the only dear face left to me —I can look upon Christ, and when I look I want nothing more."

After this the two walked on in silence for a while.

The sun had suddenly burst through the clouds which had been hiding him all day, and which, when the two had started on their walk, had made everything look cheerless and gloomy. But now all the landscape was flooded with a golden light, which shed a rich beauty over everything; whilst the sky in the west seemed to have kindled into one great blaze of glory. Esther's eye was caught by it, and as she gazed, the words came into her mind, "At evening time it shall be light." She found herself repeating them half unconsciously, over and over again, "At evening time it shall be light."

But now an abrupt turn in the road brought them within sight of the workhouse. Esther involuntarily slackened her pace. Her aunt noticed it, and immediately guessed the cause.

"You'll try and be happy, Esther, won't you, dear? I dare say you'll miss at first coming home at night, for home is home, and nothing makes up for it; but you'll be with kind people; for I'm sure Mr. and Mrs. Webbe will do everything that's right by you; and you'll get accustomed to it in time."

"But I don't want to get accustomed to being away from you, Aunt Jessie."

"And we'll hope to be together again some day," continued the other. "And now, dear, are we near the door?"

"Yes, Aunt Jessie. Are you tired?"

"Rather. And now kiss me, my darling, and promise to keep a good heart, and not fret."

They turned and kissed each other, but neither could speak for a few minutes.

"God bless you, my child, my own Esther," came at length in faltering tones from the sightless woman, as she gently stroked the soft brown tresses of the young girl. "God bless you! I never can tell you all the comfort you've been to me! But I know I don't leave you alone, or I couldn't tell how to bear it."

They reached the door, and then Esther turned away to retrace her steps alone, with an aching pain at her heart, but inwardly repeating, as if some voice within her were saying the words rather than she herself, "At evening time it shall be light." At evening time! Not till then, perhaps—but assuredly then."

Meantime Mrs. Lang found herself left among strangers. She could not see the inquisitive glances turned upon her—her whole appearance being so different from that of most of the inmates of that place, that they appeared astonished at her presence there—she could not look into their faces, and thus find out what sort of people these, her new companions, might be: she could only judge of them by the tones of their voices and the words they spoke; and these seemed not overfull of either kindness or gentleness. She still seemed to feel Esther's arms clinging round her neck; whilst in thought she pictured her taking her solitary way back to the town. Her heart was full, not so much of her own troubles, as of tender solicitude for the child of her love. But she knew where to seek comfort, and she sought and found it.

(To be concluded.)

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

147. What sin does the prophet Isaiah say was the cause of the destruction of Moab?

148. Why was Zacharias the father of St. John the Baptist struck dumb?

149. What was the total number of captives who returned from the Babylonish captivity with Ezra?

150. Where is it stated that the father of Titus was a Greek?

151. How is the mischief of idle words described in the Book of Proverbs?

152. Quote the words of our Saviour upon the same subject.

153. What disciples of our Lord wished to command fire to come down from heaven upon the Samaritans?

154. Who did they mention as having done this in olden time? Quote passage.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 352.

133. Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 16—19).

134. By means of His prophet Elisha He multiplied the widow's oil (2 Kings iv. 1—7).

135. "The carpenter stretcheth out his rule; he marketh it out with a line; he fitteth it with planes, and he marketh it out with a compass, and maketh it after the figure of a man" (Isa. xliv. 13).

136. The daughters of Shallum, the son of Halohesh (Neh. iii. 12).

137. Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater (Rom. xvi. 2).

138. "A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city" (Prov. xviii. 19).

(Drawn by R. BARNES.)

"Still happy in our mutual love."

"BESSIE AND I."—p. 384.

(Drawn by J. TARLTON.)

A TOILER BY THE SEA.

WHEN Baptiste's boat is out at sea,
And weather passing fair,
My heart beats high and merrilie,
It knows no sense of care;

And at my task a lay I trill,
As up the sandy shore
I bear my burden, with a will,
Nor feel that I am poor.

And when I pause to rest a while,
And think how brave and good,
How free from meanness, vice, and guile,
Is he who dares the flood,
I feel that in my husband's love
I'm rich as rich can be;
For howsoe'er his bark may rove,
His heart ne'er sails from me.

When Baptiste's boat is far away,
And stormy winds arise,
And buffet in the face of day,
And clouds o'erspread the skies;
When night no starry robe doth wear
To cheer us through the dark,
I quake, lest some grim sea should bear
To wreck, his gallant bark.

And then I think of Him whose voice
Could still the raging wave,
Who made the widow's heart rejoice,
Called Lazarus from the grave;
I bend my knee and ask His aid,
And even while I pray,
I hear His sweet, "Be not afraid,
But trust in Me alway!"

JOHN G. WATTS.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.—ON TO THE SYCAMORE-TREE.

THEY had tea in Mr. Woodward's study sometimes, especially in the summer, for it looked on to the garden. It was a cosy room, untidy of course, as all the Woodward rooms were, with books and papers all about, and easy chairs and couches covered with faded grubby chintz. The few who knew it always remembered the room, and the group that gathered there, and loved in after years to linger over the memory.

George Blakesley had wanted to know the Woodwards. Mrs. Woodward had been his mother's friend in girlhood, and he had often heard of Mr. Woodward in his editorial capacity. So, when he went to Colonel Wade's, and met Netta there, it seemed the most natural thing in the world that he should find his way to Hampstead, and he did. Mrs. Woodward had liked him on his first visit, and she liked seeing some one about the place who did not bother her; moreover, she was beginning to feel that Dolly was growing up, and she remembered that Netta had said he was a good match.

He raised his head half curiously when the procession, consisting of Tom, and Will, and Sally, and Dorothy, entered; he had never seem them before, and he was fond of children; but these were bigger than he had expected; and when he saw Dolly he forgot—for he was singularly absent—what was expected of him, and looked at her almost curiously. "That girl has a good face," he thought; "I should like to talk to her."

They found it pleasanter than they had imagined, having tea with the interloping Blakesley, as Tom had christened him, though he directed his conversation chiefly to their father, and the subjects of it were dry enough—mathematics, and so on. It gave them an opportunity of looking at him. He was fair and pale, with a straggling faded-looking beard and dull yellow hair, but he had a wonderfully good head, and soft kind blue eyes with dark lashes; he was not very tall, yet well-made and muscular; and with a quiet manner and voice that had withal a certain dignity.

"Well, what do you think of old pale face?" asked Tom, with his usual striking want of respect.

This remark was addressed to Dolly, when, the festival of tea having been completed, the younger branches of the house of Woodward had betaken themselves to the garden again.

"I don't like him," said Dorothy, with almost a shudder.

"Then we'll serve him out," he answered, consolingly.

"I like him," said Sally, cramming her papers into her pocket.

Sally had a quick eye, and was always drawing crude pictures dictated by her quaint fancy.

"I heard father tell him he would always be welcome, and to come often," said Will.

"It's too bad," said Dolly, almost crying; and she thought, "I will never, never like him, never!"

And George Blakesley, looking out at the straggling garden, thought, "There is something in that girl's face I like; but what a child she is!" and then he asked if he might go and look at the summer-house, and made his way for the first time to the old sycamore-tree.

CHAPTER IX.—THE INTERLOPING BLAKESLEY.

IT was six months or more since George Blakesley had first made his way to the sycamore-tree, and the children knew him well, and liked him, and he was fonder of them than ever Adrian Fuller had been.

He was well off, as Netta had told them before his first appearance, having an excellent appointment as actuary to an insurance company, as well as an income from private sources; and he had some position too, besides that given him by birth—he had carried off high honours at the University, and was clever, nay, more than merely clever, for great things were expected from him in the future. Yet his manner and ways and tastes were perfectly simple, and they seeing him at Hampstead quietly spending his evenings there, or content to pass his hours among the merry group in the garden, scarcely thought or could have realised how great and clever people sought him out, and asked him to their houses in vain. He had his own circle of friends too, who believed in him and made much of him, but though he liked them, and valued their friendship, he only visited them by fits and starts. He never lost a friend, though he was sometimes long ere he made one, for he took no trouble to do so, and he was unobtrusive and unconventional, dressing badly, never making calls, and wrapt up in his pursuits; but when people once learned to understand him, they learned to like him.

At Hampstead he had won Mr. and Mrs. Woodward completely. He talked science and philosophy with the former, and lent books to the latter. The children liked him; but they were true to Adrian Fuller, for they were loyal children—though they may not be called children longer—and constant to old friends.

They had so altered in these six months, and perhaps George Blakesley had had most to do with this. He was so apt to talk over their heads, and they, trying to reach him, insensibly climbed higher. Not, mind, that he ever talked great or grand knowingly. He would discuss the simplest things, but as only a thoughtful and educated mind could discuss them. He was a man who believed in trifles, and thought nothing too small to be considered, knowing how the smallest deeds have altered the whole world's way, and by what narrow paths the greatest cities are sometimes reached.

He had no mother or father, only three maiden aunts (sisters of his father), and these lived together somewhere up at Bayswater; but he himself lived not far from the pleasant ways of Hampstead, in a little house standing in its own garden.

"You must come and see my little place some day," he had said to Mrs. Woodward; but somehow the visit had never been effected, for she was indolent, and he careless and forgetful.

(To be continued.)

"NO MORE CURSE."

BY THE REV. JAMES SPENCE, D.D., AUTHOR OF "HOURS WITH DANIEL," ETC.

"And there shall be no more curse."—REV. xxiii. 3

THERE are many descriptions of heaven in Scripture, and of the future life of blessedness, but most of them are of a negative character, as if in contrast with scenes and experiences with which we are familiar here on earth. Thus intensity and impressiveness are given to these descriptions. Two of them have already come under our notice in recent papers—"No temple therein," and "No night there." But there are many others. In heaven there will be no illness, for there "the inhabitants shall not say, I am sick" (Isaiah xxxiii. 24). There "they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more" (Rev. vii. 16). "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away" (Rev. xxi. 4). Of all these descriptions, however, of a negative character, not one is more pregnant, comprehensive, or suggestive, than that in these words—"And THERE SHALL BE NO MORE CURSE."

Sometimes we have ventured to ask, when thinking or speaking of the future home of the saints, What more beautiful or desirable region, as the future abode of the blessed, can we conceive than this world in which we now are, if every element of evil were removed from it—if sin, with all its influences and consequences, were completely eradicated from it? Some, indeed, allege that this world, redeemed and renovated, will be the dwelling-place of the saints after the Resurrection. There is not perhaps evidence in Scripture sufficient to warrant so definite a conclusion. But we are assured that, "The heavens and the earth, which are now, are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the Day of Judgment," and we are encouraged to "look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Peter iii. 7, 13). When this wondrous change is consummated, this world, rescued from evil, and renewed, will doubtless be occupied in harmony with the high purposes of God's triumphant grace. And what more fitting than that those who realised that grace here, amidst the tears and toils of time, should reap its glory here amidst the joys of eternity, and find a province at least of their future dwelling-place on the renovated earth? Then there will be "no more curse."

In this world there is a curse, the evidences of which are manifold in us and around us. The moment sin entered, the curse came. Satan, the tempter, was cursed: "The Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." (Gen. iii. 14). Adam and Eve were cursed, for on the day of their disobedience they died to the true life intended for humanity; and the region given to be their home and scene of recreation and enjoyment was cursed for their sakes. Bread for their temporal sustenance was to be extracted from it by the "sweat of the face" and persevering laborious toil. Thus, through man's sin, creation, animate and inanimate, came under the influence of a curse; and now we are assured that "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now" (Rom. viii. 22). Everywhere on earth are the evidences of a curse in the fact that this world is a vale of tears, full of sorrow, pain, and suffering; in the fact that man, the lord of this creation, is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward; in the fact that on every side we hear the wail of misery and mark the ravages of sin. Man preys upon his fellow-man, and the history of the race has from the time of Cain been very much a history of robbery, violence, bloodshed, and wrong. It is true, indeed, that out of the infinite mercy of our God the curse of labour has been turned into a blessing, and made a boon suited to man's fallen condition and degenerate nature here; but the heaving, restless, throbbing, anxious heart of humanity, in its wail of woe, proclaims and proves the universal presence of the curse. Even Nature bears its testimony to the fact in the desolating storms which sweep the sky, in the raging ocean which so often mercilessly devours the pride and property of men, in the blight and mildew which destroy the fruits of the earth, and make the labours of the husbandman issue in disappointment and disaster. The tokens that something is wrong with man and with his position here meet us everywhere. It is not merely the Bible that says so, but the experience and observation of mankind in all ages. The revelation of Scripture is to show how the curse has been met by God—how man may be delivered from it and rise to an everlasting home in which there shall be no more curse. However, we have not now to consider the great truth that Christ Jesus has borne away the curse by enduring the cross, but rather to contemplate a little more fully this heavenly life in which there will be no more curse.

1. There will be no curse on ourselves personally as the children of God. There is no condemnation now to them who are in Christ, and there will be no curse on them for ever hereafter. The evidences of a curse on mankind in this life are manifold. An aching body and an aching mind, pain and disappointment, suffering and grief, bereavement and disaster—all are evidences in varied form of the presence of a curse on our fallen and degenerate condition. "And he died!" is the consummation here of every human life, so that there are always many sorrowing hearts and many bereaved homes among the tribes of men. Many on earth have never known perfect health; sickness invades us at all stages of our pilgrimage through this world. Through unexpected illness or calamity human purposes are broken off, many noble enterprises are abandoned, and many good resolutions fail of fulfilment. Here you often see the tokens of an inward conflict in man: there is a law in the members which wars against the law of the mind; and the path of duty is often surrendered at the dictate of passion or the bidding of pleasure. Everywhere there are evidences of something wrong with man and something wrong in him, the noblest creature of God, made at first in the image of his Maker. The very tears of repentance and the twinges of remorse so frequently experienced and observed, are proofs of the evil which has brought upon us the curse. But in heaven redeemed manhood will be perfect. There will be no internal conflict in our renovated nature in our future home, no want of harmony between our powers, no beclouded intellect, no warped judgment, no accusing conscience, no selfish heart—all these tokens of the curse will be for ever gone from us. Then there will be no weariness in our celestial service, no toil in our ceaseless activity, no gloomy fear or dark foreboding, any more for ever. Tears will be wiped from every eye, and sorrow and sighing will have fled away, for there will be no more sin.

2. There will be no more curse in our circumstances or surroundings. Here on earth life is often a hard struggle; in truth, with the great majority of the human family it is so—a battle with circumstances of difficulty and depression, and often of deprivation. The pressure of poverty with multitudes involves a constant fight in which many are worsted, and principle gives way to sin in manifold forms. Often do we see the strong rising in tyranny above the weak, and Might taking the place of Right. The competitions, envyings, and jealousies which prevail, make life a conflict, in which the weakest suffer, and those who cannot adopt the ways of the world are baffled and beaten. Even the abodes and occupations of multitudes are hurtful to their well-being, injurious alike to the health of body and soul. All these things are simply indications of the curse which sin has brought upon humanity. In our associations and companionships here we find dangers. The world is strewed with the wrecks of false friendships, wounded affections, and ruptured ties. Unknown enemies, and evils unexpected, render our good name and our property insecure. Those whom we have trusted and treated with kindness may unexpectedly turn against us. The tongue which has praised us in our presence may behind our backs breathe slander against us, and whisper our character away. In many instances we see the rottenness which festers in human society, and gives sad truth to the assertion that the "world lieth in wickedness." Everywhere the evidences of the curse abound. What a marvellous transition will it be from earth to heaven, where there will be no more curse in our circumstances! All our surroundings there will be perfect in their character and blessed in their influence. Our occupations, our abode, our companionships, will be in harmony with our redeemed manhood; and our renovated nature will be adapted to them all. There will be no blight in the air of heaven, no desolating storm will sweep its sky, no malaria will haunt its plains, and no danger lurk in hiding-places of the everlasting hills. Nor will life in heaven partake at all of the nature of conflict: there plenty takes the place of penury; and the inhabitants have all things, and abound. There will be no evil companionship, no deceitful friendship, no place for jealousy, no possibility of envy, but pure and perfect trust throughout, without fear, suspicion, or disturbance, for ever. All will delight in the same service, though in manifold forms of activity; all will sing the same song, the "new song"; all will bear the same image; and all will gladden in the same glory. Struggle and dread and foreboding, for ever gone; the battle of life ended and the victory won, and the reign of perfection and felicity begun—a reign which is to be uninterrupted and eternal. In "the general assembly and church of the first-born" there will be no envy, or discord, or bigotry, any more for ever, but universal love. Christ, the King of Love, will be the living personal centre, and all will be like Him; for they will be with Him and see Him as He is, to serve Him and behold His glory world without end.

3. Nor will there be in heaven any more curse in our prospects. We may not see before us or know the future there, any more than we can do here, but in our prospects there will be no room for disappointment or fear. In the present earthly life we know not what a day may bring forth. Happily, the child of God has no need to speculate as to what may happen to him. He can trust all with his Heavenly Father, and cast all his cares upon Him, for "He careth for us." Yet even to the Christian something may occur to dash or blight his worldly prospects. His riches may take to themselves wings and fly away; the son who has been nurtured in affection and kindness, fondly loved and kindly instructed, may turn out to be "a grief to his father and bitterness to her that bore him"—may bring down the grey hairs of his parents with sorrow to the grave. To the parent and to the child, to the servant and the master, some event may happen to disappoint the soul and harass the life as with a canker or a thorn. And death is sure to come—perhaps suddenly and unexpectedly—the darkest evidence of the curse, to close the engagements and sever the ties of this world. The arm on which you have leaned, and the bosom on which you have rested with trusting love, may be withdrawn from you, and you are made to feel desolation of heart and home. Death does not respect a mother's love, nor give way before the fondness of a husband's affection. This sad and gloomy proof of the presence of the curse is everywhere. But in heaven there will be no more curse: there, they die no more, for death itself shall be swallowed up in victory. In the heavenly life unexpected things will doubtless come to the "saints in light," but they will be unexpected blessings. There will be nothing to fear. No unexpected emergency will arise to make demand on our powers or resources which we cannot meet, or which can depress our energy or damp our enjoyment for an instant. There will be new experiences, new discoveries of truth, new disclosures of love, new engagements of service, as the ages of the future life roll on; but they will all be new delights, without a drawback and without a shadow. No confidence will be disappointed, no love deceived, no affection rudely ruptured, any more for ever. There will be no more curse; but, all within us, around us, and before us, perfection and blessing, wonderful, uninterrupted, and unending.

And to whom do we owe this future home in which there will be no more curse? Jesus Christ said to His disciples, "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." This place then is prepared by Him, and, in order to prepare it and give us a title to it, He bore the curse for us. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." So, "When He had by himself purged our sins, He sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high"—went "into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us," and to prepare the place in our Father's house above. What this preparation is, or what it involves, we cannot know here; but when "within the vail" we shall see what we cannot see now, and know even as we are known. Then the consciousness of moral perfection, the fulness of blessedness, the experience of completed redemption, bursting upon us with glad surprise, will evoke from us the adoring exclamation, "He who died for us hath prepared all this!" and our song shall be "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and hath made us kings and priests unto God and His Father; to Him be glory and dominion for ever and ever."

Have you not sometimes been taken to an abode which has been erected, or which has undergone reparation and fresh decoration, with a view to make it the home of some one who is the object of cherished affection? and, as you have gone through the rooms and admired the tastefulness and the completeness of all the arrangements, you could readily say, "The hand of paternal affection, of brotherly love, of filial, tender thoughtfulness—as the case may be—hath done this, for it clearly is visible here!" So will it be when we have reached the paradise of God, and see its grandeur and beauty, and experience its blessedness and glory. We shall joyously say, each one of us, "My Saviour hath prepared this home for me: it is the triumphant achievement of His grace, the consummate accomplishment of His love!" Thence we shall go no more out, but be for ever with the Lord: and there can be no curse where He is. He fought the fight with sin here on earth that He might clear the universe of its curse, world without end. And now our duty and our privilege alike is to "walk worthy of God who hath called us into His kingdom and glory." Thus shall we live in the present for the coming glorious future.

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 22. A Visit to Jerusalem.

Chapters to be read—Acts xxi.

THE farewells with the elders of Ephesus having been made, the missionary band begin their voyage to Jerusalem. Read 1—3, and let the teacher produce a map and trace their course. Ephesus to Coos, Rhodes, Patara, there a change of ship to Phenicia, passing north of Cyprus to Tyre. Describe the beauty of the Isles of Greece, scattered about in the blue waters of the Mediterranean, and remind similarly in modern times of Bishop Patteson and other missionaries similarly visiting the islands of the South Seas.

I. Conflicting Prophecies. (Read 3—15.) Where do they land, and why? (ver. 3.) From Acts xii. 20, and 1 Kings v. 9, 11, trace out the fact of there being great trade and intercourse between Tyre and Canaan since Solomon's time. Would be many Jews there; some have become disciples, so St. Paul and his friends spend a few days with them. (1) False prophets. What powers had the Holy Spirit given the disciples? not only of speaking in different tongues, but of foretelling future events. See 1 Cor. xii. 9—11, for an account of these different gifts; but sometimes persons made mistakes, could not be quite sure whether what they said was their own or Spirit's teaching. What did these disciples tell St. Paul? (ver. 4.) Did this dissuade him? No, for felt convinced in his own mind that he was doing right to go. Sometimes such a suggestion sent to try a person. Recall the sad story of the prophet from Judah (1 Kings xiii. 18), persuaded to do contrary to God's commands. St. John in his Epistle (1 John iv. 1) bids us try the spirit, because of false prophets. So the seven days over, another sad farewell, another prayer on the sea-shore, another parting. Trace Paul's company to Cæsarea. Where do they lodge there? Remind of Philip's past work for the Church, as one of the seven selected deacons. What is he now called, and why? to whom did he preach the Gospel in Samaria? so that evangelist means preacher as well as writer of the Gospel. What family had he, and what was their office? Remind of the prophecy (Joel ii. 28) quoted by St. Peter as fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts ii. 17). How these women prophesied we know not, perhaps taught children, as ladies now in Sunday-schools, perhaps taught adults, as Priscilla did Apollos (Acts xviii. 26). (2) True prophets. Now there comes a great prophet from Jerusalem, who was he? Have we heard of Agabus before? (xi. 28). Did that prophecy come true? Perhaps had been sent for to settle the question whether Paul ought to go to Jerusalem. Picture the scene: the friends assembled, Agabus coming in, the still silence, his taking the girdle of St. Paul's robe, his solemnly binding his own hands and feet, his prophetic words, the silence suddenly broken by the weeping of the women, and men too, the crowding round Paul, their entreaties to him not to go up to Jerusalem and be killed. Who alone was calm? but did he not feel it? Yes. Much touched by their sympathy and love, but did not mind sufferings or death for his dear Lord. What only could they say?

Practical Lesson. Steadfastness, i.e., not to be easily moved. How often do we find excuses for not doing something unpleasant? With St. Paul just the opposite. Nothing could divert him from what he felt to be right—not entreaties, tears, nor even the word of a prophet. Must try and get more of this spirit; nothing shall stop our doing right.

II. Troubles at Jerusalem. (1) About circumcision. (Read 15—26.) Now Paul, like Christ before him, set his face to Jerusalem, knowing what was before him. Who went with him? to whom did they pay their first visit? Why to James? Another missionary meeting held, like the first at Antioch (xiv. 27); James, the Bishop, in the chair, all the elders present; Paul, the missionary, tells his experiences. Where had he been in his last two journeys? All over Asia Minor, Greece, &c., preaching to thousands of Gentiles; naturally, therefore, he dwelt most on this in his speech (ver. 19). Were the elders jealous? No, they glorified God, as the Word was His. Now they tell him of a report that had got about, that Paul had said the Jews were to give up their customs (ver. 21). Was this so? Remind of the four requirements made for the Gentiles, but the Jews still retained their old customs. So advise him in most public manner to perform some Jewish ceremonies in the temple, to show how fully he maintains the whole Jewish law. Does this satisfy the Jews? Yes, those who had become Christians, but not the unbelievers. They, as so often before, raised a tumult against him. (2) About the temple. (Read 27—40.) What did they accuse him of doing? teaching against the law and temple. So had accused Jesus, and so Stephen. Old saying, "half the truth is greatest lie." All three had shown what was greater even than the temple, viz., spiritual worship. But all valued temple too highly to speak against it. Again, had seen Paul with Trophimus, and Paul in the temple, so now accuse him of taking Trophimus into the temple, i.e., into Court of the Jews. Had he done so? but anything to raise a cry against him. Now describe the riot: Paul seized by crowd of excited Jews, beaten and nearly torn in pieces by the mob, news of the riot carried to chief captain, party of soldiers, hastily collected, appear on the scene. Paul given up to them, bound with chains (Agabus' prophecy soon fulfilled!), led away to castle at corner of the temple. What does St. Paul ask leave to do? was he allowed? Shall speak of his defence in next lesson.

PRACTICAL LESSON. The troubles of the righteous. Very hard to find our words and deeds twisted against us; only what we must expect; take care that our words are guileless, and deeds such as can ask God's blessing on, then all will be well (Ps. xxxiv. 19).

Questions to be answered.

1. What two prophecies were uttered about St. Paul's visit to Jerusalem?
2. Which was the correct prophecy?
3. Where did he lodge at Cæsarea?
4. What do you know about Philip? What was he called, and why?
5. What false witness was borne against Paul at Jerusalem?
6. What practical lesson may we learn?

STILL AND DEEP.

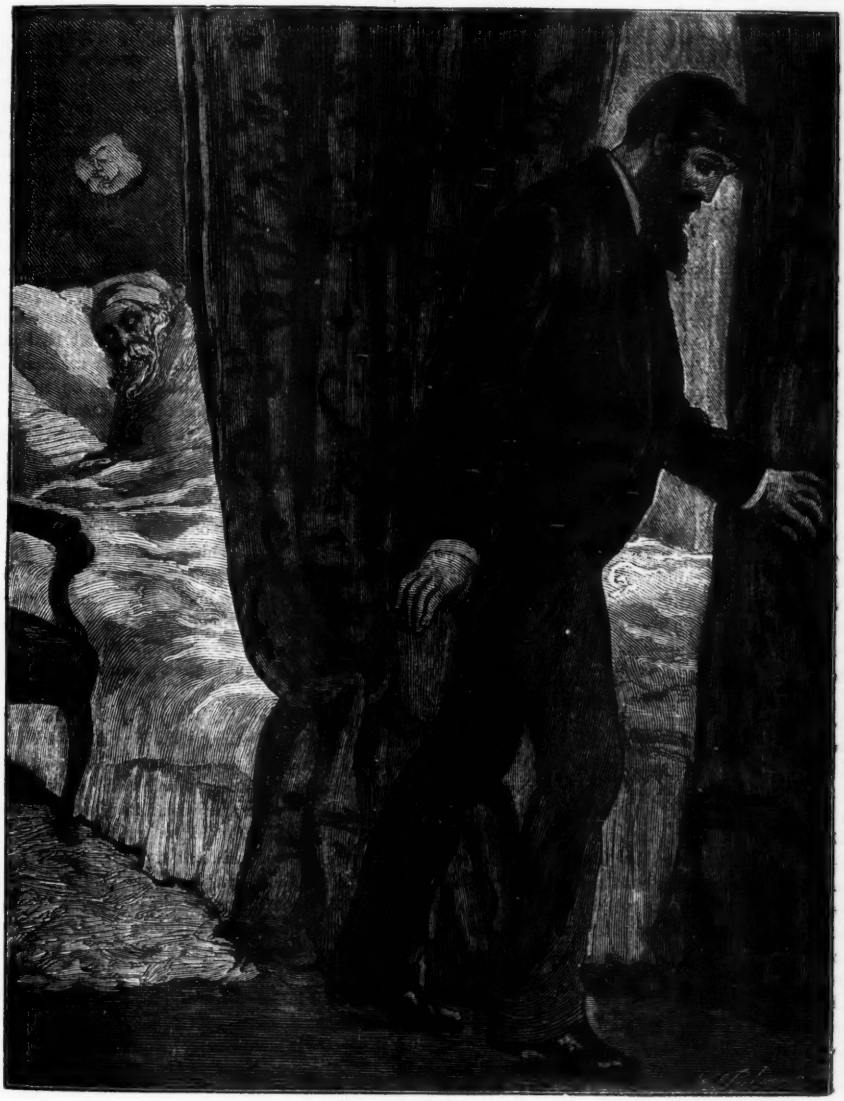
BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

BERTRAND re-arranged the pillows so that his father could recline in an easy position, with his face turned towards his son, and then, once more taking the wasted hand in his, he sat down by the bedside to listen.

"How strange it is to recall the sunny days of youth at this hour!" said Mr. Lisle—"sad and strange. But I must go back to the opening years of my existence to find the first link of the chain which binds me even now: I was educated at the Lyceum in Paris, and amongst my numerous comrades there was the son of an Englishman who was holding some temporary official position in the capital. I found Robert Trevelyan the most charming companion in every sense whom it was possible to conceive, and he and I became fast friends, with that strong vehement attachment which sometimes binds two young men together, when each has given to the other a hearty confidence and trust. The friendship between us never knew change or abatement till, alas, till the most awful moment of my life! When Trevelyan returned to his home in England with his father, it was arranged between us that we were to interchange visits every year. I spent a month with them each spring in London, and Robert passed his autumns always at our estate—the dear old home which you, Bertrand, will never see. It was in the Trevelyan's house that I first saw your lovely mother, and it was there that when I had come to live in England as a permament home, I met her again, and won her to cast in her lot with the impoverished exile"—he sighed deeply as he spoke.

"She never repented it," said Bertrand, gently pressing his father's hand.



"No; love such as ours can fill all life with inexhaustible riches, and make a home and country everywhere; and we were happy; ah, how perfectly happy we might always have been but for that one dark cloud of which I have to tell you now! Some years after my marriage, Robert Trevelyan also became the husband of a gentle young girl, whom my sweet wife learnt to love very dearly, and the intimacy between the two families became even more strongly cemented. The Trevelyans had, however, not been married many months when symptoms of delicacy showed themselves in Robert's wife, and he was advised to take her to Madeira for the winter. I was myself at the time suffering from the results of a neglected cold, and I was told that it would be a great advantage to me to escape an English spring; it was therefore decided that we were all to go together to enjoy six months' sunshine in the beautiful island, and it became to the whole of us an almost perfect party of pleasure. We were none of us very rich, for Robert Trevelyan's father had died almost bankrupt, leaving him but a slender income, and he depended for the support of his family almost entirely on an office which he held in London, and from which he had obtained six months' leave of absence; and I myself, as you know, having been finally deprived of my estates, had little or nothing except your mother's fortune, which was just sufficient for our bare subsistence, but we had enough, for we desired no luxuries, and we were rich indeed in love and happiness.

"The time came at last when it was necessary for us all to return to England; and Mrs. Trevelyan especially was anxious that her child should be born in her native land. We embarked all four on the vessel that was to convey us home, and for a few days we sailed in peace and happiness, over pleasant seas and under smiling skies; it was on a lovely tranquil evening that the shock of destiny came to shatter all our joys, and fix upon my soul the load of guilt which it has borne in anguish ever since. Bertrand, that you may understand what I have now to tell you, I must explain that, in spite of the close and earnest friendship which subsisted between Trevelyan and myself, there was one subject on which we had always differed—he was a strong Liberal in politics, a democrat and a republican, and I, as you know, abhorred such principles, and deemed them almost sacrilegious. We had, in our more youthful days, had so many disputes on these subjects, that they had threatened almost to dissolve the tie which united us to one another, and by mutual consent we had agreed to abstain from ever touching on politics at all. It was I, however, who most dreaded a recurrence to these vexed questions, for I knew that it was the one theme which roused my fiery temper to a degree that was almost beyond my control; and only the unusual excitement of the times could have led me to break my resolution of keeping silence with Trevelyan. But it was the year 1848, and a ship outward bound from England, with which we had spoken that day, had brought us news of the revolutionary troubles which were at that time convulsing France and well-nigh the whole of Europe. I was violently excited by the tidings, and so in a lesser degree was Trevelyan; for, at least, his native country was in peace, while mine was distracted by the machinations of those whom I deemed her worst enemies. So long as the light lasted that day I pored over the newspaper accounts, working myself up into a state of furious indignation against the very theories which Trevelyan most affected, and when I could no longer see to read, I joined him on the poop of the vessel, where he was standing looking out over the darkling ocean, and, quite unable to restrain myself, I plunged into a violent discussion on the principles which seemed to me to be undermining the whole basis of society; of course, Trevelyan took a precisely opposite view, and we paced to and fro in hot and eager argument, which grew every moment more fiercely angry on both sides, but especially on mine; we were alone, for your mother and his wife had retired to rest, and the swift descending night of those latitudes had fallen upon us, so that we scarcely saw each other's faces. Some words which Trevelyan uttered suddenly enraged me beyond endurance; I turned round upon him with a burst of passion; I raised my clenched fist! Bertrand, he thought I was going to strike him, but I was not! I call the justice of heaven to witness for me," continued the dying man, lifting up his clasped hands with a solemn gesture, "that never, in so much as a thought, did I seek to aim a blow at my dearest friend! No, I had but made the movement in support of my impassioned oratory; but he misunderstood it—alas for him! and, oh far more, alas for me, for all!—he started back, exclaiming, 'Lisle, do not kill me!' the words ring yet in my ears with their involuntary cry of terror, and then his foot struck against some obstacle unperceived in the dark, and he fell backwards over the side of the vessel, close to which he was standing at the moment. Bertrand, Bertrand, I heard the heavy plunge of his body into the deep dark sea; for one moment I was so appalled and thunderstruck that I seemed almost paralysed, but the next I made my cries resound through the ship, and soon the terrible shout, 'A man overboard!' was heard from one end of it to the other; in a second the captain's orders rung out clear and firm; the vessel was stopped, the boats were lowered; a search was organised over the surface of the shadowy heaving water within a given space, where alone it was possible he might be struggling, in vain! Never was there cry or sound from out the depths of that unfathomable ocean which could so much as tell us where he had gone down. As I hung over the side of the vessel in inexpressible agony I saw the boats returning one by one, empty as they went. He was gone! he was lost! he was dead; my dearest friend; and I had killed him!" the old man let his head fall back as he spoke, while tears—those saddest tears which fall from dying eyes—trickled slowly down his wasted cheeks.

"No, my dear father, no," said Bertrand, earnestly; "you did not kill him; it was quite an accident."

"An accident which would never have occurred if I had not turned upon him with such fury in my

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"He slipped softly from the room."—p. 396.

looks of passion, that he believed I meant to hurl him to the ground; nay, more, his last words—oh, terrible to think that, being of such import, they were indeed the last—that final cry from his lips, implied that he credited me even with a murderous intent. He was a man of nervous temperament; my angry countenance, my menacing gesture, made him start back to escape me, and sent him straightway to his death. I did not kill him wilfully; but none the less surely was it my hand and none other which drove him down, in all the strength and beauty of his early manhood, to lie uncoffined in his ocean grave. Bertrand, when the conviction came upon me that it was so, that indeed and in truth my passion had slain my friend, and that never more, by my one act, should I, or his adoring wife, or any one who had loved him, behold on earth his bright young face, the sharp arrow of an intolerable remorse pierced into my inmost heart, and there it has remained fixed, from that day until now."

"Surely you blame yourself too much," said Bertrand, soothingly.

"Do you think that was all the evil I wrought in the one awful moment which has ruined all my life? You have yet to hear the end of that night's tragedy. When the cries that told of some catastrophe resounded through the ship, they reached the ears of Trevelyan's poor young wife, who was lying, not yet asleep, alone in her cabin; the unfailing instinct of a true affection instantly told her that evil had befallen the one object of her love. Suddenly, as we were watching with straining eyes for the return of the boats, we saw a white-robed figure come flying along the deck with streaming hair and ghastly face, while Robert's name rang out with a despairing cry from her pallid lips; the silence from all around told her that her fond heart had divined the truth; had not some of the men held her back by force she would have flung herself after him into the sea; and all the time we were waiting to know the result of the search she was struggling madly to free herself from their hold, knowing, as if her eyes had seen his lifeless corpse, that he was to be sought only in the fathomless depths which would never yield him up till the Judgment Day. When at length the boats came back, and it was admitted by every one that all hope was over, she seemed to collapse like a senseless heap in the arms of those who held her; she was carried down into the cabin, where my wife and the other women in the ship gathered round her. Before morning a poor fatherless child had been born into the world; and as little Mary's sweet life dawned into being, that of her mother sank away; they buried her next day in the same deep waters that had engulfed the treasure of her heart; lovely and pleasant they had been in their lives, and in death they were not divided; but, Bertrand, it was my passionate hand which had flung them both into their untimely grave."

CHAPTER VI.

Bertrand remained silent as Mr. Lisle lay back with his eyes closed and his lips moving, evidently in secret prayer. He knew too well how sensitive was his father's nature, to have any hope of lessening the scrupulousness of conscience which made him judge himself so severely for the unfortunate consequences of an act, that had in itself been almost blameless; he could well remember now how he had noticed, even in his childish days, that Mr. Lisle's whole life was shadowed by some unspoken sadness which never varied or left him, whatever might be the sources of happiness around him, and he could understand easily enough how the highly-wrought temperament, which had made the Comte de L'Isle sacrifice all his worldly prospects to a sentiment of loyalty, had led him to surrender also the joy of his existence to an exaggerated sense of remorse; he felt that it was useless to combat the feeling at this supreme hour, when those events of life which touch on the region of conscience are projected on the soul, to the exclusion of all others, by the light that streams from the opening doors of the unseen world. Bertrand thought it better to try and lead his father's mind gently to the contemplation of the one part connected with this sad history of which it must give him pleasure to think, so he said brightly, "Well, dear father, at least you have one great comfort in the thought of the happy home you have been able to give to your poor friend's daughter; I understand now why you adopted Mary Trevelyan, and your having done so has been a blessing to herself as well as to us."

"Could anything make up to her for all of which I deprived her? Think of it, Bertrand—father and mother both slain on the very night of her birth; home, protection, fortune, all torn away, for her parents had no near relations, and the income Trevelyan derived from his salary of course died with him. She was left, through my means, a helpless infant, utterly alone in this cold world, without even a provision for her future maintenance."

"But you did all you could to supply her loss."

"Yes, while I lived; but here, hovering as I am over the brink of the grave, my power of reparation ends, and it is for this cause, my son, that I felt such an urgent necessity to see you before I departed; so that my spirit already disengaged from earth had yet no power to go forth upon its unknown flight till I had spoken with you face to face. Bertrand, I dare not coerce you in such a matter, even if I had the power which, in the independence of your maturity I certainly have not, but let me tell you that the one hope which sustains me in the arms of death, is that I so long have cherished, that you would carry on the reparation for my evil deed when I have gone to give account for it before my Judge."

"You must tell me exactly what you mean, dear father," said Bertrand, fixing his fearless blue eyes upon the dying man's wan face.

"It will not be difficult," he answered, with a sad smile. "My son, when I die the poor imitation I tried to erect round Mary Trevelyan of the home, the love, the happiness, she lost through me, will all crumble away into the ashes of my grave. She will be once more a forlorn destitute orphan, for I cannot even leave her the means of living. I have nothing of my own, and your mother's fortune, such as it is, and that is little enough, descends to you."

"Mary shall have it!" exclaimed Bertrand, impetuously. "My salary from the Foreign Office will suffice for me."

"Mary Trevelyan will never accept of charity from you, Bertrand," said Mr. Lisle, quietly; "she would rather take it, if need were, from any one else in all the world. No, my son, there is but one way in which you can make reparation, and that a reparation final and complete, for your father's deadly act; and oh! if you could but know with what a fervour of entreaty I have prayed that it might be in your power to fulfil my earnest longing—for unless your own heart responds to my desire, it were an unrighteous deed to urge it on you. Oh, Bertrand!" he continued, turning his dying eyes imploringly on the young man's beautiful face—"if only you can tell me that my dream will be realised! you love our Mary do you not? So sweet, so pure, so gentle as she is, you cannot choose but love her!"

"Surely I love her," said Bertrand, with a smile; "I see plainly enough what your wish is now, father, you would have me make her my wife."

The old man clasped his wasted hands together with passionate energy.

"If only you can with a true heart, Bertrand. Not even that I may die in peace, not even that my dark deed may be blotted out in the sunshine of her happy life, would I ask you to marry a woman you do not love, for that were in itself a sin, and it could but work misery for you both; but if you love her as her husband should—and surely you must, charming as she is, our sweet white flower—you will lift away for ever the load that has crushed me down these twenty years; then shall I feel that my expiation, vicariously wrought by you, has been indeed most perfect, covering over all her life, from the cradle to the grave, with a love and joy as full and blissful as that of which she was through me bereft. All through these years, in the past, anticipating this my final hour, I have always felt that if I were destined to leave her at the last to a lonely struggling poverty-stricken life, not only were the restitution I had striven to make to her hopelessly incomplete, but it would have been better for her if I had added to my own guilt by casting her an unconscious infant into the waves that engulfed her parents, that she might have joined them at least in the safety of their rest. But now the bitterness of death will all be past for me, if I may know that Trevelyan's child will be your happy wife, my Bertrand."

"Then be at ease, so far as I am concerned, dear father, for I am very willing. I love Mary dearly. I am sure that my life in her hands will be surrounded with the tenderest care, and although I do not think that I have ever been roused to any passionate affection for her, perhaps because I have always known and cherished her, yet I think the steadfast sentiment with which she has inspired me will lay the foundation for a far more sure and lasting happiness than that which could spring from a more ardent fancy."

"Oh, Bertrand, if you knew the blessed peace and comfort you have given me!" said the old man, raising his eyes, streaming with joyful tears, to heaven. "How can I be thankful enough?"

"But, father," said his son, with a slight smile, "are you not taking too much for granted? it is not enough that I alone am willing to link my fate with Mary's, how do I know that she has any such feeling for me as would lead her to give her own consent? If I know Mary Trevelyan at all, she is the very last person in the world who, for any reason whatever, would marry a man she did not love—no, not to escape death would she do it!"

"You are right in that conviction, Bertrand. Mary is a pure and high-souled girl, if ever there was one, and I know—for she has told me—that not only would she rather die than wed where her heart was not already given, but that she would think it a desecration of the very name of love ever to give her deep affections to any but one upon the earth."

"Then what reason have I to hope that I shall be that one?" said Bertrand, rather anxiously.

"I do not think you need have any fear, my Bertrand," said the old man, turning to him with a tender smile; "it would not be easy to live with you for years and fail to love you."

"So you may think in your partiality, my dearest father; but Mary Trevelyan may take a very different view of the son to whom you have always been so indulgent. It is strange, that intimate as we have been all our lives, I should not now have the remotest idea what the nature of Mary's feelings towards myself may really be; we have always been good friends, and the unobtrusive kindness she has shown me has been unceasing; but beyond that I have never penetrated her reserve in the very least; she is so exceedingly still and quiet always, that it is hard to tell whether she has strong feelings lurking beneath her unruffled calm of any kind at all."

"Ah, Bertrand, believe me, there is depth in her stillness, and there is a power and intensity of affection in that reserved and quiet nature, which is far beyond what any more passionate temperament could feel; I can prove it to you if you will, and I think it could scarce be a breach of confidence to tell you that which you will so soon learn for yourself."

"But surely it cannot be that quiet silent Mary has ever spoken to you herself on such a theme," said Bertrand.

"Not willingly, you may be very certain; nor could even I have wrung the avowal from her, but for the circumstances of the moment when I asked it. I will tell you how it was, Bertrand. Four days ago, as I sat with Mary on the lawn, under the starlight, I seemed to receive in some undefined mysterious manner a special summons for my speedy departure from this world, and a great fear seized me that I might not live to see you again, and learn from your own lips whether it would be possible for you to give to Mary the home in your heart which I so desired she should have. I resolved, that if I were not allowed to live—as mercifully I have been—till I could look upon your face once more, I would leave a letter for you, containing the substance of the sad history I have told you to-night, and a statement of the strong desire I felt that you should in this way complete the reparation I had sought to make. But I felt as you did, that this, my cherished scheme, must fall completely to the ground if Mary herself could not give to you alone all the deep and single-hearted love I well knew she could bestow but once for all; and I could not resist the temptation of trying to win the truth from her in the pathetic privilege of my dying state. Even thus it was like drawing the life blood from her heart to wring the secret from her tender delicate nature; but I did succeed. I told her how my departing soul was held back to earth by the overwhelming anxiety I felt that my one supreme desire would be fulfilled, and that she would be your wife. I could not bring myself to tell her that I, whom she cherished as the protector who had guarded her from infancy, was in effect, the destroyer of her father—that dead father, to whose mere memory she was so tender that she never called me by the name, true daughter as she was to me—but I did tell her, that for a secret reason, the only hope I had of passing from this earth in peace was centred in the possibility of her union with my son, and I implored her to tell me if on her side there would be no obstacle, for I scarce feared any upon yours. I had to tell her, Bertrand, that I felt sure you loved her, before I could win a syllable from her lips, and when at length she spoke, it was only to utter what she believed would be buried with me in the grave."

"And what was it, father? you will tell me, will you not?" said Bertrand, eagerly.

"I will tell you the words she said," replied the old man, softly. "When I asked her, with the urgency of a dying man, 'Mary, do you love my son?' she answered, quite unfalteringly, 'Better than my life; he is, and ever will be, my one and only love!'"

"She said that!" exclaimed Bertrand, starting to his feet. "Dear, sweet Mary, if it be so we shall indeed be strangely happy!"

"Yes; and I, dying, shall possess a joy which for twenty weary years, my life has never known."

"Dear father, you must drive away all sorrowful recollections now, and repose on our love for you and for each other. Oh that these new hopes might draw you back to earth, and give you to us for a little longer!"

"That may not be, my Bertrand," he said, smiling sadly; "I feel the cold hand of death laid even now upon my heart; but you have brought a strange peace to my soul, and I feel at last that I can rest. Heaven's blessings be upon your head, my son. Kiss me once again as you used to do long years ago, when you came, a little child, to give me your sweet 'Good-night,' and then leave me to sleep a while, for I am weary."

Bertrand bent down his handsome head, and pressed his lips warm with life and health upon the wasted pallid face, then, seeing that his father's eyes were already closing, he slipped softly from the room, and sent nurse Parry back to watch by Mr. Lisle till morning.

(To be continued.)

SPRING.

BIRDS, showering fairy music, take their flight
Adown these beechen groves of tender green;
And where those bars of sunshine intervene,
Dance in their golden rays the wind-flowers light.

Each mazy winding of the wood is bright
With primrose clumps and "alleluias"—seen
Through the dead leaves where last year's flowers have been
And perfumed undergrowth of woodruff white.

So from dark days of sorrow overpast
Blossoms of Faith and Charity may spring,
So hearts from cold despair and doubt, at last
May rise, and songs of trustful gladness sing.
Earth's days are not all bright, for 'tis not heaven,
Nor wholly gloom to whom that hope is given.

"ABOUT MY FATHER'S BUSINESS."

BY THOMAS ARCHER.

GIVING REST TO THE WEARY.

WE have not yet done with this wonderful district of Soho. It is one of those attractive quarters of London which is interesting alike for its historical associations and for memorable houses that were once inhabited by famous men. In essays, letters, fiction—all through that period which has been called the Augustan age of English literature—we find allusions to it; and after that time it continued to be the favourite resort of artists, men of letters, wealthy merchants, and not a few statesmen and eminent politicians. In Leicester Square Hogarth laughed, moralised, and painted. The house of Sir Joshua Reynolds stands yet in that now renovated space, and a well-known artist has a studio there to-day. But the tide of fashion has receded since powdered wigs and sedan chairs disappeared. The tall stately houses are many of them dismantled, or are converted into manufactories and workshops. The great iron extinguishers which still adorn the iron railings by the door-steps have nearly rusted away. It must be a century since the flambeaux carried by running footmen were last thrust into them, when great rumbling creaking coaches drew up and landed visitors before the dimly-lighted portals. Silence and decay are the characteristics of many a once goodly mansion; and the houses themselves are not unfrequently associated with the relief of that poverty which is everywhere so apparent as to appeal to almost every form of charity. Before one such house we are standing now, its quietly opening door revealing a broad lofty hall, from which a great staircase, with heavy baluster of black oak and panelled walls, leads to the spacious rooms above. This mansion is historical, too, in its way for we are at the corner of Soho Square, in Greek Street, and are about to enter what was once the London residence of the famous Alderman Beckford, and his equally famous son—the man who inherited the mysterious and gorgeously furnished palace at Fonthills, the author of "Vathek," the half-recluse who bought Gibbon's extensive library at Lausanne, that he might have "something to amuse him when he went that way," and afterwards went that way, read himself nearly blind, and then made a friend a present of all the books, sold Fonthills, went abroad, and set about building another mysterious castle in a strange land.

In that big committee-room on the first floor, which we shall visit presently, there was to be seen, four or five years ago, a stupendous chimney-piece of oak, elaborately carved, and said to have been a masterpiece of Grinling Gibbons. It was taken down and sold for a handsome sum of money, to augment the funds of the Institution which now occupies the old mansion, for the door at which we enter receives other guests than those who once thronged it—suffering, depressed, poverty-stricken weary men and women, who come here to seek the rest that is offered to them in the quiet rooms—the restoration of meat and drink and refreshing sleep, the comfort of hopeful words and friendly aid. It is named "The House of Charity," and the work that its supporters have set themselves to do is carried on so silently—I had almost said so secretly—that the stillness you observe within the building, as we stand here waiting for the lady who superintends the household, is suggestive alike of the repose which is essential to the place, and of a severe earnestness not very easy to define.

Members of the same committee, whose earnest hearty work is apparent at Newport Market and at the Soup Kitchen in Ham Yard, are helping this House of Charity, which has the Archbishop of Canterbury for its patron and the Bishop of London for its visitor.

Here, in the two large sitting-rooms opening from the hall, we may see part of what is being done, in giving rest to the weary and upholding them who are ready to faint. One is for men, the other for women, who have been received as inmates, for periods extending from a fortnight to a longer time, according to the necessities of each case, and the probability of obtaining suitable employment. Of course the aid is intended to be only temporary—though in some peculiar cases it is continued till the applicant recovers from weakness following either uninfectious illness or want. There can be, of course, no actual sick-nursing here; but in a warm and comfortable upper room, near the dormitory, which we shall see presently—a room which is the day-nursery of a few children who are also admitted—I have seen young women, one who was suffering from a consumptive cough, another an out-patient at an hospital for disease of the hip, and wearing an instrument till she can be admitted as a regular case. They were both sitting cosily at their tea, and were employed at needlework, as most of the women are who find here a temporary home. For it is one of the beneficent results of an influential committee, that a number of cases are sent to hospitals or to convalescent homes, and so are restored; but till this can be done they are fed and tended—fed with food more delicate than that of the ordinary meals—and are allowed to rest in peace and to regain strength.

But we are still in the men's sitting-room, where several poor fellows are looking at the lists of advertisements in the newspapers for some announcement of a vacant situation. A supply of books is also provided both for men and women, and the latter are just now engaged in mending or making their clothes.

Between thirty and forty inmates can be received at one time, and those who are in search of employment, or who require to go out during the day, may leave the house after breakfast, and return either to dinner or to tea. There are indeed few restrictions when once preliminary inquiries and the recommendation of a member of the committee result in the admission of an applicant; and it is easy to see how deeply and thankfully many of these poor depressed men and women, beaten in the battle of life, with little hope of regaining a foothold, weak, dispirited, destitute, and with no strength left to struggle under the burden that weighs them down, find help and healing, food and sleep, advice, and very often a recommendation which places them once more in a position of comfort and independence. A large proportion of those who are admitted are provided with situations either permanently or for a period long enough to enable them to turn round the difficult corner from poverty and dependence to useful and appropriate employment. Some are sent to Homes, hospitals, or orphanages, and many return to their own homes. From those homes they have wandered, hoping to find the world easier than it has proved to be, and in going back to them they have fallen by the wayside.

There are sometimes remarkable varieties here—emigrants waiting for ships to sail that will bear them to another land; men of education, such as tutors, engineers, engravers, and professional men, who have been unsuccessful, or have lost their position, often through no immediate fault of their own. Of course, the large class of genteel poverty is largely represented in the five or six hundred cases which make the average number of yearly inmates. Clerks, shopmen, and travellers, are about as numerous as servants, porters, and pages. Poor women, many of whom are ladies by birth or previous position and education, find the House of Charity a refuge indeed, and feel that the person who has charge of the household arrangements, as well as those who have charge of the inmates, the accounts and correspondence, may be appealed to with an assurance of true sympathy. Here, beside the two sitting-rooms, is a large room which we will call the refectory. It is plainly furnished, with separate tables for men and women, and the quantity and description of the food supplied is such as would be provided in a respectable and well-ordered family—tea or coffee and plenty of good bread-and-butter morning and evening, meat, bread, and vegetables, for dinner, and a supper of bread and cheese. There are no "rations," nor any special limit as to quantity, and if one could forget the distress which brings them hither, the family might be regarded as belonging to some comfortable business establishment, with good plain meals and a club-room on each side the dining-hall for meeting in after working hours.

Let us go up-stairs, and look at the dormitories, which occupy respectively the right and left side of the building, and we shall see that they are so arranged as to secure that privacy, the want of which would be most repulsive to persons of superior condition. Each long and lofty room is divided into a series of enclosures or cabins by substantial partitions about eight feet high, and in each of these separate rooms—all of which are lighted by several windows or by gas-branches in the main apartment—there is a neat comfortable bed and bedstead, with space for a box, a seat, and a small table or shelf.

A resident chaplain or warden conducts morning and evening prayer in the chapel, which is built on part of the open area at the back of the building; and I would have you consider, not only that to many of these weary souls this sacred spot may come to be associated with that outcome to renewed life for which their presence in the Institution gives them reason to hope, but that it is most desirable for the invalids, who frequently form so large a portion of the congregation, to be able to attend worship without practically leaving the house.

Not only because of the sick and the physically feeble, however, does the House of Charity represent a work that needs vast extension.

The case-book would reveal a series of stories none the less affecting because they are entered plainly, briefly, and without waste of words. They need few touches of art to make them painfully interesting. They tell of ladies, wives of professional men, brought to widowhood and sudden poverty; of men of education cast adrift through failure or false friendship, and not knowing where to seek bread; of children left destitute or deserted under peculiar circumstances; of women removed from persecution, and girls from the tainted atmosphere of vice; of weary wanderers who, in despair of finding such a shelter, and dreading the common lodging-house, have spent nights in the parks; of foreigners stranded on the shore of a strange city; of ministers of the gospel brought low; of friendless servant-girls, ill-treated, defrauded of their wages, or discharged almost penniless, and cast loose amidst the whirlpool of London streets.

But, as I have already intimated, it is not alone for its temporary aid in affording a home that the House of Charity is distinguished; it affords a good hope also, by seeking to obtain situations, for cases where peculiar circumstances make such a search difficult—for bereaved and impoverished ladies, and for educated men, as well as for domestic servants and ordinary employés. Its supporters give their special aid to the work, and, as they number amongst them many ladies and gentlemen of considerable social influence, employment is frequently found for those whose misfortunes would otherwise be almost irretrievable.

GOD'S MIRROR.

OH, might I see,
As in a glass, the glory of Thy love:
That so, on me
Thy light reflected, I to men might prove
A mirror that might something show of Thee.

Fain would I gaze
Unwearied, till I gazed all self away;
That so Thy praise
I might in every act and word display,
And Thou in me live only all my days.

So, through my heart,
Thy love unchecked, unceasingly should flow,
This all my part—
The glad possession evermore to know,
And then to all the living joy impart.

Oh, might it be!
O Thou that dwellest in the gardens, hear!
Grant this to me:
Cause me to hear Thy voice, to feel Thee near,
That so I may forget all self in Thee!

AUNT JESSIE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SHAG AND DOLL," "HUGH'S HEROISM," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

WHENEVER Esther could get time to come so far, she paid a visit to the workhouse. And she seldom came empty-handed, for Mrs. Webbe generally managed to send a little packet of tea, or some other small gift, which she begged Mrs. Lang to accept, with her love.

Thus the months rolled on with nothing special to mark them, until one day Esther presented herself at the workhouse to see her aunt, not alone, but accompanied by a sun-burnt middle-aged man, whose countenance, which had once been and indeed still was good-looking, bore unmistakable marks of suffering, either mental or physical.

Esther seemed in a strange flutter of excitement, and the first words she spoke showed her aunt that she was not like her usual self. The stranger had sat down at once without uttering a sound, but he was gazing with a look of pain and tenderness upon the peaceful quiet face, so pale and calm, so full of love and gentleness. It had aged more than he had expected since he had last seen it. Had he anything to do with the lines which care had left there? However that might be, some deep emotion seemed to stir within him as he gazed, for once or twice he covered his eyes with his hand, whilst his lips seemed to quiver.

"Did I not hear some one come in with you, Esther dear?"

"Oh, aunt, how quick your ears are! Yes, some one did come in with me; some one who has come to see you. Guess who it is, Aunt Jessie. It is some one you would like to see—I mean to meet again."

"I can't tell who it is, for I've no one now besides you, Esther; all the others are gone. Your father was the last; and you know we never heard from him after he went away to Australia when you were a baby; and report came some time afterwards that he was dead. Oh, how often I've wept over him; for he was our only brother, and we had all set such hopes on him!"

"But what if the report shouldn't have been true, auntie?"

Esther had no need to say more. With a little low cry Mrs. Lang rose from her seat with outstretched arms, and the same instant found herself pressed against her brother's heart.

"I've come home, Jessie, to ask to be forgiven."

"Frank, dear Frank!" was all she could say.

"Can you forgive me? Can you and my child here, ever forgive me the wrong I have done you?"

There was no need to ask the question again; the loving faces which looked up into his—the warm kisses which were printed upon his cheek, answered it plainly enough.

Then sitting down beside his sister, with his arm round his daughter, who stood hanging over him, he told his tale, which, however, would be too long for us to relate here.

He wound up by saying, "At last I had a long illness, when I was brought down to death's door; and then it was conscience fastened upon me, and showed me what sort of a life mine had been. It all looked very black, Jessie—so black that I must have despaired if I hadn't at the same time come to see One who once shed His own blood that all my stains might be washed away, and I made pure and white. And now I've come back to tell you, as I've already told my Saviour, how it cuts me to the heart to think of all the past, and the suffering I've caused you and those who have gone away where they are beyond the reach of all the love I would have shown them now to prove my sorrow for the way I behaved to them."

His voice broke down at these words, and Jessie, who had seen one patient sister after another pass away to her rest, with only words of love upon her lips for the brother who had caused her latter days to be spent in one long struggle with poverty, who had heard the young wife murmur, "Lord, forgive him, and grant us both to meet again," Jessie replied, "They all forgave you; and God himself has made it up to them. He has wiped away all tears from off their faces, and satisfied them with His love."

"God bless you, Jessie, for those words!" said her brother, in faltering tones, as he tried to master his emotion.

"But now," he went on, "I will spend the rest of my life in trying to make what amends I can to you, Jessie and my own Esther. But how can I ever repay you, sister, for all the care and love you have bestowed upon her? how can I ever thank you for having made her what she is? I never can do it; but the God I've lately learnt to know, He will reward you!"

It was a happy trio that left the workhouse that afternoon: Jessie leaning upon the arm of her brother, whilst Esther clung to her father on the other side. Deep joy shone on all their faces; and as they walked they discussed future plans. For the present they would go to a lodging, until they could look about and meet with a permanent home. Frank Grey's suggestion was, that as he had come back possessed of sufficient capital to start a little business, he should seek for something in which Esther might help him; and so they would all three live together.

The idea met with no opposition from either of the others, who declared that it far exceeded their utmost dreams of happiness. Esther's eyes beamed with joy; whilst her aunt's glad smile and softly uttered words of thankfulness, showed how deep and full was her rejoicing.

And Esther thought of the burst of glory which had caught her eyes that sorrowful evening when she was bringing her aunt to the workhouse; and once more the words came into her mind, "At evening time it shall be light." L. C. Silke.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

155. State the circumstances connected with the death of Zechariah, the son of Berechiah.

156. Who is it refers to his death in the New Testament? Quote passage.

157. Where is it stated that Elijah wrote a letter to King Jehoram?

158. Who, in the New Testament, is mentioned as having had a dream which made her much afraid?

159. Who is mentioned as having dwelt in the college of the prophets?

160. When God sent an angel, in the days of David, to destroy Jerusalem, who are said to have seen the angel, and hid themselves?

161. Why should we suppose that St. Luke was with St. Paul when he journeyed through Macedonia?

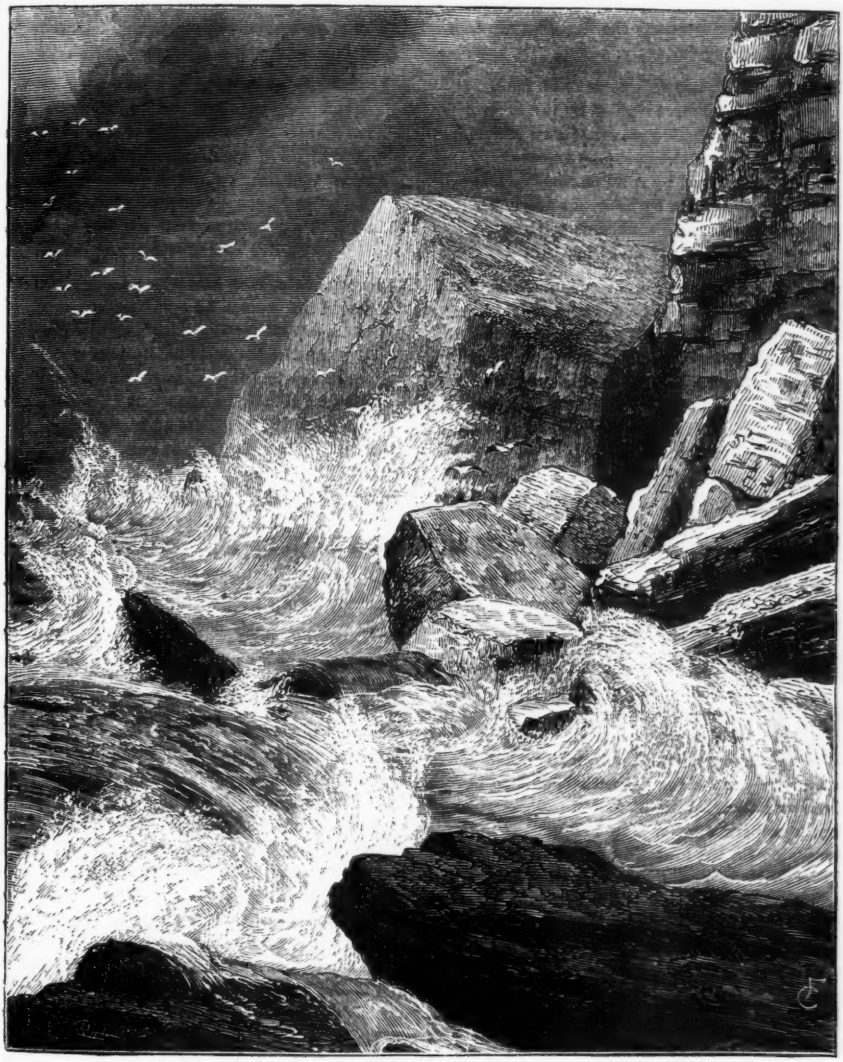
162. What country was that in which the king bought all the land from his people, and then sent them about as slaves? Quote passage.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 368.

139. Tertius (Rom. xvi. 22).

140. Of Simon Peter, and Andrew his brother (Mark i. 17).

141. Jonathan, his uncle (1 Chron. xxvii. 32).



142. "But I certify you, brethren, that the Gospel which was preached of me, is not after man. For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ" (Gal. i. 11, 12).

143. "The Lord bless thee and keep thee: the Lord make His face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up His countenance upon thee, and give thee peace" (Num. vi. 24—26).

144. Eight times—five times by the Jews, and three times by the Romans (2 Cor. xi. 24, 25).

145. Deborah (compare Gen. xxiv. 59, and xxxv. 8).

146. "How is it ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business;" and "It is finished" (Luke ii. 49, and John xix. 30).

(Drawn by F. CARLESS.)

CONTRASTS.

STRETCHING along a billow-beaten shore,
A low white line of foam and hoary spray,
Fringing a coast whose cruel rocks loud roar,
Resounding with tempestuous fray,

There, rooted firm amidst the circling waves,
A jutting crag with high uprearèd crest,
The fierce attacks of wave and weather braves,
With bold unyielding breast.

Fierce eddying whirlpools rage around its base,
The sullen roaring of the sea fills all the air,
As many a billow breaks upon its face,
And leaves its deep-traced furrows there;
And often, with the lightning's lurid flash,
Loud thunder rolls across the troubled sea,
And threatening tempests the fierce waters lash,
Uprising furiously.

Flowing between two sedgy banks of reed,
A peaceful rill scarce rippled by the breeze,
There where the shallow wavelets slow recede,
A pebbly mound o'erspread by trees—
A spot ne'er touched by wind or rushing tide—
Hid from the storm by branches overhead,
Yet where the dancing sunbeams softly glide
Through green and leafy bed.

And as with ocean crag and river mound,
Is it not too with life on earth below?
While one man lives amid a ceaseless round
Of trouble, sorrow, sickness, woe—
While ever round him foaming billows roar,
And gathering tempests crowd the darkened sky,
Another's lot is cast on happier shore
Of bright prosperity.

And seeing this, have we not often dared
To doubt the justice of the Great All-Wise?
Look we still further—see how it hath fared
Where Nature's book before us lies—
Mark how that while the stone amid the rill,
Covered with moss and earth, is hid from sight—
The wave-worn ocean crag remaineth still Unspotted, pure, and bright.

So too with man. For he whose lot is cast
Upon prosperity's untroubled shore,
Above whose head no clouds of woe have passed,
Nor waves of trouble flooded o'er,
Amidst such long unbroken peace is apt
To quite forget the goal of precious worth,
And with a growth of sloth and sin enwrapped,
To live alone for earth.

Far otherwise with him who has his place
Amid the turmoil of opposing waves,
Who meets misfortune with a cheery face,
And hostile tempests boldly braves;
For sorrow then but points the soul away
Beyond this earth to seek the Father's breast,
Where, midst the glories of eternal day,
The weary are at rest.

G. W.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER X.—IN THE FIRE-LIGHT.

DOROTHY was sitting over the study fire alone that evening. She was beginning to realise how, when we are very young, we walk hand in hand along one path with many others round us, but as we grow older the path begins to branch out here and there, until at last we all, or most of us, journey separate ways. Tom had gone to business that morning for the first time in his life. He was nearly seventeen, and "it was time that he did something," his father had said to George Blakesley. The Woodwards made very few friends, but with the few they generally were very intimate, and they consulted Mr. Blakesley now on all their private affairs, and he had been instrumental in getting the sturdy Tom a junior clerkship in an insurance broker's. It was not much, he said, and at first he would get no salary at all, but it would lead to better things perhaps. Sally had evinced some crude talent for drawing, and had gone to the School of Art in —— Street. Caroline Barker, close by, went, and that was how Sally came to be a student; and Caroline, who was older by some eight years, took charge of the little girl to and fro. Will had not come home from school yet, though it was nearly four o'clock, and getting dark, for the December days were very short. Mrs. Woodward had gone to read her book in her husband's room at the office. It was "making-up day" for the paper, and they disliked being apart even on necessary occasions, so Dolly—how the old childish name clings to her—was alone waiting for her brothers and sisters, and longing to know how Tom had got on during his first day at work. She expected Mr. Blakesley presently too. She was almost angry when she remembered how completely he was established on intimate relations with her people; it was such treachery to Adrian Fuller, in her estimation, and she, at any rate, had never let the interloper usurp his place, though she could not but own that he was very good and clever, and it had been kind of him to find a post for Tom.

Six months more, she was thinking, as the fire flickered and sent a pleasant glow round the cosy room, and Mr. Fuller would be home. How our imaginations turn and alter the current of our lives! and on how slight a foundation will they build up realities that form the histories of our lives! The quaint child had developed strangely since the morning Venus had been buried—how much she hardly knew herself. She only did know that Adrian Fuller's parting words haunted her strangely and sweetly, that his letter was hidden away, yet taken out secretly, and read again and again, and that she lived and waited simply to see the day that brought him home. It only wanted six months more to the time, she thought; when the leaves began to bud, and the swallows came to herald the summer, there would be only a little time longer to wait ere he came.

Then the door opened, and George Blakesley entered.

"I wanted to hear how Tom got on to-day," he said, "so I have come, and hope you'll give me some tea presently." He gave up his dinner many a day without a murmur, to come and see her, little though she appreciated the sacrifice.

"They are all out," she answered. She did not want to be interrupted in her reverie, but he came and sat down opposite to her, ready to talk or to be silent, as she pleased. He always fidgeted her, somehow, and she could not sit and think while he was there watching her. She looked up almost angrily, though he did not know it.

"Well!" he said, as if in answer to some strange wonder expressed in her face.

"I was thinking it is such a pity that we live always," she said, "if we could wake and be conscious on the happy days and sleep through all the weary ones."

"Are you weary already?" he asked.

"No, not weary exactly, only time drags so. One can't feel an interest in everything."

"There is nothing so dangerous as the beginning of that idea," he answered. "It grows on us if we encourage it, till at last we care for nothing."

"The days are so long!" she pleaded.

"Why don't you occupy yourself with work?"

"Work!" and she opened her sleepy brown eyes. "Why should I? and what is there I can do?"

"Why should you? Because work, be it what it may, is a noble occupation, and no men, and very few women, have a right to live without taking their share of it."

"But some are rich, and have no occasion."

"There is always occasion to work, but it does not always mean money-getting," he said; "nor does it mean that those who are rich should work for nothing, and so take the bread out of the mouths of those who have their living to get. There is plenty to do, to make life better for others, and those who do not want money can surely give some of their leisure and their intellect for this purpose.

He stopped a minute, for the girl was looking up at him half afraid, half surprised. She hated work. And oh, how dreadful the world would be if George Blakesley governed it! He would make it full of galley-slaves.

"I think the conception of Mazzini's," he went on, "that we should regard the world as a great workshop, in which we have all to make something good and beautiful, is a very grand one, and our Master is not hard to please."

"But how can I, a woman, work?" she asked, and stopped at the sound of her own voice, and in surprise at her own words. She had never been called a woman before, even by herself.

"You can make those you know happy, and be useful to them, and you can gain knowledge, child, and help others through its means."

Then there was a long long silence, and George Blakesley looked into the fire again, and Dorothy sat watching his face by its flickering light, and thinking of the past summer days of indolence and lazy happiness into which these words of his seemed to have put a sting, yet there was something grateful in this idea of work, in theory at any rate.

"I should so like to make something good and beautiful," she said, wistfully, turning her face away from him, and looking on into the twilight, as if far away behind its shadows there was a new life waiting for her.

"So you can," he answered, and he went over to the sofa on which she was sitting, and sat down by her; "so you can, my child," he said, gravely; "if you will you can make my life more than beautiful for me."

"Your life!" she said, with her startled eyes wide open in surprise. "What has that to do with my work?"

"It has everything to do with mine," he answered, gently. "Don't you understand me, Dorothy," and he looked up at the low broad forehead, and into the grave innocent eyes, and felt even then how capable she was of development into all that was great and noble in woman, or of utter shipwreck, if her character were formed by careless hands. "Don't you understand me, dear? I love you, and want you to marry me, my darling, and then we will work on together;" but she rose from her seat, and stood facing him.

"Oh no, no, no!" she said, shrinking away from the hand he stretched out as if to hold her.

Then suddenly there flashed upon her the meaning of it all—of what her day-dreams in the past had been, and for what she was waiting in the future, and sinking down on to the sofa, she put her hands over her face, and burst into tears.

"Dorothy," he said, in a strange pained voice, "what is the matter, dear? Is the idea so dreadful to you, or is it only new and abrupt. Don't you think you will learn to love me a little? You are all the world to me, my child."

"Oh no, no, it is quite impossible!" she said, and then for a moment she thought of what her life might be with that clever matter-of-fact man, with all his notions of work, and want of sympathy with dreams and lazy happiness, and thought too of a letter hidden away in a dress. "Oh no!" she shuddered; "never, never!"

(To be continued.)

THE SEVEN LAST WORDS OF THE LORD JESUS.

BY THE REV. T. M. MORRIS, IPSWICH.

V.—THE WORD OF AGONISED HUMANITY.

"After this, Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, saith, I thirst."
ST. JOHN xix. 28.

WE now come to the fifth word spoken by our Saviour from the cross—which we have designated the word of agonised humanity. "After this"—μετὰ τοῦτο—generally indicates an immediate consequence, but must not be so understood here. The three-hours' darkness and cry of desertion have intervened. It is not unreasonable to suppose that St. John, having received the commission from Christ to take charge of His mother, recorded in vs. 26, 27, did forthwith, at that very time, conduct the mother of Jesus to his own house or lodgings in Jerusalem, so that she was spared the sorrow of seeing her son in the time of His extremest agony; and that the apostle John, having thus provided for Mary, returned to the cross in time to listen to the last words of Christ. That he was present at the very last is placed beyond dispute by v. 35, where St. John is expressly declared to have been an eye-witness of the closing scene.

We have listened to Christ as he cried from the lowest depth of all, "Eli, Eli, lama sabacthani?" which cry appears only to have awakened to fresh activity the spirit of mockery and derision which had been in some measure quelled by the supernatural darkness. That darkness seems to have ceased at the time of, or shortly after, the cry of desertion; the sudden brightening of material Nature being, it is probable, simultaneous with the return of tranquillity to the soul of Christ. It was on hearing that cry that some said, "This man calleth for Elias;" and our Saviour's cry of "I thirst!" must have been heard very shortly after His cry of desertion.

If we compare the narrative of St. John with those of St. Matthew and St. Mark, we shall be able to trace the sequence of events. The cry of desertion is misunderstood, or at once wilfully perverted, by the mockers who were congregated at the foot of the cross. "This man," they say—this would-be Messiah—"calleth, and calleth in vain, for His Elias." At this moment, conscious of thirst, and remembering one unfulfilled word of ancient prophecy (Ps. lxix. 21), that this Scripture also might receive its accomplishment, Christ saith, "I thirst;" upon which one, moved by a spirit of half-scornful compassion, at once hastens to procure the refreshment which the dying Saviour so evidently needs; upon which his associates, as though they would hinder him from doing this act of kindness, mockingly say, "Do not trouble thyself to do this, there is no need for thy interference, let us wait and see whether Elias will come and save him;" upon which the man himself—not desisting, however, from his work—joining in the mockery of his companions, says, while giving Jesus to drink, "Let alone; let us see whether Elias will come to take him down."

We may take this word as expressive of great physical suffering, and present helplessness. The previous cry had reference to the agony of Christ's soul; this speaks to us of the condition of His body. We can form no very distinct idea of physical pain save as we suffer from it, but we may gather from the accounts of those who have suffered and survived, that extreme thirst is one of the most unbearable of physical torments. This state may be induced by a variety of causes, privation of drink, extreme heat, the withdrawal of the fluids of the body in the form of blood or perspiration, severe and protracted suffering. In the case of Christ there was the concurrence of nearly all these causes. For nearly twenty hours He has partaken of no refreshment, which hours have been hours of constant and constantly augmenting agony, agony of mind and body. There was the fearful conflict in Gethsemane, in which He sweat as it were great drops of blood. There was the mental anguish inseparable from His treacherous betrayal by one disciple, the blasphemous repudiation of Himself by another, and the faithlessness and defection of the rest. There was the distress caused by the insults and indignities to which He was exposed during His hurried and informal examinations before Caiaphas, Herod, and Pilate. All this was followed by the cruel scourging of the Roman soldiers, the cross-bearing to Calvary, His attachment to the cross, and His untold and mysterious sufferings upon it. We need not wonder that His tongue cleaves to the roof of His mouth, and that His moisture is turned into the drought of summer. And we should remember in what way extreme thirst affects the body. In a well-known physiological work we read: "We can understand how any unusual abstraction of fluid must produce that disturbance of the general system which is known under the name of raging thirst, a disturbance far more terrible than that of starvation, and for this reason: during abstinence from food, the organism can still live upon its own substance, which furnishes all necessary material, but during abstinence from liquid, the organism has no such source of supply within itself." And by recent experiments it has been shown that the nerves gain an extraordinary increase in their excitability as the proportion of water decreases.

We have reason to believe, then, that our Saviour was at this time enduring one of the most horrible sensations from which humanity can suffer; and when He said "I thirst," He teaches us most convincingly that He was truly a partaker of flesh and blood, that He really shared our nature, becoming subject to all those inconveniences and sinless infirmities which are incident to it. "We have not a High Priest who cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." We have here the cry of agonised humanity. We see here the sinless but suffering Son of Man.

But while clearly recognising the physical sufferings of Christ, there are other things to be kept in view, and, among them, always this—that these, great and extreme as they were, formed the smallest part of His sufferings. As we have already seen, Christ's agony was agony of soul. The torment of this physical thirst was nothing compared with the sufferings endured through those three hours of darkness, when, with a strange sense of desolation, He was thirsting for the light of His Father's countenance which had never, until then, been obscured.

This word is the word of the hero at the close of the battle's strife; while the full tide of battle is surging round him, while the deadly contest remains undetermined, the wounds may bleed, the body may suffer, but in pressing on towards victory there is no thought of them, but in the pause of victory the conqueror has returning consciousness of physical need, and says, "I thirst." So dearly bought has been the triumph, so exhausted is the conqueror by the protracted, but now for-ever-concluded strife, that He needs refreshment in order to shout forth to the joy of heaven and the confusion of hell, the undying word of victory.

In these words "I thirst" we have the only expression of physical suffering which Christ seems ever to have uttered. We read through the Gospels, and we see that Christ's life from first to last was one of suffering and of self-denial, but we can nowhere distinguish the voice of complaint. Everywhere we see simple, meek, patient endurance of whatever was inflicted upon Him. This word reminds us that Christ's silence was not that of insensibility; if He did not complain, it was not because He did not feel.

As we think of these sufferings of Christ we must think of them as voluntarily incurred, voluntarily endured. Who is this that in suffering and apparent helplessness says, "I thirst?" It is He whom angels were longing to minister unto; who, with a few small loaves and fishes, had satisfied the need of famishing thousands; who, only a few hours before, had rebuked the impetuous Peter with the words, "Thinkest thou that I cannot pray to my Father, and He shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?" Never let us forget, as we witness the sufferings of Christ, that they are the sufferings of One who had power to lay down His life, and the power to take it up again. "No man taketh it from me" He saith, "I lay it down of myself." Yes, He who submits to the torment and outrage of crucifixion does so having the full consciousness that He is the King of Kings and the Lord of Lords. That we might be saved, He condescends thus to suffer; and we see Him to whom all honour belongeth, make Himself of no reputation, and stoop to the death of the cross.

But we may fairly take these words as expressing the thirst of Christ's soul for the accomplishment of the work on which He had entered. We see the gleaming forth of that same spirit which so constantly influenced our Saviour during His earthly mission and ministry—that spirit of self-abnegation, which led Him to account everything as unimportant which did not bear upon the work He came to accomplish. Here His thought is of the Scripture to be fulfilled rather than of the thirst to be assuaged. We see every line of life converge upon one point, and the most thorough subordination of all earthly circumstances to the effectuation of the Divine purpose. From eternity had He contemplated this end. After the preparations of ages and generations did He come forth as the Mediator, the Redeemer. From His birth in Bethlehem do we find a continual onward reference to this period of consummation—this sacrifice to be offered once for all. He is thirsting for the salvation of sinners, for the redemption of the world. He is bound to the cross by His great love to the children of men, and, yearning for their deliverance, He cannot come down. To effect the salvation of souls for which He thirsts, He came to live and to die; and knowing beforehand the full bitterness of the cup, He was determined to drain it to the very dregs.

In this simple incident we see that absorption and concentration of spirit of which we have spoken. Christ does not so much complain of thirst that He may obtain something to mitigate His sufferings, for He knows that they will in a few moments have an end, but that the hitherto unfulfilled prophecy may receive its accomplishment. This is rendered perfectly clear by Christ's previous refusal of the wine and myrrh, a medicated draught intended to produce stupefaction, that the sufferer might be less sensible to the intense and dreadful agonies of crucifixion. This opiate which, according to custom, had been offered to Christ, He refused, choosing rather to endure the pain than to die with the faculties of His mind beclouded. Hanging there as a sacrifice for sin, He would not avoid one pang, or leave clinging to the cup one dreg of bitterness. The drink which was accepted by Christ was a mixture of vinegar and water, a beverage in common use among the soldiers of the Roman army.

Christ sets us an example in every respect. What can we conceive as nobler than the conduct of Christ on this occasion? Enduring sufferings of unexampled intensity, we see Him manifest no impatience, we hear Him utter no complaint. Free from all excitement, we see Him possessing His soul in that spirit of patience which He had inculcated on His followers, and to the exercise of which, in their case, He had annexed the promise of such manifold blessings. He here teaches them how "to suffer and be strong."

And we are as much struck by the collectedness of thought as by the composure of temper manifested by Christ at this time. We all know how difficult it is with any degree of purpose to exercise thought when we are suffering physical pain to a comparatively inconsiderable extent. If we look to Christ, we see the endurance of sufferings the most extreme, and yet perfect collectedness of mind. While hanging on the cross, the subject of physical pain to an extent that we can but faintly imagine, and mental agony that we cannot imagine at all, and exposed to distracting influences of many different kinds, Christ could think calmly, consecutively. We see this in the provision He made for His mother; we see this now again in the very article of death, we see Him deliberately contemplating the work in which He is engaged, and not overlooking one of its most minute and apparently unimportant details. Christ seems to have been comparing the life that He had lived and which had now so nearly come to its close with the portraiture of that life in the Old Testament, with all that the prophets had predicted concerning the Son of Man, and, that all might be fulfilled, that this outstanding prophecy might receive its accomplishment, He said, "I thirst." The closing scene of the great tragedy was near, but Christ would wait and taste the vinegar which the soldiers gave Him on a sponge before He would say, "It is finished." Does not this afford us strong assurance as to the completeness of the whole scheme of redemption? All is done, the work is finished, nothing is neglected, nothing is overlooked. We may feel quite sure that the entire scheme of redeeming love has been carried out to the very letter. Christ came to do God's will, to fulfil all that had been spoken concerning Him, and He would not declare that all was finished until the work, down to its minutest particular, was accomplished. Incidentally, then, does this word, which seems the least significant of all those uttered from the cross, afford strong consolation to those "who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us." That work ought to satisfy us, which Christ has declared to be finished, and which God has accepted as complete.

We may safely leave all in the hands of that Saviour, who, when in the very pains of death, "knowing that all things were now accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, said, 'I thirst.'"

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 23. St. Paul's Defence.

Chapter to be read—Acts xxii.

INTRODUCTION. Question as to the circumstances under which St. Paul made this speech: a prisoner in the hands of the Roman centurion, just rescued from an angry mob of Jews, accused of speaking against the law (xxi. 27); allowed to speak in self-defence.

I. The Conversion Narrated. (Read xxii. 1—21.) In what language did he speak, and what was the effect on the people? (ver. 2.) His perfect knowledge of Hebrew would show him to be a Jew and not a foreigner. Now he wants to show that he is a loyal Jew; describes his birth and education; under whom? Gamaliel, well known at Jerusalem, one of the Jewish Council; had once before taken the part of the Christians (ver. 34). He was in all respects, both as regards law and religion, the State and the Church, a good Jew. More than that, was trusted by the high priest and elders — on what errand? (ver. 5.) But what happened on the journey? The story having occupied a previous lesson, only the leading points need be touched on. Who appeared, and in what manner? To whom was he sent for further instruction? Ananias, a man learned in the law, probably well known by report at Jerusalem. Notice his message to Paul. By what name was God called? the name most dear to the Jews. Remind how often called God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; this same God called Paul to be a witness to all men of Christ, called "that Just One," in whom even His enemies could find no fault. Show how all this was a defence to the charge of speaking against Jewish law. Paul, educated as a Jew, instructed by Jewish teacher after the vision, sent by the God of the Jews to testify to His Son, the promised Messiah of the Jews. But was the message received by the Jews? No; so a second vision given to Paul, to leave Jerusalem and go to Gentiles.

II. The effect on the People. (Read 22—30.) Let the teacher try and describe the effect of the word "Gentiles." Till now had been perfect silence; the interesting story had arrested their attention; so far all was consistent with Jewish feelings; even mention of Jesus of Nazareth allowed to pass; but that Gentiles should be preached to, or treated as on equality with Jews, this they could not bear, so the suppressed rage broke out with greater intensity. Picture the scene: the people yelling with excitement; Paul, pale with emotion, not fear, standing guarded by the soldiers; the mob, casting off their outer clothes, throwing dust into the air as a testimony against Paul, the frantic cries, &c. What did the chief captain propose to do? Was it lawful to scourge a Roman, or any one, uncondemned? Where was Paul born? Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, a Roman province; so he was superior to the captain, who bought his citizenship. So he was saved from scourging, and loosed from his bonds, and delivered up by the chief captain to the Jewish Council.

III. Practical Lessons. (1) The duty of self-defence. Show that St. Paul, being wrongly accused, did right to defend himself. Remind of Christ's injunctions not to be anxious as to what they should speak (Matt. x. 19). St. Paul had no time for deliberation, no trained orator to speak for him, but could not have made a better defence. Children not likely to be called upon in this way, still are told to be ready to give an answer when asked a reason for the hope that is in them. (1 Peter iii. 15.) Help them to answer such questions as these:—Why am I a Christian? In whom is my trust? What must I do to be saved? Then apply the subject to their consciences. St. Paul's life agreed with his profession, does ours? He was a consistent Christian, no fault could be brought against his life, and his life was a blessed one accordingly, bringing thousands of souls to Christ. (2) The unselfishness of true religion. Why were the Jews offended this time? Not because he spoke of Jesus, but because he said he was sent to the Gentiles! Yet their own Scriptures full of prophecies about the Gentiles. (See Ps. ii. 8; Is. xlix. 1, &c.) Jews wanted to keep their worship, temple, God, to themselves. Let each ask, What can I do? What am I doing to spread the knowledge of Christ? (3) The benefit of a soft answer. See what St. Paul gained by the right way of putting things. Did not make great fuss, asserting his right as a Roman, but quietly asked whether it was lawful to scourge a Roman. This always best way, even in self-defence preserve self-respect, not attempt to gain rights in a wrong way. For example, a child at school, or servant in a family, wrongly accused: let them not make disturbance, but wait for quiet opportunity of putting themselves right. Will thus gain a hearing, and more likely to obtain redress. In all things remember example of Jesus (1 Peter ii. 22, 23).

Questions to be answered.

1. In what language did St. Paul speak? What effect did it have?
2. What points in the story of his conversion does he dwell most upon?
3. What word gave offence, and why?
4. What is the first lesson we may learn from the story?
5. Show that true religion is unselfish.
6. How should we answer when wrongly accused?

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

It was a glorious summer morning which dawned on the world next day, with every accessory of light and music and colour to make it gorgeous and brilliant, for there was not a cloud on the clear blue sky, and the rosy flush in the East was reflected in the sparkling stream and in every drop of dew that quivered on the grass, while the fresh air was full of melody from the carolling bird voices that sounded through the trees. Mary Trevelyan started awake from happy dreams with a sense of hope and buoyancy, which did not altogether leave her even when the full return of consciousness brought back to her the recollection of Mr. Lisle's critical state. The fact that nurse Parry had allowed her to sleep undisturbed all night convinced her that at least he could not be any worse, and her heart thrilled with the idea that possibly he might even be a little better. Hastily throwing a dressing-gown round her, she went softly across the passage, and glanced through the open door of his room. He was lying on his back, perfectly motionless, and evidently in a deep sleep, while Mrs. Parry, reclining in an easy chair by his bedside, was giving audible testimony to the fact of her being also buried in profound slumber. Mary came back well pleased to her room, and proceeded to dress, hardly able to account to herself for the strange feeling of happiness which seemed to pervade her whole being, and which could not be explained by the simple fact that Mr. Lisle was enjoying some refreshing rest that could not make his case any the less hopeless ultimately. She was standing with all her beautiful dark hair falling round her like a veil, contrasting well in its dusky hue with the white garments which she wore, when suddenly she paused as she was in the act of gathering it up in both her hands, and stood for an instant listening intently, then a light stole into her eyes which filled their thoughtful depths with radiance, her lips parted in the loveliest smile, and her alabaster whiteness gave place to a warm tinge of delicate colour; any one seeing her at that moment would have pronounced her a beautiful woman, though in general her quiet unassuming appearance would not have attracted notice as in any way remarkable; but now it was the glow of sudden joy that had glorified her face, and sent her heart throbbing with unexpected rapture, for she had heard a step in the passage—a step purposely made so noiseless for the sleeper's sake that it was strange it should have met her ear at all—and in an instant all her soul was penetrated with an inexpressible delight, as she murmured softly, "Bertrand is here—I shall see him; I shall hear his voice; now I know why I felt so mysteriously happy!" and she turned with a glad smile to the open window, feeling that the whole world for her was full of light which came not from the morning sun.

Half an hour later, when she left her room and went once more to Mr. Lisle's door, Mary was met by Mrs. Parry who was coming out, her round face beaming with satisfaction, to tell her that the invalid was sleeping still, more tranquilly than he had done for weeks, and the good woman, putting on a very significant smile, drew back so as to let Mary look into the room, and said, "Now, my dear, take a peep in there and see what there is to be seen." Mary went forward a few steps, and then her glance fell upon a picture which lived in her memory for long years afterwards through many a chance and change: Bertrand Lisle stood by the side of his father's couch in all the glory of his youth and strength, looking the very personification of manly beauty with life at its best and brightest animating the stalwart frame, and the fine face glowing with health, while before him on the bed, all white and rigid, lay the dim shadowy figure that seemed already but the ghost of a vanished life, with eyes that no more could see the sunlight, and lips that would never smile again, and mutely pleading hands folded in submission over the breast that faintly rose and fell with slow waves of breath, like the growing calm of the long troubled ocean when the breeze is dying down. The splendour of a summer noon and the cold solemn immobility of a snowclad winter's night could scarce present a greater contrast; and dear as the dying man was to Mary Trevelyan, her heart trembled with thankfulness that while he, alas! represented death and decay, the type of life and hope was that one in all the world in whom her own existence was exclusively bound up. Bertrand turned, and saw her, and the smile that brightened his lips was so surely one of intense pleasure, that she could not mistake its import; he came swiftly towards her, and clasped her hands in his, saying softly, "Little Mary, what joy it is to see you once again, even at this sad time." She raised her deep grey eyes to his face for all response, but he read their eloquent depths, and was well satisfied.

"I thought you would have been taken by surprise, Mary," said Mrs. Parry, in a rather disappointed tone, for she had expected to see Mary's start of astonishment at the unexpected sight of Bertrand; "did you know he was come? did any of the servants tell you?"

"No," said Mary in her soft, low tone; "but I heard his step."

"Did you?" said Bertrand. "I thought I passed your door so quietly that no one could have heard me; and, in any case, how could you recognise my step after all these months; but, to be sure, you were expecting me."

"Yes; but I should have recognised it any way," she answered, quietly; "how glad your dear father will be that you are come."

"I have been with him nearly all the night," said Bertrand, as they walked along the passage together.

"And he has proved a better nurse than any of us, Mary," said Mrs. Parry; "for Mr. Lisle has already slept longer than he has done at all since his illness became serious, and he shows no sign of waking yet. You must have brought him great peace of mind, Bertrand, somehow, to produce such a result."

"Perhaps I did," he answered, glancing at Mary, to see if she had any suspicion of the means by which he had brought calm to his father's anxious spirit; but there was no token of agitation on her guileless face, and she looked up at Bertrand innocently, saying, "He wished to see you so very much; I think the mere sight of you would give him rest and happiness."

"Well, Mary, my child," said Mrs. Parry, "we must take advantage of his unusual tranquillity to have our breakfast, it is quite ready; and when we have finished, I will come and sit by him till he wakes, so that you and Mr. Bertrand may have a little time together; you will have to tell us all about your travels, my dear boy."

"I am afraid they have not been in very savage countries," said Bertrand, laughing, "where I could have any interesting adventures. My life passes in the height of the most refined civilisation."

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"Bertrand gently took her hand."—p. 410.

"Then it may be quite as new to us," said Mary, with a smile, "considering how completely we are out of the world in this retired home."

"Anyhow, I am sure you have plenty to say to each other," said Mrs. Parry; and when the meal was over, she prepared at once to return to her watch by the sick bed.

"But, nurse, will you promise to send and tell me the very moment he wakes?" said Mary, anxiously; "for I long to speak to him, though I would not disturb him for the world; it seems so strange not to have heard his voice since yesterday evening."

"He spoke so much to me in the night that I have no doubt he is very much exhausted," said Bertrand.

"You can trust me to call you so soon as he wakes," said Mrs. Parry; "he will want to see you both I have no doubt," and she bustled from the room with the lappets of her widow's cap flying out behind her, which recalled to Bertrand an absurd recollection of the days when he used them as reins, the good lady herself being his steed, as she carried him about on her back.

"It makes me feel like a boy again to be once more in this dear little home," he said, turning to Mary. "Come out into the grounds with me till my father wakes, and let us explore some of our old haunts."

She agreed, with a bright smile, and together they went out into the glad summer morning with its sunny skies and its scented breeze and its rainbow-tinted flowers. They were young; they loved each other well, and they could not feel altogether sad as they wandered down the shrubbery paths towards the little streamlet, but they spoke with hushed breath, and in gentle reverent tones, because of the shadow of death that hung over the house, and the awful sense of the near approach of the one dread mystery before which the proudest spirit quails, and the most assured hope falters. It was of the dying man they spoke as they strolled along in the gay sunlight, for he was very dear to both of them, and their hearts were filled with that tender pity which the living seem ever constrained to bestow upon the dying, forgetting how soon and how surely they shall themselves succumb to the same mysterious power. Mary told Bertrand how the physicians had assured her that he could not possibly linger many days longer, and that they were indeed surprised he had lived so long.

"I am so thankful I was able to come here in time to see him for every reason," said Bertrand; "but, dearest Mary, though he is my father and only your friend, I think that it really will be sadder for you than for me when he is taken; for my profession necessarily leads me to a life apart from him, and to you it will involve much more than the loss of one you love."

"The loss of home, of protection," murmured Mary; but her voice died away, for she dreaded beyond words that her forlorn condition should in any sense appeal to Bertrand, so long as she was uncertain that Mr. Lisle was right in believing she had won his love.

Bertrand gently took her hand, and was sorely tempted to tell her then and there that all she was about to lose would be given back to her fourfold in his affection; but to talk of love or marriage in that atmosphere of death seemed a desecration, discordant as the clash of wedding bells over a grave, and he only said, "Such a one as you are can never be left lonely or unprotected, Mary, do not fear."

She was silent, and they walked on thoughtfully together, while Bertrand pondered, with some perplexity, over the arrangements which must be made to provide Mary with a home till such a period had elapsed after his father's death as would enable him to marry. The villa was merely rented, and must be given up. Mrs. Parry's private income was too slender to enable her even to support herself, and he knew, though Mary did not, that the very small sum she had inherited from her own father was such as young ladies in her rank of life would consider scarcely sufficient to provide them with clothing. Mr. Lisle had always told his son that he had carefully concealed from his adopted daughter how completely she was dependent on his kindness, and that the truth in this respect would never be known to her till after his death, when it would be no longer possible to hide it; but Bertrand thought it probable that in his tender care for her he might have made some plan whereby a home might be provided for her, at least during the interval that must elapse before Bertrand could offer her one himself; he found, on questioning Mary on the subject, that this was really the case.

"Yes," she said, "he was so good and dear, he did not limit his kindness to his own life, but thought of what was to become of me when I was deprived of his precious care; he has provided me with a shelter, for one year, in the only home he could find for me—with your mother's cousin Mrs. Wyndham. I do not know why my residence there is to be limited to one year; but he told me it was so decided."

Bertrand could easily understand that the reason of this limitation was simply Mr. Lisle's inability to pay Mary's board in advance for more than one year, as, although he had scarcely any personal acquaintance with his relation, and none with her husband, he knew enough of their circumstances to be certain that they were not in a position to receive visitors freely for any great length of time; he knew that Mrs. Wyndham had, late in life, married a widower, who, though an elderly man, was still only a poor curate, and that they lived in a very lonely and inaccessible district of Yorkshire, eking out an exceedingly small stipend by taking pupils; it did not sound a very enlivening prospect for Mary, but it was probably the best arrangement that could be made under the circumstances, and he thought to himself, with a glow of satisfaction at his heart, that he would certainly remove her from hence at the end of the year.

CHAPTER VIII.

"It seems a sensible plan, dear Mary," said Bertrand, after thinking it over, "I have no doubt Mrs. Wyndham will be very kind to you; do you like the idea?"

"Oh, Bertrand, no!" she said, tears welling into her eyes, "I dread it so much; I would not have told your father this on any account, it was so kind of him to think of me at all."

"But why do you dread it, dear?"

"You know Mr. Wyndham had a grown-up daughter when he made his second marriage, and I have heard that she was annoyed at her step-mother coming there, and that she makes the home very unhappy in consequence; she may not like my presence either."

"She must be very difficult to please if she does not like to have you, little gentle Mary; I believe she will love you very much, she will not be able to help it."

Mary shook her head. "I wish so much I could have lived with nurse Parry, but of course I will adhere to your father's plans; his wishes are sacred to me."

"Yes, let them be so always, Mary," said Bertrand, with a significant smile, which sent the blood surging through her heart with sudden agitation.

"But what is nurse Parry going to do?" continued Bertrand; "I cannot consent to lose sight of her."

"Oh, I hope not, indeed; it would break her heart to be altogether separated from either you or me. She does not like this plan of my residing with Mr. Wyndham at Chiverley, but since it must be so, she is going to live for the present with a friend of hers, who is also a widow, and keeps a boarding-house in London."

"That would not have been at all suitable for you, dear child, so I am glad another home has been found for you; and you must shake off your fears, and look at it brightly. I shall take care that you are not made unhappy, for I shall come and see you at least once in the course of the year."

"Oh, will you!" exclaimed Mary, looking up to him with such a light of rapture in her eyes, that he smiled at the full confession of her love for him which they involuntarily made.

"Yes, that I shall; whenever I can get leave. Mrs. Wyndham is my cousin, and I shall assume that she is bound to exercise the duty of hospitality, and I can always bring the Gorgon of a step-daughter some trinkets from Vienna to propitiate her savage nature; so you must take courage, little Mary."

"You shall hear no more complaints," she whispered, while his fingers clasped closer round the little hand he held.

They sat down under a willow-tree that grew on the banks of the stream, and Bertrand began to tell her of his life on the Continent; of the courtly ceremonies he attended, and the brilliant society which surrounded him in the diplomatic circle to which he belonged. She was intensely interested in every detail which concerned him, and the hours flew away on golden wings; high noon had come and passed some time, when, at a pause in the conversation, Mary said, "Surely, it is impossible that your father can be sleeping all this time, and yet nurse Parry promised so faithfully to summon us when he awoke; it almost makes me uneasy to think of such a long slumber. Let us go and see how he is."

"By all means; but quiet sleep can only be beneficial," said Bertrand; "and he has suffered much, has he not, from wakefulness?"

"Oh yes, it has been his great trial; I am truly thankful he is quiet now; I have so longed that he might rest."

Did she know what she was saying? They strolled on together over the sun-lit lawn, and went into the house, where all was perfectly quiet and silent, for the servants' offices were at the back, and Mr. Lisle and nurse Parry were the only occupants of this part of the dwelling. They went on up the stairs, through the passage, and in at the open door of the sick-room. Mrs. Parry's absence was at once accounted for, as she had laid down on a sofa placed at a little distance from the bed, and had, naturally enough, again fallen asleep in the slumbrous heat of noon. Then Bertrand and Mary Trevelyan went and stood by the side of Mr. Lisle's couch. Was it the living father that lay there or a statue carved in monumental marble to represent eternal peace, white and inanimate, with sealed eyes and lips set in a strangely meaning smile, as though some wondrous secret had just been revealed to him? Something there was in his aspect so antagonistic to the glow and warmth of life that a deadly pallor stole over the two bright young faces that looked down on him, and a chill of dread struck to their hearts. Involuntarily Bertrand grasped Mary's hand, and then stooping down, he laid his own reverently on his father's breast; no heaving breath, no throb of life, responded to his touch, but the mysterious inexplicable change which pervaded the whole well-known form, struck home to him instantly with that unmistakable conviction of the presence of death which compels the living invariably to recognise it the very moment they are brought in contact with its mystery. Bertrand turned and looked at Mary without speaking, and, gently drawing her down beside him, they knelt together by the couch in silence.

It was even so, carefully as he had been tended by that poor human love, which is so helpless in the face of death, the old man had gone through the last dread change in solitude, unaided and unwatched, secretly, silently, the long life of hope, and fear, and love, and anguish of thought and error, had floated away into the invisible air on one expiring breath, and now it no longer existed at all, save as a memory, a feature of the past, which soon would vanish, even from the remembrance of those to whom his living presence had been most familiar.

As the sunbeams flickered through the Venetian blinds that shaded the room, and fell in straggling rays upon the kneeling group, and the rigid figure with its folded hands and marble whiteness, it looked as if all were alike cut out in stone—the effigy of one long dead stretched upon a tomb, and the sculptured representatives of those who had lingered a while to pray for him, carved by the cunning of the artist's hand into a vivid imitation of life. But the spell which held them in such perfect immobility was soon dissolved, it was broken by a cry from Mrs. Parry, who, waking up suddenly, had come towards the bed, and in a moment had understood all that had occurred.

"Oh, my dear master! my dear friend! to think that I should have gone to sleep and left him to die all alone! I shall never forgive myself!" she exclaimed; "and you will never forgive me," she added, turning to Mary and Bertrand, "for not having called you."

Her distress and excitement were so great, that they both were obliged to draw their thoughts away from the contemplation of their loss, in order to console her. Bertrand emphatically assured her that he did not blame her, and that his dear father had passed away in sleep, so that it could have made no difference if they had all been present; but Mary's gentle soothing did more for the good woman than all his vehement protestations, for her sympathetic nature told her she should best relieve the sense of remorse for neglect, by reminding her that she had still a duty to accomplish for him whom they mourned, and by begging her to calm herself in order that they might join together in performing the last offices for the dead; even in that sad moment Bertrand could not help admiring Mary Trevelyan's delicate tact, and it had at once the desired effect, Mrs. Parry wiped her eyes, and resumed her composure, while Mary, in a tremulous whisper, asked Bertrand to go into the garden and cut some of the white roses his father had so specially loved, that she might lay them in the form of a cross upon his quiet breast.

A few days passed away—days of glorious summer beauty in the world without, floods of sunshine streaming over wood and field, birds making the whole air musical with ecstasies of song, green grass waving, flowers opening new blossoms to the light, all nature full of gladness and life, and within shaded rooms and voices hushed, falling tears, and footsteps lingering round a silent bier; yet it might be that the truest life was there, in the midst of that atmosphere of death, for the sunshine of the summer days would fade, the birds would cease to sing when came the winter snows, the grass would fall beneath the mower's scythe, the flowers would shrivel and perish in the chilling frosts, but out of the very rigour and soullessness of death there springs the imperishable hope of a life that cannot die, and from the gloom and horror of the grave there rises a light for the righteous, which shall for ever shine in the unfading brightness of the perfect day. This much is certain, that, deeply as those true mourners grieved for their personal loss in him who had been taken from them, there yet seemed to be a strange prophetic sweetness in the peculiar calm that was all around and within them, during the waiting days before he was hidden out of their sight till the morning of the great awakening; for it had befallen them, as it does to most in the actual presence of death, to receive so strong an impression of the utterly ephemeral nature of all those conditions of life which it could terminate so suddenly, that it seemed scarce possible to attach much importance to the vicissitudes of that mortal state, which would seem but as a vanished dream when once they had passed to the eternal existence on which they believed he had already entered.

This is a phase of feeling which all have experienced probably who have seen a familiar friend, that has shared all their daily cares and passing joys, suddenly withdrawn behind the veil; but for a brief time only it reduces the things of sense to their true proportions, and then all the passion and frenzy of earthly hopes and fears rush in again to blind our eyes, and they loom out before us so near and prominent that they seem to drive back all that lies beyond them. Already the hopes and anxieties of their earthly career had returned to beat tumultuously in the hearts of Bertrand and Mary Trevelyan, when they turned away to leave the father and the friend lying peacefully beneath the green turf of the little country churchyard. It had been Mary's special wish that he should be buried at sunset, when the same soft waning light and heavenly stillness was on all the living nature, which had filled him with such serenity when last she sat by his side, and bade him mark how like the golden west was to the gate of paradise. Quietly, as the sun was declining, they walked out hand in hand behind the coffin, borne on the shoulders of poor men to whom he had been kind; Mrs. Parry followed near them. And so they carried him to the rustic graveyard that surrounded the village church, and laid him down by the side of his lost love, with the music of celestial hopes breathing in every one of the solemn holy words with which they lulled him to his rest.

(To be continued.)

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

BY THE REV. W. M. STATHAM.

FASHION.

DEAR me, what a nuisance! The dressmaker is so busy, she sends me word that I cannot have my things home for another week, and here am I with absolutely 'nothing to wear!' How can I go out in these outlandish old fashions!"

Why I declare, Gertrude, you quite upset my gravity. Outlandish did you say? Why, these were in fashion three months ago, and style does change apace if your dresses are old-worldish now! But the fact is fashion changes now as suddenly and startlingly as the weather! By-and by lady travellers will have to secure telegrams to follow their journeyings, so that they may secure new clothes by the time they arrive at the place of their destination. Fashion, always an autocrat, is becoming a tyrant; and instead of complaining, it seems to me that people love to have it so. What do you say, Gertrude, that it encourages trade, and stimulates production, and circulates cash! You should read the "Political Economy of Art," and you would have more distinct and enlightened views on that question. All depends upon the wisdom of the investment, not upon the degree of it. But most seriously, Gertrude, don't you think it must all seem supremely ridiculous in the eyes of the lilies, and the crocuses, and the roses, who keep in the same steady fashion from age to age? We don't complain of old fashion in flowers, and yet we are everlastingly altering our own.

It is not the ladies, you say, it is the gentlemen as well. What with peg-top trousers, and sugar-loaf hats and brimless ditto, and Noah's ark great-coats, and all the infinite inventions in new ties, men are as obedient to the great fashion-god as women. Oh yes, Gertrude, I quite admit all that! Pray do not think that I wish for a moment to load your sex with all the huge weight of this folly. Far from it. There are tailors' fashion-books for men as well as Parisian toilet ones for ladies; and I know quite well that there are lovers of fashion beneath hat-roofs as well as beneath bonnet-roofs. Nor do I complain of variety; the ever-same is wearisome, and human nature loves novelty. Perhaps, though, I must exclude more than half the human race from this remark, for the Chinese and the Hindoos seem to have settled the dress question en permanence, but I freely admit that the European nations show vitality in all these matters; and in this, perhaps, as in other respects, "better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay." All I intend to criticise, is the variety when it becomes a disease! Now I have been intensely amused to-day by a new style on the lady side of this fashion question—a style which I am told next season is to develope itself in a remarkable manner. I have just seen a head with no bonnet, no bunch of ribbon even on it, but an immense chignon, and a bonnet on that—a clever swordsman could have cut off the whole lot without touching the head at all—and I am seriously told that next season that is to be the style. In all seriousness it seems to me that ladies might as well have a bonnet affixed to the middle of their backs! I always thought that elegance in dress was associated with some element of use to be beauty at all. At least that is my humble opinion. I remember a sermon of the golden-mouthed Chrysostom's, in which he pleads with the ladies to take off their delicate high-heeled boots, and to hang them round their necks. A very admirable suggestion; as, if it may not minister to ornament, it helps to avoid accidents. It is startling, however, to find that so many many centuries ago these same evils were unsuccessfully fought against, and it rather tends to make one feel how helpless we all are in the presence of this old idol. Bel bows down and Nebo stoops, but the old goddess Fashion is as erect and supreme as ever. You will remember, Gertrude, that when the Germans hemmed in Paris, the fashions were sent to England and elsewhere in balloons. One empress had gone, but the older empress Fashion reigned on, through bombardment and war! Well, after all, you say, I am obliged to admit that there is use in variety, and that stagnant dress would be as unlively as stagnant laws. Unquestionably I admit all this; but laws ought always to embody justice, righteousness, and truth, and fashion ought always to embody use, adaptation, and elegance.

My complaint just now is that fashions are becoming supremely ridiculous, and are simply "new fashions," and nothing more. How many ankles have been put out, and how many accidents have occurred, through the absurdity of small-heeled high-heeled ladies' boots it is not necessary to suggest. And how many have suffered agonies of "tic," through bonnets that are not bonnets, I leave sufferers themselves to discuss. But the great question is this—Have we none of us pluck enough to stand out against any absurd fashion? Are these influences as inevitable as the measles? Must we "have them," at any cost whatever, simply because they are fashions. I can quite imagine some "grim ogre," at the head of the fashion-world, deciding to put her followers through agonies worse than oakum-picking or treadmill-grinding, and I positively believe that the victims would follow on. What ridiculosities the world has seen! "Let plaister appear!" says the goddess Fashion, and forthwith our great-great-grandmothers dotted their faces all over with bits of black plaister, as though they had all cut themselves in shaving. "Let us limp!" says the goddess, and forthwith young ladies set themselves to walk genteelly lame! "Let us twist!" says the goddess, and forthwith the Grecian bend appears. What next may come one knows not; but if the goddess takes to walking on her hands and knees, fashionable knee-caps will surely make their appearance. We are all commanded by the goddess to write on long day-book letter-paper now, and forthwith we do it! Is it because human beings have so little in themselves to command attention, that they fly to these resources to proclaim their existence? Surely the quiet dignity of self-respect should lead us all, Gertrude, to be masters of fashion, as we are masters of ourselves! If fashion decided that it was right to lose our tempers, probably we should think fashion a fool. But are we not to be masters of the tabernacle as well as the tenant? Why should fashion dictate how I am to build my house? Neither ought fashion to be allowed to dictate how I am to plant my garden. Much more, then, ought the vestiture of the body to be decided by taste and judgment! For my own part, Gertrude, I do not hesitate to say I think variety would be charming in this as in all else. I am not an admirer of sheep when they all run through a gap in the hedge. And humanity is never presented to me in so "sheepy" a way as when ladies and gentlemen press each other's heels to run through the gap of some new fashion. Yes! men are as foolish in this as women. "Let there be heavy watch-guards!" says Fashion, and forthwith men load themselves with golden anchor-chains. We can all do much, Gertrude, to preserve a dignity of personal taste and self-respect; but that woman deserves a monument who would venture to a morning concert or a morning call in a bonnet that really kept the rain off, and kept the head warm. It is easier to fight a battle with most of the powers that be than with fashion, and it is probably true that because the valiant have gone to the very opposite extreme, and opposed new fashions by old fashions, that so few have taken the moderate course of harmonising taste with use and variety, without slavery to novelty.

Well, all my criticisms will be thrown away, you think; the shield of Fashion was never dinted yet by the arrows of satire, and never will! Perhaps not, Gertrude, but let me whisper this into your ear—the most perfect fashions are not always winsome attractions to the best men, nor are they the necessary associates of the happiest homes.

Simplicity, after all, wins the day; and as ladies exceedingly dislike their servants to imitate them, let them remember that the inimitable is not stylish decoration, but tasteful apparel. Moreover, let it be well remembered that there is inter-action in these respects; and the very raiment we wear affects in some degree the mind. It would be quite impossible (to put an extreme case) for a gentleman to dress like a clown without feeling like a clown; and the outward man affects the inward man. An untidy habit creates an untidy mind; and grotesqueness of dress produces to some extent grotesqueness of character.

Would I have you dress always in the "same style," like the Quakers do, then, you ask. Extremes again, Gertrude. I am quite willing to admit that the simplicity of a true Quaker girl's dress is often very beautiful to my mind, but I am pleading for no such sort of uniformity. But this I do say—use should decide a great deal. Boots should help us to walk, not hinder us; bonnets should protect and shade, and not float out at the back of the human being like a ship's flag; strings should be made to tie, or else be consigned to some more available department of dress. Fashion is often a kind of death-warrant in the winter; and if the newspapers told the plain truth, they would contain many notices of "Died of ribbon-bonnets, or of thin boots." Taste in dress is never to be derided. God clothes Nature in beautiful but appropriate garments, and warmth and protection are most admirably studied in all the clothing of the feathered tribes, and of the cattle on a thousand hills. I am not protesting against adornment, but against bad taste and waste. Yes; I repeat the latter. How many incur debt not because their garments are old, moth-eaten, and worn, but simply because they are out of fashion! Many a miserable tragedy at home has occurred because Fashion has demanded unworthy submission to her imperious demands. Let dress be as good as you please, and as tasteful as you please, but there is no need to instal Fashion as a goddess in the mythology of modern life.

This "Private and Confidential," Gertrude, can be read with this convenience—that it is addressed through you to many who need only to be a little easier to be a great deal happier. Independence of mind, in this as well as in many other matters, needs for its exercise heroism of heart.

A GRAIN OF SEED.

ON a bright sunny morning in early Spring, a party of children passed along the dusty road leading from Sunday-school to church.

"What are you stopping for, Ada?" asked one of the elder girls. "Come on quickly, or we shall be late."

"I am searching for a seed, Laura," replied the child, as she drew from between the pages of her Bible an illuminated text.

"What do you mean?"

"My teacher was telling us about the sower; she said the seed was the Word of God, so this ticket must be one grain. I am going to try if it will grow, and what kind of fruit it will bear." And as she spoke, little Ada threw down the card on the edge of the path.

Her companions laughed.

"It is useless to sow by the wayside, Ada, the ground is too hard."

"Ah! I never thought of that; but, if God likes, He can make it grow anywhere."

By this time the bell had ceased tolling, and the children hastened to take their places in church. On the way home Ada looked in vain for the ticket, and turning to her sister with a disappointed face, exclaimed, "You were right, Laura. I am afraid a bird must have carried away the seed. My teacher said something about that too, and yet I asked God to make it take root and grow."

"You do not understand rightly, Ada; texts don't actually take root in the ground, like common seed. It is likely your ticket was blown away, or some passer-by picked it up. Come home; you will never find it now."

While this party of happy children passed through the pleasant sunshine to their kind friends and comfortable homes, a far different scene was to be found at no great distance, where, in a miserable lodging near the end of the village, a boy, pale and worn, lay on a wretched bed, moaning in uneasy sleep. Several little children, too hungry to play, roamed restlessly about the bare room, whilst a sad-looking woman strove in vain to hush their cries and entreaties for a bit of bread.

"Father's not home yet," was all she could answer, "and I'm afraid when he comes it's little money he'll have left for us. I sent Effie out to try if any of the neighbours would lend us a loaf."

Some time passed away, the church bell had stopped ringing, and the children were growing more and more hungry, when a little girl pushed open the door.

"Mother," she said, eagerly, "kind Mrs. Black gave me some bread, and a cup of milk to warm for poor Johnny. I went to her house, and on the way home found this pretty thing," and Effie held up in triumph the very Sunday-school ticket which Ada had let fall on the pathway a short time before. The little ones gathered round to see the treasure, and could not sufficiently admire the bright border of coloured flowers.

"But what's in the middle, Effie?" asked a little brother.

"I am sure I don't know," she answered, "but it looks like letters; we'll ask mother."

The poor woman was busy dividing the bread into small portions, so that each of the family might have a share, and as soon as all were quieted, if not satisfied, she glanced at the card.

"Yes, indeed, they are letters," she said, "and there was a time I could have spelled them out, but with all the sorrow and hardship I have gone through since, any little knowledge I ever had has left my mind. Johnny could read them for you may-be when he awakes; he got some learning once, and a fine scholar he'd have made if he'd been long enough at it. I'm thinking he'll never do much in this world now."

"Why, mother?"

"Because he'll not be any time in it."

"Where is he going?"

"To Heaven, I hope, but we don't know much about that, for God doesn't care what becomes of us, or He wouldn't leave us to starve while your father's away drinking and poor Johnny dying."

Then followed a long silence, during which the mother hid her head in her hands, and sobbed bitterly. At length Effie ventured to ask her to pin up the little card against the wall, "just where Johnny could see it when he awoke." Then all was quiet, for the younger children, having stared to their heart's content at the pretty picture, went out to wander about in the sunshine, and wonder why things always looked so dark within their home, and why they were so hungry and ragged, while all the little girls and boys they met coming from church looked pleased and smiling, and were neatly and comfortably clothed.

"Mother says God doesn't care for us," remarked the eldest; "I suppose He loves other childen, and that's what makes the difference."

Meantime, Johnny awoke from his feverish sleep, and, looking round, was not long in observing the little card, which hung near the foot of his bed, for, like most sick people, he was familiar with every minute speck or spot within sight, and had so often counted them over that he could have noted the smallest change, either in number or position. The wreaths of bright red roses, blue forget-me-nots, and green leaves, which formed the border of the ticket —though not, perhaps, very true to Nature—pleased his weary eyes, accustomed to dingy walls, varied only by marks of smoke or damp.

Effie watched his awaking with much interest, and, while his mother hastened to warm the milk which her kind neighbour had sent, the sick boy, turning languidly to his sister, and, pointing with his thin finger, said, "What is that pretty thing, and where did it come from?"

"It is mine!" said Effie, proudly; "I found it on the roadside. What's written on it, Johnny? can you make it out?"

"Yes, yes!" he replied, with a new interest in his voice; "to be sure I can," and, spelling the letters one by one, with some difficulty he read the three simple words in the midst of the gay border of flowers—"God is Love."

"Why, those are strange words, Johnny," remarked his mother, as she handed him the milk and a piece of bread she had reserved. "He never showed us much of His love, or we wouldn't be in this state now!"

"It's true though, mother, for I heard those very words read out of the Bible when I was at school, long ago, but it's little I've thought of them since."

"He may love some people, but not us."

"No, no, mother! I can tell you a verse about that too: 'God so loved the world'—that's every one, you know—'that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.'"

"If He loved you, Johnny, would He leave you so long ill?" asked Effie.

"May-be He's going to take me away to Himself. Wasn't it love made Him send that card to comfort me before I go? For no one gave it to you; you found it on the roadside; so it must have come from God. And, mother, He loves you too, if you'd only believe it."

Tired with the exertion of speaking, the poor boy lay back exhausted, but his eyes were still fixed on the precious ticket. The sun was sinking behind the hills when he next spoke. From his lowly bed he could not see

> "Those hues which mark the sun's decline,
> So soft, so radiant;"

but as his sun of life was fast sinking too, he could gaze, by the light of that illuminated text—

> "Through golden vistas into Heaven."

God's love! Yes, that was the key-note to all his new-found happiness. His mother, Effie, and the children crowded round the bed, for they knew that a change had come, and in the midst of the solemn silence another figure entered softly, and leaned also over the dying boy. One glance was enough—"He is going; oh, I little thought it would be so soon!" and a pang of sorrow and remorse shot through the strong man's heart. "If he'd only stay a little longer I'd be better to him; but God's angry; he won't hear me."

"Father," said Johnny, pointing to the ticket, "God is love. He loves you, and He's taking me that you may love Him. Mother, Effie, and all, you'll believe, and come too." His voice grew so faint he could hardly finish the sentence, and these were Johnny's last words on earth.

Time passed by. The little ticket still kept its place on the wall, and often when the father was tempted by his old habits, a glance at it helped him to resist. The mother, too, could now see the love of God, and no longer murmured at her lot. Many an almost forgotten comfort found its way to the once wretched room. Effie and her brothers and sisters attended Sunday-school with the other village children, neat and tidy, happy and joyous, like the rest.

The grain of seed which little Ada had sown in faith had indeed sprung up, taken root, and brought forth good fruit. S. T. A. R.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

163. Our Saviour bade His disciples "shake off the dust of their feet" against those cities who refused to receive them—where did they do this?

164. Who was the captain of the guard appointed to look after Jeremiah, and remove him from prison?

165. What prophet, in the New Testament, foretells a famine, which afterwards occurred in the days of Claudius Cæsar?

166. How were the Ephraimites, on one occasion, known from the people of the other tribes?

167. What passage is there which states that the men of Issachar were well-read and very learned?

168. What prophecy do we find concerning the blindness of Zedekiah, king of Judah?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 384.

147. Pride (Isa. xvi. 6).

148. Because he believed not the words of the angel who told him of the birth of his son (Luke i. 20).

149. "Forty-two thousand three hundred and three score" (Ezra ii. 64).

150. "But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek" (Gal. ii. 3).

151. "In the multitude of words there wanteth not sin, but he that refraineth his lips is wise" (Prov. x. 19).

152. "That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof in the Day of Judgment" (Matt. xii. 36).

153. St. James and St. John (Luke ix. 54).

154. Elias. "And Elijah said, If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And there came down fire from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty" (2 Kings i. 10—12).

WAITING.

TO watch and wait—alas!
Wearily, heavily pass
The lonely days.

Far better work and wait,
And strive with adverse fate
While Hope delays.

499

"Poor child of grief and pain!
Unfold thy hands again
Unstrain thine eyes;
Arouse the slumbering wheel;
Unwind the cumbered reel;
Arise! arise!

"Thy loved to war are gone,
Yet art thou not alone,
For God is here.
If orphaned, still above
Thy Father looks with love
Upon thy fear."

The solitary maid
That inward voice obeyed,
And knelt to pray;
Then spun the lonely hours,
While tears, like dew on flowers,
Had silent way.

She waits in work and prayer.
What echoes through the air?
The drum! the drum!
She starts—she looks afar—
Back from the cruel war,
They come! they come!

ANNE BEALE.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XI.—DOROTHY ASKS A RIDDLE.

THE two years were over, the early summer had come, and Adrian Fuller was due in England, and Dorothy Woodward was waiting for him. She was not impatient; the dream-castle she had been building all these months was so pleasant to behold that she hardly dared to enter it now that its door was almost creaking on its hinges. She wished, sometimes, that she knew precisely when he was coming; she should like to meet him under the sycamore-tree, she thought; to be sitting reading there with the boys and Sally about, and her father and mother in the study; to hear a step, and look up and see him and greet him quietly and composedly as if his absence had been all a delusion, and in reality he had only left them yesterday. "How we have altered in these two years," she thought, looking at her brothers and Sally, "and I most of all, especially lately." George Blakesley's talk in the firelight had been a sort of revelation to her which she understood well enough now. She was getting more thoughtful, too, and fonder than ever of reading and day-dreaming, and climbed great heights, and journeyed into far countries in imagination, as many of us do, for we should achieve mighty things and be great travellers, indeed, if we could tack our hands and feet on to our fancies.

"Dolly," said Tom, one morning, "I shall get away from the office at three to-day. If you like to meet me I'll take you for a long pull upon the river." Tom had fifty pounds a-year now, had enjoyed that magnificent income for the last three months, and out of it kept a boat, and had invested in a tent, and occasionally camped out.

"Netta is coming to spend the day. She says it's so dull now that grandpapa is ill, and she cannot have visitors."

"Well, you don't want to see her."

"No, I would rather come with you."

"What have you done to scare away your valiant knight of the sickly visage?" asked the Beauty that same day, while Dorothy was preparing to go forth and meet her brother.

"Nothing," she answered, guiltily.

"But he never comes now; and he used to be so wonderfully sweet. I thought he was number two on your list of slain."

"I don't know what you mean," said Dorothy, colouring up.

"Don't you, really?" she laughed. "Take my advice, dear," she went on, "and get married as soon as you can, and as well as you can; I shall. We have no money and no position. I am sure I don't know what would become of me if grandpapa died, unless he left me some money."

"I wouldn't have any one for the sake of money," said her sister. "One ought to be in love in order to get married."

"Nonsense. Love is all very well to dream about, but, we have to live the best part of our lives wide awake. If you can catch your recreant knight take my advice and do; if Sir George Finch proposes I shall have him, and I'm sure I am not in love."

"I think it's wicked," said Dolly to herself, an hour later, as Tom pulled away at the oars; "and I am very glad that Mr. Fuller is poor." In thought she always bound up their two lives together. "Tom," she asked, shyly, "do you know why Mr. Blakesley has not been lately?" for though meeting had been awkward, he had not altogether ceased his visits after her refusal.

"No," he answered; "but he seems to have cut Hampstead. Don't know why, I am sure, unless it's because he's getting to be a swell. I have not seen him for ages. Fact is," he added, carelessly, "he thought proper to say that in his opinion I'd no business to keep a boat, but should keep myself, or help my father, or some bosh; just as if the governor couldn't afford to give us all a home. So I told him I meant to spend what I got on myself."

"Tom, that's selfish."

"Don't be a stupid, Doll, it's nothing of the sort; every fellow does it. He said the governor's paper, too, was doing badly, but that's all nonsense."

"Tom, do you think people ought to work?"

"Men ought, of course," and he loosened his collar a little more (for the June sun was warm) with a consequential air which showed he was speaking of himself among others. "Idleness is a disgrace; I told that young snob Barker so only yesterday. He was grumbling because he couldn't get into anything, and that his father had not been able to bring him up to a profession, and said that it was his misfortune that he had been born the son of a gentleman, and so could not go behind a counter. So I said yes, it is a misfortune, but why don't you sweep a crossing, that doesn't want much talent, and brooms are cheap; that showed him what I thought of his upstart speech."

"Yes, you were quite right, Tom," she answered, admiringly, watching the ripples on the water. "There is no disgrace in work of any kind."

"Of course there isn't," he said.

Then poor Dorothy sat, and wondered what was the use of working to spend the money on one's own pleasure when, too, one could be just as happy—as she could for instance, with her books and trees—without spending anything at all; it was no use to work to pay for pleasure which could be obtained in another form, and as pleasant a one, for nothing.

"I don't understand it a bit," she sighed, and then she said aloud, "Tom, I wonder what we live for?"

"To eat, drink, sleep, wear out our clothes, and hang about; and we die to fill coffins."

"But what is the good of that?"

"Don't know, I'm sure. You had better write and ask Blakesley."

CHAPTER XII.—THE FATE OF THE ROSE.

"I AM so tired," thought Dolly, wearily, as she toiled along by the heath. She had left Tom behind to put up his boat, and had come home alone. There was a little aching in her heart, as if she had been seeking for something and failed to find it—perhaps it was only that she was waiting for Mr. Fuller. She used to think it would be all right when he came. It was such a lovely evening, and the cloud mountains were clearly defined in the sky. She watched them for a minute or two, and, in fancy, climbed them over and over, and up and up, and into heaven.

"I wonder if it is such a very lovely place," she thought, abstractedly, not feeling much interest in the matter, she had no occasion to do so for many a long year yet, not till she was old, and had tired of the beautiful earth. She came in sight of her home at last. It was a dear old house, she thought—a dirty-white coloured house, with straggling creepers twining over it, and a careless happy look about the open windows as the lace curtains swayed gently to and fro in the evening breeze. "I wonder if Netta is there still," she said to herself as she entered. There was an odd look on Jane's face as she opened the door, but Dorothy did not notice it, and went straight through into the study. No one was there, and she looked out of the window, as, long ago, Netta had looked out and watched her brothers and sisters burying Venus. She started, with a cry that was almost pain. Will and Sally were together, reading, in the summer-house, and going towards them, as if to speak, were Mr. and Mrs. Woodward; and under the sycamore-tree was Netta—Netta, with the last rays of the setting sun glinting through the leaves above to light up her golden hair; with a flowing robe of white about her, and a rose in her bosom, a wonderfully lovely dress it seemed to her sister, though it was merely a simple muslin one—and she was looking up at some one who was watching her face, and seemed to be lost in admiration of it, and that some one was Adrian Fuller. She stood staring at them for a moment, then went out to seek the domestic.

"When did Mr. Fuller arrive?" she asked.

"This afternoon, Miss Dorothy; just a little while before your papa came home. Master Will and Miss Sally were at school, and your mamma was up-stairs. He walked straight in when I opened the door, and into the study, and looked out at Miss Netta, who was reading under the sycamore-tree, and then he went right away to her. I believe he expected it was you, miss."

She went slowly back to the study, and sat down in the twilight, without making any effort to meet her old friend. Netta had done that in the very place and manner in which, in her day-dreams, she had hoped she should meet him on his return, and since that was so, he should enter the house now before he saw her, just as two years before he had entered it to meet the Beauty. So she sat and waited, her heart beating, and her pulse throbbing beneath her self-imposed penance; but it was so long before they came, and she could hear their voices in the garden, and imagine how happy they were without her, and how he was talking to Netta while the stars came out. It was too bad; they might have guessed that she was home, and have come to see. But no, they were quite content, and so at last, unable to bear it longer, she rose, and, going into the sitting-room, which was next to the study, opened the piano and began to play. Then, directly she had touched the notes she was afraid of the sound they made, and ashamed of her own foolishness, and yet more ashamed now to go into the garden and tell them how long she had been in the house. Then they, hearing perhaps the sound of the piano through the open windows, came in, and Dorothy rose, and stood in the middle of the room, while Netta entered, with a white shawl twisted round her slender shoulders, and Adrian Fuller by her side. He started forward in a moment.

"Dolly!" he exclaimed, forgetting the more dignified name by which he had said he should call her. "Well, I declare, here is my little Dolly at last; and grown into a woman, too, as I feared she would!"

She was so happy.

"But I am just the same," she said; "I don't feel a bit different;" yet while she spoke the song came ringing in her ears—

> "The same, the same, yet not the same,
> Oh never, never more."

"And I am so glad you have come home, Mr. Fuller," —and she raised her eyes to his just as the Dolly of old would have done—"I have missed you so."

"That's a nice confession for a young lady to make," laughed Netta. Her voice made Dorothy start and colour, and brought her back with a bound from her old self to her new one.

"I did not mean——" she began.

"Never mind what you meant," he said. "I am very glad to see you again. We shall resume our old footing now, eh?"

"And what is to become of your faithful knight of the house of Blakesley?" asked Netta, almost mockingly. "My little sister is a sad coquette," and she looked up innocently at the returned hero. He was so very handsome, that she did not relish resigning him into the hands of her sister, especially as all that afternoon he had seemed lost in admiration of her lovely self. Poor Dolly, Netta seemed like a female Mephistopheles that evening.

"You know I have not seen him for months," Dorothy retorted, and she turned her brown eyes upon her sister with a flash.

"Haven't you, dear," answered the Beauty, and going to the piano she ran her fingers over the keys. "I think I shall come home and practise two or three times a week," she said; "grandpapa does not like the sound of a piano now that he is ill."

"Why don't you sing something, Netta dear?" Mrs. Woodward said, eager to show off her daughter —she was so proud of her.

"No," she said, hesitatingly, looking across at Adrian Fuller and Dorothy talking together in the window-seat. What could they have to say to each other? she wondered. It so annoyed her to see any one else getting attention which she considered she had a right to monopolise. He had heard Mrs. Woodward's request, however, and came towards her.

"Oh, do sing Miss Woodward!" he said, and so she suffered herself to be persuaded, and sat down, and sang "Jock o' Hazeldean" as hardly any one, perhaps, but Netta Woodward could sing it, for she had a voice such as but few women possess—wonderfully sweet and sympathetic, and so carefully modulated, it thrilled and enchained her listeners.

Adrian Fuller went to her side, and hung upon her tones, and forgot poor Dorothy altogether.

"Oh, do go on!" he said, entreatingly, when she stopped; and so she began again, and sang song after song to them as they sat listening in the twilight, till, almost unnoticed, the night had come, and the brougham was at the door to take the Beauty back to her grandfather's.

"One more," pleaded Adrian Fuller, but she rose from the piano with a laugh.

"No, I have finished. Dolly!" she called, looking towards the corner where her sister was crouching in the dark, forgetting the singer in her delight at the music. "Come and sing something, dear." Netta was always very affectionate to her sister before people.

"I!" said Dorothy, in surprise. "Why, you know I can't."

"Yes you can," she answered, sweetly; "come and try."

"But you know I can't," she said, in amazement.

"Of course she does," said Tom, who would not learn to be polite, "that's why she asks you."

"How can you be such a bear, Tom?" laughed Netta, unruffled as ever, wrapping her delicate shawl around her, and as she passed him she stroked Tom's hair with her fingers, and subdued him. "Why didn't you get yourself up?" she whispered, as she passed Dorothy "you had plenty of time, and I never saw you look such a guy."

"I never even thought of such a thing," she answered.

"You won't forget your promise," Adrian Fuller said, as she gave him her hand to say good-bye.

"Was it a promise?" she said. "I did not know that, but I never break one. Mr. Fuller wants me to sit to him Dorothy, dear, and mamma does not object. Do you know he was foolish enough to draw my face from memory, he says; he saw me, you know, the evening he left, when in my vanity I came to show myself."

"I lost the book, unfortunately, the next day—a pocket sketch-book I carried about with me," he said.

"Why, that was the book in which you put Dolly's rose," said Tom; "did you lose that too?"

"No," he answered, "I took care of that," and so the Beauty was not altogether triumphant, and as she drove away she saw that Adrian Fuller, with the privilege of an old friend, had drawn Dorothy's hand through his arm.

(To be continued.)

THE TRIPLETS OF THE BIBLE.

BY THE REV. J. HILES HITCHENS, AUTHOR OF "THE FURNACE," "THE FACE OF THE KING," ETC.

IV.—THE THREE CROSSES.

They crucified him, and two others with him, on either side one, and Jesus in the midst."—JOHN xix. 18.

OF all the places of special interest on earth none has such potent attractions as Calvary. Hallowed associations cluster around that consecrated height, and solemn voices ever reiterate spiritual lessons. As on the ever-memorable morning of the crucifixion, so now, immense and motley crowds ascend that hill. But they visit it only in imagination; for all reliable data as to the actual site of that hill are wanting. The infidel bends his steps thither, but only with averted eye, curled lip, and jesting words, to heap opprobrium on One who died there. The artist ever and anon scales the mountain-side, but it is simply to pencil on canvas the expiring moments of the Man of Sorrows. The far-reaching poet becomes a pilgrim to Golgotha, that the "lyre of thought" may be "thrilled with magic," each pensive chord vibrating at once in poetry and praise. Scores, like the vacillating Pilate and the uncertain centurion, resort to the theatre of the last sacrifice almost persuaded to surrender to the claims of the Great Victim. Hundreds, like the impious priests, inhuman soldiers, and shouting populace, gaze on the dying God-man with the most sinful and soul-destroying feelings. But, thank God! the pupils and partisans of the man called "Jesus" often visit that well-known and eventful spot, whilst some, in thought and affection, bivouac and abide there. They find it lofty vantage ground, from which their souls obtain clear and comprehensive views of divine truth. For ever Calvary will be a memorable spot to mortals; and to the sainted, bright-robed host, it will remain what it is, the best loved of all earth's elevations.

Why the hill is so famous we all well know—because of that long-anticipated day when three crosses were erected there, bearing three sufferers. Not, however, so much because of two of those crosses. The crucifixion of the two malefactors was not enough to render that spot so memorable. Many other evil-doers were crucified, but the places where they died are unmarked, and the particulars of their deaths unrecorded. The crucifixion of these two thieves is only famous because of their association with Jesus, "in the midst." The attractions of Calvary are derived from Christ. The central cross has made the other crosses famous. Artists, historians, poets, and theologians, conduct humanity to Calvary because Jesus died there. Good, devout, faithful men and women love to linger there in silent, sweet, and sacred musing, because He, whom they love before all others, expired there for them. They sing or say, "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

In our visit to the sacred mount at this time we will repair to the central cross—to "Jesus in the midst"—that in all things He may have the pre-eminence.

This central cross reminds us of the stupendous strength of divine love.

We have often deciphered the goodness of the Almighty in the volume of creation which lies ever open before us; but the immeasurable extent of His grace, the unlimited yearnings of His affection for guilty man, the summer sunbeam cannot pencil, the placid rivulet cannot lisp, the soft zephyr cannot whisper, nor any spot in Nature, however profuse in beauty and melody, reveal. God does not point to the beauties and bounties of creation when He commendeth His love toward us. He directs attention to the sacrifice of Calvary, and says, "Herein is love!" Apostles and prophets do the same. Whilst we do well to follow natural philosophers in their varied excursions into the realms of creation, whilst we are strengthened in our convictions by a study of the discoveries of science or the portrayals of art, let us never forget that, independently of all human discoveries and abstract reasonings, God is love, and that the crowning and completest evidence of that love is presented in the truth which tuned the harps of Judah even in the wilderness, and which caused the Roman empire to ring with songs of joy, even when the singers knew the penalty of death awaited them. Yes, it is in the work of redemption that all the outgushings of infinite love concentrate. It is in the cross of Christ all the other attributes of the Divine nature are eclipsed. Opulent as is the Maker and Proprietor of all things, He exhausted His treasury, and could render no more expressive assurance of His affection than He presented in His "unspeakable gift." That is an infinite demonstration—infinitely capacious, infinitely durable, infinitely strong, infinitely sure, and infinitely precious. The strains of intercession Jesus presented for His murderers, the accents of sympathy He breathed to Mary, the cry of agony He poured forth to His Father, the revilings He endured, the promise of Paradise he gave, the tears and blood He shed, were the mighty manifestoes of the love of Deity—evidences that our Father's heart pulsates with the firmest, fondest, fullest affection for the sinful creatures of earth. Something of the length, breadth, depth, and height of the love of God, which passeth knowledge, may be learned from the central cross. Dear reader, let us see to it that this love cements us to the cross. Let us gladly yield to its magnetic power! None ever suffered for us, presented to us, or accomplished in us, what Jesus has! Not one in the wide universe can be found so deserving of our confidence and love! With unwavering zeal we should aim to live so that all our thoughts and feelings, and desires, and deeds, may converge toward Immanuel as the glorious centre! Not till the angelic intelligences weary of looking into the sufferings and glory of Christ, not till the harps of the celestial choir cease the sweet strains of the new song, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!" let us cease to dwell in thought upon, and speak with unfaltering tones of the glory and greatness of redeeming love!

This central cross reminds us also of the only divinely appointed way of salvation—faith in the crucified one. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up: that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have eternal life." By the efficacy of Christ's blood we have pardon and peace. In the study of His example we find stimulus to holiness. From the recollection of His mediation we gather strength. We find life, and we retain it, by clinging to the cross of Jesus. Our souls throb with vitality only whilst looking unto Jesus, and living on His inexhaustible fulness. What the orb of day is to the goldening sunbeam, what the balmy atmosphere is to your lungs, what the ethereal light is to your eyes, what the full fountain is to the limpid stream, that Jesus is to the believer's soul. Man, regenerated man, is dependent. As the clematis clings to the post of your garden-bower, or as the convolvulus twines around the sturdy tree, so man's soul must lean upon, cling to, expand, blossom, and bear fruit, by the cross of Jesus. Here or nowhere have we spiritual life! Whatever can elevate the affections of the heart, develop the faculties of the mind, satisfy the longings of the soul, and ornament the features of the character, is unfolded here! Everything the Infinite could bestow, more than the finite can embrace, and enough to engage all heads, hearts, and tongues through time and eternity, is unveiled here. The culmination of the beautiful, the summit of the sublime, the acme of all that is affecting, the climax of all that is mysterious, is visible here. Here, then, by the cross of Jesus we sinners are permitted to stand—permitted to fix our gaze on the great Saviour, and feast our famishing heart on His rich bounties. Here rebels can fraternise with the Eternal King. Here the creature and the Creator can enjoy the closest communion. Here the most abject child of dust can hold intercourse with the Infinite Father of Spirits. Here, then, beneath the shadow of this central cross, let our hearts nestle, for here the world is crucified unto us, and we are crucified to the world.

Looking at this central cross we may learn submission to the will of God.—The servant is not greater than his Lord. The pious Herbert has beautifully said, the cross is "the decreed burden of each mortal saint." No pilgrim heavenward should expect exemption from this uniform condition. There is a cross appointed and prepared for each—prepared by a loving God with full adjustment in form and weight to our characters and capacities. Ponderous and painful our burden will often feel, but if we realise the sympathising presence of the once crucified One we shall have strength joyously to endure. Our heaviest affliction will be light, our protracted season of agony but a moment, whilst we are near the cross of our dear Lord. We shall say:—

> "O holy man of sorrows! dare I breathe
> One murmuring sentence? What this cross of mine
> Beside that cross Thou didst endure for me?
> A few brief tears and transient sufferings,
> Compose my sum of trials; but Thy woes
> Claim as exponents mighty drops of blood!"

Let us now turn to the cross of the penitent thief, and we shall witness the place of execution turned into a place of grace—a display of mercy on the arena of justice. From the narrative of the Evangelists we gather that both thieves were conducted to the place of execution reviling Jesus. With feelings of animosity they both joined with the infatuated multitude in accusing Him of arrogantly assuming a title and character that were never His. One of these criminals eventually yielded to Christ's supremacy, and acknowledged himself dependent on Christ's love and power. A change was effected in his spirit. His prejudices were banished, his passion subdued, his antipathy converted into affection, and his revilings transformed into reverence. Prayer was offered and answered. The Redeemer gave the thief an assurance of final salvation. Standing in thought by the cross of the penitent thief we are reminded—

That the cry of faith is always heard by Jesus.—Though the utterances be brief and broken, they are welcome to Him who is willing to save. If the expressions of the lip be the sincere outcome of the heart, they must, they will be readily heeded. What the penitent thief was brought to feel and believe is just that of which we must be sensible. He was convinced of his sins, so must we be. He regarded Jesus as the only Saviour, so must we. He saw Christ as the promised deliverer, the man mighty to save. He beheld Him gathering the burdens of men and hurling them away for ever; grasping the barred gates of death, and

(Drawn by J. McL. Ralston.)

"The home of youth stands ruined there."

"THE LONG-AGO."—p. 423.

throwing them wide open; grappling with principalities and powers, and effectually subduing them. He did not think his cry for mercy unnecessary because of the Saviour's sufferings and intercessory prayer, nor must we. He prayed for himself. He exercised faith in the Redeemer, so must we. The perfect work of the Saviour is not intended to encourage indolence on our part.

We are reminded, too, that no person is too vile, and no time unfavourable, for the extension of divine grace.—With the experience of the penitent thief, who had loved his evils and lived long in the corrosive indulgence thereof, yet rescued and raised to heaven as a monument of sovereign grace, none need despair. The Divine Philanthropist is not like man. He may be always found. You may come to Him at daybreak, when the first faint sunbeams are struggling above the horizon and tipping the hill-tops, as Mary beheld Him at the sepulchre. You may come to Him at noonday, when the sun is culminating, as Saul of Tarsus experienced on the road to Damascus. You may find Him at eventide, when the flowers fold their beauties, the clustering stars emerge from their hiding-places, and sweet serenity reigns around, as the disciples experienced on the first day of the week. You may commune with Him when the curtains of night are gathered round the face of Nature and mankind are lapped in sleep, as the history of Nicodemus and the Philippian gaoler proves. When expectation is disappointed, and efforts appear fruitless, as when the disciples on the sea of Tiberias had toiled all night and caught nothing; when alone and diligent in duty, as when the woman was surprised by the weary traveller at the well of Samaria; when in the crowd, as when publicans and sinners gathered around to listen to His teaching; when troubles assail and the heart fails for fear, as when the disciples saw One walking on the waters and heard a voice exclaiming "It is I!" and when come to the spot where the stream of Time commingles with the ocean of Eternity, as in the case of the dying thief: at any season, in any place, and under any circumstances, Jesus is willing and wishful to receive the expressions of our faith and affection. Oh, cheering thought for those who lie in anguish upon the couch of sickness, feeling that the final hour is near, that as the penitent thief found mercy in the eleventh hour, so they may look unto Christ and be saved, even when the pallor of death is stealing over the countenance and the solemn hush of dread suspense reigns in the chamber! Jesus is able to save to the uttermost all who come unto the Father by Him.

But, looking toward the third cross, what sad reflections fill our minds! We see a man favoured with the same revelations of love and power—permitted to listen to the same expressions from the lips of Jesus, and drawing near to the same eternal state, remaining callous and indifferent. Cannot we here see how sins harden the heart to a degree almost beyond hope? Gradually, by indulging evil, the mind grows darker, the will set on the abominable thing, the habits fixed in their downward tendency, and the whole man stands before divine influences as though encased in triple mail! Alas for such a man! There is little hope of his salvation! And do we not learn too, from this third cross, the dangers of procrastination? We cannot presume to say, that because one man is saved in the last hour, when the swellings of Jordan are upon him, that therefore all will be saved, or that we shall be saved if we defer seeking Christ. The one cross tells of hope, the other warns against presumption; the one says, "It is never too late to return," the other says, "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation!"

THE LONG AGO.

AFTER long weary toilsome years,
Spent far away in foreign clime,
For every one there comes a time
When a glad voice from home he hears—
After long years.

Fond memories of the days of old,
The echoes of some far-off strain
Waken the heart to youth again,
And none but pleasant dreams enfold
The days of old.

But if perchance the Long-Ago
Should exercise a mystic spell,
And some lone wanderer impel
To seek the home he used to know
Long years ago;

Gazing o'er ground well-known of yore,
He sees indeed the self-same hills,
And hears the music of the rills,
But seeks in vain to view once more
The home of yore.

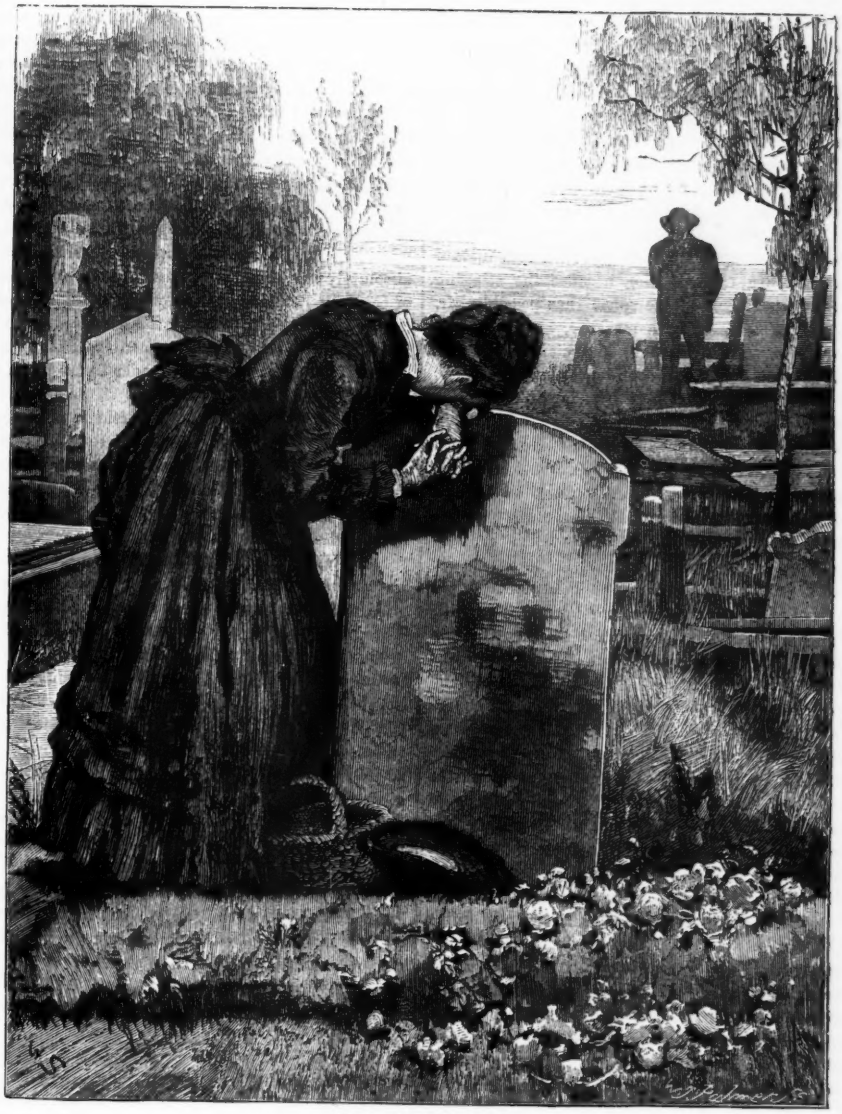
All bears the impress of the years—
The home of youth stands ruined there,
The thatch has fallen, bleak and bare
The house its tottering roof up-rears,
Grown old in years.

Ah well! though of the Long-Ago
Old friends and scenes scarce aught remains,
From memory still in tender strains
Kind thoughts of thee will ever flow,
Old Long-Ago. G. W.

STILL AND DEEP.

BY F. M. F. SKENE, AUTHOR OF "TRIED," "ONE LIFE ONLY," ETC.

CHAPTER IX.



BERTRAND LISLE found that his father had left a letter for him in case he should not arrive in England in time to see him alive. It contained the substance of the sad history Mr. Lisle had told him on the last night of his life, and the expression of his earnest hope that his son might be able, with the consent of his own heart, to make Mary Trevelyan his wife; he added, that as the income derived from Mrs. Lisle's fortune, on which he had been living, would of course belong after his death exclusively to Bertrand himself, he had managed to set apart a sufficient sum to pay for Mary's board and lodging at Chiverley for one year, as he knew that the Wyndhams were in too straitened circumstances to receive her on any other terms. This money, he said, he had already dispatched to Mrs. Wyndham, with the understanding that so soon as she heard of his decease she was to write and invite Miss Trevelyan to come to them at once, so that the poor child might be spared the pain of knowing the arrangements it had been necessary to make for her maintenance during that first year. At its close Mr. Lisle earnestly hoped she would have her home with Bertrand to their mutual content and happiness—if not, he could but commend her to the care of her Heavenly Father, since he had himself deprived her of the protection of both her parents on earth. On the day following the funeral the expected letter from Mrs. Wyndham arrived, written coldly but politely, with a request that Miss Trevelyan would let her know on what day she might expect her. Poor Mary would fain have lingered in her old home, with all its dear associations, instead of going at once to utter strangers—for she had never even seen Mrs. Wyndham—but she knew that the house was now Bertrand's, and that he wished to sell the furniture and give it up as soon as possible, in order that he might return to his post on the Continent, which he had left without any regular leave of absence on the sudden emergency of his father's illness. It so happened that important diplomatic interests required his attention there at once, so that he was unable to take Mary down to Chiverley himself, which he had specially wished to do, in order to judge, by his own observation, what her chances of happiness were likely to be in her new home. Mrs. Parry had received no invitation whatever from Mrs. Wyndham, even for a time to accompany Mary; indeed, her name was not even mentioned in the letter; but she could not bear the idea of her poor darling, as she called her, setting out on her dreary journey quite alone, so it was decided that she was to escort Mary to the station nearest Chiverley, where some of the Wyndhams could be asked to meet her, and there take leave of her and return to London.

They were to start very early in the morning, and Bertrand was to go down to Dover a few hours later on the same day, and cross in the night to Calais, so that the last moments in their childhoods' home arrived only too soon for both of them.

On the evening before their departure some persons had come to see Bertrand on business connected with the winding-up of his father's affairs, and Mrs. Parry was busily engaged packing-up, so that Mary found herself alone, and free to go and take a last farewell of the spot it most pained her heart to leave.

It was again the sunset hour; but not as on the two former occasions, with floods of glory streaming from the gate of heaven, and earth made lovely by the dying smiles of day. It seemed now as if mysterious Nature were in sympathy with the sadness of her human children, for the skies were covered with clouds as with a mourning veil, and drops were falling like tears from every flower and tree, left there by a recent shower; the moist air was soft; the low night wind rose sighing as the twilight fell; and the one black-robed figure, passing with noiseless step along the churchyard path, seemed well in accordance with the scene.

Mary Trevelyan went on, threading her way with scrupulous care among the graves, so that she might not step on any one of them, till she found herself at the spot where Mr. and Mrs. Lisle now lay side by side. She placed some wreaths of flowers she had brought with her on their graves, as the last token of affection she could ever show them, and then, leaning upon an old tombstone which stood near, she looked down sadly on the sods that hid from her the first friends of her helpless infancy, and gave herself up to the painful thoughts which, in the depth of her silent nature, were weighing upon her with an intensity of which her outward calm and stillness gave no sign. She felt that she had reached a point in her existence when the past lay all behind her like a fair and sunny garden, within whose safe enclosure the guarded years of her happy youth had passed in an atmosphere of ease and tenderness, where no storm or danger could disturb the peaceful air; while the future seemed to loom before her dark and menacing, full of terrible possibilities, and of one most bitter certainty close at hand which she well knew contained the sharpest pain she could in any way endure.

(Drawn by W. SMALL.)

"Leaning upon an old tombstone."—p. 424.

She was about to be parted from him who was and ever had been more than all the world to her. Reserved and silent as she was in all her intercourse with others, Mary Trevelyan was no self-deceiver, and she knew that all the vast capacity of affection which lay in the depths of her strong earnest character had been given once for all to Bertrand Lisle, never to be withdrawn or lessened till her heart should cease to beat for ever in the cold grasp of death; but as yet she knew not if the profound intense love she bore him was to be her uttermost anguish or her very crown of bliss. No word on such a subject, of course, had crossed his lips during the mournful days through which they had been passing, and she herself grew every hour more guarded and distant in her manner towards him, because the stinging fear tormented her delicate spirit that possibly Mr. Lisle might, at least in a measure, have betrayed the secret of her devotion to his son on that last night of full and final confidence between them. This thought was terrible to her, for it seemed to leave her for ever exposed to the dread that Bertrand might seek to make her his wife from compassion rather than from love, and it drove her to the resolution that she would not let him even see the sorrow she felt at parting with him, much less the faintest indication of her feelings such as they really were. Could she have imagined—as she did not in the least at the time—that Mr. Lisle would have lived to see his son again, not even to gratify his dying wish would she have made him the revelation which she did; and she could but trust that he had carried her confidence with him unbroken to the grave; if it were so, she saw clearly that the course of reserve and almost coldness, which in her uncertainty she felt constrained to adopt towards Bertrand might well have the effect of causing him to mistake her real sentiments altogether. If it should be that he loved her, however, as his father had assured her and his manner to herself since his return almost led her to believe, it surely could not fail that they should one day understand each other, and that Bertrand would then appreciate and forgive the line of action which her maidenly pride compelled her for the present to adopt. Meantime, whatever the future might bring, this much was certain that on the morrow she was to be separated from him; not, as it had been hitherto, when he had merely gone away to his official post, leaving her in his father's house, to which he could not fail to return on every occasion when he was able to absent himself from his duties; now, the home they had shared together, the home that had been hers as well as his, was broken up for ever; she had no claim on him whatever, excepting such as his own heart might elect to give her, and she well knew how likely it was that the natural affection which might have drawn him to her in the familiar intercourse of former days, would now give place to some new sentiment drawn forth by the attractive society in which he would live habitually. She herself must turn away from him to go out into a cold strange world, where she was not bound by the ties of blood to any one human being; and despite his promises of visiting her, despite the hope that lurked even in this hour of despondency within her heart, it might be that never again would the sunshine of his beloved presence bring light and love and happiness to her young forlorn life. The bare thought of such a possibility was too much, even for her strong patient spirit, and, as she clasped her hands tightly on the rough stone monument in the effort to control herself, she let her head fall down upon them despondingly, while her frame shook with suppressed sobs. She was absolutely resolved that Bertrand should see no trace of tears on her face when they met again, and only in this solitary resting-place of the dead did she allow herself to give way to the momentary abandonment of grief, which swayed her slender figure like a reed shaken by the tempest.

It was thus that Bertrand Lisle saw her as he came quietly over the grave-strewn ground to join her. He had sought her when his business was done, and guessed that he would find her here—where, indeed, he wished himself to come for this last hour, to take his final leave of the spot where his parents lay.

He paused a moment to look at her before she was aware of his approach, struck by the unconscious grace of her attitude as she leant, in her dark flowing robes, against the grey stone, with her face hidden in her little white hands.

She looked so young, so slight, so unfit to battle with the rough waves of this troublesome world, that Bertrand could well understand his father's anxiety to secure for her a safe and happy haven, where she would be sheltered from the storms that might overtake her in an unprotected life.

"Dear Mary," he thought, as he advanced towards her, "I could have no fairer, sweeter wife if I sought the wide world over."

There was no sound of weeping from her lips as he came and stood beside her; but in the powerful agitation which she was restraining with all her strength she did not hear his step. Very gently he touched her on the shoulder. "Mary," he said. She started, lifted up her face, and saw him.

CHAPTER X.

Bertrand noticed at once the whiteness of her quivering lips, and the expression of anguish in her tearless eyes, though she struggled to compose herself the moment she met his gaze.

"Dear Mary," he said, tenderly, "I can well understand how sad a moment this must be for you, when, in taking a final farewell of these cherished graves, you seem to be breaking the last link that connects you with those we have lost."

As he spoke a vivid crimson flamed for an instant over her white pure face; for she knew that he mistook the cause of her sadness, and that it was not for the dead but for the living that her young heart was torn with passionate grief, not because those who had been the guardians of her childhood were at rest in Paradise, but because he who stood by her, in the strength and beauty of his youth, was about to be borne away from her side by a wave of that inexorable destiny which never might bring him back to the shores of her life.

She did not speak, for she was absolutely true, and she would not even by a look confirm his mistaken opinion. He was accustomed to the stillness of her manner, however, and went on frankly, "Of course, I share all your feelings in that respect entirely, so in future we must comfort one another, little Mary."

"If we ever meet," she said, in her soft low voice.

"If we meet!" he repeated, in surprise; "why surely, dear child, you have no doubt on that point?"

"We part to-morrow, and the future is so uncertain," she answered.

"Doubtless; we cannot forecast an hour in this world, and we may meet with a railway accident, one or the other of us, no later than to-morrow; but I do not see why we should anticipate such terrible contingencies; I dare say we shall both get safe to our destinations, and I mean to come to Chiverley to see you in the spring, so there is as much certainty of our meeting as we can ever have in this life of any event which is yet a few months distant. Do you not believe this, child?"

She lifted to his face the deep grey eyes which always reminded him of the line,

"Dark, and true, and tender is the North,"

so thoroughly did they combine these qualities, and said, "I believe that it might be so, of course—but you may not come——"

"Why? Do you think that I am of so much importance to the nations of Europe that I cannot possibly be spared from my diplomatic post, even for a month or two? Why, you know, do you not, that I can have leave of absence for a few weeks every year? I came over surreptitiously just now, without having applied for my usual congé, so as I am wanted there at present I shall not ask an extension of time now, but shall wait till the spring, when I can claim it for next year, and then I can be with you for some weeks at least—so you must prepare to welcome me properly, little Mary." With all her natural reticence and her present purpose of careful reserve, she could not restrain the murmur that escaped her lips, so low that he had to bend his head to hear it, "Welcome as flowers in May."

"I shall come sooner than they will," he said, smiling. "When the carnival is over in Italy, and the quiet days of Lent have begun, so that there are no more state receptions and ambassadorial balls, then you will see me appear at Mrs. Wyndham's hospitable home, for I shall assume it to be so, whatever may be the reality; but now, Mary," he continued, throwing off the light manner with which he had tried to beguile her sadness, "I have one word to say to you seriously. This is not the time or the place, standing by this new-made grave, to speak of future hopes; but I believe you know what my father's wishes were, and I am anxious you should understand that they are mine too, and I hope that they will be yours when I can speak to you more openly on the subject."

He took her hand as he spoke, but his natural delicacy prevented him from looking into her downcast face; as for her, her heart stood still in a conflict of feeling which almost took her breath away, for her whole soul leapt up in boundless rapture at the idea that he might really so love her as to wish for his own sake to make her his wife; but, on the other hand, she shivered with the shrinking dread that his father might have told him how he had wrung from her the avowal of a love that had been given unasked, and that the words he had spoken to her now were born of pity, not of spontaneous affection, and the fear kept her absolutely mute, even at the risk of being misconstrued by Bertrand. Her silence did not surprise him, however, for he knew that it was difficult for her, especially with her habitual timidity, to answer such a veiled declaration as he could only make her now. He felt her little hand trembling in his like a fluttering bird, and when he grasped it tighter she made no attempt to withdraw it, so he was perfectly satisfied, remembering as he did the strong heart-wrung words with which she had told his father what he was to her. He felt entirely secure of her love and faithfulness to him, and at a fitting time he would know how to make her own to him all the devotion which he knew her concentrated nature could feel for that one whom she had, as she had said, elected to be her only love for ever.

He stooped and took two of the white roses from the wreath she had laid on his father's grave, and putting one of them into her hand, he said, "Keep it, Mary, as I shall mine, in remembrance of this hour; and now I think we must take our last look of the dear graves, for it is getting so late and dark."

They knelt down together for a moment at the sacred spot, and then, hand in hand, they went down the churchyard path towards the home that was to be theirs no more.

Next morning, when the crimson dawn was filling all the world with roseate light, Mary Trevelyan came down the steps she had so often trodden in light-hearted happiness, and which were never to know the touch of her noiseless feet again, and entered the carriage which was to take her and Mrs. Parry to the nearest station. Thus far Bertrand had declared he would accompany them, though he had to return to the deserted house to make various arrangements before finally starting for Dover. Mrs. Parry sobbed unrestrainedly as they drove out of the gates, for she, too, had lost a happy home; but Mary sat like a statue, without a vestige of colour in her sweet still face, and with shadowy eyes, which she kept persistently averted from Bertrand's face. She was struggling with all her strength to maintain her self-control, and it seemed to her that if she looked just once into that sunny face and met the glance of the dear blue eyes she loved so fondly, her composure would give way, and the pent-up grief she felt at leaving him burst forth with unmistakable evidence of the deep love she bore him. So, not many words were spoken amongst them till they reached the station; then Mrs. Parry hastily dried her eyes in order to attend to the safety of about twenty packages, large and small, containing all her worldly goods, with which she distracted the mind of the railway porter, till she had established herself in the centre of the platform, firmly seated on one box, with quite a flock of others surrounding her, over which she kept guard, as if she expected them to become animate and run away. Meantime, Bertrand drew Mary aside, and walked up and down the quietest part of the station while they waited for the train.

"I shall write to you often, dearest Mary," he said, "and you will do the same for me, will you not?"

"I will answer every letter you ever send me," she answered, in her low soft tone.

"Which means that you will not send me any spontaneous letters, does it not? How very careful you are not to offend the proprieties!" he answered, smiling.

"That is not the reason," she said, gently; "but when I receive a letter from you I shall be able to feel sure that you wish to hear from me."

"You may be sure of that at all times, child; but you remember how often we used to say long ago that there never was any one so afraid of being in the way as you were, little Mary, and it is the same spirit which animates you now I can see. Well, I shall secure frequent letters by writing often, and it will not be long before we meet again."

"You said in the spring; do you mean March or April?"

"Yes; I shall come again with the violets, like Napoleon. You know that is the reason why his followers use those humble little flowers as their badge—an incongruous one for the mighty Emperor. When he was in Elba they used to say, 'He will come again with the violets,' as he did, and I shall be like him in that respect."

"Oh, not like him, Bertrand!" exclaimed Mary; "for, you know, he came only to go away again for ever—he never touched the shores of France again."

"That is true. Well, I shall not imitate him beyond a return with the violets. He was no true Frenchman, but he had made France his own, and I pity him for never being allowed to look on her again. Oh, Mary, I like to think that I shall be on French soil to-night, though it will be but for a few hours."

"Yes, I am so glad you will have that pleasure at least on this sad day," she answered; for she knew and sympathised with his intense love for his country. But now the ringing of bells, and hurrying to and fro on the platform, announced that the train was at hand, and in another moment it came rushing in, and the moment of separation had indeed arrived. Bertrand found a comfortable seat for Mary in an empty carriage, and then looked round for Mrs. Parry that she might have a place beside her; but she was to be seen flying about the platform in that highly unnecessary state of excitement into which old ladies are apt to work themselves when they are making a railway journey, and he was obliged to go to her assistance in order to prevent such a catastrophe as that of her being left behind with Mary and one half of her luggage disappearing in the distance while she was left stranded on the platform with the other half; it was not an easy matter, even for Bertrand, nimble as he was, to capture the good woman, so wildly did she rush from side to side laden with bundles, and clinging convulsively to a cage containing a venerable cockatoo which had belonged to her husband, and was supposed to have commenced his career in the course of the last century. Bertrand at last succeeded in taking her into custody, and he came back holding tightly by her cloak to the door of the carriage where Mary was seated, and into which he hoisted her by a considerable exertion of manual force, and deposited the cockatoo on the seat beside her; she was still, however, in a cruel state of uncertainty as to whether one or two cherished carpet-bags and bonnet-boxes had been placed in the van. She vociferated inquiries on this subject to every porter who passed; and under cover of the outcry she made Bertrand bent forward to Mary, and whispered, "Have you got your white rose safe, dear, as I have mine?"

A soft smile gleamed for a moment on her sad lips. "Oh yes!" she whispered, and an involuntary movement, of which she was not conscious herself, but which Bertrand at once detected, showed him that the flower he had given her had found a resting place very near to her heart; he had no time to say more—the inexorable whistle sounded, the carriage door was locked, and as the train sped swiftly on, his bright face flashed away from her sight, and it seemed to Mary Trevelyan as if the light of the sun had suddenly faded out from the world.

(To be continued.)

SCRIPTURE LESSONS FOR SCHOOL AND HOME.

SCRIPTURE STORIES. First Series. No. 24. St. Paul a Prisoner.

Chapter to be read—Acts xxiii.

INTRODUCTION. Ask who took Paul a prisoner. Out of whose hands did the chief captain rescue him? To whom did he deliver him? Why to the Council? Show the respect held for the Jewish Council by the Romans; besides, the captain was a little afraid of being called to account. What unlawful act had he done to Paul? (xxii. 29.) So would conciliate the Council, and not deliver Paul to Roman magistrates, by whom he himself would be blamed for the scourging.

I. Paul before the Council. (Read 1—10.) The prisoner. Perhaps children have seen a prisoner; how does he look? Why dejected? because of shame and disgrace of position. Still, if innocent, would have good conscience. What is he accused of? Look back at xxi. 28. Profaning the Temple. A very serious charge in eyes of the Council. Remind how charge against Christ was that He said He would destroy the Temple, and how the Temple was the centre of all Jewish religious rites and ceremonies. An offence against the Temple therefore one against God. Now listen to the prisoner. What does he say? (ver. 1.) Did he mean that he had done no sin? No; for see Rom. vii. 18, but outwardly had not offended in religious matters. What does the judge do? Just as Christ was struck. (John xviii. 22.) Describe the scene: the high priest, with his gorgeous robes of office, the seventy elders around, the prisoner now calmly making his defence, now indignantly rebuking the judge for his cruelty and wrong-doing in smiting the prisoner. What did the Council say, and how did Paul answer? Explain to the children that he was not really the high priest, but a usurper, and therefore St. Paul was not speaking evil of the ruler. (2) The Council. Who were the two leading parties? What were the opinions of the Sadducees? So Paul took advantage of the difference of opinion to help himself. What does he say about himself? (ver. 6.) Remind of previous lessons, how often apostles in trouble for preaching resurrection, e.g., at Athens (Acts xvii. 32), now it helps him; so he showed the wisdom of a serpent (Matt. x. 16), and old promise fulfilled that wrath of man should praise God, for what was result? Division in council, great discussion, the two parties actually coming to blows. What did the chief captain do? Was anxious to save Paul, evidently much impressed by him, and anxious to help him all he could. So Paul was taken back into the castle.

Practical Lesson. God's over-ruling Providence. The same subject of resurrection, before a cause of offence, now a means of deliverance. Often thus. What seems most against us turns out for good, e.g., Joseph's being sold proved salvation of his brethren, and many other instances. So with children. God can overrule all for good, therefore, like Paul, must just let our light shine, always speak and do what we know is right, and leave events with God.

II. Paul a Prisoner. (Read 11—22.) (1) A midnight visit. Describe St. Paul carried back into the castle by the soldiers, taken to his dark cell. His evening meal over, thinks over events of day, wondering what will happen to him next, remembering prophecy of Agabus, that Jews would bind him and deliver him to Gentiles (xxi. 11), then kneels down, commits himself to God's keeping, falls asleep. Who appears to him in the night? How does Jesus comfort him? Had gone through great trouble, been seized by mob, beaten by Romans, smitten by orders of high priest; still had borne witness of Christ. How? By his speech on stairs of castle, but more than all by his life, and the patience with which bore his sufferings. Had borne all for Christ. What a comfort to be assured by Christ himself that it had had effect! and now should do the same at Rome. Would sleep sweetly with such assurance (Ps. cxxi. 3). (2) A conspiracy. What are the Jews doing? Have been foiled so far by the breaking up of the Council, so they hatch a plot. How many of them? What is their plan, and what oath do they take? But so many being concerned, the plot oozes out. Who hears of it? So Paul's nephew tells him, and he sends him to his friend the chief captain, who devises a scheme to frustrate their plans, and save Paul. (3) A midnight journey. Whom does the captain send? Why two centurions, with their two hundred horsemen? Not merely because of the Jews in wait, but also because of the dangerous journey. At what time are they to start? Every precaution taken against surprise. So Paul, ready at nine o'clock, unable to take farewell of friends, starts with the military escort for Cæsarea. (4) A letter. Let the children notice the peculiarities of a Roman letter, the beginning and ending as compared with ours, and then see the same in the Epistles. To whom was it addressed? Of what was Felix the governor? Remind again of our Lord's trial, and how Christ was sent to Galilee to be tried by Herod. What does he leave out in his letter? What does he say about Paul? Nothing worthy of death or bonds, just as Pilate had said he found no fault with Christ. Of which of us could this be said? (5) An arrival. Now Cæsarea reached; the escort take Paul to the governor, and deliver the letter. To what city did he belong? As Cilicia belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, he was kept prisoner till he arrived.

PRACTICAL LESSON. God's care of His people. The captain's heart turned to Paul, the dissension in the Council causing his escape, the plot discovered, the midnight encouragement, the safe journey. Can trace God's care. So in our lives, though cannot always see God's care, may be assured of it. Gives angels charge over us, and orders all things for good of His people.

Questions to be answered.

1. How was Paul treated unfairly by the high priest?
2. Trace comparisons between his trial and that of Christ.
3. How did he escape from the Council?
4. How did God cheer him at night?
5. Who proved his friend, and how did he show his friendship for him?
6. What lessons may we learn from the story?

JULIA BRENT; OR, "HANDSOME IS THAT HANDSOME DOES."

"MAMMA, I shan't have Julia Brent at my birthday party," said Ada Graham, as she stood drawing on her gloves at the parlour fire one morning before going out to school.

"My dear, I thought you wished to have all your class-mates?" replied Mrs. Graham, looking up questioningly.

"Yes, of course—so I do; but I do not like Julia—she is so ugly," and Ada gave a glance at the fair rosy face and golden curls reflected in the mirror before her.

"But, my child, it is not Julia's fault that she is so plain; nor did she bring the cruel disease which has marked and scarred her face on herself. If God were to send some sickness to you which would mark and disfigure you, I know you would feel deeply if people slighted you. It is not right, Ada, to exclude Julia on that account."

"Perhaps not, mamma; but still I do not mean to ask her—all the girls say I ought not;" and Ada kissed her mother, and, taking up her books, set off for school.

"What taste the child has!" said Mrs. Graham, when her daughter was gone; "she cannot bear to look at anything which is not beautiful. I am sure she will make an artist. Don't you think she grows very pretty, John?"

Mr. Graham, buried in the Times, scarcely heard a word of the conversation, but answered, "Yes, very—very pretty," and gathering up his letters, set out for his office.

He was a wealthy merchant, living in one of the pleasantest suburbs of a large city, and Ada was his only child. Everything she could possibly wish for she had; and Mrs. Graham thought her the best and the most lovely child in the vicinity.

Beautiful she was, certainly, and every one kept telling her so, and praising and flattering her till her little brain was almost turned. Naturally vain and selfish, these faults were nourished to an alarming extent, quite unconsciously, by her mother and friends.

At school she was not either a diligent or clever child, but every one gave way to her, and made the best of what she did. It was an acknowledged fact that she was Madame Holman's favourite, but no one seemed to be jealous of her; for, though really very selfish, Ada had the name of being very generous. Her papa and mamma gave her plenty of money, and their visitors more bon-bons than she could by any possibility of a chance manage to eat, so that she liberally shared with her class-mates; but she never gave up her own pleasure for that of her friends, or denied herself the smallest gratification to oblige any one else.

Julia Brent, whom Ada did not like because she was "so ugly," lived with her uncle and aunt in a great square brick house not far from Mr. Graham's. She was the orphan daughter of the late rector of the parish, and quite homeless and friendless, except for her kind uncle and aunt.

Very plain-looking she was, with her sallow little face all seamed and scarred, and great gaunt eyes, but to those who looked beyond the mere surface there was much beauty to be seen in Julia Brent. Her cousins, Janie and Netta, both pretty children, loved her very dearly, for she was always ready to help them with their lessons, or romp in the nursery when the tasks were done. Her aunt found her always willing to do anything she desired her, at once, and her uncle called her his little secretary, so neat and tidy did she keep his study. But Julia was a very shy, sensitive child, and often when in her little bed she would cry herself to sleep because she was so ugly, and people looked at her so unkindly. But on the whole she was far from being unhappy, and when her music-teacher at Madame Holman's declared that she was the cleverest of all his pupils, and the drawing-master praised her before all the class, she really felt genuinely happy.

Ada Graham's birthday party was to take place in December, just a few days before closing up for the Christmas holidays. She was eleven years old, and her party was to be on a much larger and grander scale than it had ever been before. The invitations, written by Ada herself on perfumed pink paper, were sent out a week in advance; and when the dainty little note containing Janie and Netta's invitation came, there was no mention of Julia. Mrs. Brent was very much surprised, but thinking that perhaps it was merely an oversight, said nothing about it. Every spare moment during the day Ada and her friends were chatting about what they should wear and what they should do, and in fact there was nothing thought of but the party. Lessons were neglected, and very many were the bad marks some of the children got.

Thursday was the evening of such importance in the eyes of a dozen young ladies, and on Monday, as Janie Brent was repeating over her morning lesson to her mamma, she said, suddenly, "I think, mamma, that Ada might have asked Julia; she will be so sorry and disappointed!"

"Did not Ada intend asking your cousin, dear, or was it a mistake?" asked Mrs. Brent.

"No, mamma, she said she would not ask Julia, because—because——"

"Well, darling, why?"

"I had rather not tell you, mamma, please," said Janie, blushing furiously, and looking very much put out.

"But, my child, it is very necessary that I should know why Julia has not been invited to Ada's party. If it is any fault of hers, I shall not blame Mrs. Graham, and let you and Netta go; but if not, you know Janie it would be very selfish of you and your sister to go without your cousin, who is so good and gentle and kind. Tell me, dear, the reason."

"Because, mamma, Ada says Julia is so ugly."

"Oh, Janie! how unkind, how wicked! Julia did not make those great marks on her face, nor is she to blame for being small and pale. Do you think, my child, you could go to Mrs. Graham's, and enjoy yourself—dance, laugh, sing, and be merry—knowing that your cousin was not asked because she is not fair and pretty to look at like Ada? My darling Janie, God looks at the heart, not the face; and if Julia is a good, obedient, patient child, He will love her, and never pass her over. I cannot let you and Netta go to Mrs. Graham's party; and I don't think my little girl will care to go, will she?"

"If you wish me to stay away, mamma, I'll try to be content; but I shall be disappointed; and Netta ——" here Janie's resolution gave way, and she burst into tears.

Mrs. Brent soothed her as well as she could, and when the sobbing-fit was over she set off to school not nearly so unhappy as she fancied she would be. Julia and Netta knew nothing of what occurred, and Janie was not to tell Ada anything about her determination, but write a polite note to her house, saying that she and her sister could not be present at the birthday party.

When the children got into school there was a great bustle amongst the girls in the senior class. Madame Holman was called away to Germany suddenly, to see a sick brother, and the examinations were to take place at once, and the prizes be awarded before she went. The eldest girls in the school were scarcely twelve, and there were only twenty-four altogether, so that it was not a very hard task to get through the examination. Subject after subject Julia Brent carried away the prizes in—drawing, music, reading, geography, and conduct. During the half-year not one single bad mark did she receive. After her came Janie, her cousin; for Julia taught her almost everything she knew herself. True, she could not make her play her musical exercises so well, or draw her figures so correctly, but she made her much better than she was in many things.

Last of all in everything was Ada Graham. Her party had driven all idea of her lessons out of her head, and, very much ashamed and very sullen, she stood at the bottom of her class.

The prize for drawing Ada had very much coveted, and when she saw it handed over to Julia she burst into tears. It was a beautifully-bound volume of natural history, with many fine pictures, and Ada had set her mind on having the book.

When school was dismissed, and the children, in twos and threes, were chatting over their answering, and examining their prizes, Julia came over to Ada's side, and, holding out the book, said, "I know you are fond of animals, and I have two natural histories already; take this, Ada, you see I have three other prizes. Do, please have it."

"Do you really mean to give it me, Julia?" asked Ada, opening her blue eyes wide in astonishment.

"Yes, dear, of course I do, as you seem to care for it," and, putting the book into her hand, Julia ran on to overtake her cousins.

Ada went home in high glee with the prize in her hand. When her mamma asked who else got prizes, she told her Julia Brent. "Indeed, mamma, she got this too, but she knew I set my heart on having the drawing prize, and I would have had it but my hand shook so to-day, so Julia very fairly gave it up to me." And Ada put the subject aside very lightly, but left the book on the drawing-room table, where every one could see it.

The next morning Mrs. Graham was surprised to see a note for Ada, more so when she learned that Netta and Janie Brent could not be at the party on Thursday night.

"I wonder why they are not coming. Does Janie say, dear?"

"No, mamma—only that she is very sorry that she and her sister cannot accept my invitation."

"And Julia?" said Mrs. Graham.

"Oh, mamma, I did not ask Julia; you know I said I would not."

At length the important Thursday arrived, and early in the morning Ada was bustling and fussing about the house till every one was worried to death. At last an idea struck her to go over to a cottage where a little girl lived, and bring her back to her party. She was only the daughter of a poor seamstress, but sometimes Ada took a fancy to having her to play with, for she was a very sweet, pretty child, and as she was gentle and quiet Mrs. Graham did not object.

Putting on her hat and cloak, Ada started in haste to White Cottage, fully determined on having Mary Scott back with her.

"Be sure you do not go by the common, darling, as it is very wet after all this rain," said her mother.

"And, Miss Ada, take care you do not venture to cross the stepping-stones, as the stream is flooded," said the servant; and, promising to keep to the road, Ada started.

Now, to go by the common and over the stepping-stones was full half a mile shorter than round the road. So Ada, directly she got outside the gate, determined on going the nearest way. Properly it was not a common—only a piece of land which had been used as brick-fields, and was full of deep pits and muddy hollows; a little stream ran at one side, separating it from the farm and cottage Ada wanted to go to. In the summer the brook was almost dry, but in winter it was very much flooded, and a very strong current from a neighbouring mill-stream dashed past. But Ada, being in a wilful mood, and impatient, thought she could cross with perfect safety, and ventured boldly on the stones. Just then she heard a voice cry from the other side, "Don't! don't!" and looking up, she saw Julia Brent waving her arms, and making signs to her to turn back. Ada, however, took no notice; but when about in the middle of the stream she felt the stones slip from under her, and in another moment she was struggling in the water.

Julia stood for half an instant in dismay, then calling her dog Jasper, who was a long distance behind, she sprang forward, and without a moment's hesitation rushed into the stream, and seizing Ada by the cloak, tried to drag her into a part where they could get footing, calling all the time on Jasper to come and save them. Ada clung helplessly to Julia, a dead weight, and it would have gone very hard with both the children, for, despite all Julia's efforts, they were getting into the current, but at that moment the good dog bounded into the water, and seizing his young mistress by the arm, swam to land. It was not more than two yards, but still, without Jasper's assistance neither Julia or Ada would have ever reached the shore alive. Half dragging, half carrying her companion, Julia made her way to the first house in the vicinity, and making one great effort to knock, she dropped down insensible on the step, with Ada, scarcely more conscious, by her side. It happened that the gentleman at whose house they called knew both Mrs. Brent and Mrs. Graham, and sent at once for them and a doctor. His wife undressed the children, and putting them in a warm bed, used every means to restore them to consciousness. Ada was the first to speak, and looking round, she asked for Julia. "She saved me, mamma. I went over the stepping-stones, and Ju. and Jasper pulled me out. I must have been drowned but for her! Ask her to forgive me, mamma, and tell her she is a thousand times more beautiful than I am. She looked like an angel when she caught hold of me in the river."

Very many weeks passed before either of the children recovered their fright and wetting, but on one of them the lesson was not thrown away. There was no birthday party for Ada; and when in the New Year she had all her school-fellows to see her, one quiet evening, she humbly begged Julia's pardon for all the wrong she had ever done her, and declared her intention of trying to become more like in every respect the little girl she had thought "so ugly." Through all her life Ada Graham never forgot that Julia Brent saved her from a terrible death, and she learned the truth of the old saying, "Handsome is that handsome does." H. J. B.

"THE QUIVER" BIBLE CLASS.

169. Who was reigning in Judæa when Joseph returned from Egypt with the infant Jesus?

170. What was the present sent to Saul, king of Israel, by Jesse, the Bethlehemite? Give passage.

171. What was the tribute paid yearly to the king of Israel by Mesha, king of Moab?

172. What was the subject upon which our Lord first began to preach?

173. By what name is the Mount of Olives called in the book of Kings?

174. Who is stated to have first discovered mules?

175. What was the other name given to the country of the Gergesenes?

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON PAGE 400.

155. He opposed Joash, the king, in his wickedness, for which he was stoned with stones at the commandment of the king (2 Chron. xxiv. 21).

156. Our Saviour. "From the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias, which perished between the altar and the temple" (Luke xi. 51).

157. 2 Chronicles xxi. 12—16.

158. The wife of Pilate (Matt. xxvii. 19).

159. Huldah, the prophetess (2 Kings xxii. 14, and 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22).

160. Ornan and his four sons (1 Chron. xxi. 15—20).

161. Because in relating the incidents which occurred there, he says, "We endeavoured to go" (Acts xvi. 10).

162. "And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh: for the Egyptians sold every man his field because the famine prevailed over them: so the land became Pharaoh's" (Gen. xlvii. 20).

(Drawn by H. C. SELOUS.)

THE "STILL SMALL VOICE."

WRESTLING in direst agony,
Grief thrilling through my breast,
Hear me when, Lord, I cry to Thee,
And give me rest.

Help me, O Lord, the path to choose,
Guide Thou my steps aright,
Till, journeying on, my way I lose
'Mid realms of light!

And, lo! an answer swift I hear,
To help me in my choice;
For, whispers softly in my ear,
"A still small voice!"

Voice sweet, yet one that never yields
Bidding me choose aright!
To leave the bright and sun-lit fields
For shades of night!

To give up all that is most dear,
And bend 'neath load of woe;
To suffer many a sorrow here,
Much grief to know!

O Lord, guide Thou mine erring way,
Help me in this my choice;
That I, Thy messenger, obey
The "still small voice!"

G. W.

THE BRIDGE BETWEEN

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TROUBLES OF CHATTY AND MOLLY," "THE DINGY HOUSE AT KENSINGTON," "QUEEN MADGE," "AGAINST HERSELF," ETC., ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.—ROBINSON CRUSOE AND HIS MAN FRIDAY.

"NO, Dorothy, you foolish little maid, I never forgot you," he said, "though it was so long before I wrote;" and they walked on through the summer fields.

They were such happy days for her, those in which, for a little while, she lived within her dream-castle. She had forgotten her disappointment in not meeting him first, her half-unconscious jealousy of Netta, and her longings for beauty—forgotten everything save that Adrian Fuller had come home, and that he was her friend and companion again, just as in the happy days of old.

He was a handsome man, tall and fair and well made, with all the tone and colour which George Blakesley had lacked. Yes, decidedly a handsome man, an artist by profession, and full of vague ideas and indolent dreams. A man who was capable, and felt his capability, and so was satisfied. He could not rouse himself to do more than feel this; he so delighted in the summer and the long days of sunshine, and the evenings of shadow and twilight, and it was so pleasant to stroll about with Dorothy leaning on his arm, ready to talk or be silent, to walk long miles through the tall grass and flowery green lanes, or to sit under a tree, or linger about in the picturesque old garden, dreamily talking of books (poets and love stories usually) and trees, and all that appealed to his artist nature and the girl's love of beauty.

She never forgot those first days of his return, the days in which her father was at the office all day, for he was worried about matters there, and had little time for home; and Mrs. Woodward was away, for Colonel Wade was very ill, dangerously so, and had sent for his daughter at last; and Netta was a close prisoner to her grandfather's house. Tom went to his work, and Will and Sally to their lessons, so Dorothy had it all her own way. Adrian Fuller had finished his two years' work, and wanted a rest, he said, and was glad to return to his old haunt at Hampstead, and spend his days with his former playmate. No one interfered or considered for a single moment how dangerous it was for this girl, who could hardly be called a woman yet, to pass hour after hour in the society of a handsome fascinating man, who found time hang upon his hands. The end of it all, or that there would be anything to end, was a thing no one troubled about. Dorothy was always hanging about, reading books or sitting under trees, her mother said, and she saw no harm whatever in her doing so in company with Adrian Fuller; they had known each other for years, and he was like one of the family; besides, she was hardly aware, much less concerned, about the state of things, for she was at her father's house. As for Mr. Woodward, he was only too glad that there was some one who could talk to his daughter and direct her reading, and be there to discuss the affairs of the nation with him when he returned home of an evening.

"I thought you had forgotten me," she said, and added, half laughingly, for her jealousy had quite vanished, "you know I am not pretty like Netta, and you never drew my portrait."

"But I shall some day, when I want a womanly little face and a broad low brow like Dorothy's," he answered, looking into the clear brown eyes.

She was so happy as she walked beside him, swinging her hat, upon his arm, along the lonely picturesque paths that may even yet be found beyond Hampstead, that the expression upon her face made it one that might almost be called beautiful. He wondered at it, little realising how much he had to do with it.

"And if I did draw Netta's portrait, I have lost it, remember, but I took care of the rose. I, too, never let any one take Dorothy's place, remember, and she let Blakesley, or whatever his name was, take my place."

"Oh, I never did!" she answered, and her eyes filled with tears; "I never, never did, indeed, Mr. Fuller!" She had never called him by his Christian name in her whole life.

He sat lazily down under a tree, and motioned her to do the same, laughing the while at her vehemence. "I was only teasing you," he said. "Now sit here and tell me about him."

"No, not now," she pleaded; "let us read a little while."

He threw off his cap, and opened his book, and she hers, and so they sat silent, but contented and happy in the way they liked. He, because he was enjoying the summer and the sun and the freedom from work, which he had not known for two years past; yes, and he liked being with his old friends again, and to tease Dorothy—he was fond of Dorothy in his way, she was such a nice child, he thought, and such a pleasant companion, and he was so thoroughly at home with her. She was happy because Adrian Fuller was there; and the summer, and the sun, and the trees she loved, and the books she read, and all else that appealed to her were simply as the setting of a jewel, or the frame of a picture, or the landmarks of a garden in which those sweet June days were passed.

"Now tell me what the hero Blakesley was like," he said. This was in the evening time, when they were in the garden. Mr. Woodward was still at the office, but Tom was home, and sat trying to remember how many locks there were on the river between Oxford and London. Will and Sally were together, the former learning his lessons, the latter drawing grotesque figures, as usual. "First, what did he look like?"

"Washed out," said Tom, looking up.

"He didn't!" said Dorothy, indignantly.

She had a feeling of gratitude towards her old admirer; for had he not been the one person in the world who had told her in spoken words that he loved her?

"Yes, he did," persisted Tom, who had never cared about the interloper, in spite of what he had done for him. "He had a faded-looking beard, dull yellow hair, and a washed-out complexion."

"He was very clever, though," began Dorothy.

"That's right, Dorothy, stand up for him!" laughed Adrian Fuller, amused at the scene; but she moved away offended, and going to the end of the garden, stood looking over the fence at the hazy distance, as she had one night long ago. He soon followed her. "I like you for standing up for him, you silly child," he said; "you needn't get angry. Now tell me about him yourself."

"He was very clever."

"More so than I am?" he said.

"Oh no," she said, looking up quickly; "and he was very fond of work. Are you, Mr. Fuller?"

"No, I detest work. I like to dream my time away; and though I can conceive a dozen wonderful pictures and delight in beholding studies for them and in planning them, yet I hate the labour involved in painting them."

"I hate work too," she said, almost thankful to be able to express her views; "and I cannot always see the use of it."

"No, nor I," he answered. "If I had two hundred a year I would never do a stroke. I have no patience with men who go on earning money to supply themselves with luxuries. I'm thankful that I have simple tastes; and in the country, or by the sea, the common inheritance of all human beings, and a luxury for which none have to pay, I should be quite happy to read, and dream, and stroll, and so pass my life."

"Oh, so should I!" she said, feeling all her sympathies go out to him; for he had so exactly described the life she would have thought blissful beyond all other in this world. Poor, thoughtless little Dorothy!

"I think sometimes I shall work hard for a few years, in order to put by just enough to do this. Then I shall take a cottage somewhere, and live like Robinson Crusoe."

"Till Man Friday comes," she said, turning her face away; for this plan of his included no other human being, she thought.

"You shall be the Man Friday," he said, without for a single moment thinking of the light in which his words would be taken. Her head drooped a little lower as she bent over the fence, that was all. It seemed so natural that he should say this, and she did not dream of taking it in any other sense but one. It was what she had been waiting for since the morning that Venus was buried, the thing which she had felt would be, and which her mother and Netta had thought impossible. "You shall be the Man Friday, Dorothy," he repeated.

"Yes," she said, simply.

"Unless Blakesley cuts me out again," he laughed, little thinking that he was talking to a child and being listened to by a woman. "But I don't believe he will," he added, carelessly.

"No," she said. He went in soon afterwards; for Mr. Woodward came home, but Dorothy stayed there still, till looking round, she saw the sycamore-tree, and made her way to the rickety seat beneath it, then she put her hands over her eyes, and swayed to and fro in the twilight. "Oh, I am so happy!" she said, softly and gravely, to herself; "I am so very happy!"

(To be continued.)

CHRISTIAN GRACES.

BY THE REV. G. A. CHADWICK, M.A., RECTOR OF ARMAGH.

PRAYERFULNESS.

"Continuing instant in prayer."—Rom. xii. 12.

THIS paper is not concerned to deal with objections urged by sceptics against prayer. They bid us look at the firmly settled order of the universe, and blush for our belief that human prayers can alter the machinery of existence. We reply that we never ask to alter the machinery, but only the results of that machinery, only the train of events which is continually altered by requests made to our fellow-mortals. We grant that successful prayer would be impossible if it implied the conception of a God striking down upon His world at uncertain intervals from outside the universe, but if He is as much within His creation as He is without it, then we should rather blush for the suspicion that prayer to Him need be less effectual than prayer to parliament or to the sanitary commissioners. These can alter, very materially indeed, what some people think to be too regular for God to interfere with.

For Christians it is enough to find that two kinds of prayer are recommended and even commanded in Scripture. One is habitual prayerfulness, the other is the exercise of stated prayers. One is a feeling, a temper, a condition; the other is an action which comes natural and easy to that state of mind, and is indeed its voice, its certain result.

Thus, we are bidden to pray without ceasing, and to continue instant in prayer, and St. Paul speaks of himself as praying for Timothy "without ceasing night or day." But we are also bidden, when we pray, to enter into our closet, and even to use certain words.

Let us see (1) how it is possible to pray without ceasing; and (2) how far this is from setting aside the more occasional and formal action.

I. Some there are who smile at the bare notion of ceaseless, unbroken communion between man and God. And there are others who do not smile, but sigh at a command that seems so far above, out of reach of our fallen natures. They will say, "Look at our times of rest, of business, of eating, drinking, and sleep. See how hard it is to keep our attention fixed upon our wants, and upon God the supplier, even in the sanctuary, even when all disturbing thoughts are carefully screened out by the place, the service, and the day. How, then, do you expect us to do always, amid distraction and secularity, what we find it so hard to do at all? The commandment" (they urge) "must be a strong figure of speech, a somewhat exaggerated way of telling us that prayer should be very carefully and frequently attended to."

But no one who truly reverences the inspired Word of God will content himself with such paltry and dishonourable treatment of its deep and far-reaching words. We know a metaphor when we see it; and we know that this is not a metaphor. Pray without ceasing does not mean pray often, and cease to pray every time. It means, let your life itself be a ceaseless petition, not always spoken in words, but always plain and real to the eye, if not the ear, of our Father in heaven. And, mark, that what we are so unready to think possible of prayer, because our souls are unspiritual and dull, is no more than what we see every day in other temporal affairs. You will not believe that you can pray always, because you have to eat, drink, and sleep? Yet you cannot deny that shame or ambition, or selfishness, or love, can lay hold upon the mind with just that firm and unshaken grasp which you refuse to prayerfulness. A man meets you in the market-place and transacts business, upon whose reputation, twenty years ago, some great exposure burnt an ineffaceable brand. He makes his bargain, he discusses politics, he laughs loudly at every passing jest. And yet there is beside all this, and through it all, such uneasiness, such a daunted spirit, such a watchful and unquiet eye, such readiness to explode in unreasonable rage, as proves how that old exposure clings to his spirit, never to be overcome. He does not always think of it, but it always stings.

And here is a man who has one set strong purpose in his life—perhaps a low and selfish greed, perhaps a great and generous achievement. Now surely you can see that central idea colouring his decisions and his words, many a time and oft, when he himself has not the least remembrance of it. For in all he does there is a downright earnestness, decision, unity of purpose, and clearness of thought, that only come from a mind made up, a single eye.

And once more, here is a man whose delight and joy has been long since covered in the mould of the grave-yard. You can tell it—surely you who know him at all can tell it—not only in the still and sacred moments when all that is gone lives again to memory and to the true heart which conquers time and sorrow and death—not only then; it mingles with all his being; it changes the expression of his face even in sleep, and the very tone of his voice and cadence of his laughter have something in them of the sound of funeral bells. You say, "He has never forgotten," not meaning, surely, that the buried face and silent voice are incessantly present to his eye and ear, nor even to his memory. But there is a place deeper down than memory; there is an unconscious and yet real communion, not of mind with mind, but of spirit with spirit, and soul with soul, while ear and eye and reason wander far enough—and there and thus the living is for ever in presence of the dead.

Or, take some simpler illustration. Look at the perfect confidence of a child's face when he is asleep in his mother's arms, and you will know that even slumber does not cut all communication between the soul and its experiences while awake. Look at the grandly calm expression on the slumbering face of some old saint an hour before his fading eyes open on the splendour of the great white throne, and then at the defiant scowl of the sleeping murderer, whose scaffold is already draped in black, and say whether these are alike, just because neither remembers or thinks of anything. They do not remember, but yet the taint or the glory is on their soul, and therefore one sleeps in the shadow of death and the other in God's marvellous light.

It is plain, therefore, that some things continue with us always, felt or unfelt, by night and day, in sorrow and mirth. They do not hold themselves aloof from our common life like oil from water, they blend with it like wine; and even when you pour in so much of the other element that neither taste nor colour betrays their presence any longer, they are there still. One question still remains. You ask, "Is prayer a thing which can thus mingle with our whole life?" and we can show you that it is. Consider what prayer means. Prayer is not the bended knee, nor the spoken word. It is not even, as the poet says, "the heaving of a sigh, the dropping of a tear, the upward glancing of an eye."

Wherever three things go together, there you have prayer—an acknowledgment of want, an acknowledgment of God's power to supply that want, and an appeal to Him, of any kind, to put forth that power to save.

